

R 808.005 LON
The London journal and weekly record of literature, science and art.
1845-n.d.

CEsm

945046

Special Collections
Hamilton Public Library

3 2022 17121436 0

THE

LONDON JOURNAL:

AND

WEEKLY RECORD OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOL. XVII.

LONDON.

G. VICKERS, 334, STRAND, AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

1853.

LONDON JOURNAL

LONDON.

PRINTED BY G. VICKERS, 334, STRAND.

INDEX.

PAGE

PAGE

PAGE

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

Pages—12, 22, 44, 54, 68, 92, 100, 116, 134.

ESSAYS.

CLXXXI.—How to Make Sunday Really Sunday	25
CLXXXII.—Power: its Divisions and Features	80
CLXXXIII.—Colonies and Colonists	107
CLXXXIV.—People Who Never Say "No!"	150
CLXXXV.—Morals in Trade	168
CLXXXVI.—The Boyhood of Great Men	198
CLXXXVII.—How to Make Money.—No. I.	219
CLXXXVIII.—How to Make Money.—No. II.	236
CLXXXIX.—How to Make Money.—No. III.	250
CXC.—Popular Songs.—No. I.	301
CXCI.—The Last Waterloo Banquet	314
CXCII.—Popular Songs.—No. II.	333
CXCIII.—Mesmerism	358
CXCIV.—Popular Love-Songs	381
CXCV.—Temple Bar	395

FACETIÆ.

Abernethy and Liston	14
Accident	270
"Adam, Where art Thou?"	126
Adulterations	398
Advance of the Turks	350
Advancing Philosophy	190
Advertisement	62
Advertisement Duty	158
Advice	206
Advice of an Old Lady	110
Advice to an Authoress	206
Advice to a Traveller	254
Advice to Young Ladies	94
Ah! Come, Rapida!	367
Airs of Sims Reeves	175
Alarming Elevation of Spirits	159
Alarming Invention	78
Alarming Sacrificers	47
Alexandre Dumas	158
A Little Farm well Tilled	14
All Smoke	239
All the Berries	175
"Alone in his Glory"	158
American Story	16
Amusing Cure for Drunkenness	78
Amusing Perplexities	238
Anachronism	126
Anderson, the Wizard, Sold by a Yankee	111
Anecdote of Macklin	303
An Emperor's Joke	95
Another Grievance	399
Another Rap at the "Rappers"	239
Anticipation Better than Enjoyment	238
Antiquarian Advertisements	350
Antiquity of Coalition	223
Anything but a Billot-Doux	62
Anything but Curious	110
Anything but That	334
Appropriate	175
Appropriate Punishment	270
Ardent Affection	126
Arithmeticians and Book-keepers	303
"A Rolling Stone Gathers no Moss"	46
As it Should be	159
"A Son of a Gun"	78
Aspiration of a Husband	334
Asounding	239
A Treat	14
Attractiveness of Ladies	142
Auctioneer's Motto	158
Australian Banking System	30
Australian Crochets	75
Author of Scotch Beer	383
A Wag	14
Awkward Mistake	398
Babies	350
Bachelor's Con.	270
Bachelor's Valentine	126
"Barber Pole" Pattern	350
Barefaced	206
Barrel Organ	319
Barrister Matched	382
Bass Viol	190
Battle-Eve at Chertsey	367
Begging Impostors	223
Be Good-Natured	174
Below Par	110
Best Lord Mayor's Screened	95
Best Safety-Valve	190
Betting-House Nuisances	254
Billingsgate Fish Market	175
Black Eyes Concealed	270
"Black Gentlemen's Cravats"	206

Board and Lodging for Murderers	255
Boiling Eggs	158
Book-keeping Taught in One Lesson	14
Branch of Education	303
Bred to their Business	286
Bridal Fracas in Paris	79
Bride 580 Years Old	398
Bull	174
Bull, by Mr. Calhoun	222
Burning Shame	30
Buying his Own Boots	382
By no Means Bad	350
Cabbage	255
Californian Living	142
California Sandwiches	350
"Call up Lemon!"	286
Carrying his Trunk Before him	47
Case in Pint	399
Case of Russian Leather	350
Catechism of the Fine Arts	190
Caught in the Rain	350
Causes and Effects	286
Chancellor's Dream	239
Change for a Guinea	303
Change of Name	16
Changing Opinion	16
Charles Mathews and Munden	78
Cheap Plan for Boarding	30
Chemistry a Valuable Science	110
Chickens and Eggs	318
Chicory and Trickery	62
China	158
Chinese Boot-jack	62
Chinese Rebellion	303
Chops and Stakes	222
Christmas Incident	14
Civilisation	286
Clever Clown	222
Clock Calculation	382
Cockneyisms	366
Coleridge in Love	350
Colt's Revolvers	126
Common Case	270
Complication of Disorders	174
Compliments Matrimonial	238
Con. for the Million	142
Conservative and Radical	254
Consistency	271
Constant Dripping	334
Convenient Religion	142
Copley and the Three Wives	303
Costume of Nature	110
Cottle and Wordsworth	206
Counsel and Witness	366
Counting the Pigs	398
Court Card	47
Court House	303
Court Scene	46
Cow and Calf	174
Crows' Court-Martial	286
Curing Fish	158
Curious Answer to a Text	16
Curious Penalty	158
Curious Result	239
Curran and Chancellor Clare	14
Curran and the Duel	303
Currency	239
Cut and Come Again	111
Cutting the Knot	334
Dainty Dish	207
Dangerous Freedom of Dogs	238
Dangerous Precedent	207
Daniel Webster and his Brother Ezekiel	47
Daniel Webster and the Poachers	20
Darn it	78
Dear Little Cherubs	63
Definition of a "Composer"	110
Definition of "Focus"	126
Definition of Humbug	270
Definition to a Hair	286
De Gooseitibus	271
Delicate Libel	47
Depreciation of Gold	239
Donald's Mistake	382
"Don't Rob Yourself!"	270
Dropping Down in Price	254
Drowned by Applause	142
Drunken Ass	175
Duel at Vera Cruz	94
Dutch Commercial Letter	366
Duty on Tea	367
Eccentric Surgeon	190
Echo	383

Editorial Cry	47
Effects of a Draught	398
Extraordinary Invention	206
Extreme Case of Conscience Money	95
Eyes	47
Eye-Wash	254
Family Scene	114
"Falling off in Horsemanship"	162
False Alarm	318
Fanny Fern	222
Fashionable Assemblies at New York	382
Fond of Company	350
Fontenelle	398
Foreman's Mistake	303
Forensic Eloquence	398
"Forgot her Other Name"	270
Forlorn Hope	190
French Joke	350
French Practical Joke	334
French Translation	158
French View of the House of Commons	222
"French Without a Master"	62
Fun and Fact	366
Fur Enough	255
Garb of Nature	30
Gasconades	398
Gastronomic Progress	190
Genial	110
Gentlemen Defined as Shadows	303
Genuine Eloquence	222
Genuine Stock	223
German Answer	303
Ghosts	366
Girls are Useful Articles	350
Girls Beware!	367
Give him his Due	271
Give him Plenty of Soap	303
Going Smith and Coming Smith	303
Going to Church by Proxy	30
Gold Above its Level	238
Gold-Digging Husbands	207
Golden Kisses	94
Good Bargain	110
Good Descent	46
Good Gaffer	270
Good Idea	222
Good Joke	286
Good Leaper	222
"Goodness Me!"	270
Good Old Times Restored	319
Good Place for Hunting	14
Good Price for a Lady's Tooth	110
Government at School	175
Government Labels	111
Government of France	238
Grand Jury at Fault	222
Grass from the Path of Rectitude	46
Greatest Work of Fiction	30
Great Indian Debate	334
Great Oversight	271
Great Regard	382
"Guilty or Not Guilty?"	222
Hair Paper at a Discount	110
"Halt!"	254
Handsome Men	350
Hard Drinker	158
Hard to Interpret	318
Harmonic Rapping	255
Harvest Moon	382
"Has your Sister got a Beau?"	158
Hats and Daguerreotypes	398
Heads versus Tails	110
Height of Absurdity	384
Hibernian M.P.	398
High Life in the Last Generation	94
High Price for a Kiss	286
Hint for Stupid Gentlemen	267
Hint to Mischief-Makers	63
Hints to Omnibus Passengers	194
Hint to the City Corporation	110
Historical Butcher's Bill	178
Hoaxing the Yeomanry	175
Holding Office Conducive to Longevity	142
Home and Abroad	382
Home Argument	190
Home for Irish Sailors	289
Hood's Epigram	222
Horrible Revenge	255
Horse-Dealing Extraordinary	30
How Curious!	303
How do you get on with your Arithmetic?	47
How to Coin a Joke	350
How to Collect the Pretty Girls together	180

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
How to Find out When it is High Water	175	Needleworker's Complaint	238	"Striking" Sign-Board	254
How to Increase the Size of your Eyes	303	New Aphorism	366	"Strong-Minded" Women	238
How to Judge	318	New Decimal Coinage	207	Substitute for Wild Duck	62
How to Measure the Distance to the Sun	142	New Definitions	366	Snett's Joke	142
Idea of a Great Man	94	New Machine	254	Suggestion	270
Illusion Dispelled	334	New Moon Divination	94	Sum for Somebody	286
Impolitic Politics	270	Not to be Endured	254	Sum for the Boys	366
Important Omission	30	Novel Mousetrap	158	Supernatural Amusement	223
Important to Housekeepers	31	Obituary of a Lady	174	Superstition in the Nineteenth Century	94
Increase of Salary	238	Objectionable Child	14	Suspension of the "Grape" Shot	175
Indelible Rouge	142	Obnoxious Member of the Carlton Club	175	Swapping Horses	382
Independent Country Editor	78	Obtuse Boy	286	Sweeps versus Geese	62
Introduction	398	Obvious Initials	223	Sympathy	350
Invitation to Tea	255	Old Proverbs	382	Table-Moving	ib.
Jack Shaw	62	One (Perhaps) in Ten Millions	319	Tacitus	78
Jockeyship	398	One Tongue Sufficient for a Woman	255	Tax on Bachelors	158
Jocose Boarding-House Keeper	382	Our View of the Turkish Question	383	Tell-Tale Pin	382
Jonathan Trying to Turn the Tables	190	Our National Defences	94	Temperance Frolic	47
Judge Caught Napping	158	Paddy and the Pill-Box	334	Test of Good Humour	383
Judicial Wit	366	Paddy's Watch	271	The First Expense	62
Jumping Cardinal	126	Patience and Late Hours	398	The French Emperor	94
Just Cause and Impediment	318	Patience Exhausted	158	The "Guards" in their Element	174
Keen Retort	175	Pattern Wives	351	The Press and the Empress	63
Keep Clear of the Law	14	Pay as you Go	398	There's Nothing Like Leather	14
Killing Time	78	Peace Movements	94	The Ultima Ratio	47
Kill or Cure	126	Pecuniary Demands	399	The Wizard and the Sheriff's Officer	30
King of the Island	230	Penitence	286	Things Extremely Difficult not to Lose on a Railway	14
Knotty Point	95	Perpetual Motion	382	Thrashing Wild Oats	30
Ladies' Stockings	190	Pertinent	142	Three Crowns	270
Lady Officer	398	Philanthropic Profession	239	Three-Pennyworth of Cholera	238
Lawyers	158	Photography Anticipated	190	Three Things a Woman Cannot Do	ib.
Lawyer's Opinion of Law	399	Playing the "Heavy Business"	62	Timely Arrival	14
Lawyer's Petition	ib.	Pleasant	350	"Tis False!"	318
Laying it on Thick	286	Pleasant Affliction	318	Two Things Looming in the Future	319
Lay of the Last Minstrel	62	Pleasures are Fleeting	158	Turning a Penny	14
Leader of Fashion	142	Pocket Legislators	303	Turning the Tables	190
Legal	239	Poets seldom make Good Astronomers	126	"Tyrants Never Sleep"	206
Legal Sharpness	142	Police Regulations	175	Understanding and Patience	255
Letters from Hayti	158	Political Truism	14	Unfailing Omnibus Characteristic	334
Light Land	398	Political Wood Engraver	95	Unwholesome Truth	95
Light Summer Hats	334	Poor Old Nobility	270	Urgent Case	30
Linen—Mark it	382	Posthumous Epistle	206	Use of a Wife	142
Liquor Law in Sweden	383	Poultry Mania	239	Variety is Charming	62
List of Indexes	303	Precocious Juvenile	222	Vaulting Ambition	94
Little Fable on Policy	350	Prejudices	126	Vegetarianism Extraordinary	30
Little Political Game of Spelling	334	Prime Joke	142	Vegetative Ideas	126
Livery of London	207	Prince Menschikoff's Mess	334	Voltaire and his Secretary	223
Livery of the City of London	367	Printed Sermons	398	Voltaire and Piron	303
Locomotive City	46	Problem for a Place-Hunter	95	Vulgar Error	271
Locomotive named "I Still Live"	110	Problem in Table-Moving	367	Waiting for Mature Age	270
Logic	14	Professional Pomposity	366	Wanted	318
London Barber's Advertisement	255	Progressive	ib.	Wanted, a Gentleman, for Breakfast and Tea	94
Long and Short of it	206	Progress of Poultry	63	Wanted, Immediately	238
Long Courtship	238	Prompting the Prompter	158	Warm Fowls	95
Long Measure	30	Provoking	398	Warm Reception	366
Long Range for the Peace Society	142	Pun for the Prime Minister	223	Warning to Young Ladies	30
Look at This—and then Faint	46	Puritan Preachers	94	Warranted to Wash	190
Looking out in Time	62	Psalm of Life	238	Weak Women	238
Logacious Tailor	318	Quack Compositions	206	Wedding Divination	398
Lord Peterborough and the Canary	206	Quadrilles for the Ceiling	239	Weight of Hearts	238
"Love in the Moon"	14	Queer	254	"Welcome Little Stranger"	142
Love of your Specie	254	Queer Consolation	350	Well-Disciplined Soldier	239
Lovers' Madness	14	Queer Dishes	398	Western Editor	286
Love's Labour Lost	47	Questionable	271	Western Farmer	14
Low-Spirited People	94	Questionable Sport	14	Wet and Dry	190
Lucky Individual	382	Questionable Wish	78	What a Jewel	318
Macaboy Snuff	78	Question for a Debating Society	383	What an Invading Army might Destroy in London	95
Macready's Rehearsal	190	Question for Lawyers	175	What a Vegetarian Cannot Do	239
Magistrate Misbehaving Himself	270	Quick Printing	62	What Becomes of all the Governesses?	30
Magnificent Furniture	222	Railway Equality	78	What Comprises Man's Life?	46
Make-Weight for Advertisement Duty	255	Railway Safety	223	What is "Canvassing?"	350
Making Game of her	318	Raising Funds	190	What Islands ought to be Good Singers?	30
Man's Faults	174	Rat Exterminator	254	Who Should Join the Militia?	271
Marble-ous	222	Rather Dry	174	Who Wouldn't be an Editor?	78
March of Improvement	239	Real Sufferers from Free Trade	62	Why Don't you Marry?	110
March of Politeness	286	Reasonable Enough	63	Wives and Husbands	382
Marriage of Mr. Tremble to Miss Watson	30	Reason for Extravagance	286	Woman's Last New Mission	14
Marrying First and Axing Afterwards	286	Reason for Liking a Preacher	303	Woman's Rights	206
Matrimony and Friendship	303	Reason for Not Liking Step-Fathers	47	Woman the Wooer	303
Modern Duelling	14	Remarkable	14	Women and Flowers	126
Modest	62	"Remember the Poor"	46	Women and Physicians	110
Modesty	206	Reported Promotion	174	Women and Salmon	318
Moliere's Torment	158	Reputed Origin of "Blackguardism"	14	Women's Rights in Paraguay	62
Monkeys	382	Retort	398	Wretched Ignorance	126
Moral Suasion	366	Reversing a Proverb	286	Writing a Four Months' Note on the Ice	94
More Proof of Astrology	223	Reward of Politeness	318	Yankee and the Grand Duke	174
Morning Toast of the Maids	239	Running into Debt	46	Yankee Ingenuity	399
Most Buoyant of Waters	159	Russia and the Female Wig Party	367	Yankee in Love	318
Motives for Going into Parliament	366	Sam Slick and the Quack Doctor	318	Yankee Pedlar and Dutch Farmer	14
Motto for a Railroad Car	223	Sam Slick Hooking Lucys Gown	399
Motto for Dishonest Shopkeepers	ib.	Sam Slick's Caucus Meetin'	398
Motto for the Early Closing Association	286	Sam Slick's Notion of Reform	ib.
Motto of the North-East Wind	126	Scarce Articles	47
Medical Mysteries	238	Schoolmaster Wanted	110
Men of Leisure	78	Something "Like"	175
Men's Nursing	270	Something New	ib.
Military Law	286	Something New on Foot	174
Minding His Own Business	174	Something Serious	270
Miserable Fair ...	78	Speaking Without Thinking	222
Mr. Emerson	206	Speedy Cure	206
Mr. Hoe and Miss Handle	366	Spirit Rappers	223
Mrs. Partington	142	Spirits	366
Much Ado About Nothing	350	Spirits of the Deep	319
Mulish Obstinacy in Dress	207	Spread of Education	126
Museum Catalogue	222	Statistics of Dancing	366
Musical Catechism	190	Steam	126
Naming of Ships	78	Steam Apparatus for Shaving	238
Napoleon I. and Napoleon III.	238	Stooping Judge	110
National Affection	142	"Stop my Paper"	190
Natural Magic	319	Story of a Humorist	142
Natural Remark		Strength of Bad Habits	158
				GEMS OF THOUGHT.
				Pages—15, 31, 63, 111, 143, 159, 191, 207, 223, 239, 271, 303, 319, 335, 351, 367, 399.
				GENERAL ARTICLES.
				A Ghost Story	52
				American Slavery	43
				Anecdote of a Ring	132
				Anecdotes of Etiquette	215
				An Evening Party at Damascus	375
				An Heiress for a Sixpence	397
				Ascent of Mont Blanc	185
				Australian Crested Pigeons	25
				A Word About Wedlock	141
				British Census of 1851	316
				Buckingham Palace	201
				City Railway Terminus	105
				Communism with Departed Spirits	13
				Courage of the Fellahs	348
				Dress, the Index of Character	308
				Earthmen in South Africa	325
				Embarrassing Situation of a Wolf-Hunter	363

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Escape of Fontane	132	Madura	217	Handsome Present	239
Eton College	200	New Wing of Buckingham Palace	201	Hint for Tutors	375
Farmer's Weather-ometer	397	Northumberland Vase	329	"Home Diggings"	15
Farming in Australia	84	Palace of Sultan Khosroo	153	Horse-Shoes on the Church Door	111
Festival among the Negro Aborigines of South Africa	311	Papier-Maché Bird-Cage and Stand	281	How much Animals Eat	151
Festival in Sumatra	244	Pigeons from India	72	Idleness and Intemperance	287
Fight with a Jaguar, or American Tiger	108	Present Appearance of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham	120	Imperial Honours	143
Fortune Made from Small Beginnings	326	Quartz-Crushing and Gold-Cleaning Machine	393	Indians in European Dress	207
Fragment of a Letter	212	Railway Terminus in the City of London	105	Industry	223
Goura Victoria Pigeons	8	Ruins of St. Pancras Priory	232	Influence of Temper on the Voice	335
Great American Suspension Bridge	69	Sèvres Porcelain Vases	312	Instincts of the Hottentots	207
Great Exhibition in Dublin	249	Silver-Gilt Casket and Wine Cooler	328	Integrity of the Dog	383
Handwriting	121	Suspension Bridge Near the Falls of Niagara	69	Intellectual Ambition	223
Herne, the Hunter	109	The Artillery Camp	376	Interesting and Extraordinary Circumstance	95
How Bullfinches are made to Pipe	326	The Birmingham Central Railway Station	53	Interesting Precocity	143
How Murat Met his Fate	268	The Cavalry Camp	360	Inventions of the Chinese	327
How the Scotts of Thirlestane Came to Beggary	325	The Choirpotamus, or River Pig	56	Judge Not	383
How to be Happy	135	The Jacquard Loom	373	Kew Gardens	239
Indian Pigeons	72	The Kremlin, Moscow	169	Ladies and Looking Glasses	255
Interesting and Extraordinary Circumstance	95	The Retreat	377	Ladies Beware!	ib.
Interesting Discovery at Jerusalem	397	The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone	13	Ladies of St. Petersburg	20
Irish Carmen	326	The Sham Encounter	361	Largest Organ in the World	31
Ivan's Tower	213	The Zulu Kaffirs	364	Largest Tree in the World	397
Lending and Borrowing Money	397	Travellers and Guides Ascending Mont Blanc	185	Launching of a Ship	143
Letters from a Virginia Cousin	11	View of Eton College	200	Little Things	191
Little Children	324	View of the City of New York	137	Logic among Friends	351
Lost in the Prairie	42			Love of the Esquimaux for Tobacco	95
Marriage Customs of the Inhabitants of Mount Lebanon	377			Man Asleep for Five Years	360
Mary Stuart's Marriage with Darnley	8			March of Surgi-al Sill	143
Mr. Sands, the Air Walker	184			Martens of the Creation	ib.
Origin of Certain Words	72			Maternal Turkey	ib.
Phenomena of the Ebbing and Flowing Well in Germany	77			Military Power of Turkey	351
Philippine Islanders	295			Moral for Young Men	383
Price of Diamonds	292			Mount Etna in Winter	ib.
Priory of St. Pancras	232			Nelson's Heart	207
Romance of Real Life	340			New Theory of the Discovery of America	15
Romantic Adventures of a Paisley Body	200			Nineveh	191
Rome	265			Northcote, the Painter	223
Royal Visits to Remarkable Places.—No. IX.—The Crystal Palace	120			Note about Arab Horses	375
Scene in a Buddhist Temple in China	302			One Hour in the Bath	255
Scene in the Life of Torquato Tasso	231			Operatives of Stockport	189
Schools of Design, Finsbury Square	245			Origin of Brandy	95
Singular Habits of Celebrated Men	334			Otto of Rosses	303
Slavery in Egypt	276			Our Dinners	53
Snail Eating in England and Italy	190			Pastime	40
Statue of the Late George Stephenson	40			Pedestrianism Extraordinary	108
Strange and Impressive Custom	391			Perilous Situation	355
Take Care of your Health	271			Petitions Against the Opening of the Crystal Palace on Sundays	191
Tales of the Brahmins	89, 117, 153, 165, 277			Plain People	351
Temples of Buddha, at Rangoon	359			Postage Stamps	31
The Blind Asylum, St. George's Fields	233			Power of Music	159
The Camp at Chobham	341, 360, 361, 376, 377			Prayer at Sea	121
The Choirpotamus	56			Presence of Mind	31
The City of New York	137			Queen Victoria and the Missionary	335
The Cricket in the Wall	327			"Rappings" at Liskeard	367
The Crystal Palace	136			Read Carefully	20
The Enemies of the Oyster	180			Ready Made Shirts	287
The Great Central Station, Birmingham	53			Remarkable Clairvoyant Revelations	271
The Hair Apparent to the British Throne Under Instruction	377			Shocking Superstition	31
The Impromptu Coat	54			Silk	232
The Marriage Altar	287			Silver Mine in Inverness-shire	52
The Ocean	276			Simplicity in Dress	15
The Pattern Wife	268			Singular Instance of Courage in a Bird	79
The Prince and the Prelate	293			Singular Occurrence	31
The Progress of Russia	169			Skating Scene in Germany	351
The Toilette of the Empress	159			Slang Expressions	399
The Wizard and his Bottle	54			Slavery	79
The Worm Well	216			Snail Restaurant	239
The Zulu Kaffirs	364			Something to Swallow	47
Threshing-Floor in the East	135			Spain as it Was Before the French Conquest	207
Toussaint L'Ouverture and his Court	93			State of Sicily	95
Tremal Naig's Choultry	217			Statistical	143
War Steamers	87			Sudden Rising of an African Desert Stream	255
Wolfish Letter Carriers in the Arctic Regions	172			Take Care What you Say Before Children	143
Wolf Supper on the Prairies	360			Take my Horses, Take my Men	31
				Tales of Snakes	127
				Taste	271
				Test of True Affection	23
				"That Will Do"	79
				The Actor's Farewell to the Stage	138
				The Adjustment of our System	399
				The Agapemone	63
				The Best Recommendation	148
				The Brigands of Terracina	367
				The Dash	108
				The Duchess of Sutherland	319
				The Dying Soldier	175
				The Egyptians the First Inventors of Beer	223
				The First Opera ever Composed	191
				The First Pitt in the House of Commons	41
				The Inventor of Ink	367
				The Late Duke of Wellington	180
				The Late Mr. Turner, R. A.	143
				The Mother's Smile	319
				The Needle	255
				The Nile	287
				The Polka	127
				The Poor Author in all Ages	4
				The Real Sea-Serpent	31
				The Society of Ladies	367
				The Thoughts of a Day	239
				The Tomb of Pizarro	79
				The Wellington Funeral Car	63
				The Wife's Pint o' Ale	335
				Tom Moore's Certificate of Birth	15
				Touch of Nature	127
				To Young Ladies	244
				Transportation of a Wealthy Man	175
				Turkish Breakfast	15
				Tyrants of the Household	63

	PAGE
Vestiges of Creation	255
Walking under Water at Paris	399
Was Noah the Founder of the Chinese Empire	223
Wells Dry	31
Wet Season in 1848	ib.
What a Bride in Siberia Must Do	296
What the Ladies Owe to Tea	63
Which is the Tinker?	191
White Crow	31
White Negroes	72
White Roses	191
Witches Raising the Wind	47
Woman	228
Woman's Love	191
Words	239
Working Men	264
Worth Heeding	159

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Pages—16, 32, 48, 64, 80, 96, 112, 128, 144, 160, 176, 192, 208, 224, 240, 256, 272, 288, 304, 320, 336, 352, 368, 384, 400.

POETRY.

A Concert	10
A Fragment	15
A Lady's Hand	199
A Locket and Chain	71
An Old Story	296
A Poem	108
A Sweet Repose	383
A Tear	111
A Thought	223
Bad Luck	252
Bed-Time	95
Clouds and Sunbeams	348
Death of a Rose	334
Eva	87
Forgive and Forget	209
Friend Sorrow	319
Give me the Night	349
Happy Childhood's Home	238
Happy Hours	125
If Thou hast Lost a Friend	216
Isabelle De Croye	389
I See Thee Still	344
Labour and Wait	95
Let us Love One Another	372
Lines Written in an Album	143
My Own	324
Nature's Teachings	367
Oh, if all were Friends Together	7
Old Friends Together	148
Old Maids	143
Our Aim	13
Peace	292
Rhyming Dialogues	110
Sweet and Sad	47
The Blind Boy	239
The Chamois Hunters	308
The Days Gone By	268
The Death of the Warrior King	172
The Dream of Home	223
The Indian Lover's Song	232
The Last Letter	276
The Little Black Boy	15
The Nightingale	159
The Peasantry of England	312
The Picture of a Perfect Wife	111
The Poetical and the Practical	357
The Pursuit of Happiness	180
The Remembrance	164
The Ships of England	184
Three Sonnets on "Great Men"	20
To-Morrow	228
War	292
When Love was a Child	174
Why are Roses Red and White?	91
Words of Wisdom	307
Work	244

PORTRAITS.

Ebenezer Elliott	152
Mr. Dargan	264
Mr. Sands, the Air Walker	184
The Duke of Argyll	24
The Empress of the French	41
The Late George Stephenson	40
W. S. Woodin	93

SCIENCE.

Acceleration of the Communication with India	127
Acoustics and Ventilation	391
Adulteration of Drugs	204
Adulteration of Lard	102
Advice to Coffee-Drinkers	88
A Glass Column	343
A Hint	379
An Apparatus for the Interior of Bonnets, to Fix them on the Head	379
Anatomical Dissection of Alligators	390
An Austrian Land Storm	26
A New Poison	315
A Rare Fish	164
Artificial Illumination and Heating	267
Artificial Production of Fish	230
Astley's Life Boat	316
Average Duration of Life	216
A Wonderful Cinder	343
Baillie's Smoke Guards	71
Balmoral	390
Beltzung's Patent Bottle	11
Brass Tube-Making Machinery	183

Brazilian Diamond Discoveries	88
Captain Ericsson's Caloric Engine	43
Causes of Earthquakes	155
Chromatic Battery and Electric Light	88
Circular Weaving Frame	216
Coffee and its Adulterations	230
Cold	204
Cold Water Safety Steam-Engine	391
Colouring Collodion Pictures	295
Communication Between the Suffolk Coast and the North of Europe	252
Consumption of Tea and Coffee in England and the United States	366
Costly Food	295
Crayons for Writing on Glass	379
Cure for Cancer	390
Cure for the Potatoe Disease	11
Cure for Yellow Fever	379
Curious Calculations	390
Danger Attending Precocious Development	366
Danger of Taking Things for Granted	296
Daniel and Son's Patent Steel Shred Stamps Head	267
Death in the Jam Pot	26
Depth of the Ocean	155
Diamonds in California	71
Discovery of a Buried City	26
Discovery of New Sulphur and Salt Mines in Ireland	252
Discovery of Two New Planets	230
East India Teas	379
Effects of Clothing	252
Ericsson's Caloric Engine	55
Experimental Philosophy	216
Exportation of Beer and Ale	390
Falsifications of Food	204
Florida Paint Root	390
Fuel Superseded	216
Gas	25
Gas from Wood	164
Gas Lighting	126
Gold found in Arran	55
Glove-making Machine	391
Good out of Evil	183
Growth of Fish	204
Horological Cradle	279
How to Detect Adulterated Bread	88
Hydrophobia	379
How to Keep Eggs Fresh	327
Imports	11
Important Discoveries in Crystallography	252
Importation of the Precious Metals	315
Imports and Exports	204
Improved Crushing and Amalgamating Machine	252
Improved Steam and other Gauges	267
Improvements in Generating Steam	155
Improvements in Photography	327
Improvements in Preparing Oils for Lubricating and Burning	295
Improvements in the Manufacture of Tin	ib.
Improvements in the Preservation of Woods and Metals from Decay	158
Incrusted Boilers	327
Influence of Climates	127
Instantaneous Flowering of Plants	327
Iron Pavements	43
Ironstone Bricks and Pottery	315
Lacon's Boat Lowering Tackle	141
Law of Copyright	183
Legumin Cheese	390
Lewthwaite's Patent Numbering and Marking Machine	231
Lime Water for Hens	267
Locomotive Tables	231
Lunatics	295
Maccaroni Flour	327
Manufacture of Cotton	71
Manufacture of Paper from the Refuse of Sugar-Canes and Cow-Houses	343
Mexican Mode of Teaching Horses to Step out	26
Milk as a Manufacturing Ingredient	315
Mr. Hobbs and the English Locksmiths	391
Multipotent Propeller	365
New American Rifle	11
New Combination of Metals	216
New Compound of Caoutchouc	252
New Description of Steamer	164
New Disinfecting Process	327
New Materials from Western Africa	183
New Motive Power	141
New Plastic Material for forming Various Objects	315
Novel Mode of Hatching Chickens	279
Nutritious Value of Food	296
On the Purification of Sulphuric Acid from Nitric Acid	379
Ordnance Survey of Scotland	230
Oysters	ib.
Paint for Brick Houses	231
Patent Flour Mill	71
Patent Light Reflectors	ib.
Post-Office Notice	327
Power of Sight in Birds	155
Power's Patent for Silvering all Sorts of Metal and of Glass	391
Prevention of Incrustation in Boilers	25
Prevention of Smoke	43
Professor Faraday on Table Moving	380
Proposed Method of Restoring Blackened Portions of Oil Paintings	26
Purification of Oleic Acid, and its Application to Manufacturing Purposes	296
Railroads	216
Range of the Human Voice	315
Rapid Filter	ib.
Rats	295

	PAGE
Relative Purity of Different Descriptions of Artificial Light	366
Remedy for the Sting of Bees	343
Rhubarb Wine	315
Rope-making by Machinery	379
Rusty Iron	183
Salt and Sea Water	366
Samuelson's Patent Digger	267
Sand	127
Sanitary Dangers	252
Saxon Cleanliness	102
Screw v. Paddle	315
Sea Sand for Mortar	164
Sewing by Machinery	379
Ship Building	102
Ship Building on the Clyde	204
Silk	365
Singular Case of Spontaneous Combustion	ib.
Singular Geological Fact	343
Statistical	295
Swallows	379
Tax on Coals	71
Tea at Home	279
Test of the Purity of Ultramarine	379
The Chemistry of Nature	327
The Collodion Photographic Process	204
The Degrees of Sleep	252
The Dome of St. Paul's Cathedral	183
The English and Belgian Submarine Telegraph	316
The Largest Merchant Steamer in the World	127
The Longest Straight Line in the World	164
The Parisian Exhibition Building	ib.
The Reaping Machine Invented by a National Schoolmaster	103
The Refraction of Sound	279
The Rhubarb Plant	295
The Salt Trade	327
The Schools and the Royal Scottish Academy Exhibition	216
The Ship Worm	155
The Stereoscope	379
The Telegraph Lines of the World up to 1853	43
The Undulatory Theory of Light	343
The Wax Insect Tree	391
The Weed	343
To Mend Iron Pots	252
Tooth Combs	183
To Remove Sulphuric Acid Stains	315
To Restore Frozen Plants to Life	71
Trigonal Water Mills	279
Triumph of Genius	26
Useful Invention	391
Vital Point	216
Vulcanised India Rubber and Gutta Percha	231
What Steam has Done	11
White's Hydro-Carbon Cannel Gas	55
Whittington's Stone	164

SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION IN DUBLIN.

Pages—280, 281, 296, 297, 312, 313, 328, 329, 344, 345, 373, 392, 393.

TALES.

A "Chink in the Shutter"	141
A Frolic with Fortune	331
A Lesson to Matchmakers	316
Allan Menteith	218
Do Human Hearts Break?	310
Faith and Fortune	138
Father Bromley's Tale	105
Feelings and Fortune	69
Henry Bibb	297
How Old are You?	220
Is Patience a Virtue?	234
Legend of Blarney Castle	396
Mother and Daughter	186
My Ghost	124
Neglecting a Fee	58
Sense, Common and Uncommon	170
The Charm	204
The Estrangement	74
The Falling Star	148
The First of April	228
The German Student's Story	362
The Last Throw of the Dice	373
The Links in the Chain	201
The Mask	196
The Masked Bride	251
The Masked Marriage	266
The Merchant's Dream	119
The Neglected Daughter	284
The Park Gate	342
The Promising Daughter	389
The Queen's Dream	103
The Sewing Girl	156
The Sonnambulist	237
The Spirit Maiden of Rhine-Land	124
The Two Sisters	221
Who Wants a Monkey	123
Woman's Love	214
Wooing a Widow	348

THE FAITHFUL SLAVE.

Pages—245, 260, 281.

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

WITH TWENTY-FIVE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Pages—1, 17, 33, 49, 65, 81, 97, 113, 129, 145, 161, 177, 193, 209, 225, 241, 257, 273, 289, 305, 321, 337, 353, 369, 385.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 420.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MARCH 12, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[MARTINGALE GIVING HIS FINAL INSTRUCTIONS TO HIS ACCOMPLICES.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LVIII.

His mind, like Time's repository, stored
With scraps of curious knowledge, gleaned
In the strange nooks and corners of the world,
Where solitary Wisdom hides her gems.
Science to him was a familiar thing;
The only mistress which knows no deceit.

THE ROSICRUCIAN.

THE village of Mortlake has frequently been noted for the singular characters who have taken up their abode there. In the reign of Elizabeth, it was celebrated as the residence of that learned charlatan, Dr. Dee, the alchemist, scholar, mathematician, and astronomer, respecting whom tradition has handed down so many curious legends. The house which he occupied, in the early part of the present century was used as a school; in fact, it has only disappeared within the last twenty years. On more than one occasion, Elizabeth rode from her Palace of Sheen, to consult its owner there. During her long reign, she manifested a confidence in the arch impostor which would almost lead us to question the masculine vigour of a mind which procured for its possessor, not only from her courtiers and flatterers, but from poets and grave historians, the epithet of "England's Lion Queen." In an old mansion, which is still standing, Colonel Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, resided—there is even reason to suppose that the Protector himself occasionally inhabited it; for the house still goes by his name. It is a singular old place: an oak-panelled room is shown as the bed-chamber of the great regicide; leading from it is a secret staircase, or rather the remains of one, which communicates with the vaults below; from whence a subterranean passage—part of which we have explored—is reported to extend to the opposite side of the Thames.

This was the house which, by the direction of Meeran Hafaz, Colonel Mowbray had taken, and to which it was intended to remove his niece, for the furtherance of their unprincipled design against her happiness. The place was well suited for such a purpose: high walls surround the gardens on either side, and the wings are joined by an iron grille and gates, which extend the entire length of the main body of the building, of which several of the upper rooms, judging from the grated windows and the massive bars still remaining on the outside of the thick oaken doors, have been used as prisons.

Most of the localities in England which have been rendered remarkable by traditions, either of superstition or crime, influence in some degree the character, feelings, and opinions of their inhabitants. Thus the Protestant citizens of Glastonbury are devout believers in the miraculous thorn in the ruins of the ancient abbey of that city—which thorn is said to put forth leaves and flowers on the anniversary of the birth of the Saviour; the country-people near Bury St. Edmund's still think it unlucky for a bridal party to pass over the bridge under which the patron saint of the town was slain by his pagan enemies, and frequently go miles to avoid it; the Cornish miners retain a peculiar veneration for St. Michael, who has given his name to their picturesque mount; and at Durham, many will be found to assert that St. Cuthbert, who was so capricious in the choice of his burial-place, keeps watch over the stately pile where his ashes finally repose.

It is not therefore to be wondered at, if the inhabitants of Mortlake, who retain many confused traditions of Dr. Dee and his marvellous stone, even at the present day are slightly tinged with superstition. It is a common opinion amongst them, that Cromwell House is haunted; and even those who affect to laugh at the supposition, preter, at night, walking a considerable distance out of their road, to passing near it.

The arrival of so singular a personage as the Khan set all the tongues of the village in motion. The house he had taken was detached from the street by a large field, at the bottom of which it stood. He received no visitors, employed no servant, spoke with no one; twice every week the Richmond carrier deposited at his gate a basket, supposed to contain his provisions. The only thing positively known respecting him was, that he had a cage with two enormous serpents in his room,—some said he worshipped them; others, that, by a compact he had made with a certain dark personage, he was doomed, as the price of his services, to nourish them with his own blood,—and an enormous tortoiseshell cat—as they styled the hunting-leopard.

From their error respecting the cheetah, we may imagine that, forty years ago, a menagerie had never, or very rarely, visited the place. So great was the curiosity and excitement, that the rumour of Cromwell House being about to be inhabited scarcely caused an inquiry as to the name of the new occupant; nothing was talked or thought of but the Khan.

The renegade was seated in his lonely chamber, near a table on which were several skulls, which, to all appearance, had but lately been the seat alike of life and reason, for the hair and flesh still adhered to them; beside him were scattered several surgical instruments; whilst in the centre of the room was a singular-looking frame—consisting of two semicircular pieces of wood, lined and padded, capable of being opened or shut by means of screws: the height of the machine was just sufficient to inclose the head of a person of moderate height seated in the chair to the back of which it was attached.

The cage, with the two serpents, stood by the window; the cheetah, with its chain and collar, was attached to a staple at the opposite end of the apartment.

With a thoughtful air the solitary inmate rose, and, taking one of the heads in his hand, placed it in the frame, and screwed the machine till the skull was so firmly held, that, had it been attached to a living body, it would have been impossible for the owner to have moved it a single line, or shrunk from any torture or operation which the Khan might have thought proper to inflict.

He next seized a large wooden mallet: just as he raised his arm, with the evident intention of striking a severe blow, there was a gentle tap at the door of the cottage. Throwing a cloth over the machinery, he replaced the mallet upon the table, and quitted the room; but returned almost immediately afterwards, accompanied by a thin, weather-beaten old man, with sharp, prying eyes, and frosty-looking features. The visitor carried a faded, rusty-black velvet bag in his hand, which had all the appearance of having been made out of an old pall.

He was the sexton and gravedigger of Mortlake.

"You have kept your promise," observed the Khan.

"Ay!" replied the old man, "although I am far from being assured that it is the part of a prudent man, or even of a good Christian, to do so: were it to become known in the village, I should not only lose my office, but run the risk of being torn in pieces by the women and boys of the place!"

"Fear not!" said the Khan. "I shall not betray you!"

The sexton eyed him with a half-terrified, half-serious air, as he proceeded to open his bag, and place three heads, recently severed from their bodies, but evidently not till after death, upon the table.

"There is little danger of your betraying me!" he replied; "since the consequences would be as fatal to you as to myself: they would burn you alive in your retreat! They already say —"

He paused, as if fearful of offending, and hesitated.

"Well!" said the Khan, "what do they say? Speak freely! Think you I have lived to these years, to feel either surprised or angry at the gossip of a set of ignorant villagers?"

His visitor looked round the room, as if he feared that the echoes of the lonely chamber would repeat his words, and, lowering his voice, demanded if he had ever heard of the famous Dr. Dee.

"Frequently," was the reply; "he was one of the most learned men of the age in which he lived, and, like myself, devoted himself to the pursuits of natural science."

"Natural science!" repeated the man.

"And forbidden, also," continued the renegade; "he was one of those enthusiasts who deceive others, being themselves deceived. But what of him?" he added, in a tone of surprise—for he could not comprehend how a fellow like the sexton should have ever heard of the mystic charlatan.

"He died in Mortlake!" said his visitor, with a knowing air.

"Oh! true—true! I recollect—it was here that Queen Elizabeth used to visit him!"

"Of course you recollect it—you must!" exclaimed the terror-stricken gravedigger, who considered the words of the Khan as a confirmation of his suspicions.

"I have read so," observed the renegade.

"No doubt!" continued the old man, "perhaps you can tell where he was buried? No stone marks the spot; and I have heard the rector say there is no mention of it in the registers!"

He to whom these questions were put, and observations made, looked up, as if to ask why the burial-place of the renowned alchemist should be a point of interest to him.

"I know!" continued the speaker.

"You?"

"I! And if you would like to see yourself again —" correcting himself, he added, "that is, if you have any curiosity to visit the old church, I will point out to you the spot where his body is concealed—for it can scarcely be called buried. I made the discovery years ago, but never had the courage to raise the lid of the old wizard's coffin. Is there any gold in it?"

"I should think not," replied the Khan, with a faint smile; for he had heard of a ridiculous idea, broached by the gossips of the parish, who had taken it into their heads that he was no other than Dr. Dee himself, returned in spirit to haunt the scene of his former achievements.

"Of course you must know!" observed the sexton, with an air of disappointment—for he had entertained an idea that the renowned philosopher and alchemist had been buried with his treasures.

"At least we can ascertain," said the renegade, who felt curious to see the last resting-place of a man respecting whose place of interment so much mystery had been observed, and inspecting his remains. "But, whatever the coffin may contain, I promise not only not to dispute the prize, but to reward you for your compliance with my request."

At the word reward the eyes of the old man glistened, and he glanced at the three cadaverous-looking heads which he had so lately placed upon the table. The Khan understood him, and counted several pieces of gold into his eager hand, the fingers of which were lean and crooked as the claws of a vulture.

"Are you satisfied?" said his employer.

A reluctant "yes!" to which the hungry looks still fixed upon the bag from which the Khan had drawn the coin, gave the lie to the old man's assertion.

"Will you want more heads?" he demanded.

"Bring me as many as you can procure; but I should prefer them from ayed men!" was the reply.

"No doubt!" thought the sexton—who fully believed that the speaker employed them, as Friar Bacon is said to have employed the brazen head of old, to draw oracular responses from them—"the older the wiser!" Speaking aloud, he inquired when the singular personage who had so profitably employed him would like to visit the church; adding, that it must be at night.

The Khan advanced towards the window, and noticed that the heavens were overcast, and the distant thunder gave warning of a coming storm. Few persons, on such a night, were likely to wander near the churchyard, or notice their entrance into the sacred building.

"This night," he said.

The old man trembled, but avarice mastered his fears. He assented; but added, that his visitor must come alone.

"Who should accompany me?" demanded the Khan, bitterly. "I am friendless—know no one—love no one—and am beloved by no one! The blasted elm, at the end of the cemetery, is not more withered than my heart!"

"And most likely not half so old!" thought his visitor.

"Probably he planted it himself."

As it wanted rather more than an hour to the time, the sexton took his departure, under pretence of seeking the keys, but in reality to avoid remaining longer beneath the roof, which he firmly believed to be occupied by no earthly inmate.

"You have noticed," he said, as he was leaving, "a small oaken door in the side of the old church tower?"

The renegade nodded, to intimate that he had.

"As soon as the church has struck twelve, I shall be there," continued the speaker; "you need only push it—it will be unlocked; mount to the first chamber, there I will await you—it is not far from the place we seek."

After promising that he would not fail his appointment, the Khan conducted his visitor from the cottage, and drew the heavy bolt athwart the strong oaken door after him.

When he returned, he removed the cloth from the framework on which the skull was fixed, and was about to proceed in some extraordinary experiment, ceremony, or incantation, when he suddenly changed his intention.

"Not now!" he murmured; "there will be time after my visit to the wizard's grave!"

CHAPTER LIX.

Do not all charms fly
At the mere touch of cold philosophy?
There was an awful rainbow once in heaven—
Now we know its woe and texture; it is given,
In the dull catalogue of common things,
Philosophy will clip an angel's wings. KEATS.

It is an established and somewhat melancholy fact, that philosophy and science have destroyed much of the poetry of life: for every truth they have disclosed, they have at least deprived the world of one cherished article of superstition—one poetic illusion; driven from towns and cities, the wild and marvellous took refuge in their stronghold, the villages and retired nooks of England; but even there they are being gradually assailed and defeated in detail.

The lover of the mysterious and terrible, at the present day must travel far from the busy haunts of men, before he will meet with one tolerably authenticated ghost story. No sooner have boys and girls escaped from the nursery, than they laugh at its traditions; superstition is cultivated more as a taste than a religion; there are but few right-down believers. Pocklington Hall, which, thirty years ago, it was thought none but a priest could sleep in, would not now remain tenanted; since the trains have run five times a day to Windsor, the inhabitants of the place have lost much of their faith in Herne the Hunter. Our country cousins laugh at the idea of the lion on the top of Northumberland House wagging its tail when it hears the clock strike twelve. We remember once to have met a Scotchman, who pronounced the stains of blood in the apartments of Holyrood House, humbug. From that moment we looked upon the return to the ancient belief in ghosts, ever-burning lamps, treasures guarded by dead misers, and beneficent geni, as hopeless; and endeavoured to school our faith to modern opinions. After all, we fear that we have but partially succeeded. In an old house in the country, on a cheerless winter's night, the impressions of our early years return; and we are once more devout believers, at least till morning. How often have we wished, as the sunbeams streamed through the windows of our hermitage, that we could for awhile live under the poetic influence of fear and superstition!

How much that is magnificent in poetry and painting do we not owe to it! Milton, Dante, Caravaggio, and Shakspeare:

Oh! thou whose spirit most possessed
The sacred seat of Shakspeare's breast;
By all that from thy prophet broke,
In thy divine emotions spoke,
Hither again thy fury deal;
Teach me but once like him to feel;
His cypress wreath my meed decree,
And I, O Fear! will dwell with thee.

The storm, as the Khan had foreseen, broke, long before the hour of midnight, with fearful violence over Mortlake; the wind moaned and shrieked as it swept round the gables of the houses, and swelled into a perfect hurricane when it broke against the tower of the church—which tower, par parenthèse, is much older than the rest of the sacred edifice.

Despite the inclemency of the weather, he sallied forth to keep his appointment with the sexton. He could not rest: not that his mind was disturbed by the war of elements, but his blood was feverish; like most natures which have been crushed, or secluded from their kind, his heart had preyed upon itself; his wisdom was of the character which analyses the granite—not the flowers of the earth—and dwells upon the phases of death, rather than the beauties of existence; he preferred the morbid to the joyous.

As he advanced along the narrow path which conducted to the place of rendezvous, he paused more than once under the impression that he heard footsteps following him; but the raging of the storm and the heavy splashing of the rain he concluded had deceived him.

At last he reached the tower of the church, but not till he had once or twice stumbled over the turf-bound hillocks which crossed his path at every step he took. Pushing the door as the sexton had directed him, he mounted the narrow staircase, and entered a sort of bell-loft or chamber, where, by the dim light of a solitary lantern, he found the old man awaiting his arrival. The last stroke of twelve struck as he made his appearance.

"You are punctual!" observed the gravedigger.

"As death!" replied his visitor. "If I waste my own hours in dreams and idle fancies, I have no right to rob others of their time. Few, perhaps, have so much upon their hands as myself."

His listener shuddered, for the words of the speaker confirmed in his mind the vague, superstitious idea he had conceived concerning him.

"It must indeed be a sad thing," he thought, "not to rest in one's grave!"

Armed with his crow-bar and a lantern, the sexton descended the stairs, closely followed by the Khan. At the bottom of the descent, he pointed to a small mound of earth, which had evidently been recently scraped aside, discovering a small oaken door, studded with nails, and fastened by a bar of iron drawn across.

"Where does this lead to?" demanded the renegade.

"To a vault beneath the tower of the church," replied his conductor. "I discovered it many years since, when a mere youth; for my father held the office of sexton before me; and, I have heard the rector say, my grandfather before him."

"And you have kept the secret?"

"Religiously," said the old man. "In fact, I never saw how I could gain anything by revealing it. Many have asked me for the resting-place of Dr. Dee, but my finger refused to point it out till it was touched by gold."

With a look of contempt, the Khan motioned him to proceed. By their united efforts they raised the door, which opened from the floor of the tower like a trap, discovering a second flight of stone stairs similar to the first, terminating in a low, arched vault, which was evidently of very ancient date, the groining being exceedingly rude and massive.

The only attempt at ornament in the architecture was in the key-stone of the arch, directly in the centre of the chamber. It represented the head of an angel, with the wings furled at the back. The features had been sculptured by no apprentice hand. They were cold and passionless as death, and yet possessed that terrible style of beauty which appeals to the imagination rather than the reason. As the Khan gazed upon it by the light of the torch—for he had brought one with him—and reflected that, by the account which his companion gave, his were the only human eyes which for half a century had contemplated the spot, he could have fancied that the ange of silence had been transformed into a stone, and trans fixed there as the guardian genius of the place.

"It is indeed a singular recess!" he said, addressing his companion; "is there no record of its existence?"

"None that I ever heard of," was the reply.

"Nor tradition?"

"None," said the sexton; "I only found it out by accident. I don't mind telling you how it occurred. Fifty years ago, I and a few lads of my own age used to steal out at night, and sometimes shoot a deer or some of the smaller game in Richmond Park. On one occasion we were hotly pursued by the keepers: I concealed my companions in the tower of the church. When the hue and cry were over they left me, but were too much frightened with the risk they had encountered to remove the carcass of as fine a buck as ever graced the feast-day of a bishop."

"Well?"

"Well for them, as you will hear, that they did so; for they were most of them taken in the village; but, as the buck could not be found, the justice was compelled to let them go."

"What became of the game?" inquired the Khan.

"I buried it," said the old man; "and, in doing so, discovered the entrance to this vault. So you see that prudence at first kept me silent. See!" he added, pointing with his foot to a few bones which still remained scattered upon the damp floor of the vault, "the beetles and the rats feasted from a haunch fit for the table of a king!"

"Enough!" said his companion, satisfied with his explanation; "show me the wizard's grave!"

His conductor pointed to a stone sarcophagus or coffin, which stood directly in the centre of the vault: it was of unusual size—almost large enough for a tomb. The renegade examined carefully the interstices between the lower part and the lid, and discovered that it would not be difficult to open it. With the assistance of the sexton, he introduced the crow-bar, and the ponderous stone rolled aside with their united efforts.

A rich aromatic odour gradually filled the vault.

Both of them approached to gaze upon the relics of the dead.

In the coffin, dressed in a long mortuary vestment, was the body of a man apparently about eighty years of age; a white, flowing beard descended to his girdle, which was of leather; the hair upon the head, which was covered with a black velvet skull-cap, had been closely shaven. The hands of the dead man were crossed upon his breast; upon one of the fingers glittered a costly ring.

Whilst the Khan stood gazing upon the singular relic before them, the eyes of the sexton wandered alternately from the countenance of the corpse to the features of his companion, as if he expected to trace a resemblance between the living and the dead.

"This," murmured the former, "is the end alike of youth and age—wisdom and ignorance! How many schemes filled that once busy brain! What plots, conspiracies—deceivers or deceived," he added, "it matters now but little which, since, dupe or duper, all that remains is ashes!"

Suddenly the attention of his conductor was caught by the glitter of the gem upon the finger of the corpse. With a grin of satisfaction, he stretched forth his hand to seize it, when that of the dead man, the instant he touched it, appeared to sink into his breast. The terror of the sexton became extreme.

The renegade only smiled. He was perfectly aware that it is no unusual thing for bodies which have been discovered perfect, to fall to dust at the least touch, or even on their exposure to the air.

"Rob not the dead!" he said.

Before the old man could reply, the door of the vault was burst open, and two figures, masked and enveloped in black cloaks or mantles, sprang into the place. The face of the sexton became suddenly blanched with terror, then rigid, as he fell senseless at the foot of the sarcophagus. His companion remained firm and calm, as was his wonted manner.

"What seek you?" he demanded of the intruders.

One of them dashed aside his mask, and disclosed the features of Meeran Hafaz. The other retained his disguise.

"Meeran!" said the Khan.

"Ay, Meeran!" exclaimed the young Indian, passionately; "whom you would betray! I know the interest you take in my rival's welfare—how already you have preserved him from my just resentment—the suspicions you have conceived against the warrener—the threats you have uttered!”

“Against him,” interrupted his former friend; “but never against you! I loved you till I found my presence was no longer pleasing to you—that I was a check upon your pleasures, though not upon your crimes.”

“Crimes!” repeated the young man; “recall the word!”

“Never!” said the renegade; “it is not my will to die with a lie upon my lips! Strike,” he added, “at the heart of him who watched over your infant years, who was your father’s friend! I shall not resist—my memory will avenge me!”

The masked stranger whispered a few words in the ear of Meeran, when the countenance of the Khan, which had hitherto been impassible, became suddenly animated and flushed with anger.

“Fratricide in heart,” he said, “if not in act!—raise your arm, or point a finger at me—dare but to make the slightest movement against my life, and I will circle thee in flames that shall consume thee, or cause the worm to gnaw the living flesh from off thy bones! Fool!” he added, “I may become the sacrifice of my own weakness, but not thy victim!”

As he spoke, he drew from his vest one of those small crystal phials, which are fabricated only in Venice, and stood ready to dash it to the ground at the feet of the colonel—before whom Meeran instantly sprang, as if to shield him from danger. When the speaker saw this, he slowly replaced the vessel in his bosom, at the same time murmuring:

“Not against thee! not against thee!”

The heart of his former pupil and friend was not proof against this unexpected manifestation of affection.

“Let there be peace between us!” he said, addressing him in the language of the East; “and let us converse calmly together.”

“I am always calm with those I love,” replied the old man.

“Answer me,” continued the youth. “I know thou wilt with truth—thou hast threatened the warrener?”

“After he had attempted my life!” said the Khan; “but for the man you hate I should have been numbered with his victims! I owe my preserver gratitude,” he added, firmly, “and will join in no plot against his happiness or safety!”

“And was this the only reason of your quitting me?”

“No other!”

“Hear me,” continued Meeran, whose opinions underwent a complete change from the explanation of the speaker—for Will Sideler had cunningly suppressed that fact in his narration. “Swear to me that you will never, by word, writing, or act, do anything to compromise my honour, or breathe a hint of any suspicion you may have conceived touching the death of Sir William Mowbray, and we are once more friends!”

The renegade remained silent.

“Do you hesitate?” demanded the young Indian, his eyes flashing with anger.

“No!” replied his quondam friend. “I solemnly swear—by your dead father’s memory, your mother’s name, and my eternal hope—never to breathe in human ear a hint of my conviction!”

“Enough!” said Meeran; “I know the man I trust! Farewell!”

Despite the remonstrance of Colonel Mowbray, who had far less reliance on the oath of the Khan than his companion, the speaker left the vault, without attempting the least violence against the life of the man whom they had jointly sought with the fixed determination of destroying.

“Go!” said the old man, sternly, at the same time pointing to the door; “the hour of punishment is but delayed! There is One who needs no proof, nor witness, nor confession—who sees into the heart—who prepares in secret the penalty of crimes like thine—strikes when the culprit deems himself secure, and he is gone! To Him I leave you!”

Without a word, the conscience-stricken colonel left the place.

No sooner had he departed, than the Khan began to take means to recover the old sexton, who still lay in a swoon at the foot of the coffin of Dr. Dee: by means of a pungent essence which he invariably carried on his person, he quickly brought the gravedigger to himself.

“Where am I?” faltered the still terrified wretch, staring wildly around him.

“With the living and the dead!” replied the renegade. “And—they—who are not of this world—the fearful beings who—”

A cold shudder broke his speech, and, with a trembling hand, he wiped the moisture from his brow.

“Are gone,” continued his companion. “Morning soon will dawn—it is time that we departed, too!”

By their joint efforts the ponderous lid of the coffin was replaced, and they left the vault together. They emerged into the open air just as the first grey streak of dawn began to pierce the veil of night; the storm had partially subsided, but the rain still fell heavily. The Khan drew from his vest several pieces of gold, and proffered them as the recompense he had promised.

“No!” said the sexton; “dearly as I love the glittering coin, I will not risk my soul to obtain it!”

The Khan smiled disdainfully, and cast it at his feet.

At an early hour that same day he departed from Mortlake in the same quiet manner he had arrived. None knew where he went, neither did he leave the least trace for love or hate to follow him—he was alone in the world, and had no leave-takings.

The next day all trace of the opening of the vault was effaced, and none of the inhabitants of the village ever suspected that the burial-place of the wizard had been discovered.

Our readers can comprehend, no doubt, why the old alchemist had taken such precautions that it should remain a secret: he feared, most probably, that his remains should be torn by a superstitious populace from their unhallowed resting-place—hence the doubts which many who have written of him have expressed as to the real spot of his interment. Some have contended that he was buried at Manchester, where he held a valuable preferment. We feel happy to have thus set at rest all further question upon the subject.

Few, if any of our readers, we are sure, will doubt it.

CHAPTER LX.

But vain my suit—my madness vain—
Though gladly from her eyes to gain
One earthly look, one stray desire,
I would have torn those wingers which hung
Like banners furled, and o’er that fire,
Unmoved, in heaven their fragments flung.

MOORE.

WALTER MOWBRAY had drunk from the eyes of the beautiful Therese Colonna the deep, intoxicating draught of love; nor was it long before he won from the fair girl the half-whispered, blushing avowal that his passion was returned.

It is by far the happiest moment of our youth—perhaps of our lives—when first the voice of woman tells us we are loved. The heart, like some vagrant bird which at last has found a mate, forgets its wanderings, and begins the era of a new existence—an existence so pure and sweet, angels might resign their immortality to share it—and gain by the exchange.

O youth—youth! generous, bright, and joyous youth! Age may dim, but not destroy the recollection of thy glorious dreams, or the love which hallows them. They follow us through manhood, cheer us in age, and, like the last lingering sunbeam, rest even on our graves.

Much to the secret annoyance of our hero, his friend could only encounter the object of his heart’s worship at the palace of the Princess Pauline, whose caprice for the young barbarian—as she persisted in calling him—daily increased, manifesting itself in words and looks which it was impossible for the most obtuse comprehension to misconstrue. To the Palazzo Borghese, therefore, he was obliged to accompany him—for Walter never found either its mistress or her fair charge visible when he called alone.

Henry was too generous to let his friend perceive the embarrassment and repugnance these visits caused him.

On the evening appointed by Father O’Hara to conduct the lover of Ellen to the religieuse, who he stated could give him the clue he sought to the lost heir of Sir William Mowbray, the two friends, accompanied by their now constant companion, Martingale, walked to the palace of the princess. To the latter, intimate as they had become, Henry had never breathed a word of his rendezvous with the priest: not that he mistrusted him, but the concerns and secrets of his benefactor were, in his eyes, too sacred to be confided even to the ear of friendship.

“Do you not intend to pay your homage to the fair Pauline to-night?” demanded our hero, addressing the traitorous emissary of his rival; at the same time glancing at the morning costume which he still wore.

“Not this evening,” replied Martingale, with a sickly smile. “I have received letters from England which demand an immediate answer.”

“Happy fellow!” exclaimed Henry, with a sigh; “your friends, at least, have not forgotten you! I sometimes think,” he added, “although the idea is too absurd to entertain it seriously, that my correspondence has been tampered with!”

“Great heavens! by whom?” exclaimed the traitor.

Both the friends regarded him with a look of surprise.

“By the officials of this government of priests!” answered the unsuspecting youth; “who see a conspirator in every harmless traveller, and start at the shadow of their own abuses, instead of endeavouring to reform them! I have but one enemy in the world, and he,” he added, “unfortunately, is in England!”

“Unfortunately?”

“Yes; for my absence leaves him at liberty to plot against my happiness and peace.”

“A rival?” observed Martingale.

As Henry made no reply the subject dropped, and they separated. No sooner had the young man entered the vast courtyard of the Palace of the Borghese, than their late companion hastened to a low osteria in the neighbouring strada, where three or four ruffianly-looking fellows were drinking: they caught his eye the instant he entered.

Hastily tossing off a glass of the excellent Montefiascone, which may be had even in the humblest of these places of resort, he threw down a paulo, and, without waiting for the bacochi which the man was counting out for him, left the place.

“Inglese!” said the man, with a chuckle, as he returned the coin to the till: every man who shows a disregard for money in Rome, being set down by the cheating shopkeepers and tradesmen as Englishmen; they cringe to us for our custom, and mock us for our gullibility. In justice to them we must add, that many of our countrymen render themselves ridiculous, whilst travelling in a foreign land, by pretensions to rank as empty as their own heads. We remember once meeting, at the table d’hôte of the Croce de Malta, in Milan, the son of a Norwich silk weaver, who gravely requested a brother bagman who called upon him to use no name, as he was there incognito. The guests before whom this little display occurred, took him for a personage. We, who remembered him from his childhood, at once set him down as a puppy.

Martingale, who had sauntered down one of the narrow streets leading to the Tiber, was quickly followed by the men whom he had left drinking in the osteria. As soon as he had reached a spot sufficiently secluded for his purpose, he stopped, and permitted them to overtake him.

“Good night!” said the leader of the ruffians—a tall, powerful fellow, whose jacket, with double rows of silver buttons, hung gracefully upon his arm. “Is it your excellency’s pleasure that we should complete our arrangement to-night?”

“To-night!” replied their employer, in a husky tone; for, despite his heartlessness, the frank, generous spirit of the intended victim had made an impression even upon his selfish nature.

“‘Tis well!” exclaimed the ruffian. “Where are we to wait for him?”

“At the Palazzo Borghese.”

“Perhaps,” observed another of the assassins, with a laugh, “we may have to wait longer than will suit our purpose.”

“How so?”

“Many a gallant,” added the man, “who visits the principessa at night, does not quit the palace before morning.”

This Martingale assured them was not likely to be the case. He then proceeded to give them directions which rendered it, as he thought, impossible for Henry Ashton to escape, describing more particularly a Spanish cloak with a white lining, which our hero had on when he parted with him.

“Enough!” said the leader of the gang. “I answer for the rest. Your excellency may sleep with the assurance of having an enemy the less in the world when you awake! But the reward!” he added, at the same instant extending his hand.

“There is half the sum I promised you,” answered Martingale, dropping a heavy purse into his palm; “the rest shall be paid when you have earned it. Are you satisfied?”

“Sì Signor.” replied the fellow, clinking the gold with an air of satisfaction; “you will not forget the buono mano?”

Pay an Italian what you will—exceed even the price he asks for his services—and he still demands his buono mano, or drink money. Their employer promised that it should not be forgotten, and they separated: the men to watch for our hero’s egress from the palace—Martingale to his hotel, to await the intelligence of his death.

Never before had the wretched man felt so dissatisfied with himself and the world. Perhaps originally there had been some good in his now reckless nature—he had been susceptible of manly friendship, confidence, and virtue; but lacked the courage to stare the lean spectre, poverty, in the face—to struggle with the hideous phantom which haunts so many from the cradle to the grave.

Accident had placed him in a false position: he had acquired luxurious habits and expensive tastes. Master of others, he was the slave of his own passions, which led him step by step to the abyss of crime.

Unfortunately for society, there are but too many Martingales in the world. Guilt or ambition finds in them ready instruments. Such men always have their price.

“I grow womanish and childish!” he exclaimed, as he paced with uneasy strides the floor of his apartment in the Via Condotti. “Why should I pity him? Would he—were my real character known, and my doom the galleys—feel one sentiment of commiseration towards me? No! And yet,” he added, with a sigh, “I cannot but wish this crime could have been spared me! Thank heaven, it is the last!”

In the gilded saloon of the princess, the two friends encountered the Duchess of Devonshire, who, being aware of the appointment which our hero had made for that very evening with the Capucin, regarded him with a look of surprise.

“What!” she whispered in his ear, “has the Calypso of Rome succeeded in detaining her Trolemachus?”

Henry coloured at the allusion, which it was impossible for him not to comprehend. Looking at his watch, he observed that it still wanted nearly an hour of the time.

“But the Capucini is a considerable distance from the palace,” answered the kind-hearted woman—who saw with regret the entanglement into which her friend Pauline was trying to draw him.

“I am a quick walker,” was the reply.

“Indeed you shall do nothing of the kind!” said her grace; “my carriage is in the courtyard—for I had not intended to remain long. I am getting tired of these réunions, where everything is said but what men really think and feel. No remonstrance,” she added; “you owe me some gratitude for the interest I have taken in the object of your visit: show me that you are sensible of it, by doing as I wish.”

To a request so made it was impossible to demur. Henry kissed the hand of the speaker, and hastily left the room, to avoid meeting the fascinating Pauline, who had just made her appearance.

“Troppo tardi!” said her grace, laughingly, as the eyes of the princess followed our hero from the saloon.

Her friend gave one of those pretty little shrugs which convey so much from a Frenchwoman; and, taking the arm of the speaker, began to make the tour of the room.

Walter—the happy Walter—was seated by the side of Therese, breathing in her heart’s young hope impassioned vows, and reading in her eyes the response her lips had trembled to make: so absorbed was he in his felicity, that he noticed not the departure of his friend.

Pity the world should ever wake
The young heart from so fair a vision,
Or Time the rosy fetters break
Which hold it in love's gentle prison.

ROBIN GOODFELLOW.

At the gates of the Borghese Palace the myrmidons of Robert Martingale still kept their fearful watch: the gold they had already received had sharpened their avarice, and given them an appetite for more; they were like bloodhounds upon the track—only to be satisfied by the life of their victim.

As the carriage of the Duchess of Devonshire passed through the portal into the street, one of the ruffians peered at the occupant: fortunately the lamps were unlighted.

"Tis he!" he said; "let us follow it!"

"Fool!" replied his leader, remembering his employer's description of the cloak with the white lining; "he has no cloak!"

Long after the vehicle had disappeared, they remained upon their post: the accomplices of crime are generally faithful till they have received the wages of their guilt.

CHAPTER LX.

In these deep solitudes and awful cells,
Where heavenly, pensive contemplation dwells,
And ever-musing melancholy reigns.

ABELARD AND HELOISE.

ON reaching the Capucini, Henry dismissed the carriage of the friendly duchess; resolving, should he return to the Palazzo Borghese, to do so on foot—for the night promised to be a fine one. His visit was evidently expected, for the porter conducted him, without a word, at once to the cell of Father O'Hara, who was awaiting his arrival.

"You are punctual!" observed the old man, smiling; "it is scarcely the virtue of youth."

"In the present instance, father," replied the young man, "it is the virtue of gratitude: so anxious do I feel to bear some tidings of his lost son to my benefactor, Sir William Mowbray, that I could make a far greater sacrifice than one night's heartless pleasure in the world to achieve my object."

"It is time that we should depart," observed the priest. "Depart!" repeated the hero; "is it not here that I am to meet the lady you promised to introduce me to?"

The monk gravely informed him that it was contrary to the rules of their order for any female step to pass the threshold of the convent, although their church, like that of the Dominicans, Jesuits, and Benedictines, was open to them for confession, penitence, and prayer.

"To avoid scandal," he continued, pointing to a robe and cowl similar to the ones he wore, "you must dress yourself as a brother of St. Francis."

"Will that be right?" demanded his visitor.

"I have a dispensation for your assuming it," replied Father O'Hara, meekly; "otherwise it would be sacrilege."

This of course silenced all further scruples on the part of Henry, who quickly transformed himself, outwardly at least, from a man of the world to a humble brother of the cowl and cord.

When the metamorphosis was complete, they sallied forth. The youth observed, as they passed the porter at the gate, that his companion extended his hand, in order to display a massive ring. He had noticed the same gem upon the hand of the general of the order, Micara, on the occasion of his first visit.

This simple circumstance convinced him how much he owed to the influence of the Duchess of Devonshire with Gonzalvi, the minister and alter ego of the Roman Pontiff.

"And whither are we bound?" he demanded.

"To the convent of the Theresians, near the Four Fountains," replied his conductor; "the most austere order in Rome. The will of the Holy Father alone would unbar the grating to you: without it," he added, solemnly, "it would be death to enter!"

The Theresians was the name of a religious house held in most dread in Rome, on account of the severity of its discipline and the austerity of its rules. For eight days after profession, the parents and friends of the newly-received nun were permitted to see her at the grating. That period expired, they never beheld her more. True, they on rare occasions spoke with her, but a sombre veil, dark as her destiny, was drawn between them.

Henry Ashton sighed, as he thought how many a young and lovely girl had been consigned to such a living tomb.

In 1836, we witnessed the reception of the beautiful and gifted daughter of the late Admiral Hartwell, who took the veil there: the impression—the sad, the painful impression it produced upon our spirits—young as we were at the time—we shall not easily forget.

Instead of entering at the gate of the convent, Father O'Hara proceeded to the door of the little church adjoining, which he unlocked and carefully closed, after admitting his companion. The sacred edifice was illuminated only by the light of a single lamp, which burned day and night before the altar, to intimate the mystery contained there. After a short mental prayer, the priest unlocked the massive iron grating at the side, and they penetrated where unlicensed foot had seldom trod before: all was silent as the shadow of death's wing.

Guiding themselves by a light which streamed through an open door at the end of a long corridor, they entered a narrow cell, in which the religieuse who had so singularly attracted our hero's attention and sympathy at the church of the Capucini was kneeling, praying before a crucifix upon a table, upon which were the emblems of mortality,

From a feeling of reverence, they stood in silence till she had finished her orison.

"Welcome, father!" said the lady, addressing the priest in English; "is this," she added, in a voice slightly tremulous from emotion, "the young gentleman of whom you wrote to me?"

The priest bowed in the affirmative.

"I have heard," she continued, with increasing emotion, "that your purpose in visiting Rome was to obtain some tidings of the son of Sir William Mowbray?"

A violent sob, which she vainly endeavoured to suppress, interrupted her further utterance.

"True, madam!"

"Not that title," whispered his conductor "you must address her as Sister Mary!"

"True, Sister Mary!" continued Henry Ashton, correcting himself; "of the infant whom his guilty mother robbed of his name and birthright, as well as the blessing of a father's love, when she fled with her seducer from the husband whom she had so heartlessly dishonoured!"

The canoness drew herself up to her full height, and fixed an indignant glance upon him.

"Wert thou a winged messenger from heaven," she exclaimed, "armed with the thunders of the judgment-seat, I would hurl back thy words, and say that they were false! Lady Mowbray was true to her marriage vow—true to the husband of her choice!"

"True!" repeated the astonished youth.

"She was betrayed!" continued the religieuse; "infamously, heartlessly, cruelly betrayed, by the man whom she had sworn to love, honour, and obey, had introduced like a serpent to his home—taught his young bride to trust as a brother! God!" she added, clasping her hands wildly, "where were thy lightnings, when the demon told her that her husband had killed a political opponent in a duel? that he was compelled to fly, to avoid a disgraceful trial, and still more disgraceful death? The confiding wife listened only to her fears—fled with the villain, as she thought, to rejoin the father of her child—was hurried from city to city, land to land, nor knew nor dreamed that he she loved was following on her track!"

"Monster!" said our hero, with a burst of generous indignation. "Give me some clue to track the ruffian! I will seek him at earth's remotest bounds, nor leave him till I have avenged her honour and my benefactor's ruined peace!"

"They are avenged," replied the lady, with forced calmness, "as far as human punishment can reach him!"

"Hush!" interrupted the priest, addressing Henry Ashton; "touch not upon that fearful theme! 'Vengeance is mine,' saith the Lord."

"It was mine, father. Why should the deed be hid? rather blazon it to the world—it may redeem my fame, but not my peace! When the ruffian," she continued, "found that the woman he had betrayed, but could not dishonour, had discovered his treachery, and spurned him like a reptile from her presence—that she scorned his loathsome love—he determined to complete by violence the triumph which fraud had failed to gain. He sought her in her chamber—the sleeping cherub by her side, who already began to lip the name of 'mother,' was no protection; and yet a fiend might have respected her: sorrow and helplessness had made her sacred!"

The generous-hearted youth uttered a deep groan of rage and indignation. He thought of the sorrow of his benefactor—his blighted manhood—his years of shame and suffering.

"The ruffian," continued the recluse, with still increasing excitement, "knew not the spirit he had raised! Scarcely had his hand touched the infant, to remove it from her side, than its distracted mother awoke. She was armed! God gave her strength and courage! There was a blow—a gurgling sound—a hot stream upon the floor! and then a groan! The false friend and the oppressor—the destroyer of my husband's happiness and my fame—fell, like a cur, dead—dead—at my feet!"

Overcome with the emotion which the recollection of the fearful scene she had described had conjured up, the unhappy lady sank back upon her seat.

Her auditor continued to gaze upon her with mingled admiration and pity.

"Forgive me," he said, sinking on his knees, "that, misled by your cruel destiny, I doubted even for a moment of your virtue! Let me be the bearer of these blissful tidings to your husband! God! how will his heart leap with joy when he receives them!"

"A dream—a dream!" uttered Lady Mowbray—for so we now must call her; "in this world we can never meet again!"

"But why did you not write to your friends?" inquired Henry; "unfold the fatal truth?"

"I was mad!" exclaimed the lady; "mad with my wrongs and suffering! The blood of the villain I had slain had set my heart and brain on fire! They beat as they beat now!" she added, pressing her thin hand to her pale brow. "Husband and son lost!—both lost!—never, never to be restored to me!"

Overcome by the recollection of her sufferings and wrongs, the unhappy Lady Mowbray fell in violent convulsions upon the floor of her cell.

"I will tell you why," said Father O'Hara, as he stooped to raise her; "for two years the victim of the treachery of Captain Lucas was the inmate of a madhouse!"

(To be continued in our next.)

THE POOR AUTHOR IN ALL AGES.—If the flowers strewed before me had but a little gold leaf on them, I should be the happiest dog in the world. It is strange that the people who value the silk so much, should not feed the poor worm who wastes himself in spinning it out to them.—Mogre, GENEVRA;

OR, THE HISTORY OF A PORTRAIT.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE three weeks' absence of Monsieur de Serval was occupied in fulfilling our engagement in "Ajesha," which was performed twenty nights, and obtained great popularity for itself, and glorious fame for us. Upon the return of my lover, my comet-like career was to terminate into marriage, and retirement into private life. Blanche still adhered to her resolution of remaining unmarried, though many good offers had been made her; and of the opinions of Inez in that particular, we had been duly informed by a letter from herself, describing her happiness, her pleasant home, and her husband's love.

The prophecy of old Acte lingered in my mind, and constantly haunted me; and Blanche also seemed painfully impressed by her words. I observed for some days before M. de Serval's return, that she would sit for hours—often all day—in absent thought, noticing no one—answering no one, if spoken to. Wondering at this neglect of my kindness, in her who had always from childhood manifested so much attachment to me, I felt a reproach for this coolness rise to my lips; but when I glanced at that calm, sweet face, and saw the pre-occupation of sad thought, all anger vanished, and, quietly coinciding with her wish, I left her to her meditations.

The night before the day on which my lover returned, I sought my pillow early; but sleep fled my eager embrace. Restlessly I tossed—I could not rest. Madame Bonni had a library of select works, fitted up in a little room on the ground-floor: I remembered this, and, wanting to amuse me till repose should come, I arose, slipped on an opera-cloak of blue satin, which happened to be lying near the bed, and, thrusting my feet in slippers, descended the stairs: all the household had retired. I got my book from the library, and was about returning, when, passing the door which led into the garden, at that late hour I was surprised to see it open. The resplendent moonlight streamed brightly through, disclosing my favourite seat beneath the blooming acacia, and those beds of roses so odorous, and that pretty garden looked so inviting, that I stepped out in the moonlight, and looked around. All nature was hushed to repose—that delightful calm which, unlike death, tells of prostrated strength presently to be revived. As I stood under the porch, gazing vacantly around, voices struck my ear. Who could be there at that late hour? I thought of robbers, and trembled with fear. A moment's listening reassured me: it was a woman's sweet tones I heard, and then those of a man in reply.

Far down the gravel-walk, at the extreme end of the garden—by the margin of a little fountain which had once played there, but whose source was now neglected, and obstructed by weeds and stones—I thought I perceived two forms. Determined to ascertain who and what they were, I stole noiselessly down the walk, to the shade of my favourite tree, which now cast its deep shadow far down the way, and, concealing myself behind the broad trunk, peeped from around it, and beheld, to my astonishment, Lord Glenfells and Blanche!

I listened to hear their voices. He spoke:

"Is not love the same? Can an empty ceremony—said over two lovers—render more binding the greatest, best, and noblest sentiment of our nature? Say, Blanche!—my beautiful one, my ocean pearl!—could the words of the matrimonial service make me more constant—make me love you more than I now do? You, my heart's worship, my idol! shall I not give you my whole soul—and what more can I do? If an unhallowed, a conventional form into which I was persuaded—forced; if that wretched link of earth binds me in earthly form to another—what matters it? Consider, love, it is the same, so long as we are constant to our attachment: that constitutes the perfidy. Oh! listen not to the world's prudence—to the cold calculations of a prudish moral. Let feeling usurp its place, and that I know will triumph—will plead my cause! Come with me this night—now; beneath the light of yonder bright silver! We will seek some other land, or a distant part of this country, where your fault—if that can be called fault which consummates my bliss—will be unknown, unheard of; and we will live in blessed harmony and love! Come, dearest—come!"

"No, no!" and her voice was choked by tears. "My love is all wrong—it is unhallowed! You are a married man! If I fly with you, disgrace follows me! You have a wife in England: you must forget me, and I you. Even were you free, would you marry me? Consider your rank, and I an actress!"

"Blanche, you mean not what you say, when you tell me to forget you! Do you really wish me to return to England, to my dull wife—ten years my senior—and the stupidity of home—a home like that? Do you really wish it? If so—farewell!"

He made a movement to turn away; but she clung still closer to his bosom, and buried her head there.

"Cruel! oh, cruel! I do not want you to go!"

"Consent, then, to go with me. Come, now, this moment! I will get a carriage, and morning light shall find us far away! Decide, Blanche, between my loss and my happiness! No answer? Blanche, are you dreaming, love?"

"No; I was thinking of Genevra, my faithful friend. What will she think of my conduct? How mysterious it will seem to her—how ungrateful! But I love her—oh, so dearly! She is the only woman who ever loved me, and I return her feelings with usury. Let me at least run up to her room, and as she sleeps, kiss her, and say farewell!—I feel, for the last time; and here—while the moon shines so bright above—while I consent to forfeit, or your sake, my good name, inviolate till this moment—here let me gaze upon those starry spheres, and call down upon her young head their resplendent blessings! O Heavenly Spirit! preserve her as she now is—beautiful and pure as the lily of the valley! Preserve her from that error of the heart which I now commit, which leads me to sin—knowing that sin! Grant that, in some future state, our souls may meet, may hold communion with each other, and be conscious of affinity! Holy influences of heaven—spirit of night and air—grant my prayer!”

I saw her sink upon her knees, clasp her hands on her white neck, and fix her eyes on the starry firmament. Thus she remained a moment, in a breathless ecstasy of thought, when Lord Glenfells gently raised her, and once more folded her to his bosom.

“Why this tumult of passion, dearest? What agitates you so?”

“Get a carriage: bring it round to the garden-gate. I shall soon be ready for you. Meanwhile, let me go and kiss her, and wish her good bye!”

I saw her break away from his fond arms; and, quick as thought, I retreated to my chamber, unobserved, as I had come. I would not for worlds that she should have known that I had overheard her. I got into bed again, and closed my eyes. She passed my door, and ascended to her own room. Her hasty steps sounded overhead for some time—hurriedly packing up, I suppose—then she again descended, and paused at my door.

The lock turned, and her sylph-like form glided to my bed-side. She stooped over me—imagining that I slept—and smoothed my hair beneath my cap with her tiny hand; then she kissed my forehead, and murmured:

“Genevra! dear Genevra! dear friend! when you awake in the morning you will seek me, but find me not: perhaps you may miss me for a little while, may sometimes think of me with love and kindness; I hope so. I go to a new life—the life of love! I go to accomplish my destiny.”

Once again she kissed me, then glided from the room. I heard her tell Lord Glenfells to bring the carriage round to the garden-gate. My room looked out on the street. I rose again from bed, and directed my steps to a little back room, near my own, which overlooked this gate. I wanted to see her go, though she knew not I was a witness of that departure. Her behaviour was an enigma I could not solve, and the reasons for which ever remained a mystery. If she was determined to become the associate of this man, why not go to him in broad daylight? What prevented her? She was her own mistress: no one did, or had the right to control her. She had long ago emancipated herself from her teacher's guardianship: what, then, was the reason of this secret flight? I knew not then—I know not now.

I had stood watching at the window of the room for some time, when I saw Lord Glenfells and Blanche emerge from the shadow of the porch, and pass through the gate; he put her in the landau, saw the baggage placed behind, seated himself by her, and, like lightning, they vanished from my sight.

The amazement of our hostess can better be imagined than described, when, on going to her room next day, she found it unoccupied—the stage and personal wardrobe of its fair proprietress gone also; and whither had she taken her flight? How strange the gifted child of song should yield to a momentary infatuation, and, listening to impulse, forgetting reason, abandon herself to such a life! What demon possessed her?

I had expected a violent storm on the part of M. Belmont; but, to my astonishment, he received my recital of the night's adventure with perfect indifference; and remarked, with imperturbable phlegm, that “it was her own affair: she ought to know best what she was about.” I had expected some surprise, sorrow, or at least an emotion of some sort; but I forgot that my teacher had been hardened in the ways of the world; and births, deaths, marriages, seductions, and every other evil thing, was a matter of course to him. He always maintained that every sensible person should be the best judge of their own conduct. Like a true Frenchman, he did as he pleased, and allowed every one else to do the same, unmolested, undisturbed by criticism or advice.

After breakfast, Madame Bonni and I sat together speculating and mystifying about Blanche's strange behaviour: the problem, however, could not be solved by us. It was past elucidation, and the more we talked, the farther we got from the point—the motive of action. While we were discussing, I was called away: my lover had returned.

I found him standing, hat in hand, facing the door where I entered—his face calm and happy in expression—and it warmed and brightened when I came towards him; catching my hands in his, he pressed them fervently, and, kissing me, asked:

“Have you missed me, darling?”

“Oh, very much, dear Rinaldo!”

“And I have been dreaming of you during my whole journey; I scarcely had sense enough left from reverie to attend to my business, and I have hurried back, leaving it half incomplete, to be arranged by lawyers.”

“But where is it you have been to, dearest?”

“Genoa and the frontier of Austria: an estate left me I was in danger of losing, through the perfidy of relations; but, thank heaven, their malice is defeated, and I am safe! Now, love, come, sit here by me on this sofa, and tell me all you have been doing. I left the night “Sonnambula” was to be performed: tell me about it; did it succeed?”

I described the opera, and singing; its success, and subsequently the disappearance of Blanche, with Lord Glenfells, the night before.

“Gone with Lord Glenfells! what an unwise action! But who is he?”

“A gay young Englishman, travelling on the continent for amusement. Dear Blanche, who would have dreamed, after all the temptations she has evaded—who would have thought she would have acted thus?”

“No one, in truth; it is very strange: your friend appeared so gentle, so indifferent to men's society, and fond of solitude; of all women, I should have thought her the very last one to commit so rash an action.”

“Blanche is one of those strange, impulsive beings, who, if you can only thoroughly warm and interest, will go all lengths to love and please you. Lord Glenfells has acquired a great influence over her, and she has consented to forego respectability, society, everything, for him. Oh, how I wish she had not done so! how I regret her loss!”

“She may repent this imprudence some day, and return to propriety; and you, do not grieve about her; summon your stoical philosophy, and practise your favourite aphorism. Never regret that which is past.”

“Yes, I know I ought to practise my precepts: philosophy triumphs over past and future ills, but present troubles overmaster philosophy.”

“True, love; a wise remark!”

“We were engaged to sing five nights yet, to complete our engagement. Now she is flown, I shall have to finish alone,” I observed, absently; for, notwithstanding my joy at seeing my lover again, my thoughts reverted to the absent Blanche.

Monsieur de Serval drew me gently towards him, as he sat upon the sofa.

“Come hither, dearest—come, sit close by me, your presumptive and future lawful protector; do not look so sad; cheer up, and let us talk of happiness and love, and delightful scenes and conversations, all in store for us in times to come.”

But I could not feel my usual cheerfulness, even for his sake, and after a slight conversation he went away, and I retired to my own room and my solitude; and then I wept for Blanche's loss, and Blanche's shame.

Nothing is sooner dried than a tear; and, as de Serval had said, my regrets could not restore her, could not undo her behaviour; and the deprivation of her sweet society made me fonder still (if that could be) of that of Monsieur de Serval; my whole heart now exclusively centered in him. I performed my last engagement on the Neapolitan boards, and bade adieu to the distinguished patronage of royalty, and the humble, yet heartfelt admiration of the people. The journals doled forth newspaper sentiment and lamentations at the dramatic loss; and private circles wondered at my good fortune. For myself, I did not think whether it was good fortune or not. I only knew, I only thought I loved him, and was willing to go anywhere, do anything, make any sacrifice for him. I will not describe the few weeks of courtship that intervened before my marriage: such scenes can only be felt, be experienced—they cannot be told; they are sad, yet sweet episodes in my memory; and though painful to recur to, yet mentally I treasure them, for that was my first love.

Signor, I married him; my wedding was simple, and celebrated with but little display; his noble friend, the Countess Bramanti, honoured it with her distinguished presence; and my guardian, teacher, and benefactor, Monsieur Belmont, gave me away. I was united to him in the pretty church of Sacre Cœur, where, some weeks before, I had attended mass with Madame Bonni: it was filled with spectators, every one wishing to see the new singer married; and my kind hostess kissed me at the conclusion of the ceremony, and wished me happiness, with tears in her eyes and smiles on her lips.

“May many blissful days and years be thine, fair girl!” said the countess, in her deep tones, as she swept her majestic form towards me, and clasped me in her arms; “may you love each other, and in that love be happy!”

Monsieur Belmont conducted me to the carriage which was to bear me away to my future home, in a valley amid the cloud-capt Apennines. Immediately on arrival there I promised to write to him, and regularly maintain a correspondence. My husband—how strange the word sounded to my ears!—joined me, and I was whirled away from the scene of my short-lived, yet brilliant triumphs.

Our journey to his mountain home occupied two days; and during the time my husband exhibited a frenzy of emotion, which terrified more than it pleased me. But the ways and loves of men were then Isiac mysteries to me, and you know their translation of the word love is rendered differently to ours.

On the evening of the second day of our travel, he told me we were approaching the Chateau of the Ravine, for that was the traditional name of the castle. The scenery was sublime, and, lost in contemplation and thought, reposing my head on his shoulder, I silently admired it.

Stupendous rocks, rising perpendicularly in the air to an immense height, faced the smooth road on either side for some distance; as these declined away, a broad vista of the dark-blue mountains far in the distance, and a beautiful level plain, such as I had seen when first I came to Naples, met my gaze. Like a panorama, these swiftly disappeared, and we entered on a broken chain of the Apennines themselves; the carriage slowly wound round and round the upward ascent of the rocky pass, barely wide enough to allow the vehicle room to roll along; then we descended as rapidly as we had come up, and thus continued on for some miles, when the ridge of mountains suddenly terminated, and I looked down from the great height on which we stood, and beheld at my feet the ravine, and in the midst of it, presenting an imposing appearance of grandeur and decay, the chateau. It had been built, my husband said, in the ancient times of feudal splendour; but its successive possessors, either for the want of means or inclination, had suffered it to moulder away, as time, year after year, diminished its magnificence. He said he intended refitting it, and renovating the antique style, and I was pleased to hear the promise that so fine a structure should be rescued from decay.

A few minutes brought us to the gates, which were thrown wide open to receive us, and the carriage rumbled into the great courtyard. M. de Serval alighted, lifted me out, and, leaning on his arm, I ascended a marble staircase, and entered a pretty saloon, tastefully furnished, where I sat down, quite wearied by fatigue. He left the room for a moment, to order lights and supper to be prepared, for twilight was stealing over us; leaning back on the couch, I languidly closed my eyes, and was almost asleep, when a heavy footstep startled me: looking up, I saw standing before me, and fixedly looking at me, an old woman. There was nothing strange in the simple fact of her being old—for old women are as plentiful as stars; but this one was peculiarly singular in appearance: she wore a scarlet woollen petticoat, black stockings, and a little cap of green; her long, thick, coarse, black hair, fell below her waist in tangled braids; her eyes were piercing in expression, and they seemed to sparkle and glance fire as she fixedly stared at me. She appeared to be beating time to her own thoughts, for she repeatedly struck her breast with her right hand. Perceiving that I saw her, she curtsied, and, in a lofty tone, said:

“Welcome to your home, fair mistress! welcome to the Chateau of the Ravine!”

“Do you belong to the household of Monsieur de Serval?” I asked, strangely impressed by her manner and appearance.

“Yes, madame. I came here a long time ago, in the service of the first lady.”

“The first lady! who was she?”

“You know, madame, of course, the Lady Isodore, Monsieur's—”

She paused abruptly; and, turning, I saw my husband's stern gaze fastened on her: she covered beneath that look, and well she might, for even I could not have met it unabashed.

“Pasiphae, you can go—your young mistress is tired—she needs repose after her long travel.”

Silently she retreated.

“Who is that old woman, dearest? Her strange ways surprised me!”

“An old domestic I have retained in my service, though almost useless. Come, Genevra, your chamber is prepared, and supper arranged in the banquetting hall.”

Thither we went: the apartment was magnificent, and one of the tables set with dainties that might have delighted an epicure; the lamps, shrined in vases of alabaster, shed a sweet, soft light; the hush of stillness and repose reigned within and without. More than all, my husband's accents of tenderness, and the tumult of love that had usurped the place of gentler emotions in my breast, have impressed that scene in indelible traits on my memory.

After supper we returned to the saloon, and entertained ourselves, till the clock struck the hour for retiring, with a conversation in which words had all to do—not thoughts: they were differently employed.

Then, at ten o'clock, we retired to our bedchamber: the same old woman stood at the door of the room as I entered: an ominous smile sat on her lips; she opened her mouth, as if to speak; but, perceiving my husband close behind me, she went away without expressing the thoughts which seemed to tremble on the point of utterance.

I wish I could make you realise the ecstatic rhapsody in those first days of wedded love; such emotions as I experienced one can only experience once in a lifetime—for the novelty wears away; they also disappear. I wish I could make you feel as I felt, as we roved together, like children, hand in hand, through those flowery glades, and through the blooming gardens of that old castle—sometimes reading, sometimes talking, always loving, and picturing a continued increase of happiness, and everlasting bliss.

Alas! poor, frail human nature! poor, frail, inconstant mortals! What a strange mockery does it not seem to our own hearts, to look back after years have changed these delusions of fancy, and stripped them of their false lustre! what a mockery does it not seem, to think over what we once thought, and see the folly of dreaming of affections unaltered, and hearts that never could grow cold!

Old Pasiphae was my attendant. I preferred her to another, a younger girl, who had come to the castle to engage in my service. She was a very odd woman, and strongly infected with the popular superstitions of that section of the country.

The chateau was built with two wings, each side of the main building: the right wing was always closed, bolted, and barred. I had been married two months, when curiosity induced me one day to ask Monsieur de Serval the reason why that part of the mansion was unopened, unoccupied, and neglected. He answered, carelessly, that the castle was so large, he had not thought it necessary to refit that side of it—it was more decayed than the rest. This reply satisfied me for the moment; but woman's curiosity was on the alert, and I wished, I scarcely know why, to see the interior of that gloomy side of the chateau.

Six months had glided swiftly on since my marriage. Oh, days of hope! oh, hours of happiness! with what mournful pleasure do I retrace your flight! and with what lingering sadness detail the strange contrast which time developed all too quickly to my wondering eyes!

I had heard several times from my worthy teacher. No tidings had reached him of Blanche. He had heard nothing—knew not if she were dead or alive. This distressed me, even amid my joy. Madame Bonni was well, and often sent her love; and the theatrical world, they said, still mourned my irreparable loss—the journals still dwelt upon my merits.

It was at this moment of time that Rinaldo left me for three days, for a hunting party, to come off some fifty miles from the castle. He bade me farewell with great tenderness, and departed. This was a favourable opportunity, I thought, for the execution of my long-cherished project of gaining admission to the closed and, I imagined, haunted rooms. The key my husband always kept locked up in a small casket, and I knew where the key of that was to be found.

Having unlocked the casket and obtained the key, I took a lamp from my dressing-table, and directed my steps to that quarter of the house. The quivering flame was often nearly extinguished by gusts of wind, and the shaking of the great oriel windows reminded me of the tread of ghosts. My feet often faltered from fear; but I continued on, and reached the great door in the centre of the long gallery, which gave admission to the interdicted apartments.

When I inserted the key in the lock, and unlocked the door which gave entrance to these deserted rooms, my heart quite failed me, and I regretted my curiosity. What was there to see about old, unfurnished, desolate apartments? How foolish of me, to pry into nothing! Yet an impulse I could not overcome bade me go onward; and accordingly I pushed open the door, which opened harshly. I went in: the first room was a large antechamber, like that on the other side of the house, naked and lonely. Crossing this, I opened another door, which led, as I supposed, into a similar apartment, when, to my utter amazement, I beheld what struck me dumb with astonishment.

The saloon in which I stood was well furnished. A Grecian couch occupied one corner; books and toys, and instruments of music, were scattered round; and, reclining on this couch, lay a woman of handsome form, but wild, haggard features, and insane expression; and, on a low stool at her feet, sat Pasiphae, my attendant.

Hearing the door open, she glanced around, and, seeing me, shrieked, and covered her face with her hands:

"Gracious heavens, madame! how came you here? what brought you to these fated rooms?"

"What does this mean? speak, I command you! Who is this woman?—what are you doing here?"

"Ah, madame, why did you come here? Alas, alas! how unhappy—how unfortunate!" was the only reply she made, as she rocked herself to and fro.

"Tell me! tell me quickly!" I cried, seized with a horrible suspicion of the truth. At this the strange woman raised herself to a sitting posture, and, regarding me with a countenance of melancholy wildness, said, clasping her hands together as she spoke:

"Oh, ask him, won't you, to take me out of this? I will be good—indeed I will! I never will come near him, if he don't want to see me, if he will only take me away! Oh, do ask him! pray do!"

I went towards her mechanically, so stunned and stupid was I with astonishment. I sat down beside her, and more closely observed the poor lunatic. I could plainly see the traits in that blurred face; traces of mind, now scared and erased, like a blotted, crumpled page. Love, jealousy, humanity, and disgust, all told me, that in this unhappy one I saw my husband's victim. What could he mean by shutting her up there? Old Pasiphae still sat with her head bowed between her hands, and she exclaimed:

"What will master say? oh, how he will curse me!"

"No, no, Pasiphae—you shall not be blamed! Monsieur de Serval shall never know of my visit here. Get up, and tell me what this strange scene means?"

The maniac stared at me with her great black eyes, and then continued on in her sad tones.

"No—no ball to-night! I cannot dance! he is coming for you to-morrow! I cannot dance when I expect him: take away the dress; send away the carriage. I am going to sleep, to dream of him!" and languidly closing her eyes, she sank back on the couch, and lay perfectly still.

Thinking the poor creature had fainted, I uttered an expression of fear, when Pasiphae, motioning me to silence, bent over her watchfully. Presently the sound of her regular breathing assured the old domestic that she slept. Smoothing back from her forehead the tangled masses of her hair, and covering the thin form with a large shawl, Pasiphae composed her delicate hands upon her breast, and then rising, took my hand in hers, and said, mournfully:

"Come, dear lady, this can be no pleasant sight for you. If you will return to your own room, I will tell you all. I have been on the point of doing so several times, but fear of master's anger prevented me; and I am old and broken down, and, were he to discharge me, might suffer and die from want. Come, lady, ere she awakes. Poor thing! she will soon be dead and far away! She has been very troublesome of late—I could scarcely manage her; but now she sleeps quietly—the first time in many days."

I silently contemplated the fitful repose of the madwoman for a moment before going, and in that instant I saw the whole fabric of delusive happiness I had erected on unstable air, shattered to the earth. I gazed on the neglected, cast-off victim of my lord's caprice, in whose emaciated form and desert mind I saw the records of long mental and bodily suffering.

Pasiphae interrupted my reverie by twitching my robe; and, after she had arranged the light on the antique mantel-piece, and adjusted her window drapery, taking my lamp in her hand, we left the saloon, locking the door upon her insane ward.

The outer door of the antechamber she also locked; and, satisfied that, if awaking, she could not follow us, I returned to my chamber, and, overwhelmed with sickness of the soul, threw myself despairingly into a chair, then, burying my face in my hands, wept bitterly. I felt disappointed—heart-broken: disappointed, that the man in whom I had centered all my hopes, should so utterly have ruined them; heart-broken at the melancholy sight I had seen. Sobbing like a child, I sat, forgetful of my own identity, or Pasiphae's presence. At length my grief in a slight degree abated, and, wiping my eyes, I looked up and perceived the poor old woman sorrowfully looking at me.

"I know, dear Lady Genevra, how sad you feel at this proof of your husband's infidelity; and sorry am I that you should have come to those rooms and seen my poor charge!" said Pasiphae; and sympathy almost rendered her voice sweet, and almost metamorphosed that weather-beaten face into one of youth and beauty.

"How long has she been insane?" I asked, my voice almost choked with sobs.

"This autumn coming, will be two years."

"Who was she? how came she here?"

"She was always called the Lady Isodore; that is the only name by which I ever knew her. Four years ago, master brought her here one night in a fine carriage, and commanded us to treat her the same as if she were our lawful lady: we always did so, and she ruled the household. Master seemed very fond of her; and, although he never took her travelling with him, and no one visited her, yet her great love for him appeared to supply the place of all other society. Two years after she came, he seemed to grow tired of her, and they often had furious quarrels. One night, in a difficulty of this sort, forgetting himself, he struck her violently with the butt-end of a pistol he held in his hand: she fell upon the floor, and when revived, from that hour was mad. In vain did my unhappy master use every endeavour to restore her: reason had fled—never to return. Since then she has been sometimes wild and gay, sometimes sad—as this evening you saw her. Master at first was nearly mad himself with remorse and despair; but after awhile he recovered from his grief, and having fitted those rooms up for her, consigned her to my care, and no longer troubled himself about her. From habit, I have acquired great influence over her, and even in her wildest moods she will obey me. I think, dear lady, that crime will always meet its just reward, even here on earth; and when I look at master sometimes, I think within myself: 'the hour of retribution for thy sin will surely come some day!'"

"When he came down to the castle, some months ago, and told me to have it cleaned and fitted up for the reception of its future lady, I could scarcely credit my ears, and wondered who would marry and risk her happiness with a man like him; and when he brought you here, and I saw how beautiful and innocent you were, I trembled for the future. I never intended to tell you this, and master trusted to my fidelity to him, that you should never discover the secret of the uninhabited wing of the castle. You are not more grieved than I, that chance or curiosity should have directed you there: your trust in monsieur I know is broken; but, dear lady, I feel it my duty to tell you, that you lean upon a broken stick, if you depend on him for faith."

"Hush, Pasiphae! oh, be still! don't say anything against him! how miserable I feel! I cannot believe that my Rinaldo can be so depraved—that he whom I trusted to reform, to render a better, wiser man, could act with such brutality towards a woman!"

My soul sickened with horror at such an inhuman action; and I soliloquised: "This was the man whose glowing description of the wrongs and troubles of his childhood had so interested and beguiled me; this was the man who had begged me to exert my influence to reform and purify his heart; who had promised, were I his Mentor, to be as gentle as Telemachus; who had entreated me to be his guardian angel, to warn him from the evils he had committed, yet deprecated: this was the man!"

Truly, reason might have reproached me with over self-confidence, and blind trust in the boy-god Cupid, who had so cheated me. And I had dreamed of future years of tranquil happiness and companionship, after the first flush of love had faded; and that, profiting by past errors, virtue hereafter should be his patroness: and this was the man on whom I purposed working these miracles! He who could wantonly inflict personal violence on a woman, and then keep a senseless idiot housed like a dog in an uninhabited part of the house. The veil which shrouded my eyes was being lifted off, like the mysterious veils of Isis, which conceal the grotesque absurdity of the image adored.

Perceiving Pasiphae still standing before me, her eyes filled with sympathetic tears, I said:

"Pasiphae, my good woman, you can go; I would rather be alone; I feel very sad: you had better return to the room—she may awake, and miss you."

"You look very unhappy, dear lady: had I not better stay a little while with you?"

"No, no; I prefer being alone. Go!"

She departed; and then thought usurped her sway. I wished my husband were there at that moment, to have told him what I thought of his conduct; but when I re-considered it, I saw it would do no good; for, to reproach a man with his vices, only alienates his affections, and gains his dislike: it does not convince his understanding, for that will not be convinced; nor better his heart, for he always thinks that could not be bettered; and, indeed, I think they are quite right, not often being troubled with any. A roar of words is generally the only result, and contempt and hatred the inevitable consequence. I was determined, however, to speak of it to Monsieur de Serval on his return. Then, distressed in mind, caring not if I died that night, I sought my pillow, and wept till lost in the oblivion of slumber.

CHAPTER IX.

Two days afterwards my husband returned from his hunting party, bringing some game with him. It was now late in the fall, and the forest trees were tinted with many and various dyes, but the charms of nature had no charms for me then—it was all dark and desolate, like my soul. This strange, unlooked for event in my new-married life, carried back my thoughts to the miserable days of infancy, and the lonely hours I spent as a wandering beggar-girl in the streets of Vienna; the ideas the speculative mind of childhood then indulged in, again returned to me, and I began to take an inverted view of everything, and to look on nature and human beings with an abstracted gaze.

The evening of my husband's return, I was standing on the balcony of the castle, when he rode up to the gates, followed by his grooms; he rode well, and his appearance was distinguished on horseback. Seeing me, he lifted his hat, and smiled, then disappeared under the gateway.

Knowing he would expect me to meet him, I slowly dragged myself to the banquetting-hall; for so entirely were my feelings toward him changed, that now I would have avoided, where formerly I should joyfully have sprung to his arms.

He stood surrounded by his dogs and servants, giving directions to the grooms: saddles and housings, and game were lying about.

"My love, excuse me a moment; I will see you in your drawing-room presently," said Monsieur de Serval, as I came towards him.

Seeing him occupied with his retainers and servants, and glad to be alone, I went to my salon, and sat down to my piano; I began a sweet air from one of the operas I had formerly performed: it was Norma's reproach to Polleo, and, as I sang it, I felt how applicable it was to my own case. A heavy hand was laid firmly on my shoulder, and, turning, I saw Pasiphae.

"My lady, Monsieur de Serval has come back; I saw him just now in the hall."

"I know it, Pasiphae, I have just seen him. How is she—is she quiet?"

"No, my lady; rather wild and noisy this evening. Oh, you had better not let him know what you have discovered!"

"I shall tell him the truth: I am not afraid to speak the truth, Pasiphae; it should at all times be spoken; no blame shall fall on you; be quieted—you are safe."

The sudden entrance of my husband interrupted us, as I was about asking some question about the unhappy Isodore. At the sight of him, notwithstanding the injury I was satisfied he had done that poor woman, the thousand fascinating remembrances of the last six months crowded fast upon me; and, in looking on his fair face, whatever wickedness that face concealed, I felt I loved him still. It was a delusion, when I imagined I could so quickly learn to hate him. In fact, the transitions of human feelings are like the seasons of the year: so gradually do we pass from one line of feeling to the other extreme, that we are ourselves unconscious when the end is attained. Thus it was with me; I did finally consummate the climax of indifference and contempt towards my husband, but not then—I had not reached it then.

Pasiphae made a low obeisance to her stern master, and left us alone.

As usual, Rinaldo kissed me; I submitted to the caress without returning it. Noticing my coldness, a cloud gathered on his brow.

"You receive me very indifferently, Genevra, on my return from a perilous boar-hunt."

"I feel indifferent at this moment, Rinaldo."

"Pray, may I inquire, signora, the cause of this change?" said he, and drew his stately figure to its full height, and regarded me searchingly.

"I can easily explain it, monsieur; I have been in the right wing of the castle, and have seen the lunatic you keep shut up there—Lady Isodore."

He started back, as if shot: then rage shone in his eyes, and he angrily exclaimed:

"You have been to those deserted apartments! How dared you go there—what took you there?"

"My feet, of course, were the mechanical operators on the occasion, monsieur," answered I, derisively; "but curiosity was the only motive I had at first, till, gaining access, I beheld the victim of your cruelty!"

"You, Genevra! you to pry into my secret affairs! you, whom I have taken from a disgraceful profession, and elevated in rank to any lady in the land, to talk to me of cruelty!" Foaming with rage he tore up and down the room like a madman.

"Would, monsieur, for my peace of mind, my happiness, that you could undo what you consider so great an honour, and restore me to that 'disgraceful profession,' which I have reason to regret having left for the arms of a libertine, and a home that has been desecrated by wanton violence. Yes, when the night before last I went to those rooms, and gazed with feelings of intense pity upon that forlorn being, I plainly beheld the life you have hitherto led, and to which you will of course return, after the novelty of my love has worn away. Oh, little did I think, when I pledged you my whole heart and soul at the altar—little did I dream that my affection would be thus requited by living witnesses of shame and horror like this!"

I felt excited to a terrible degree: the recollection of her injuries, and my own shame, had excited me to a point I should, ordinarily, have believed myself incapable of. With his arms folded, and head depressed, my husband contemplated me.

"If you have finished, signora, I should like to take the liberty of speaking!" said he, ironically.

"No, I have not done! I never could find words sufficiently strong to express my disgust and horror of such actions! Other women, perhaps—creatures of sensual, vulgar souls—might feel jealous of the husband's love, forgetting the villany extended to the betrayed one; but I do not. I blame you, not her—whoever she may have been, whatever she may have done!"

"Will you hear me, lady?" again demanded he, in the same cool tone as before.

"Yes, monsieur; speak on. I have expressed my thoughts; now speak yours."

Haughtily I flung myself on a couch, and, looking him in the face, awaited his remarks.

"The unfortunate woman you have seen," said Monsieur de Serval—endeavouring to compose his features and his voice to calmness—"that unfortunate is a Spanish woman from Madrid—her name is Lady Isodore Dosamados—she was of a noble, but impoverished family. When I first became her lover, I never enticed her from habits of morality—she voluntarily became my companion. When I passed through Spain, on my return to Italy, she attached herself to me, and I brought her here. It was her own jealous temper, exasperating my irritable one, which brought her to her present condition. If she chose to excite me to a quarrel, and work upon my feelings until, losing all consciousness, I inflicted a blow that crazed her, it was her own fault—I did not intend to harm her; but immoral women, when enraged, are more like wild beasts than human beings. Thus it was with her. I have provided for her during her insanity, and will continue to do so, as long as her wretched life continues."

"I do not believe all you wish to impress me with as truth, in regard to your moderation and kindness to her," I replied, as he paused, evidently expecting me to say something. "I don't believe all you say; for Pasiphae"—I stopped abruptly, remembering my promise not to implicate her.

"What of her?" cried he, sternly.

"Nothing!"

"I know what you would say: that she has told you many delightful tales of my cruelty, as you call it; well, let the old woman have her say: women and children should never be contradicted. Her crazy ward will not live long; I only retain her now because she can manage her better than any other. When Isodore dies, she shall go quickly; and, as for you, signora, learn that I take neither reproof nor advice from my wife, however much I love her. And beware how you provoke my anger thus a second time!"

He stamped out of the room, and his heavy tread echoed along the corridor. Amazed at his temper, I sat still, thinking over what he had said, and wondering if he had spoken the truth—which, in that case, would have been some extenuation of his fault—when Pasiphae came rushing into the room, her face expressing the greatest terror, and, frantically wringing her hands, she threw herself on her knees before me, and stared, without uttering a word.

"What is the matter, Pasiphae? what has happened? what ails you?" I cried.

"Oh, terrible, my lady! When I went back to the rooms, an hour ago—when I left you here with master—I found Lady Isodore had got out of her room. Frightened nearly to death, I went to hunt her. It seems she had wandered along the corridor, which is dark and gloomy in the evening, and not seeing the great staircase, tripped over it and fell from top to bottom, fracturing her skull, and bruising her body dreadfully! I found her lying senseless at the bottom of the steps, and got the men to carry her up to bed. Oh! come with me, dear lady! come quickly! she may be dead even now!"

I needed no urging to fly through the dim galleries to the deserted apartments; Pasiphae following as fast as her legs would carry her. There, stretched on her couch, apparently lifeless, her wild face out and gashed with wounds, blood streaming from her head, lay poor Isodore! The physician was already in attendance, bathing the blood from her face and head, and two or three of the household domestics, in astonishment beheld, what they had never dreamed of before—that the deserted wing of the castle was tenanted by a lunatic! Her existence there, during the period of her insanity, had always been a mystery, known but to one or two, who carefully guarded the secret—and they now stood gaping in stupid wonder.

I assisted the physician in bandaging that poor head, and applied aromatic vinegar to her hands and nose. The Esquapius eyed her with that peculiar expression physicians bestow on those whose case they consider hopeless. For an hour, perhaps, she lay insensible. I stood rubbing her hands, while tears fell fast from my face on that poor distorted one!

Presently a slight shiver ran through her frame; her eyes opened spasmodically, then closed again. She opened and shut her hands like one in intense pain—then she groaned sorrowfully. Oh! Pasiphae buried her weeping countenance in the pillows of the bed.

"Doctor," said I, "tell me the real truth: will she recover from these terrible wounds?"

"My dear signora, to be candid with you, I must say, judging from the severity of the fracture on the skull, she never will! She may linger a day or two, but I scarcely think she will survive that length of time—the poor woman has killed herself!"

This announcement, delivered with the habitual coolness of gentlemen of that profession, was a thunderbolt to me.

"Going to die, do you say? Oh, heavens! how dreadful!"

After leaving a potion to be taken at a certain hour, the physician went away, promising to call at daybreak, and we were left with the sufferer alone. Monsieur de Serval had been informed of the sad event. Pasiphae said he made no remark, but strode past her to his room, and locked himself in. Probably, if he felt any sentiment at all, it was one of joy at the prospect of release from his illicit tie. Oh, how selfish are men where their pride or vanity is touched, or their vices exposed!

All night I watched beside her. She remained in a state of stupor, manifesting no life, save by a feeble groan now and then, sometimes opening those great eyes, and then relapsing into lethargy.

The physician was punctual to his promise, and the grey dawn had scarce been born ere he came. He administered something which momentarily revived her, and, in the course of the day, she spoke!—oh! strange problem—spoke sanely—with that singular precision we frequently see in the insane restored to mind! Her memory reverted, and dated from the fatal moment when the blow was given which shattered that fair temple of reason!

I had not seen Rinaldo since the hour of ten, the night before; and, as he was acquainted with the sad disaster, I wondered at his indifference to what the physician too prophetically foresaw—her death-bed! "Alas!" thought I, as I leaned over her, and watched the slow dawning of mental consciousness, and the confused look and air of intense agony her face showed—"alas! it seems to be my fate to be connected with the worthless and unhappy! My husband, whom I thought so perfect—so repentant of former follies, and determined to amend in future—has sadly disappointed me! The world I imagined so beautiful an Elysium, I find the abode of fair deceit, and corrupt and rotten at the core! Oh, life! where are thy pleasures unmingled with the alloy of pain? Or is it thus in everything? No sooner do we possess it, than we discover it to be like those lovely apples of the shores of the Red Sea—very fair to look upon, but, when tasted, bitter as wormwood—rotten as dust!"

Pasiphae disturbed the sad tenor of my thoughts, by directing my attention to the door, at which stood Monsieur de Serval. Thinking his presence the indication of a better mood, I sprang towards him, and, forgetting our quarrel, caught his hand in mine. He looked melancholy; and I thought I could trace remorse on those delicate features.

"Oh, Rinaldo!" I cried, "you see what has happened! Last night, while the nurse was absent from the room, she left the apartment, and, not seeing the great staircase, stepped off it, and fractured her skull. The physician says she cannot survive. How terrible it is—is it not—to see one die who has led such a life? Come close to her; she is regaining her senses—her right mind!"

My husband started. He evidently expected to see her crazed still, and did not want to meet face to face, with reason restored, the woman he had brutalised; but, as she lay and looked at him, intellect shone in those dark, oriental eyes—not the quick, sharp, wandering stare of insanity! She recognised him, and feebly beckoned with her hands. I gently drew him to the bed-side. She made a motion as if to be raised, and I lifted her in my arms, and laid her head on my breast. The blood had oozed out from the bandages, and her hair was clotted with it. Her face was deadly pale, and the mists of death had already settled there; her eyes were growing languid and dim, and her hands and feet very cold. My husband looked at her with that expression of self-consciousness of having inflicted wrong, which alone can impress the human features, ere the heart is altogether hardened and depraved. As I have said, her memory flew back four years before, and she thought the quarrel had just occurred.

"Never mind, dear Rinaldo, I forgive you! Don't grieve, though I die from it! I know I am high tempered: I provoked you to do it! I did not mean to make you angry: don't grieve! Here, Pasiphae, bandage my head; put me to bed; when I recover, I will try and be a better woman—more deserving of your love!"

In agony I glanced at the physician: she had no idea of her real state. She knew not that death, in a few hours, would take her for his own! The good man eyed her with an air of interest—for this was a strange case.

He approached her, perceiving my wish; and, taking one of her hands in his, said, quietly:

"My good lady, listen to me! You are not aware of your condition at present; you are only this moment regaining your mind! You have been insane for several years, till, last night, escaping from the room, you fell down stairs; and that sudden concussion has been the means of restoring your mind! It is my duty to tell you, that a very few hours will close your life—you cannot live longer than to-morrow!"

"Been insane!" repeated she, with a scornful, indignant air; "you are dreaming, man! It was only a moment ago Rinaldo and I were quarrelling, and, enraged, he struck me with a pistol! I am very sorry; but, oh! how strangely my head feels! Oh, how painful! What ails me? Why am I lying here surrounded by people? How dim everything looks! I cannot distinguish anything—why is this? Get lights—I must arise and dress! I must find Rinaldo! where is he?"

She pushed me violently away from her, and, with the last effort of strength, sprang from the bed to her feet. Seeing my husband, she threw herself on his neck, and, wildly sobbing, kissed him! It was an awful sight, to behold that woman, already in the embraces of death, hugging and clinging to what had once constituted her joy of existence! I felt no jealousy, for I ever possessed this peculiar trait: the moment an object of affection disappoints me, that moment affection and infatuation disappear. I felt a sentiment of bitter shame and regret that I had given myself to such a man: that is what I experienced as I witnessed this strange scene.

He looked annoyed—not grieved; and once or twice tried to lay her down on the bed, but her personal strength, to which was added additional power by the strong excitement under which she laboured, frustrated his endeavour. Her disordered hair hung down her back; the bruised and bandaged head, covered with blood, presented a ghastly sight. Her thin hands, which clasped his neck, scratched and wounded; and the long night-robe she wore, dabbled with blood!

"No, no, no!" she cried; "I have you—I have you! Now, you shall not go till you promise to love me, and forgive me my anger!"

"Take her away, Pasiphae! rid me of the mad woman!" shouted my husband. "Why do you stand there, stupidly inactive, when you see me thus annoyed? Take her off my neck—put her in bed!"

At the sound of his loud, vindictive voice, she relapsed her hold, staggered back, and, mournfully gazing on his enraged face, shivered, turned, if possible, more pale—then fell flat on the floor!

"Oh, miserable man!" I exclaimed, as the nurse raised the death-stricken, inanimate form, and laid it on the bed, while the doctor darted looks of contempt at him. "Oh, apology for humanity! and have you no pity for the unhappy sufferer from your vices?"

"Why did you summon me here, madam, to witness this mummery? We all must die some day—it matters not how! Do I wish to behold the death-bed of a lunatic? Can I assist her final departure? Why have you called me?—to anger me, I suppose."

"Well, monsieur, if you think it too great a condescension to see her die, go—leave the room! I will attend the poor dying creature!"

Without replying, save by a look of scorn and anger, he departed. I could easily understand that he felt doubly angered when he reflected (as he must have done) that my discovery of his illicit connection necessarily would weaken, if not wholly obliterate, my love for him. It was this that inspired his rage, and made him hate the unfortunate object of it. His love for me was still unabated—not so mine! A bar of ice seemed placed between us! In this respect women and men differ greatly; for though a man may indulge himself in many loves, yet he generally returns to the lawful one. On the contrary, when a woman's affections are once thoroughly alienated, they seldom return to the first object of attachment.

I cannot think of that woman's death-bed without bitter regret; nor write this portion of my memoir without dropping tears upon the page! Recovering from the stupor into which she had fallen when he repulsed her, her eyes roved anxiously around in search of him. Not seeing him, she closed them again, and remained motionless. An hour passed by. Finding she did not stir, I felt her hands and feet—they were growing colder and colder, and her eyes more dim! She was an hour nearer death!

"She will be dead before twilight, lady," said the physician, having felt her pulse. "Poor thing! her death is very painful: she has suffered much!"

"Yes, I have suffered much," was her audible reply, to our astonishment, and she uplifted her eyes and joined her hands as if praying. I remembered Monsieur de Serval's description of his mother's death-bed, and wondered how he could treat thus the last moments of his neglected mistress. So easy is it to express fine sentiments which one does not feel, and never practises! Fine words cost nothing, and may be equally well said by a bad as a noble soul; but fine actions must result from a good heart.

Gradually twilight drew near, and she was sinking momentarily. Raised on my breast, I held one hand in mine: she seemed labouring to say something. I stooped to the level of her ear, and tried to catch the sound. Her voice was low, faint, and broken.

"Dear lady," at last I thought I heard her say, "I thank you for your kindness, whoever you may be, and—" She paused, as if to reflect—"tell him I forgive him the injury he has done me!"

Backward she fell from my supporting arms on her pillow: slower and slower came her breath; more fixed grew her eyes; her hands grasped convulsively at the bed-clothes. I heard a rattling sound from her throat; then the eyelids remained half closed, the mouth half open; the hands released their hold, and the physician, bending over her, said:

"Madame, she is dead!"

I burst into tears, and fled from the chamber of death to my own room, and there wept long and bitterly, both for her and for myself.

(To be continued.)

OH, IF ALL WERE FRIENDS TOGETHER.

BY JENNY.

Oh, if all were friends together,
Flowers might unheeded die;
Who would pine for summer weather,
Though seared leaves around them lie?
For all hearts would be united,
Pallid lips might learn to smile;
None could mourn affections blighted,
Saved from sorrow, sin, and guile.

Oh, if all were friends together,
Many more would meet above
Those with riches should endeavour
To serve the poor man's love.
Wealth or power can never bring us
Happiness beyond the grave
Oh, if all were friends together,
Many a wanderer we might save!

[PIGEONS OF THE INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO AND NEW GUINEA.]

GOURA VICTORIA PIGEONS.

THESE splendid birds, which are found in the large islands of the Indian Archipelago and New Guinea, generally live in the dense forests, and feed upon berries, seeds, grain, &c., which they seek for on the ground. They build their nests in a tree, and, like most of the species of pigeons, lay but two eggs. The pair represented in our pictorial illustration are the only ones in England, and were exhibited at the late poultry show in London. The extreme beauty of these birds, their brilliant plumage, and remarkable fan-like plume, obtained for them unusual attention, and they immediately came to be considered the gems of the exhibition in the pigeon department. That they will be bred in this country we do not in the least doubt, but as it takes a long time to multiply any variety of pigeon, it is almost certain that, for years to come, the Goura or Victoria Pigeon will be very rare, and command a high price. It is the largest of the pigeon family, and when perfectly domesticated among us, will be an extremely useful addition to our native stocks.

The pigeon is probably the most popular of all the tribes of the feathered creation; and in England it is so much esteemed, that it has been exempted by Act of Parliament from the category of game, and protected from wanton destruction by some stringent provisions. Indeed, it has been so thoroughly domesticated, that it is as much private property as a dog or a horse. The beauty of the bird, the many allusions to it in the Old Testament, and its rich dietetic qualities, have all contributed to render it such a universal favourite. It is found in all countries, and will thrive wherever man takes up his residence. Its peaceful and social life has endeared it to the affections of almost every people under the sun; for, from the burning plains of India to the frozen regions of North America, the pigeon is to be seen hovering about the habitations of man.

The domestic pigeon owes its origin to the Rock Dove (Columba Livia), which, as all our readers are doubtless aware, is a British bird, but is also widely distributed not only over Europe, but Asia and Africa. Everywhere it haunts rocks, precipices, and caverns along the shore—it also frequents towers, cathedrals, and high buildings. Even in London, wild blue pigeons make their nests in the crevices and on the ledges of several of our public edifices. They swarm along the cliffs bordering on the sea of Spain, Italy, France, and North Africa. Myriads tenant the recesses or caves of the rock of Gibraltar, and the rock of Teneriffe. In India this species congregates in vast flocks, and is a constant inhabitant of every dilapidated building. In Britain, it is found in various cliffs along the wide extent of our shores, and is a never-failing resident in the wild, romantic precipices of the Orkneys. This species, crossed through ages with others, has been domesticated in this country from time immemorial; and we are credibly informed, by those who are best able to form an opinion on the subject, that in no other country in the world does it abound in such numbers and extraordinary variety. For ourselves, we can assert, that we never approached town, hamlet, or village in England, but we encountered in its outskirts troops of pigeons, whirling and sweeping about in the air at every possible angle. In the manufacturing districts, the numbers kept by mechanics and weavers are incredible: they must amount to many millions; and so strong is the tie between these beautiful birds and their masters, that they are rarely used as an article of food, although it is well known they are delicious eating in any form of good cookery. They are kept solely for ornament, or as domestic pets; and their breeding and management cost no little sum of money, and excite a vast amount of emulation.

There are very great numbers of these birds in England. A dove-cot is reckoned an indispensable adjunct to a country gentleman's residence, and in many counties it is customary for farmers to keep a few pairs. They are occasionally reared in the view of supplying the market, but for the most part they are kept as articles of luxury. They are very voracious, and destroy great quantities of grain. There are some rather curious speculations on this subject in Vancouver's "Survey of Devon." He supposes that there are in all 20,000 pigeon-houses, and 1,125,000 pairs of dove-house pigeons in England and Wales,* and that they consume 157,500,000 pints, or 4,921,875 Winchester bushels, of grain a-year! Of course there must be a good deal of looseness in this statement: it has been said by some to be much under, and by others to be much over the mark. But, without giving any opinion on this point, there can at all events be no question that the number of pigeons is very great, and that the destruction they carry on, when considered in the aggregate, must be very considerable indeed.

Of the varieties best known in England, the common pigeon, or Stock Dove, is too well known to be described; but what are called "fancy pigeons" form varieties that are very highly prized. The Carrier Pigeon is a great favourite, but the extension of the electric telegraph has quite ignored its amazing aerial powers and fidelity. This variety, which originally came from Persia and Syria, and about whose exploits the most wonderful stories have been told, is now seldom used as a messenger, except among the betting and pugilistic fraternity; and it is very likely that, in the course of a few years, it will become extinct in this country, except as an object of curiosity to those who have the time and the perseverance to devote themselves to their training. It is a very fine bird, and larger than the generality of pigeons, measuring sometimes, from the top of the beak to the end of the tail, fifteen inches, and weighing twenty-five ounces.

The Turbit is another favourite with the pigeon public: it is a pretty bird, something like the Turtle Dove, but larger and stronger. Then comes the Jacobine, a slim, sulky bird; the Fan-tail, a miniature kind of peacock; the Tumbler, the smallest and most valuable variety; the Trumpeter, which repudiates cooing as effeminate; the Pouter, a not very handsome bird, with a crop which it can distend with air; the Nun, with its tuft or hood of white feathers; the Helmet, the Owl, the Spot, and a perplexing number of foreign varieties recently imported. Of these, the rarest are the Columbia Coronata, or Great Crowned Pigeon, from New Guinea; the Red Breasted Turtle; the Bronzed-winged Pigeon, from New South Wales; the Columbia Crestata, or Crested Dove, from the South Sea Islands; and several varieties from America.

While we are upon the subject of pigeons, we may as well inform our youthful friends that pigeons are remarkable for cleanliness. In their habits and diet they teach mankind impressive lessons; therefore, unless the dove-cote is kept extremely clean, the tenants will never thrive.

Before introducing the birds to their future domicile, it should be cleansed inside and out with lime-wash. The cells should be at least a foot square, with an opening in the front, but not too large, for they like to sit in secret and in comparative darkness. The dove-cote should also be placed remote from trees, or the noise of a manufactory or workshop; and as they are fluttered in their homes by enemies more terrible to them than Coriolanus was to the Volscians, it should be elevated on a stout post, having the lower part coated with sheets of tin, which would prevent cats and rats climbing. Keeping pigeons in cages or upper-rooms, is not healthy for either the birds or the people in the dwelling—for, if neglected, they die of a cough called the "roup."

The food of pigeons should be—first, plenty of pure, fresh water: secondly, as pigeons are granivorous, almost every description of grain may be given them. They like wheat, barley, oats, canary and hemp-seed, also beans, vetches, and tares. Hemp-seed should be used with moderation, as it is a very stimulating food. Fine, fresh gravel should be strewn about to aid their digestion, also salt; and if chalk or lime be placed in their way, they will peck at it with great delight, for it not only corrects acidity in the stomach, but assists in the formation of the egg-shell, which contains phosphate of lime in large proportion.

On the commercial value of pigeons a vast deal might be written, for we think they have not been sufficiently brought into general estimation as an article of food.

Young pigeons sell in the market for about a shilling per couple—the breeder, of course, sells them for much less; each pair will rear four pairs of young in the season. Will the price obtained for these four pairs remunerate the breeder for the keep of a pair of adult birds throughout the year? We much doubt it; however, we will not be positive, for in some districts these birds may be kept at far less expense than in others. In the markets in France pigeons are abundant and very fine, and in some parts of that country we have seen them in enormous flocks, scattered over the fields, gleaning for themselves but in spring, and again throughout the winter, they must require more food than they can collect by ranging the country. It is principally from France that the London markets derive their supply.

TOM MOORE'S CERTIFICATE OF BIRTH.—Immediately after this (Moore's birth), my mother indulged in the strange fancy of having a medal (if such it could be called) struck off, with my name and the date of the birth engraved on it. The medal was, in fact, nothing more than a large crown-piece, which she had caused to be smoothed so as to receive the inscription; and this record of my birth, which, from a weakness on the subject of her children's ages, she had always kept carefully concealed, she herself delivered into my hands when I last saw her, on the 16th of February, 1831, and when she evidently felt we were parting for the last time. For so unusual a mode of commemorating a child's age, I can only account by the state of the laws at that period, which, not allowing of the registration of the births of Catholic children, left to parents no other mode of recording them than by some such method as this fondness of mothers devised.—Lord J. Russell's Memoirs, &c., of Moore.

FIRE.—What a thing fire must have been to the primitive man the first time it flashed upon him! Say that he kept watch over his people; that at the chilliest hour of the night, just before sunrise, he noticed how a dry stick grew warm when rubbed against his club; that he rubbed them again, more stoutly still, and it became hot; at it again, with the wonder of a child and the strength of twenty men he flung it down, for it scorched his hand; yet he could not choose but try again, and it smoked; again and again, quicker and quicker, longer and longer, he pursued the wild experiment, until it burst into flame, and the sun arose in the east: what was the fire upon the brand but the spirit of the blessed sun come down to dwell with him and his? It is surely not impossible to feel how, in the absence of science, with the presence of only an incalculably small amount of experience, in an intellect far more observant than analytical, and a young soul capable of little more than wonder and love, the worship of the Sun and Fire might arise; and, once risen on a national and continental heart, it could never set until the fullness of a better time were come. Nor is Christianity herself, the reconciling genius of the world, ashamed to draw upon the memory of that old faith; for she lifts up her Prince of Peace to the homage of the nations, under the image of the Zoroastrian god: "The Sun of Righteousness with healing in his beams."

* This statement must be far below the actual fact. The number of domestic pigeons in England alone must exceed the population of the United Kingdom.

[THE PALACE AT GREENWICH—THE CHRISTENING PROCESSION SETTING OUT.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER I.

In the midst a form divine,
Her eye proclaims her of the Briton line;
Her lion port, her awe-commanding face,
Attempered sweet to virgin grace.

GRAY.—"THE BARD."

Of the many sovereigns who have swayed the sceptre of England, there cannot truly be said to be one whose reign has exceeded in importance and stirring events that of Elizabeth—the long-cherished idol of the nation. Her courage and energy established the Reformation—her prudence and far-sighted policy defeated the machinations of Spain and France; achievements which have thrown a dazzling veil over the vices of cruelty, deceit, and vanity, which unhappily deformed a character in whose composition so many elements of true greatness entered.

The age of Elizabeth was not only the age of great events, but of great men. Shakspeare, Bacon, Spenser, Sidney, and Harrington, illustrated her reign by their genius, wit, and eloquence. Raleigh, Drake, Sussex, and Perrot, defended it in the field—whilst Burleigh laboured for its glory in the cabinet.

It is scarcely necessary to remind our readers, that the illustrious subject of our present memoir was the daughter of Henry VIII., by his second queen, the beautiful but unfortunate Anne Boleyn.

The birth of the royal infant occurred on the 7th of September, 1533, in the Palace of Greenwich. Her father earnestly desired a son: had Anne Boleyn given birth to a boy instead of a girl, her fate, in all probability, would have been different. The Catholics secretly rejoiced at his disappointment, for they looked upon the overthrow of the ancient faith, with some degree of reason, as the work of the new queen.

In the royal closet, which overlooked the courtyard of the palace, were two persons in earnest conversation; both were remarkable-looking men, but dissimilar in costume and appearance: the elder, clad in the ecclesiastical robes of the period, was the celebrated Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury; his companion, the ex-secretary of Wolsey—Cromwell—whom the capricious Henry had taken into favour on the downfall of his former minister and favourite.

"I trust that her majesty will have a favourable time," observed the prelate, "and present the king's highness with a son—a thing to be desired, no less for the contentment of his grace, than the security of the reformed religion."

"Amen!" replied Cromwell, fervently; lowering his voice, he added: "and the safety of the mother and her friends!"

An expression of doubt and hesitation was visible upon the countenance of Cranmer, or the words of the speaker had produced a painful impression upon his mind. He was too clear-sighted not to comprehend that his position was anything but a secure one: through life it was his misfortune to be compelled, by the force of circumstances, to follow a temporising policy—always between two dangers, it was barely possible that he should escape them both.

"I scarcely comprehend the direction of your speech!" he said, lowering his voice almost to a whisper.

Cromwell smiled. He felt assured that the prelate had fully understood him—that his words had hit their mark.

"Deal frankly with me," continued the archbishop, at the same time wiping the perspiration from his brow; "I am slow of wit, and little skilled to sift the subtleties of speech—show me your thought more plainly."

"Is it a confession you desire, my lord?" demanded the layman.

"Rather a confidence," answered Cranmer; "for you are one of those who watch the tide of the times; that bark will be securely steered which follows in your wake!"

In this metaphorical language—then the fashion of the day—did the speaker convey to the astute statesman the high opinion which he held both of his prudence and discernment. Cromwell, although a courtier, and accustomed to such change, felt flattered by the compliment.

"My meaning, my good lord, when I prayed that her grace, for her own safety and that of her friends, might give birth to a prince, was simply this: a male heir, although the youngest born, by the laws of England excludes his sister from the crown. Should the Lady Mary ever live to mount the throne—"

"The Lady Mary!" interrupted the prelate; "improbable—impossible! You forget the act of divorce between Henry and Catherine of Arragon has been confirmed by parliament!"

"True, my lord—most true!" observed the statesman, somewhat sarcastically; "it was the foolish doubt of a weak judgment, unworthy second thought! Our royal master is constant in his loves, as well as friendships! It were treason to suppose his purpose could be shaken, or a parliament be found so mindless of its dignity, as to stultify its own deliberations!"

By this artful speech did Cromwell convey to Cranmer where the real danger lay—in the changeable disposition of the king, and the subserviency of the parliament, which had proved itself ready to make or unmake laws at the royal will. Perhaps, too, he had observed the first symptoms of the decline of Henry's passion for Anne Boleyn: if so, it was not without good reason, as the sequel proved, he so ardently desired that the child she was about to give birth to might prove a son.

Further conversation was interrupted by the door of the royal closet being violently kicked open, and the appearance of the monarch himself, accompanied by his brother-in-law, the Duke of Suffolk, who had espoused his sister Mary, the Queen Dowager of France. Both were attired in riding dresses. The irritability of the king arose from his being disappointed of his favourite pastime of hawking, by the labour of the queen which irritability was not lessened by his impatience to ascertain the sex of the infant about to be born to him.

"An it prove a boy, Suffolk," said Henry, speaking in his usual loud tone of voice, "we will keep our Christmas in such state as England has not witnessed since the Tudor wore the crown! Ho, ho! my Lord of Canterbury!" he continued, as he recognised Cranmer in the royal closet; "arrived at last—we have waited for you!"

"My barge, your highness, grounded at Rotherhithe," observed the prelate, meekly; "else I had reached Greenwich before noon—two hours at least!"

An ungracious, half-muttered "humph!" was the only notice which the despot condescended to take of the archbishop's apology.

"Anne," he continued, "it would seem, hath a sore time of it! I trust it will prove a boy; it were ill fortune to make such evil for a pining girl! Why, how you stand!" he exclaimed, glancing from Suffolk to Cranmer and Cromwell; "ye are pretty cumpers: not a word to help your master to pass a heavy hour like this!"

Both Brandon and the archbishop expressed their conviction that the child would prove a prince.

"Heaven owes it to your grace," observed the latter, "for the glorious work of reformation in the church, and the prayers of your grateful subjects."

"We shall reform it yet further, my lord!" interrupted Henry.

"To the welfare of the kingdom?" chimed in his brother-in-law.

Cromwell alone remained silent.

"An heaven pay the debt," impudently answered the king, "we will hold ourself quits with it, for our service in repelling the mockeries of Rome and the arrogant pretensions of its bishop, who claims the right to judge between princes and their consciences!"

The door of the royal closet opened, to give admittance to the aged Duchess of Norfolk, the grandmother of Anne Boleyn, who, at the earnest entreaty of her descendant, had undertaken to announce to Henry the disappointment of his hopes, and the birth of a daughter.

"Well, grandam!" he exclaimed, rubbing his hands—a favourite action with him when he was either pleased or excited; "is it over? how fares the queen—and her son—her son?" he repeated, in a tone somewhat less confident—for there was an expression of painful disappointment upon the countenance of the venerable duchess.

"The queen's grace," faltered the messenger, "bore her pains bravely: your highness owes a thanksgiving, at least, for that!"

"Doubtless—doubtless!" drily answered Henry. "God's death, madam!" he added, with a sudden burst of temper, "can you not speak plainly? Must I be the last man in my kingdom to know what I have to be thankful for? is it a boy?"

"As sweet a princess," replied the duchess, with desperate courage, "as ever king was father to—the very image of your gracious self!"

The countenance of Henry underwent a marked change it became alternately flushed and pale, and the veins in his temples and bull-like neck were swollen with passion. He had ardently desired to have a son—and bitterly felt the disappointment. Without uttering a word, he quitted the royal closet, leaving those present in a state of painful suspense and terror.

"Heaven's will be done!" exclaimed Cranmer, with a sigh of resignation; then added, with his usual inconsistency, "would it had been a boy! would it had been a boy!"

"It might have been better for us all!" whispered Cromwell.

"Her grace's next child may prove one," observed the duchess. "Both their graces are young enough to be the parents of a numerous race! God's wot!" she added—for her womanly feelings had been outraged by the manner in which the king had received the intelligence; "one would think my granddaughter had brought him a monster instead of a fair princess!"

Here it may be observed, that swearing, in the reign of Henry VIII., was not considered the exclusive privilege of the male sex—the ladies generally indulged in it. Elizabeth, in after-life, was celebrated for the variety and frequency of her oaths.

Henry, feeling probably ashamed of the unnatural ebullition of temper he had displayed before his brother-in-law and the prelate, returned to the apartment; as for Cromwell, he cared but little for any opinion he might form.

"Grandam," he said, addressing the aged peeress; "you have had scant thanks for your news, and yet we do thank you! Bear our loving greeting to the queen, and bid her keep up her spirits for my sake! Heaven!" he added, with a satirical glance at the prelate, may pay its debt more honestly next time! Ha! said I rightly, prelate?"

"I trust so, my gracious sire," replied the archbishop, scarcely venturing to raise his eyes from the ground; for Henry evidently looked upon him as responsible in some way for the payment of the debt due by heaven, which he had so incautiously spoken about.

"Your grace ought not to feel disappointed," observed the Duchess of Norfolk, "or surprised, at the birth of a princess. Is not the chamber in which her highness the queen made her bed (this was the usual phrase at the time called the Chamber of Virgins?"

"Pish!" exclaimed Henry; "pish!"

"And is not this," continued the aged lady, "the eve of the nativity of the Blessed Virgin, whose especial protection the noble infant will doubtless enjoy?"

Neither the king nor the Archbishop of Canterbury were in any way scandalised at the supposition of the speaker. Their Protestantism—if Protestantism it might be called—was very different from that of the present day: it was merely a slight change—substituting the fallibility of the Pope for the infallibility of the royal will.

"Well," said Henry, "since the Blessed Virgin hath sent us a daughter, she shall be royally welcomed in honour of her patroness! It is our pleasure, my lord primate, that the christening should take place with the same pomp as if heaven had paid the debt you wot of, and favoured us with a son; in consideration of which we trust the Blessed Virgin will rest satisfied, and send us no more daughters!"

Cranmer bowed, to intimate his obedience.

"And," continued the speaker, "to mark our favour, which still is undiminished to your person, we invite your grace and the good Duchess of Norfolk to stand sponsors to this godsend, whom we intend to name after our mother, Elizabeth of York; the ceremonial," he added, "shall be settled at to-morrow's council."

Placing his arm familiarly upon the shoulder of his brother-in-law, King Henry left the royal closet for his private apartments. Before Suffolk he did not hesitate to give way to the bitter expressions of disappointment which the birth of the princess had caused him. And yet on the following day he commanded a "Te Deum" to be sung in the Royal Chapel, at St. Paul's, and Westminster, to express his gratification and happiness—a circumstance which ought not to surprise us, when we remember that Henry VIII. was a hypocrite alike in his resentment and affection.

Anne Boleyn awaited with considerable impatience the return of her maternal grandmother. She knew how ardently her husband desired a male heir to his crown, and although she put a good countenance upon the matter before her ladies and attendants, she secretly trembled at the effect the disappointment might produce upon his capricious heart. The aged duchess at last returned from the royal closet, her countenance radiant with smiles—for her pride had been so amply gratified by the invitation of the king to stand sponsor for his child, that she had forgotten the outbreak of his passion on being informed of its sex.

"And how did Henry receive you?" demanded the young queen, in a faint voice.

"Most graciously, Anne," replied the amiable lady, who at that moment asserted a grandam's privilege, and addressed her descendant by her christian name. "He hath commanded that the infant shall be christened with the same magnificence and state as if it had been a boy, and invited the primate and myself to answer for it at the font. Who knows," she added, glancing at the infant, as it slept upon the bosom of its mother, "but that little hand may one day grasp its father's sceptre?"

Anne Boleyn smiled at the anticipation, and fondly clasped her new-born infant yet nearer to her bosom.

Here the queen's physicians interfered, and declared that they would not hold themselves responsible for her safety unless she were left to the repose which nature required. The Duchess of Norfolk and the attendant ladies withdrew, leaving the anxious, overfraught spirit of their mistress to recruit itself in sleep.

CHAPTER II.

The populace do mutter in the streets,
Dreaming no good can come o'nt. Belshames say
His wish is made his punishment.

By the people generally, the intelligence of the birth of a princess was received with sullen indifference; for the marriage of Anne Boleyn with the king had been anything but popular with his subjects, the great majority of whom still adhered to the ancient faith, and looked with terror and dislike upon the innovations of Henry and his schism with the Holy See. The Catholic party secretly rejoiced at his disappointment in not having a son. They knew that, in the event of his death, the claims of the daughter of Catherine of Arragon to the crown would outweigh those of the daughter of Anne Boleyn.

It was to brave this feeling on their part that the king commanded the baptism of the infant to be celebrated with so much state and magnificence.

The tenth day of September was the one appointed for the ceremony, at which, for the sake of éclat, the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and council of the City of London, together with many nobles, bishops, and abbots, were invited to attend.

The baptism of the infant princess took place in the church of the Convent of Greyfriars, which was adorned with arras for the occasion, and a stately canopy of crimson and gold was erected over the silver font. The aged Duchess of Norfolk carried the infant in her arms, under a cloth of estate, which was supported by the Lords Rochfort, William and Thomas Howard, and Lord Hussey—four nobles of her mother's blood. The train of the babe, which was of purple velvet, was borne by the Countess of Kent, assisted by two earls. The Duke of Norfolk, bearing his baton as Earl Marshal of England, walked on one side of the canopy, and the Duke of Suffolk, the king's brother-in-law, on the other. The procession was headed by the citizens, gentlemen, and esquires; then the chaplains and aldermen of the City of London, in their chains and gowns, followed by the Lord Mayor in his robes, privy councillors, peers, and bishops, according to their degree.

The Bishop of London officiated on the occasion. Cranmer was the godfather, and the Duchess of Norfolk and the Marchioness of Dorset her godmothers. Although the Reformation had made considerable progress in England, it is not a little remarkable that the ceremony was performed with all the rites of the Catholic church.

Before leaving the church, Elizabeth was confirmed by the archbishop. Thus the spiritual obligations of the sponsors were not of long duration.

Cranmer bestowed upon his royal goddaughter a standing cup of gold, similar gifts being presented by her godmothers—which gifts were carried in the procession on its return to the palace, when five hundred torches were borne before it, the trumpets sounding all the way to the Chamber of Virgins, where the queen still lay.

At the age of three months, Elizabeth and her governess, the Lady Margaret Bryan, removed to Hatfield—Henry not choosing that her mother should nourish the infant herself.

Parliament, which met a few weeks afterwards, passed a law, declaring her heiress to the throne, in default of the king leaving male issue—the claims of the daughter of the unfortunate Catherine of Arragon to the crown being completely set aside.

She was afterwards removed to Chelsea, and took up her abode in the palace of the Bishop of Winchester, who, as an especial mark of Henry's favour, had the honour of defraying the household expenses of his heiress out of the revenues of his see: a distinction which the worthy prelate no doubt would willingly have declined.

The various projects of marriage entertained either by herself or others, commenced in the second year of her age, and may be said to have terminated only with her life. The first husband proposed for her was the Duke d'Angoulême, the third son of Francis I.; but, like many other proposals, it was broken off.

Elizabeth was but two years old when Henry VIII., disappointed that Anne Boleyn had not brought him a son, satiated with her beauty, and madly in love with her successor, Jane Seymour, took advantage of certain levities in the conduct of the queen, to bring her to trial and the block. The axe is a sharp instrument, and, during the reign of the savage monster, trenced many difficulties besides his matrimonial ones. The particulars of her trial and execution will be recorded in their proper place, when we come to treat on the life of that unfortunate queen.

Cranmer—the timid and obsequious Cranmer—without the least hesitation pronounced the marriage between Henry and Anne Boleyn null, and their issue, consequently, illegitimate; which sentence preceded the execution of the queen, and rendered it legally as well as morally a murder; for if the unhappy Anne had never been the wife of Henry, she could not have committed treason by infidelity to him.

From the moment of her mother's death, Elizabeth seems to have been treated with the most cruel neglect by her brutal parent: a letter is extant, written by her governess, Lady Margaret Bryan, in which that lady declares that her charge had neither gown nor kirtle, petticoat, nor any kind of linen.

The letter, which is preserved in the Cottonian MSS., presents a curious list of articles of apparel deemed necessary for the wardrobe of a female infant of condition in the reign of Henry VIII., the names of which—such as rails, body-stitchets, muffers, and biggins—are unknown at the present day.

The letter is addressed to Cromwell.

The touching appeal of Lady Margaret Bryan appears to have produced but little effect; for, shortly afterwards, we find the Princess Mary, who resided with Elizabeth and the faithful governess, at Ilunsdon, wrote to the king, in behalf of her infant sister, and, as it would appear, with some success.

By his marriage with Jane Seymour, the favourite wish of Henry's heart was at last gratified—the queen made him the father of a son; but the birth of the long-desired heir was purchased at the expense of his mother's life, who survived her accouchement but a few days. At the christening of the infant prince, the daughters of Catherine of Arragon and Anne Boleyn appeared in public, for the first time, together. No sting of conscience—no sense of decency or shame—prevented the cruel father from parading, as it were, before the people, the issue of his divorced and murdered wives. Elizabeth, then four years old, carried the chrisom—a vessel of gold, enriched with gems—containing the consecrated oil. To render the mockery yet more complete, she was borne in the arms of the Earl of Hertford, the brother of the new queen.

On the return of the procession, she was led by her sister, the Princess Mary; Lady Rivers bearing her train.

The future Queen of England must have been not only a beautiful and engaging child, but well trained by those who had the care of her education—since she found sufficient favour in the eyes of her savage father to be made the companion of his idolised heir.

According to contemporary writers, the royal children appear to have loved each other with a true brotherly and sisterly affection.

Lady Margaret Bryan, and those who had the care of her person and education, appear to have acted in the most judicious manner to promote the future welfare of their charge. Under every change they continued to keep her not only in Henry's favour, but continually about the court. Neither the people nor the nobles were permitted for an instant to forget that she was the daughter of their sovereign. How often must her time-serving godfather, Cranmer, have had occasion to blush in the presence of the innocent child, whose birth he had stigmatised as illegitimate; but a want of moral courage appears to have been the leading defect in his character.

On Henry's marriage with Anne of Cleves, in 1540, although it was well known that his highness had expressed both disappointment and disgust at his bride, the faithful governess did not lose the occasion of even a temporary advantage for her pupil. However short the reign of the new queen might be, she continued to make the most of it, and contrived to obtain an audience of the king, which most probably took place in the old palace at Greenwich.

The impatient bridegroom listened, as may be supposed, with an ill grace to the formal compliment of the messenger, and replied with one of those inarticulate growls by which he usually expressed his dissatisfaction: growls which, like the echo of the distant thunder, boded but little good to those who had been foremost in bringing about his marriage—as Cromwell and others found to their cost.

Little daunted by her reception—for the Lady Margaret appears to have possessed no less courage than prudence—the governess concluded with a request that her pupil might be permitted to offer her respectful homage to the new queen.

"To what purpose?" exclaimed the tyrant, who even then meditated the divorce which he afterwards carried out, under the singular plea that he had not given his internal consent to the union; "she ought not to desire such a thing, seeing that she had for her own mother a person so different from the queen. Let her write to her, as she will," he added; "let her write to her!"

With this ungracious permission the messenger was dismissed: the result was an exceedingly elegant letter, which Leti, in his "Life of Elizabeth," has preserved; but which, having doubtless been written at the suggestion or dictation of those around her, we have not thought fit to insert.

The unfortunate Anne of Cleves appears to have entertained a sincere affection for her stepdaughter, whose favour was no less marked with her successor, the beautiful but guilty Catherine Howard—who, being related to the Boleyns by blood, treated Elizabeth with great consideration and kindness—the best trait in the character of that licentious woman.

Shortly after the execution of Catherine Howard, Henry entertained two projects of marriage for his daughter: one with a Portuguese prince, the other with the son of the Earl of Arran. The latter was intended as a bribe to that powerful noble, to win his consent to the union of the infant Queen of Scotland, Mary Stuart, with his son, Prince Edward, by which means the two crowns would have been united.

Whilst these treaties were going on, Elizabeth resided with her sister Mary, at Havering Castle—or Tower, as it was generally called; nor did she again make her appearance at court till after her father's marriage with his last and best wife, Catherine Parr, who not only persuaded her husband to send for the princess, but superintended her education, and treated her with the affection of a parent—a kindness which, we regret to add, her daughter-in-law afterwards repaid by the blackest ingratitude: seeing that she encouraged the flirtation—to use the mildest term—of the widowed queen's third husband, Sir Thomas Seymour, the Lord Admiral—a folly or vice, whichever way it may be construed, which occasioned the first speck upon the character of the future Queen of England.

Although only thirteen, a fourth match was proposed for her acceptance, in the person of Philip of Spain, who afterwards married her sister. Never had princess so many suitors.

The period at last drew near when England was to be relieved from the arbitrary rule of the greatest tyrant who ever dishonoured the throne. Henry, bloated and suffering both in body and mind, was called to answer for his crimes at that tribunal where earthly dignities weigh not a feather in the great account.

His successor was with Elizabeth at Enfield, when the Earl of Hertford and Sir Anthony Brown announced to him his accession to the crown. The affection between the royal orphan appears to have been sincere and mutual; and they wept their common loss together. Edward, after his accession to the crown, did not forget his sister, as his correspondence sufficiently testifies.

Henry's will was no less just than politic. By it his three children were placed in the natural order of succession to the crown. His son, who succeeded him, first, as was the ancient and present law of England; then the Lady Mary; and lastly, Elizabeth—provided, of course, that neither of her predecessors left lawful issue.

The dower of both the princesses was made equal: that is to say, an annuity of three thousand pounds, and a further sum of ten thousand on the marriage of either of them, provided they married with the consent of the king and his council.

By the decision of the council, the Princess Elizabeth was placed under the guardianship of her father's widow. It was about this time that Sir Thomas Seymour, the uncle of the new king, made his proposal for the hand of Elizabeth. By some historians it is stated that the council interfered to prevent the marriage; by others, amongst whom is Leti, who had peculiar sources of information, the refusal proceeded from the princess herself—which, when we consider her politic conduct, even in childhood, is not at all improbable.

The daughter of Anne Boleyn appears to have inherited, with the energy and indomitable will of her father, much of her unfortunate mother's levity of character. Even to the last years of her life, she indulged in toying and coquetting with her lovers—a weakness which in youth caused her fame to be suspected, and in age rendered her ridiculous.

Fortunately for her future greatness, to her inordinate love of admiration was added a sound judgment, which stood her friend whenever her real interests were perilled by her levity and misconduct.

A CONCEIT.

Like unto a willow bending—ever bending—
Above the bosom of a lucid stream,
Did my soul waver, still to heaven sending
A prayer that something might reveal my dream.

Yea, like unto a slender willow growing
Upon the margin of a streamlet fair,
Was this fond heart: poor thing! how little knowing
That clearly did its image lie reflected there.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, &c.

BELTZUNG'S PATENT BOTTLE.—This is a very neat and simple little invention, which has for its object to substitute for corks a more convenient and equally secure method of closing bottles. For years the thing has been attempted, but unsuccessfully. Now, however, a machine has been patented, which makes the thread of a screw outside the neck of a bottle when manufactured, without any loss of time, any increase of labour, or any extra expense. The caps fitted on this screw may be made of gutta percha, copper, tin, zinc, and all alloys. It is quite unnecessary to point out the advantages of the invention.

CURE FOR THE POTATO DISEASE.—M. Bayard, a resident of Maine and Loire (commune of Jaille Yoon), has recently communicated to the French Academy of Science a method discovered by him of preventing the potato disease. Before planting the slices of potato, he inserts into each a pea or more, according to the size of the piece. He then plants the potato slices as usual, and, according to his testimony, the resulting crop is altogether free from disease. The theory of this action of remedy, according to M. Bayard, is as follows: The peas, by germinating, withdraw from the potato that excess of moisture to which the disease is attributable, and which result is attained to an inferior degree, and much less satisfactorily, by a dosage of common salt. Hence, M. Bayard considers that the agencies of salt and of germinating peas are precisely similar. Ashes, too, which have been lauded as a remedy by some, would possess a similar theoretic action. It is a curious fact, according to M. Bayard, that the potato disease never approaches very near to the sea shore; another fact, in his estimation, favourable to the theory, that superabundant moisture in the slice seedling is the primary cause of the potato disease. Those who do not consider the matter attentively, may regard common salt as the reverse of a drying agent, inasmuch as it soon becomes moist. This is, however, consistent enough. The moisture results from that which the salt takes away from substance containing water, and in contact with it.

WHAT STEAM HAS DONE.—The time was when eggs in Caithness stood a fixture, summer and winter, at 3d., and haddocks at 6d. per dozen, and woe betide the disposer if they ventured to ask a halfpenny more. We had no steamers then. The times have changed since, and even in the dead of winter, exporters can calculate on regular transit to the southern markets almost to an hour: and hence the price of eggs has risen to 9d. per dozen, and haddocks to 2s. per dozen. The parish of Bowyer gudewives and Whaligoe lasses are unco saucy even at that. We have heard of one exporter of eggs having sent up to Edinburgh market this season, from Caithness, upwards of £2000 value of that article alone. Of the quantity of smoked haddocks sent from Caithness we have no data, but it must amount to a large figure. —John O'Groat's Journal.

English consumers paid to the French farmers or gardeners, last year, no less than £287,000 for potatoes. This large amount is irrespective of those paid to the growers of Jersey, Guernsey, and Scotland. In the two articles of poultry and potatoes, it appears that little less than half a million of money is needlessly and annually paid to "Vorriners"—as the Hampshire people would call them—which might as well and as easily be put into their own pockets. In the year 1851, there were imported live animals: 192,585 sheep, 37,624 oxen and bulls, 24,026 cows, 24,870 calves, 15,597 swine. The last five items, at their market value, may be set down at £1,000,000 sterling. From all these, agriculturists should know that they permit £1,500,000 to be paid to foreigners for articles which may, as far as soil and climate is concerned, be grown at home. To say nothing of £2,132,179, paid in 1851 to the French for flour and wheat. If English farmers will slumber while those of other nations feed, and sow, and reap, who do they expect will "protect" them?

NEW AMERICAN RIFLE.

The fame which our trans-Atlantic cousins have achieved in the improvement of fire-arms bids fair to be considerably extended, by a new "shooting iron," which has recently been brought to this country, and lately tested at Woolwich. Its exhibitors, Messrs. Moulton and Eustis, claim for it two important qualities, which undoubtedly are acknowledged desiderata, and which, as far as an opinion may be pronounced without lengthened examination and trial, do certainly appear to be attained. These qualities are, first, a simple, safe, and expeditious mode of loading at the breech; and, secondly, the cleansing of the barrel secured at each discharge. On the value of such improvements, should they be realised, it is quite unnecessary to dilate, for the use of the rascal is obviously a clumsy mechanical expedient; and the employment of greased patches round balls is neither convenient nor effectual for keeping the bore in perfect order. Every one accustomed to the use of a gun will readily recognise the importance of any safe and effectual means for loading at the breech, the existing practice being the greatest drawback and inconvenience in handling fire-arms, since the abolition of the old flint-lock. American rifles have a very unnecessary quantity of metal in them, which, as it tends to diminish the amount of recoil, affords proportionate facilities for breech-loading. The balls commonly used in them are also smaller (the bore being less); and with this must be taken the fact, that the charge of powder in the cartridges of the new implement is only half that of the ordinary rifle. Messrs. Eustis and Moulton, however, state that it will carry a half-ounce ball accurately 650 yards, and 14oz. 1500 yards. The French government have, it is said, approved of their invention, and given them a large order. It certainly appears well adapted for the use of troops, and, by the presence of the commander-in-chief at the late trial, our military authorities appear to regard it with considerable interest and favour. Its final success and adoption can only be secured by more extended experience of its merits; but, so far as it can at present be judged of, it seems the most formidable, simply-constructed, and economical rifle that has yet been produced, tending to increase the destructiveness of war, should it arise, but also tending to shorten it. If the importation of such inventions have no other effect, at least they may arouse our gun-makers to a display of more energy and skill than for many years they have put forth. The great improvements so recently made in this branch of industry all come from abroad, and, should this state of things continue, not only shall we lose an important trade, but perhaps a strong defence in the hour of national danger. The Americans won their independence with their rifles. Cheap and good rifles will at least help to strengthen ours.

LETTERS FROM A VIRGINIA COUSIN.

BY MARGARET IRVIN.

YOU must know that the negroes almost invariably prefer to intermarry with strangers, rather than with their own fellow-servants, even though by this arrangement they only meet once in a fortnight or so. One of the reasons for this preference seems to be, that when the husband comes to pay the weekly or monthly visit, some little present is generally expected and brought. A few pounds of coffee or sugar, a little parcel of tea, a pair of fowls, or a new head-kerchief, are the husband's gift, purchased with the eighteenpences that find their way to the pockets of any of them who choose to perform extra services. The wife, in turn, has a trifle for her "ole man," too—one of "young Mas'r's" vests, it may be, which she has made look "mighty nice," as she tells him—"tho' 't wa'n't of no 'count, no how, when she got it;" or she has a bonne bouche for him in the shape of one of her pet ducks, which she has roasted for the occasion, or a savoury pie, or something equally acceptable. A lady, speaking on the subject not long ago, told me that her mother had a valuable servant-woman, who seemed to be very strongly attached to her husband; and, as she only saw him once in a fortnight, it was proposed, as a reward for her faithfulness, to purchase him, merely for her gratification, as there was no call whatever in the family for his services. "Then please mam, Miss Sally," she said to Mrs. P., when the latter told her of her intention—"please, mam, sell me. I'd rather you didn't own me and Davy both!"

Well—not to run away from my subject again—Rhynie, a pretty and jaunty-looking mulatto girl, who had attracted my attention by her amusing imitations of the air and manner of her young mistresses, was that night to be married to a servant from a neighbouring plantation, and she wanted to be dressed as much as possible like Miss Maria, who had been the object of her most unbounded admiration when she had been married the year before, to the young planter down on James' River. Miss Maria had worn a satin dress, it is true, but a white dotted muslin satisfied Rhynie. Miss Maria had had a veil of most costly lace depending from the orange flowers in her hair to her white-slipped feet; and Rhynie had been teasing her pet, Fanny, for something that would look like a veil, even though it should be a piece of Miss Sophy's ole lace window-curtains.

You know the peculiarity that most Southern servants have of designating their mistress by the name she was accustomed to bear before her marriage. This arises from the fact of a young lady always carrying servants from her father's house, when she goes to one of her own, who of course retain the old name, and hand it down to the younger tribe that grow up about them; so that one constantly hears the mistress addressed by her maiden name, even though she be a grandmother.

Fanny had not succeeded in finding anything among her own possessions that would suit the purpose of the bride elect. Her sister Sue remembered an old-fashioned wrought tissue veil—such as used to be worn some twenty-five years back, by country brides on the first Sunday of their appearance at church—and she good-naturedly went in search of it.

An airy, summer dining-room of larger dimensions than the more cozy arrangements for the winter warranted, and which, accordingly, was not used in cold weather, except on the occasion of a great Christmas dinner, or something similar, had been granted by Mrs. —, for the bridal party. Miss Sophy's table linen and china had been lent for the nonce; and such a whisking about as there was of turbaned heads—such a running in and out of the great dining-room—such an air of importance among the little negroes who were bringing in irregular bunches of the garden flowers which the frost had spared—white, and red, and yellow chrysanthemums, with sprigs of jessamine and cedar—to the two little girls, Harriet and Sophy H—, who were busy weaving wreaths for the cakes that were to grace the table.

The list of invitations had been dispatched the day before, written by Harriet, at Rhynie's dictation, and amusingly imitative of the "white folks." The child had blotted her sheet, and so had to do her work over again, and it was thus I got a sight of the duplicate list. It may amuse you, Jeanie, to know that its wording was just what yours would be, were you issuing cards for a party. "Miss Rhynie H—'s compliments: she will be happy, &c., &c." Then followed the names: "Mr. Pompey Randolph and lady," "Mr. Milton Peyton and lady," "Mr. Sambo Harrison," and so on—the surnames of course being those of their masters.

Dinner was gotten over considerably earlier than the usual Virginia hour of four, for the convenience of the servants; and we were duly informed that the bride hoped—"you alls white ladies would do her the favour to come and see her married."

At the hour designated, the children of the house—who had all their sympathies enlisted in the matter, and to whom Rhynie was scarcely less important a personage than one of their sisters—came running to inform us that "Uncle Adam" was come, and they were just going to begin. We followed the eager little girls, and together with the rest of the family, made our way to the dining-room, which was already filled with black faces. Fanny H—, who was about fourteen, had had the ordering of affairs pretty much her own way, and had taken care that there should be no lack of light. The silver candelabras were on the mantel, holding tallow candles, it is true, instead of sperm, and the long table, with its wreathed cakes and rows of light, did credit to the young hands that had arranged it.

As we entered, and the smiling, and tittering, and grinning groups rose to acknowledge the favour done them. Sue H— whispered into my ear a line of Byron, slightly parodied:—

"— bright
The lamps shone o'er brown women and black men!"

The little negroes were gazing about among the larger ones, in clean aprons and trousers, pinching one another's ears, and pulling one another's woolly hair, for very merriment, and receiving in return admulatory cuffs here and there from some white-kerchiefed "Aunt."

At length "Uncle Adam" gave the signal by stepping out into the floor: he was a venerable-looking, grizzled-headed old man, whose dignity of preacher gave him great weight among his coloured brethren.

The dark mass parted, and Rhynie, leaning languidly on the arm of her chosen, glided forward, followed by the train of sable attendants. All were bridally attired, and the veil floated most becomingly over the mahogany shoulders of the bride. The hands of all were duly incased in white cotton gloves, with the exception of Rhynie, who sported, through the favouritism of Miss Fanny, a pair of spotted kids. When "Uncle Adam" directed the groom to take his betrothed's hand, there was a deal of tittering from the difficulty of drawing off the tight glove. At last the bridesmaid succeeded in accomplishing it; but not without severing the thumb in her efforts, at which the titter became for a few moments an uproarious peal; but a shake of the preacher's head restored silence, and he went on.

"Do you, brother Sampson, take this lady whose hand you've got a hold of, to be your weddin' wife,—and do you promise afore God and these white ladies that you're a gwine to be a lovin' husband to her?"

"Yes sir!" promptly responded brother Sampson, with as decided a bob of the head as the stiffness of his high-standing collar would permit.

"And do you, sister Rhynie, promise to take this gemelman to be your weddin' husband, and not to give him up for nobody else till death you does part?"

The veiled head drooped in gentle affirmation.

"Kiss your bride, brother Sampson!"

The groom turned to do as he was bidden, but the coquettish Rhynie, forgetful of her position and her new dignity, whirled on her heel to escape the pouting lips that were proffered, and was lost for a little while to our view, among the laughing groups that closed around her. The remembrance of our presence soon recalled her, however, and put her upon her good behaviour again; and she came forward to receive the congratulations which we stood ready to offer.

We did not wish to impose the restraint of our presence long enough upon the wedding party to wait and see the bride's cake cut; so, with an assurance from the bride's mother, Mrs. H—'s old cook—that she would send up a waiter of "good eatens" to the parlour before she allowed anybody to touch a mouthful, we took our leave.

I wish, Jeanie, you could have heard the merry law-haws that reached us in the parlour, as we sat with our coffee-cups in our hands, round the well-filled waiter which had been dispatched to us. If you had, I do not think your heart would have been disposed to waste much superfluous commiseration upon the so-called poor, unhappy slaves. After the supper was fully over, you should have heard the tumming of the banjo, and the echo of the noisy feet that kept time to it. Indeed, the sound was so contagious, that we could hardly keep our own feet still, and felt like whirling one another round the room, from the mere force of sympathy.

When Mrs. H— thought the merriment had been kept up long enough, she sent word to some of the "old folks" to that effect. The noisy guests at once acquiesced; preparations were immediately made for departure, and by half-after nine o'clock all were gone, and the premises at Mount Albyn were reduced again to their usual quietude. Your inference may be, that Rhynie would be quite spoiled by all this fuss about her. Not at all, my dear. The next morning we found her at our bedside very little after the usual hour, dressed in her neat, every-day linsey coat (as the negroes call a dress), quite ready to do our bidding, and looking only a little abashed as we reminded her of her new dignity of wifehood. But surely, even if it did spoil our servants a little sometimes, is not this better than the utter and entire want of interest and sympathy that exists between northern mistresses and their domestics? But enough on this subject; so, dear Jeanie, au revoir.

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XIII.

SCENE—A village; peasants merry-making: JACOB very consequential amongst them.

PEASANT.
JACOB, give thee joy! We give thee joy, Jacob!
'Tis said thou art to be clerk of the parish.

JACOB.
It hath pleased the good minister
So to appoint it.

PEASANT.
The good minister? nay, the good Jacob
So to deserve it.

JACOB.
I do not vaunt—success maketh a man proud,
Nevertheless I assume no pride, peasants;
Though clerk is a pretty name and a worshipful,
Nevertheless I ask you not to say
Clerk Jacob! I say I ask ye not to call me
Clerk Jacob!
Although every man's title is his right:
Delectus esset dignitatis.
And Clerk Jacob's mine, if every man got his due.
I confess that I have a pretty manner withal,
And a voice of some mellifluousness.
Albeit it becometh not me so to exalt
Mine own acquirements: principibus cede.

PEASANT.
We give you joy, Mr. Clerk Jacob.

JACOB, smiling conceitedly.
Nay, good people; nay, of a verity
I take it most unfriendly of you,
As to the Mister—plain Clerk Jacob!
I would assume no dignity unworthy
The occasion and the antiquity of mine office.
Vitis nemo sine nascitur. I pretend not
To be better than my neighbours.

CLOWN.
Now, as thou art a learned clerk, I put it to thee,
Believ'st thou aught of witchcraft?

PEASANT.
Witchcraft? Oh, la, neighbours, let us away.
I dare never sleep alone o' nights
If I listen to witchcraft.

JACOB.
Of what craft, good Master Clown?

CLOWN.
Of witchcraft, sorcery, of bead and book;
Of magic circles, round which dead men's bones
Dance to the hollow drum of their own coffins.

JACOB.
Of a verity, Clown: did not the wisest queen,
Ay, and the best old England ever crowned,
Did not Elizabeth consult the stars,
And summoned Dee, the great astronomer,
Conjuror, foreteller, and Satan's agent,
To name the day for her own coronation?
Believe in witchcraft? Of a surety, Clown.

CLOWN.
But hold they intercourse with spirits, thinkst thou?
Eh, Jacob? thou art learned; a reader, Jacob;
A studier of sciences, I've seen; but mum!
I spied thee throat deep in old musty books,
Parchments, and piled papers; and I said,
If thou wouldst seek out knowledge, Master Clown,
Shake hands now with thyself; for here's the man
Could send thee home with every brain-shell loaded.
Tell me, though, honestly—now good Sir Clerk—
Believ'st in "numbers mystical." Eh, Jacob?
Eh, good Sir Clerk—good Master Jacob—Clerk!

JACOB.
Why Clown,—quot homines tot sententiae—
As many men so many opinions:
Nathless I like not seeing. . . .

CLOWN, interrupting him eagerly, and rubbing his hands.
No—well; no more do I.

What?

CLOWN.
Nay, I said nothing—did I? Well, good Jacob,
Thou lik'st not seeing. . . .

JACOB.
Mystical numbers from all time have been
The ready beads of superstition, Clown—
Credulity the thread to hang them on!
Nevertheless I like not number seven.

CLOWN.
No, thou lik'st better number one, Clerk Jacob;
A jest—no disrespect to thine office—a poor jest!

JACOB.
Thirteen at table suits my fancy not,
For thereon hangs a fatal prophecy.

CLOWN, solemnly.
Nine has been cursed.

JACOB.
Not cursed; there be nine Muses:
Curse not the Muses, Clown.

CLOWN.
I know not what a Muse is.

JACOB.
Why thou amuses—ha! was I not quick
'Twas jest for jest—a very nimble wit!
Three Graces. . . .

CLOWN.
Three?
I know but two: what's the third?
We say but two i' the kitchen.

JACOB.
Not know? then knowing not the third
Mak'st thee a graceless Clown!
Ha, good again, i' faith—a spicy wit;
A very racy wit.

CLOWN.
Nay, an' you be a fetching of wit,
I am myself no indifferent carrier:
Tell me now—

Gone?

[Goes a few steps, and calls after him.]
Jacob! Clerk Jacob! canst thou tell me . . .
He's gone, without hearing my best!
He should have heard my best;
Peter says it's my best! Why is . . .

[Enter PETER.]
I've told it thee before, Peter.

PETER.
Twenty times; thou scorest my memory daily.

CLOWN.
I lack counsel, Peter; construe me this—
Is good sleeping true sign of a good conscience?

PETER.
Sure, as good eating is sign of a good appetite.

CLOWN.
Then listen; for I have that withal to tell thee
Will knock the feet of thy knowledge from under thee:
A bad conscience sleepeth not during the night—
Good!

PETER.
How, good?

CLOWN.
Nay, the conscience is bad, but the imprimis good;
A bad conscience walketh at midnight—
Muttereth to itself—holdeth discourse
With things invisible;
For your bad conscience hath a cowardly sight!

PETER.
Well, well, get rid of thy bad conscience:
What next?

CLOWN.
Lend me thine ear, and keep thy tongue close
Betwixt thy teeth, thus, lest it slip to thy lips:
Then follows it, Master Peter,

[Whispering.]
That this Falkner
Hath an evil conscience! I sleep over him;
First floor of all others from the ceiling,
Cool in winter, hot in summer; I'm but a clown—
It matters not where I lodge.

But as I tell thee,
This Falkner waketh me all hours of the night:
It's not a little can rouse me, for I'm a hard sleeper.
Well! I start me up—midnight; the old tower
Striking one, two, three; and bolt upright I listen:
Tramp, tramp, tramp, tramp, to and fro; then a noise
As though some one threw himself heavily
Into a chair; then—noiser yet!—groans—Peter;
Such heart-splitting groans: oh, dear!
Then a window slowly and creakingly
Heaved up, as though the air of the place
Had grown too hot for him.
Once, when I could bear it no longer, I knocked,
And inquired whether he were ill?

PETER.
Well?

CLOWN.
Well; no reply—silent as fear: after Waiting some time I returned to my loft,
And heard no more of him that night.
Take my word for it, Peter, if our lady
Wedded him, the bridal wreath will prove
Of black flowers; a garland of crape,
With gloves to match; no man liveth long
That sleepeth not: they say he's been in India!
I like not people that have been in India.

PETER.
Thou mightst as well tell me—they say he's not
Had his dinner; I like not people
Who have not had their dinner.

CLOWN.
Well, peradventure I don't.

PETER.
Don't what?

CLOWN.
Like people who have not had their dinner.

PETER.
Thy most marvellous reason?

CLOWN.
'Tis plain as a pikestaff.
People who have not had their dinner
Are empty; emptiness is folly!
Folly is depravity—dost thou mark?
Depravity is vice, and vice is crime:
Ergo, it is a crime to be hungry!
People who have not had their dinner
Lack virtue; therein they are obnoxious,
Therefore in my disfavour.

PETER.
Thou hast been in wise company,
Where thou hast found more whys than wherefores

But herein thou art unwise,
Therefore a clown!

CLOWN.
A non sequitur, Peter—a non sequitur.
Thy civility is a little soured in the bleaching;
That is to say, thou takest liberties.

PETER.
Let me take the further liberty
Of advising thee . . .

CLOWN.
Ay, Master Peter.

PETER.
Not to be over liberal with thy story
Of this Falkner: thy not liking him
Matters little, but his not liking thee
Might cost thee thy place. Be wary, Clown.

CLOWN.
I will, an thou wilt own now I have a learning,
And a nice skill as to causes—cute in question:
I do enjoy a bit of your deep philosophy—
I should like to dive, and bring up
Out of the great sea of knowledge
The why and the wherefore of every thing.

PETER.
Keep as thou art, Clown; the sea of folly
Hath as many divers within it,
And the knowledge they bring to the surface
Is equally popular.

CLOWN.
Popular?
I remember an orator, Peter,
A fine, lipping, mincing, gentleman,
So much in love with his own eloquence
That he was always clipping his own words.

PETER.
Clipping! ha, ha, ha! thou shin'st to day, Clown.

CLOWN.
I had but little schooling worth calling;
But genius, Peter, genius makes up for it.
Old Headline, the schoolmaster, owes to this day
That when only in two letters, I made them
Sound out like words of three syllables.
Ay, Peter, but fine scholarship's a fine thing.
I learnt just sufficient to puzzle my brains,
And so made me a clown! If I get
A good thought, 'tis a blunder of nature!

PETER.
Why then, thy wisdom, Clown, might blunder here
This Falkner, after all, may be in love!
Forgetful of his food—why proof of love!
Absent when spoken to—sure sign of love!
Given to lonely musing—still 'tis love!
Sleepless o' nights—undoubtedly 'tis love!
Thy adder's nest will prove a very dove's.

CLOWN.
Love? if that be love, I know no picture on't.
The love I saw was apple-cheeked and plump
A game of forfeits in the rogue's blue eyes
Love, Peter?—pish, go wash thine eyes, good Peter Love's ever where there's feasting—mind you that.
Love, quotha? I'd as soon wed the church-clock,
And be struck on the head all hours of the day;
Not but a wise man may be mistaken, Peter,
And one of less wisdom set him right.
Thou hast scholarship!
If I had sat on a Latin form for a fortnight,
Like thee, I'd have known the language ere this.

PETER.
So, then,
Thou dost own that some are wiser than thou?

CLOWN.
Ay, some are wise, Peter,
And some are other-wise, Peter!
I wish Jacob heard that:
Some are wise, and some are otherwise, Peter.

PETER.
Come along. . . .

[Seizing him jokingly by the ear, and pulling him off.]

CLOWN.
Ha! you see I'm not to be led by the nose.

[To be continued.]

PASSIONS OF ANIMALS.—Spry and others state that the snake-catchers in the East Indies have the art of enticing snakes from their concealment by a kind of song or humming sound; and Neale affirms that he tamed rattlesnakes by music, and, however dangerous they might be, he completely subdued them, which is confirmed by Chateaubriand, who saw the anger of one of these reptiles completely subdued by the tones of a flute. Lenz, on the other hand, describes these as mere fables, as in no instance could he ever succeed in making any impression on a snake by music; but he cites the instance of a goose which followed a harp-player whenever he performed. Bechtem says that mice are attracted by music, and Bettina noticed the same in running up the gamut. An elephant in Paris, within hearing of a concert, expressed, by gestures, its pleasure at some pieces, whilst others did not affect it. Some dogs are singularly excited by music, and accompany it with a distressing kind of howl. It is known to sportsmen that the deer and roe listen to music, and, according to Obsonville, monkeys are attracted by it, and exhibit marked delight.

[THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE.]

THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

LIKE his predecessor, Mr. Disraeli, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone, has sprung from the ranks of the people; for his father was a Liverpool merchant, who, to use a phrase—happily for the vigour of the British character, common in the land, and not at all considered low or derogatory—we say, to use a familiar phrase, Mr. Gladstone's father "began with nothing." That is to say, he started in business very humbly, acquired a little capital, and, through perseverance and indomitable industry, realised a splendid fortune, and died a baronet, having had that title conferred on him when that great man, Sir Robert Peel, was at the head of the councils of his sovereign, Queen Victoria.

Sir John Gladstone may be said to have been one of the lions of that extraordinary commercial emporium, Liverpool—for he grew with its growth, and strengthened with its strength. Sixty years ago, it was one of the third-rate sea-ports in the kingdom; but Sir John Gladstone lived long enough to see it rise to be the first seaport in the world—and not only become greater than London, but, taking its exports, excel London and the twelve other principal ports of the empire put together. The worthy baronet was very much attached to the town; and among the inhabitants, the memory of not one of its merchant princes is more respected. And with good reason, for he was a liberal benefactor to the chief local charities, and, in a day when religious destitution was more severely felt than at present, erected and endowed several beautiful churches in connection with the Established Church of England—for the baronet, although a Scotchman by birth, was one of the warmest friends the Establishment possessed; and no doubt it is to this strong predilection of the father for the support of the Establishment as a portion of the constitution, that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer owes the foundation of his strong bias for the institution being de facto, as well as de jure, one of the leading auxiliary estates of the realm.

The subject of our memoir was the third son of Sir John Gladstone, and he was born in Liverpool, in 1809—so that he has just arrived at the age when the mental faculties of a man of talent are in the very summer of their vigour. His early years were passed in his native town, from whence, at the proper age, he was transferred to Eton, and thence to Oxford, where, in 1831, he obtained a double first-class certificate. At college, no student could have been more diligent or more exempt from the influences that too frequently blight the moral freshness of young men of rank and wealth. Young Gladstone was a pattern scholar, and his father, being justly proud of his abilities, resolved that, as the family honours would devolve on the eldest son, and the dignity of supporting the mercantile renown of the name of Gladstone was assigned to the second, the third should dare the steep ascent to political fame. Accordingly, crowned with the bays of scholarship and authorship—for before he had attained his twenty-fifth year he had made his début in the latter capacity—he attracted the notice of Sir Robert Peel, who, oldest patrician families in the country, and must have considerably strengthened his position as a public man, if any such support were needed, when he commanded the rare advantages of talent, character, and wealth.

In September, 1841, he again took office with Sir Robert Peel, as Vice President of the Board of Trade and Master of the Mint, which he retained until May, 1843, when he became President of the Board of Trade, retaining the Mastership of the Mint, but in 1845 he resigned both offices. In December, 1845, he was appointed Secretary for the Colonies; and in the July following, on the disruption of the Peel party, he finally retired, and never again had the opportunity of serving his sovereign in conjunction with the statesman whose untimely loss fell so heavily on the heart of the country.

Mr. Gladstone's literary efforts have been chiefly polemical. He is author of "The State in Relation with the Church," "Church Principles considered in their Results," and other works of a similar class. As an orator he ranks high, for he is chaste, unaffected, and forcible. With politics we have no connection; but we may venture to remark, that Mr. Gladstone is evidently of opinion that, as Great Britain is great, not merely in the extent, but in the diversity of its population, it is sound policy to give to every interest the utmost consistent liberty of action, and the utmost opportunity for legitimate development.

And we may also remark, that as Mr. Gladstone is generally looked upon as the successor, in the political world, of his late lamented leader, his views must have great weight in any cabinet of which he is a member, and be freely canvassed among the public. In social position, in character, in talent, and in domestic antecedents, he strikingly resembles the late Sir Robert Peel.

But it remains to be seen whether his intellect will expand with occasions as they arrive, as did that of his illustrious Mentor. The age is progressive in all its departments—new institutions and fresh conditions are springing up rapidly—hourly they may be seen to grow upon the mental vision; and the man who would direct and control them must emphatically be the man of the age. He must be capable of submitting to generous modifications, to liberal concessions, and to an abandonment of prejudices, however respectable they may be, or however hallowed by the respect of a past generation.

If Mr. Gladstone can realise this largeness of character—if he can follow the tendencies of civilisation as they arise and accumulate—he will unquestionably become a great man. A brilliant future lies before him, if he will but take due advantage of the opportunities that surround him; and as no man could better appreciate the solid benefits of a sound education than himself, the country, we think, will look to him for some comprehensive measure of instruction for all classes.

Let him but establish a system of general education, acceptable to every section in the community, and he will be the most popular minister the country ever had.

But in his present sphere he might do immense good. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, he will have to study the finances of the country; and, without committing ourselves to any positive expression of feeling on the subject, we may say that he has the chance of suggesting means in 1834, was collecting under his ample wings that brood of youthful politicians who have subsequently acquired such well-earned celebrity as the Peel party, and was by him appointed a lord of the treasury; but, when Mr. Stuart Wortley failed in obtaining a seat in Parliament, superseded that gentleman as Under Secretary for the Colonies. He held this office so ably as to obtain the warm approbation of his political chief and patron, until the brief ministry of the latter expired in April, 1835. After that he distinguished himself on the benches of the opposition, and materially contributed to the overthrow of the Whig ministry, in 1841. But during this interval he was more agreeably engaged than in levelling his powers against the policy of a cabinet obnoxious to his party—for in 1839 he married Catherine, eldest daughter of the late Sir Stephen Richard Glynn, Bart., of Hawarden Castle, Flintshire. He thus became connected with some of the

for the equitable adjustment of the national burthens, and the establishment of a principle of taxation that will afford more satisfaction than that now followed.

Freedom of industry, of trade, and of commerce, demand a large allowance of liberty for other conditions; and we must boldly state, that all such taxes as those on knowledge are incompatible with the pure interests of the nation; they are opposed to its instincts—in fact, are impediments in the way of its course of action. Their repeal would occasion no great loss to the revenue, and if the question was made one of mere fiscal prudence, they might be transferred, with wisdom and decency, to the luxuries that come so extensively into demand with the accumulation of wealth, and the accompanying increase of wants that, in previous stages of civilisation, are deemed purely artificial.

Thought should be as free as the heaven from which it came; but thought cannot be free in England, until its machinery is delivered from the grasp of all restrictions upon its productive power, and the contamination of impositions entirely the inventions of a less enlightened period.

OUR AIM.

BY G. BENNETT.

Oh! that our thoughts, like winged spirits flying
Through the still air, could reach an absent friend!
Oh! that their souls, to those fond thoughts replying,
Could back to us some welcome message send!

Were it not well, ere sleep the world concealing
From human eyes, bids us its cares forget,
To let some thought, our hearts' deep love revealing,
Fly to the home where dearest friends are met?

There should it whisper, 'midst their quiet gladness,
Of faithful ones, that yearn with them to be;
That in their absence feel a secret sadness
Steal like a storm-cloud over memory.

Go, holy thought!—like a pure spirit soaring,
To bask amidst the noontide blaze of light—
Go! tell the loved of one whose soul is pouring
Its prayer for them in the deep silent night!

Go! bear to friendly hearts the fond assurance,
Of truth unchanged amidst the storm of years—
Of warm affection, proved by long endurance—
Of faith which still without a stain appears!

Go to the dying, as the chain that bound them
To earthly ties is broken, link by link;
With purer, higher, holier hopes surround them,
Lest from the darkness of the grave they shrink.

And whisper to the silent mourner, bending,
In such deep sorrow o'er the much-loved dead,
That the freed spirit to its God ascending,
Hath from the cares of earth for ever fled.

Go to the captive's cell, glad tidings bring
Of faithful hearts that strive for his release;
Go! on the aching brow and spirit fling
The hush of slumber and the calm of peace!

To the unquiet mind, which pain and sadness
Forbade to slumber through night's reckless hours,
That memory tortures almost into madness,
While storms have blighted all hope's sweetest flowers.

Say that misfortune hath not touched them only—
That others droop beneath the same dark care:
But that the loving heart is never lonely,
Still linked to other hearts by thought and prayer!

Go to the chambers of the poor and lowly,
Let them know that our thoughts are oft like theirs—
Our souls full of those feelings, pure and holy,
Which prompt in all the same deep, earnest prayers!

Tell them the links of human love have bound us
To all the human race; and that we claim
The sympathy of all true hearts around us—
A universal brotherhood our aim!

COMMUNION WITH DEPARTED SPIRITS.

A belief in the possibility of communion with the spirits of the departed, and that they watch over us, should, says Washington Irving, be a new incentive to virtue, rendering us circumspect even in our most secret moments, from the idea that those we once loved and honoured are invisible witnesses of all our actions. It would take away too, from the loneliness and destitution which we are apt to feel more and more as we get on in our pilgrimage through the wilderness of this world, and find that those who set forward with us lovingly and cheerily on the journey, have one by one dropped from our side. Place the superstition in this light, and I confess I should like to be a believer in it. I see nothing in it incompatible with the tender and merciful nature of our religion, nor revolting to the wishes of the heart. There are departed beings that I have loved as I shall never again love in this world; that have loved me as I never again shall be loved. If such beings do ever retain in their blessed spheres the attachments they have felt on earth—if they take an interest in the poor concerns of transient mortality, and are permitted to hold communion with those whom they have loved on earth—I feel as if now, at this deep hour of night, in this silence and solitude, I could receive their visitation with the most solemn and unalloyed delight. It is an exquisite and beautiful thing in our nature, that when the heart is touched and softened by some tranquil happiness or affectionate feeling, the memory of the dead comes over it most powerfully and irresistibly. It would almost seem as if our better thoughts and sympathies were charms, in virtue of which the soul is enabled to hold some vague and mysterious intercourse with the spirits of those whom we dearly loved in life. Alas! how often and how long may those patient angels hover about us, watching for the spell which is so seldom uttered, and so soon forgotten!

FACETIÆ.

KEEP clear of the law; for when you gain your cause, you are generally a loser of your money.

"MRS. JENKINS," said a little red-haired girl, with a pug nose and bare feet, "mother says you will oblige her by lending her a stick of firewood, filling this cruet with vinegar, putting a little soft soap in this pan, and please not let your turkey roost on our fence."

A little farm well tilled, is to a farmer the next thing to a little wife well willed.

THINGS EXTREMELY DIFFICULT NOT TO LOSE ON A RAILWAY.—A limb, or an eye, or a tooth, or your time, or your patience, or your trunk, or luggage, or your wife, or your life!

"I fear," said a country minister to his flock, "when I explained to you in my last charity sermon, that philanthropy was the love of our species, you must have understood me to say specie, which may account for the smallness of the collection."

A barber in London advertises that his customers are shaven "without incision or laceration, for the microscopic sum of one halfpenny."

The following epitaph is by Moore, on an attorney named Shaw:

Here lies John Shaw,
Attorney at law,
And when he died,
The devil cried,
"Give us your paw,
John Shaw,
Attorney at law!"

—Russell's Life of Moore.

SOME wag inserted in a London paper a notice of a meeting at the Reform and Carlton, to consider the propriety of an amalgamation.

TIMELY ARRIVAL.—The Marquis of Lansdowne called one morning on the Countess of Cork, and found the whole house in a state of great bustle and excitement. "Come in," said she, "Lord Lansdowne—come in! I am so glad you arrived at this moment! only think! the grey parrot has just laid an egg!"—Moore's Diary.

REPUTED ORIGIN OF "BLACKGUARDISM."—In all great houses, but particularly in royal residences, there were a number of mean and dirty dependents, whose office it was to attend the wood-yard, sculleries, &c. Of these (for in the lowest depth there was a lower still) the most forlorn wretches seem to have been selected to carry coals to the kitchens, halls, &c. To this smutty regiment, who attended the progresses, and rode in the carts with the pots and kettles, which, with every other article of furniture, were then moved from palace to palace, the people in derision gave the name of "blackguards," a term since become sufficiently familiar, and never before properly explained.—Gifford's Notes to Ben Jonson.

ABERNETHY AND LISTON.—With all his power of creating mirth, and provoking laughter in others, Liston was, when at home, the dullest man imaginable, and a prey to low spirits, which frequently threatened his reason. By the persuasion of his wife, he went to the celebrated Abernethy, so well known for the brusquerie of his manner. Liston was ushered into the surgeon's room, and was received with a slight bow by the old cur, who was unacquainted with the name or person of his visitor. "Sit down, sir. What ails you?" said the doctor. Liston stated his complaint with gravity and deliberation. "Is that all?" inquired Abernethy. "There's nothing the matter with you! Low spirits! Pooh, pooh! Go to Covent Garden to-night, and see Liston perform; if that has no effect, go again to-morrow: that will do it. Two doses of Liston will restore a melancholy madman! There—go—go!" Liston was taken aback—tipped his guinea—and made a most theatrical exit.

CURRAN AND CHANCELLOR CLARE.—Lord Chancellor Clare, on one occasion, while Curran was addressing him in a most important case, occupied himself with a favourite spariel, or Newfoundland dog, seated by him; and all the world will remember the rebuke administered to him by that rarely-gifted man. Curran having ceased speaking, through indignation, or malice prepense, Lord Clare, raised his head, and asked: "Why don't you proceed, Mr. Curran?" "I thought your lordships were in consultation," replied Curran.

HEIGHT OF GALLANTRY.—At the late "fair for the blind," in Boston, a sailor was strolling past a table kept by a most lovely woman. Jack stopped, looked for a moment in breathless admiration, then took a ten-dollar note from his pocket, laid it on the table, and was passing on. "My good friend," said the lady, "won't you take something for your money?" "I thank you, madam," replied the tar, with another shy look; "I've had more than my money's worth already."

A western farmer, being obliged to sell a yoke of oxen to pay his hired man, told him he could not keep him any longer. "Why," said the man, "I'll stay and take some of your cows in place of money." "But what shall I do," said the farmer, "when my cows and oxen are all gone?" "Why, you can then work for me, and get them back."

A GOOD PLACE FOR HUNTING.—"Well, farmer, you told us your place was a good place for hunting—now we've tramped it for three hours, and found no game." "Just so—well I calculate, as a general thing, that the less game there is, the more hunting you have."

"I say, square, what'll you take for that are dog o' your'n?" said a Yankee pedlar to an old Dutch farmer; "what'll you take for him? He ain't a very good-looking dog; but what was you callin', maybe, he'd fetch?" "Ah!" responded the Dutchman, "dat dog ish n't wort' nothin', most; he ish n't wort' you to buy 'um." "Guess tew dollars about would git him, wouldn't it? I'll give you that for him." "Yaas; he isn't wort' dat." "Wal, I'll take him," said the pedlar. "Sh'top!" said the Dutchman: "Dere's one ting about dat dog I can't sell." "Oh, take off his collar; I don't want that," suggested the pedlar. "Tain't dat," replied Mynheer; "he's a boor dog, but I can't sell de wag of his tail when I come home!"

THE Calcutta Englishman publishes the following amusing episode in the Burmese War: "The setting sun was gilding the broad waters of the Irrawaddy, as the steamer Mozuffer, with the Calcutta mail, cast her anchor below the Hastings shoal, dreading, at that late hour, to attempt its dangerous passage. But a little time had she lain there, when the Mahanuddy, feeling her way, cautiously yet closely approached her; and a staff-officer from the last-named vessel, hailing the Mozuffer, eagerly asked for the latest news. 'The news!—the news!' exclaimed he; and about fifty persons, officers and privates, clustered round, anxiously awaiting the desired information. 'News!' responded a gruff voice from the Mozuffer—'ay, there is news, and good news, too, for you military! That old woman, Godwin, has been superseded, and General Cheape has been appointed to the command in his room.' General Godwin was himself the officer who was asking the news: those around him were his staff, or the troops proceeding to the capture of Pegu! We will not attempt to describe the scene; it sufficeth to say, that the principal actor in it was furious: he immediately stopped the Mahanuddy, and ordered the officer commanding the Mozuffer to send him his despatches. Those present tell us, that it was difficult to say which was most amusing, the rage of the general, or the consternation on board the Mozuffer, when they learnt the name and rank of the officer to whom they had imparted the interesting intelligence."

"LARNING—larning—larning!" is the cry of father an' mother: if my boy had the "larning," what a janius he would be! In course, ye old fools, your bouchal would be a swan among the goslings; but it isn't "larnin" half the world want: instead of "larnin," by which they mean cobwebs picked out of dead men's brains, if they would get some discipline. Discipline—discipline—discipline—that's the only education I ever saw that brought a boy to any good. What's the use of battering a man's brains full of Greek and Latin pothooks, that he forgets before he doffs his last round jacket, to put on his first long-tailed blue, if ye don't teach him the old Spartan virtue of obedience, hard living, early rising, and them sort of classics? Where's the use of instructing him in hexameters and pentameters, if you leave him ignorant of the value of a penny piece? What height of bletherin' stupidity it is, to be fillin' a boy's brains with the wisdom of the ancients, and then turn him out like an omadras, to pick up his victuals among the moderns!—Blackwood's Magazine.

A CHRISTMAS INCIDENT.—In a district in the neighbourhood of Inverness, which of late has become locally notorious for breaches of promise of marriage, &c., the following incident took place lately: A farm servant had wooed and won the affections of a young woman; her consent to marriage was obtained, and Christmas night appointed for the celebration of the nuptials. A large party of friends and acquaintances were invited to attend the wedding, and the apartments of the principal inn in the district were secured for the occasion, a substantial supper having been ordered to be ready for all and sundry who chose to partake of it. The day preceding that set apart for the festivities, however, brought mine hostess the following laconic epistle: "Dec. 23, 1852.—Mem, you Will not Require to be at the terrible of Preparing a Wedding for Me." The party most interested—the intended bride—received no intimation of the change which had come over the spirit of her lover's dream, and, consequently, at the appointed hour, accompanied by a batch of friends, she reached the inn. The brief epistle quoted above was produced, the party became excited, and a number of those present sallied forth to effect the capture of the bridegroom, and compulsory fulfilment of his engagement. The clergyman was also present, and exerted himself to comfort the unfortunate affianced. While the proceedings narrated were going on, a farm lad from Forres arrived at the inn, on his way to visit his friends in a neighbouring strath; and having been made acquainted with the whole affair, gallantly "popped the question" to the deserted fair one, and was at once accepted. The minister was still present, the knot was tied, dancing commenced, and the evening was spent right pleasantly. It is hoped that the spirited young ploughman may never repent his hasty marriage.—Inverness Courier.

A FAMILY SCENE.—A gentleman deeply engaged in study—and a lady, pretending to knit, is perplexing him with her questions.—Lady (in the drawing, affectionate style): "Ma deah! correctly speaking, what is a dentist?" Gentleman (short, sharp, and rather cross): "Dentist is derived from dent, French for teeth. Dentist is a man who pulls teeth out." Lady (after knitting once round, in order to give the gentleman time to become immersed in his book again): "Ma deah! you said this morning that Professor Musty was a great linguist. Is not linguist derived from the Latin lingua, a tongue?" Gentleman (tartly): "Yes." Lady: "Well, then, is a linguist a man who pulls tongues out?" Gentleman (very decidedly): "No, madam; but I wish to heaven he did!" Exit lady in a huff.

A CLEVER DOG.—An individual in Montrose is in possession of a member of the canine race which is apparently far more sagacious than beautiful. Its owner, it seems, has been in the habit of visiting a friend, about sixteen miles distant in the country, pretty frequently by railway recently. However, the visits have not been so frequent as his dogship desired. Being evidently a high-minded animal, and scorning to depend upon others for his own pleasure, he went off the other day to the railway station, deliberately took his accustomed seat in a carriage, waited patiently till the train arrived at the station nearest his master's friend's house, and then leaped off, and made for his country residence, where he got safe, much to the astonishment of his host; but, if one might judge from the pendulosity of his tail, greatly to his own satisfaction.

BOOK-KEEPING TAUGHT IN ONE LESSON.—Don't lend them!—Punch.

POLITICAL TRUISM.—If the present Ministers do not fall out, it is more than probable that they will keep in.—Ibid.

OBJECTIONABLE CHILD: "Lor! Pa, are you going to smoke?" My eye! won't you catch it when Ma comes home, for making the curtains smell!—Ibid.

TURNING A PENNY.—Among the new inventions of the day is an article called a revolving till. We are not fully aware of the advantage of a revolving till, but one of its uses may probably be the reception of good round sums.—Ibid.

LOVE'S LABOUR LOST.—Two men exert themselves to no purpose. One is the man who tries to have the last word with his wife; and the other is he who, having had the last word, tries to make her confess she was in the wrong.—Ibid.

THERE'S NOTHING LIKE LEATHER.—Some Frenchman has been amusing himself in the fabrication of a new hat, which is made entirely of leather. We don't know why a hat made of leather should not be as good and as handsome as any other hat, but somehow it would seem strange to us if we had to leave our hat with our boots outside the door to be cleaned every morning, and it would sound equally strange to hear any one calling down the kitchen stairs: "Hallo! Mary; haven't you blacked my hat yet?"—Ibid.

"WHEN FOUND, DON'T MAKE A NOTE OF."

To find a government steamer which will compete in speed with any common coal-barge.

To find a better school for Accidence than a Railway.

To find the philosopher's stone, or its equivalent in rarity—a stone of butcher's meat, which by your own scale weighs fourteen pounds.

To find the centre of a dress circle without a shilling to the boxkeeper.

To find a clairvoyant who, upon his own responsibility, will venture to foretell when the Beer Monopoly will end, or the Amelioration of Ireland begin.

To find a vegetarian so strictly adherent to his principles as to decline eating a kidney potato.

To find the wife who will spontaneously give her husband the latch-key, rather than herself sit up for him.

To find an individual of sufficiently homoeopathic appetite to dine twice off a leg of mutton at a sea-side lodging-house.

To find so "plain" a cook that not even a policeman will "make up" to her.

To find a man who ever lent his umbrella "for five minutes," and lived to see it back again.—Ibid.

QUESTIONABLE SPORT.—The Court Circulars of the daily papers frequently state that "His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out shooting." But we remark that they never report his bringing home any game.—Dryden.

A TREAT.—Amongst the "law notices" the other day, we saw, under the head "Court of Chancery," that "The Lord Chancellor would sit in Lincoln's-inn to hear humble petitions." What else can he expect to hear? Surely no sane man would ever think of petitioning Chancery!—Ibid.

REMARKABLE.—The Metropolitan Poultry Show was honoured by a visit from the Ambassador of Turkey. Several fights took place between certain combative specimens of the feathered tribes, but they were soon suppressed by the vigilance of the police. The number of visitors amounted to 12,000; yet there was an entire absence of foul play.—Ibid.

WOMAN'S LAST NEW MISSION.

The "Women of England," a little while ago, wrote a very polite note requesting "their sisters," the women of America, to do them the small favour of abolishing slavery throughout the whole extent of the United States. Really, they would feel very much obliged to them if they would, and any little matter they could do for them in return they would be most happy. To this the "Women of America" have returned, what they call an answer; one, however, not alluding in any way to the trifling request addressed to them, but asking their English sisters if they would be kind enough to educate the lower orders of English society; just to set Ireland to rights again; to see that the journeymen tailors are paid proper wages, and not compelled to work on Sundays; to be so good as to raise the condition of the now wretchedly-paid needlewomen; to make the costermongers get married; to render the dwellings of the agricultural and labouring population comfortable homes; and, in fact, altogether to remove all the social abuses and carry out all the social reforms, that have engaged the attention of philosophers and statesmen for years.

We like this extremely. It is better than all the arbitration schemes that the most violent member of the Peace Society could ever dream of. However superior moral force may be to force of arms—however much nations would gain by arguing their quarrels instead of going to war about them, we all know that when great, rude, big boys, like Russia, France, or England, begin arguing with each other, they are very apt to come from words to blows. Not so with the women—bless their dear, gentle little hearts! The tongue alone is their offensive and defensive weapon; and, however fierce the contest, it would only end in one or other nation having the last word.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

You are at all times what God sees you to be; you are not at any time what man judges you to be, only so far as his judgment is in agreement with the Divine light. This is a most interesting consideration.

CONTENTMENT is the great sweetener of life in every state.

So soft a pillow is death to a good man, so willingly, so gently does he leave the world, as a weary labourer goes to bed at night.

WHAT a beautiful virtue is benevolence! It is a precious one existing between man and man, as children of one common Father,—a tie wholly unaffected by difference of age, station, kindred, or country, and over which the artificial distinctions of a vain world have little power.

THE LITTLE BLACK BOY.

My mother bore me in the southern wild,
And I am black, but ah! my soul is white;
White as an angel is the English child,
But I am black, as if bereaved of light.

My mother taught me underneath a tree,
And sitting down before the heat of day,
She took me on her lap and kissed me,
And pointing to the east began to say:

“Look on the rising sun, there God does live,
And gives his light and gives his heat away,
And flowers, and trees, and beasts and men receive Comfort in morning, joy in the noon-day.

“And we are put on earth—a little space—
That we may learn to bear the beams of love,
And these black bodies and this sun-burnt face,
Are but a cloud and like a shady grove.

“For when our souls have learnt the heat to bear
The clouds will vanish, we shall hear His voice,
Saying, ‘Come from the grove, my love and care,
And round my golden tent like lambs rejoice.’”

Thus did my mother say and kissed me,
And thus I say to little English boy—
When I from black and he from white cloud free,
And round the tent of God like lambs we joy,
I'll shade him from the heat, till he can bear
To lean in joy upon his Father's knee,
And then I'll stand and stroke his silver hair,
And be like him, and he will then love me.

MAN is a social being, and so desirous of fellowship, that he pines and grows sick of life when destitute of companions to share his joys. Cicero carries his social desire so far as to say, “A man would have no pleasure in discovering all the beauties of the universe, even in heaven itself, unless he had a partner to whom he might communicate his joys.”

In a conservatory I found a teacher who said more to me than sermons often do. It was a luxurious rhododendron, covered with blossoms. When some one passing, shook it roughly, it scattered a shower of honey-dew from its roscate cups, and immediately began to fill its chalice anew with transparent ambrosia. For a few days past I had been a little vexed, with the world and its rude thoughtlessness, but I took a lesson of the rhododendron, to shower sweetness on hands that disturbed me, and to fill anew with pure honey-drops the chalice of my inward thought.

MISCELLANEOUS.

If the 27,000,000 inhabitants of these islands were each taxed 30s., we should raise £50,000,000 yearly revenue—all we want.

THE Duke of Argyll is working some “home diggin's” near Inverary, where, two years since, while the land was being drained, a rich ore of nickel was discovered. At the present time many hundred tons of the valuable ore are collected in barrels ready for exportation. The duke has refused £30 a ton for it.

NEW THEORY OF THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.—Prince Madog was the first, according to the “History of Wales,” that discovered the New World. After his discovery, he returned to Wales for followers, and sailed again, but never afterwards returned—this was about the twelfth century; and this, added to the fact that a tribe of Welsh Indians has been lately discovered in America, proves that these Welsh adventurers were the discoverers of the New World.—Ellis Robert's Lecture on the Music of Wales.

AUSTRALIA.—It is observed, in Mr. Lancelotti's book upon Australia, that almost everything in nature is, in Australia, the reverse of what it is here. When we have winter they have summer, when we have day they have night; we have our feet pressing nearly opposite to their feet. There, too, the compass points to the south; the sun travels along the northern heavens; the plumage of the birds is beautiful, their notes are harsh and strange; the swans are black; the eagles are white; the moles lay eggs; the owls screech and hoot only in the day-time; the cuckoo's song is heard only in the night; the valleys are cool; the mountain-tops are warm; the north winds are hot, the south winds are cold, the east winds are healthy; the bees are without sting; the cherries grow with the stone outside; one of the birds has a broom in his mouth instead of a tongue; another creature (the duck-billed platypus) unites with the body, fur, and habits of a mole, the webbed foot and bill of a duck. Many of the beautiful flowers are without smell! and even the geological formation of the country, as far as ascertained, is most singular.

THE Commander-in-Chief lately examined a bullet-making machine invented by Mr. Anderson. It is completely self-acting, and, without a single attendant, is capable of producing 10,000 Minié balls per hour; and, as they are all made by compressure, they could not be made more perfect or uniform in the metal than they are by the new machine.

HAPPINESS OF CREATION.—We are affected with delightful sensations when we see the inanimate parts of the creation—the meadows, flowers, and trees—in a flourishing state. There must be some rooted melancholy at the heart, when all nature appears smiling about us, to hinder us from corresponding with the rest of the creation, and joining in the universal chorus of joy. But if meadows and trees in their cheerful verdure, if flowers in their bloom, and all the vegetable parts of creation in their most advantageous dress, can inspire gladness into the heart, and drive away all sadness but despair—to see the rational creation happy and flourishing, ought to give us a pleasure as much superior as the latter is to the former in the scale of beings. But the pleasure is still heightened, if we ourselves have been instrumental in contributing to the happiness of our fellow-creatures—if we have helped to raise a heart drooping beneath the weight of grief, and revived that barren land, where no water was, with refreshing showers of love and kindness.

A FRAGMENT.

BY T. B. READ.

I WALK'D the woods of March, and through the boughs
The earliest bird was calling to his spouse;
And in the sheltered nooks
Lay spots of snow;
Or with a noiseless flow
Stole down into the brooks;
And where the springtime sun had longest shone
The violet looked up and found itself alone.
Anon I came unto a noisy river,
And found the bridge beneath me quiver;
Below the hungry waters howled and hissed,
And upward blew a blinding cloud of mist;
But there the friendly Iris builds its arch,
And I in safety took my onward march.
Now coming to a mighty hill,
Along the shelvy pathway of a rill
Which danced itself to foam and spray,
I clomb my steady way.
It may be that the music of the brook
Gave me new strength. It may be that I took Fresh vigour from the mountain air,
Which cooled my cheek and fanned my hair;
Or was it that a-dawn the breeze
Came sounds of yondron melodies—
Strange sounds as of a maiden's voice,
Making her mountain home rejoice?
Following that sweet strain, I mounted still,
And gained the highest hemlocks of the hill,
Old guardians of a little lake which sent
Adown the brook its crystal merriment,
Blessing the valley where the planter went Sowing the mould, and whistling his content
Through underwood of laurel, and across
A little lawn, shoe-deep with sweetest moss,
I passed and found the lake.

THE EXPOSURE OF SICK HINDOOS ON THE BANKS OF THE GANGES.—As we approached Bengal, I observed, on both banks of the Ganges, a gradually increasing number of cane mats, coverlets, drinking vessels, &c.; and also many sick persons lying upon mats, &c. On inquiring the cause, I found that it was the custom of the country among the poorer classes, that when a patient was supposed to be past all hope of recovery, his relations conveyed him to the banks of the Ganges, so that he might die in the vicinity of the sacred river. The relations or friends of the patients visit the spot, to ascertain whether they are still living: when death ensues, they purchase a sufficiency of wood to make a funeral pile, and commit the body to the flames; when their means do not afford the expense of doing this, they merely burn a portion of the face, and then push the body into the sacred river. When a patient, thus situated, happens to recover, he considers that he has, as it were, acquired a new life, and thenceforth all his former relations and friends are treated as strangers; he never returns to the dwelling in which he had formerly resided, but wanders down the Ganges, until he arrives at Santipore, near Calcutta, where he settles himself; and it is a curious fact, that nearly the whole population of Santipore is composed of such persons. These people never again hold any communication with those who had been nearest and dearest to them; and they contract marriages amongst themselves only. This town or colony—the only one perhaps of its kind in the world—may be called the colony of convalescents.—Koneberger's Thirty-five Years in the East.

SIMPLICITY IN DRESS.—Those who think that, in order to dress well, it is necessary to dress extravagantly or gaudily, make a great mistake. Nothing so well becomes true feminine beauty as simplicity. We have seen many a remarkably fine person robbed of its true effects by being over-dressed. Nothing is more unbecoming than overloading beauty. The stern simplicity of the classic tastes is seen in the old statues, and in the pictures painted by men of superior artistic genius. In Athens the ladies were not gaudily, but simply arrayed, and we doubt whether any ladies have ever excited more admiration.

A TURKISH BREAKFAST.—A Turkish breakfast comprises about thirty dishes. Soon after the first dish comes lamb, roasted on the spit, which must never be wanting at any Turkish banquet. Then follow dishes of solid and liquid, sour and sweet, in the order of which a certain kind of recurring change is observed, to keep the appetite alive. The pilau of boiled rice is always the concluding dish. The externals to such a feast as this are these: a great round plate of metal, with a plain edge of three feet in diameter, is placed on a low frame, and serves as a table, about which five or six people can repose on rugs. The legs are hidden in the extensive folds which encircle the body. The left hand must remain invisible; it would be improper to expose it in any way while eating. The right hand is permitted alone to be active. There are no plates or knives or forks. The table is decked with dishes, deep and shallow, covered and uncovered; these are continually being changed, so that little can be eaten from each. Some remain longer—as roast meat, cold milks, and gherkins, and are often recurred to. Before and after dinner they wash their hands. An attendant or slave kneels, with a metal basin in one hand, and a piece of soap on a little saucer in the other. Water is poured over the hands of the washer from a metal jug; over his arm hangs an elegantly embroidered napkin, for drying the hands upon.

THE RECENT FLOODS.—Amongst the most singular of the effects produced by the recent floods may be mentioned the fact of a corn-stack, fourteen yards long, which was standing in a field at Heversham, belonging to Mr. Wilson, of that village, having been lifted from its place by the rising waters; and, after floating about at their mercy, like a dismantled and rudderless ship, for upwards of an hour, being deposited in safety at the opposite end of the field, wholly uninjured, save by the wet—in as firm and compact a condition as before the flood—and, apparently, without a single blade of straw, in its body or its roof, having been disturbed from its relative position.

MARY STUART'S MARRIAGE WITH DARNLEY.

NEXT day, Sunday, the 28th of July, the marriage took place in the chapel of Holyrood House. Between five and six o'clock in the morning, the queen was first conducted to the chapel by several of her nobles; and it was remarked as ominous, that she was dressed in a mourning gown of black, with a wide hood. She was led into the chapel by the Earls of Levenox and Athol, who left her there while they went to fetch the bridegroom. They were received by two Catholic priests, who, after the banns had been asked the third time, and a notary had drawn up an instrument to the effect that no man opposed the marriage, or alleged any cause why it should not proceed, performed the ceremony. Mary was then conducted to her chamber, followed by her husband; and, as a part of the ceremonies, she was required to cast off her care, and, laying aside the sorrowful garments she then wore, to give herself to a pleasanter life. After some feigned reluctance, she consented; and then every man that could approach her was suffered to take a pin out of her dress, and she was committed to her ladies, who undressed her, and arrayed her in garments more fitting for the occasion. After this commenced the festivities of the day. As the newly-married couple were conducted to the dinner, the trumpets sounded, a “largess” was cried, and money was thrown in great abundance to the crowd of attendants. The king and queen sat together at the high table, the latter served by three earls—Athol as server, Morton as carver, and Crawford as cup-bearer; while three other earls—Eglington, Cassilis, and Glencairn—performed the same offices for Darnley. The time between dinner and supper was occupied with dancing and other gaiety, which was repeated after supper until the hour of retiring. Mary was at this time in her twenty-third year, and Darnley had just completed his nineteenth.

BOOKS RECEIVED

THE MAYFLOWER. By Mrs. Stowe; Author of “Uncle Tom's Cabin.” London: E. Farrington, Bath Street, Newgate Street.—This series of stories, scenes, and sketches, among the descendants of the pilgrim fathers, fully sustains the popularity of the authoress; and is a grateful as well as welcome addition to the literature of the Anglo-Saxon family. We cordially recommend the work to the readers of the LONDON JOURNAL, feeling assured that it will be found as acceptable to the admirers of Mrs. Stowe as any one of her numerous productions. It vigorously sustains her widely diffused and well-earned popularity in the world of letters and moral improvement.

THE MODERN HOUSEWIFE. By Alexis Soyer. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.—A new edition of this excellent and useful families, in all conditions of life, in the management of every department of their households, ought to receive the most encouraging, the more especially as the work has been fully revised, and contains additional receipts, and the most accurate directions for the preparation of every meal of the day, as well as for the judicious management of the nursery and sick-room.

TO OUR READERS.

PERMANENT ENLARGEMENT OF "THE LONDON JOURNAL."

THE Proprietor of the LONDON JOURNAL, anxious to convey to his numerous subscribers and readers the expression of his gratitude for the unprecedented patronage he has received, begs leave to offer it in the form which he believes will prove most acceptable to them—namely, the Permanent Enlargement of the work to ONE-FOURTH more than its original size.

The LONDON JOURNAL is not only the cheapest and argest, but by far the most extensively circulated of the serials devoted to the amusement and instruction of the people. It is the welcome guest alike of the drawing-room and the cottage. Fathers place it with confidence in the hands of their children—assured that not a line which can sully the purity of the youthful mind will be found to disgrace its pages.

In conclusion, the Proprietor begs leave to assure his patrons, that, whilst every exertion will be made to advance with the spirit of the times, in the progress of science, literature, and art, the same moral tone which has hitherto prevailed will be strictly preserved. No expense or effort will be spared to maintain the Journal in its present honourable position, as the head of not only the serial publications of England, but of the world.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JANE CURIOUS.—The science of analogical reasoning supports the suggestion that other planets besides the earth are inhabited. There is a great similitude between all of them, particularly the Earth, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury. They all revolve round the sun, as the earth does, although at different distances and in different periods. They all borrow light from the sun as the earth does. Several of them are known to revolve round their axes like the earth, and by that means must have a like succession of day and night. Some of them have moons that accommodate them as our moon does us, and they are all in their motions subject to the same law of gravitation as the earth. Therefore it is only reasonable to think that those planets may, like our earth, be the habitations of various orders of living creatures.

W. FORD.—The commercial phrase, "settling a bill," means payment of the money. The receipt is a mere acknowledgment of the payment given and taken, not merely to prove the discharge of the debt, but to facilitate the operations of business.

R. ROBERTSON.—The money coming to your wife under the provisions of a deed, there would be no occasion for her mother to make a will, unless she had some accumulations of interest to bequeath.

HERCULES.—Duelling is still practised in England, and it is still fashionable; because if a man of rank, or a military or naval officer were to refuse a challenge, he would be branded as a coward, and "cut," and by none sooner than the women. The law is severe, but it is evaded by secret meetings or trips to the continent. However, no institution of a widely-spread character can be suppressed by the physical law. Opinion is the only power that can act effectually, and as we have become by degrees more refined in our manners and humane in our general tone of society, since duelling was a positive mania among us, let us hope that as we go on improving, duelling will gradually disappear. A moral disease can only be eradicated by the slow processes of thought and experience, and duelling will only have ceased when mankind will have advanced some considerable further distance from the savagery common to all nations and all races.

MANFRED.—Religious darkness is not peculiar to any age or people, for there is always extant an incompetent spirit of appreciation of existences and intelligences not patent to the capacity of the myriads who can only admire material forms. They are insensible to more remote creations, but should not be blamed for purely an organic defect. In their way they are useful, for they operate as a check upon enthusiasts and fanatics, by inviting the exercise of the reasoning faculties, instead of giving unbounded licence to the imagination.

ANNA.—When a man marries, it is quite an understood branch of etiquette that all former acquaintanceships terminate, unless a desire to renew them be intimated by sending their card, or, if distant from their residence, a letter. When this is not done, it must be considered that the husband wishes the acquaintance to drop. The reason for the rule is, that a married man has his wife's tastes to consult as well as his own, and that wives generally look upon old bachelor friends with great suspicion. Besides, the husband starting on a new career, acquires different habits and opinions, and, looking at the responsibility of marriage, it is not desirable or prudent to have too lengthy a list of acquaintances. Matrimony suggests economy and retrenchment. The best plan is to give bachelor friends a dinner previous to the marriage taking place, and they will readily and cheerfully understand it to be intended for their congé.

*—Suppressing the initials, we give the following as a cool sample of the tone of feeling which the emigration mania is producing throughout the country. We can only inform this contemplative and burglariously imaginative correspondent, that if he should commit a crime for which the punishment is transportation beyond the seas, he would most assuredly not be sent to any colony in Australia. He would suffer a probationary imprisonment in this country of two years, six months of which would be in solitary confinement, and then be sent to some dreary settlement, to labour in coal or lead-mines, or be put to harbour work, in which he would for several hours a day be up to his waist in mud and water.

A. D.—Under certain circumstances, divorce should be allowed. It was common in the earlier ages of Syria and Arabia, for it was always regarded as a privilege; and in the more civilised times of Palestine, was still considered to be of so much importance, that even the disciples of our Lord pronounced its extinction a sufficient ground for declining marriage altogether. In the Mosal code, formalities and delays were enjoined in practice, which must have greatly restricted the custom, and which at least softened the painful abruptness of divorce. A period of three months must elapse before the separation could be valid, during which the husband and wife were to be allowed the opportunity of reconciliation. This is only fair, but our law is monstrously unjust. It only allows divorce to the rich, for the costs of an Act of Parliament amount to £400. As marriage has been made a civil contract by the law of England, and always has been so by the law of Scotland, it is quite time it was deprived of the false character it has acquired.

G.—You must be guided by the circumstances of your own peculiar case; but we could not say it would be advisable for parties to marry when the lady was six years older than the gentleman.

LOGOS.—We do not think oaths could be dispensed with—but, viewed in the abstract, they are extremely repulsive; because the imposition of an oath carries with it the strong presumption that the individual is not to be believed without it. The idea has an extensively demoralising effect on those who are placed within the sphere of its influence; and we believe, with the Quakers, that it opens a wide door to the disgusting vice of lying; but how it can be done without, is the question. Human nature must be bound by some obligations, and among the highest discovered must be the voluntary request for the attestation by the Supreme Being to the truth or falsehood of a statement. Before we can discard old forms, new ones must be invented.

TUTOR.—Whenever the person with whom you are discussing a point—whether of love, war, science, or politics—begins to sophisticate, drop the subject instantly. Your adversary either wants the ability to maintain his opinion—and then it would be uncivil to press it—or he wants the still more useful ability to yield the point with unaffected grace and good-humour; or, what is also possible, his vanity is in some way engaged in defending views on which he may probably have acted, so that to demolish his opinions is perhaps to reproach his conduct, and no well-bred man goes into society for the purpose of sermonising.

ALFRED.—"Cutting" a person you do not wish to be further acquainted with, must be very delicately performed—for the act requires strong justification. Glaring instances of bad conduct would be sufficient to warrant the action, and then it must be done without offering an insult. A cold bow is very discouraging, and a stately display of ceremony ought to be taken as a pretty strong hint that an acquaintance is not deemed desirable. It is the manner which renders "cutting" effective. Vulgarly should be carefully avoided.

R. B. L.—The wife should be some years younger than the husband, but when the ages are equal, there is no violent disparity between them; and to your other question we unhesitatingly reply, that marriage between two persons known from infancy is infinitely better than a marriage between two young people comparatively strangers to each other. In the former marriage there is the additional guarantee of friendship cemented by the sweet commonality of years.

RODRICK.—The monarchies and higher classes on the continent have a vehement dislike of Great Britain. Among the people generally, Great Britain is at once envied and admired—envied for its greatness—admired for its liberal institutions. But as the multitude have no great influence anywhere, our country has not any firm hold on the affections or gratitude of the continental nations. As among individuals, so among nations, brilliant success is invariably looked upon with jealousy—and that being the fact, hatred is not far off.

ADA AND AGNES.—The rule is, whilst walking with a friend, never to introduce an acquaintance whom you may happen to meet. Should a lady, walking out with a lady friend, meet her lover, as he could not possibly pass her, she should scarcely avoid presenting her friend. All rules of etiquette have allowed exceptions, and, after all, the heart is the best judge of etiquette.

G. A. S.—Your half-sister opposes your marriage because it would interfere with her residence with you as housekeeper. We do not think that is fair, and if she can, as you state, earn a decent livelihood by following the trade to which she was brought up, she ought surely to prefer independence to dependence. Tell her that her chance of obtaining a husband would be much improved by her abandonment of her half-menial situation.

W. T.—Touching a lady's cheek with a wetted finger, to ascertain whether she painted, is an assault. As to the thrashing administered to him on the spot, it was only proper and manly, and you may light your cigar with his doctor's bill.

J. S. H.—The will must be proved, and you had better consult a solicitor. We can, however, inform you, that the first duty to the testator is to bury him, regard being had to his property and station in life. The family wishes should be consulted; but when a litigious spirit prevails among them, no more money should be expended in the funeral than is allowed by law. £20 has been allowed for a captain in the army, but in this matter the executor must be guided by the station in life of the deceased.

L. W. G.—Your friend is bashful. He is so sensible of the power of female charms, that he prudently admires them at a distance. Men of his temperament, when they do fall in love, become horribly exacting and jealous. Like volcanoes, they blaze out when least expected. Don't be alarmed—he is no woman-hater.

G. COLLE.—It is evident your sweetheart does not like the idea of going to Australia; and no wonder, if the accounts from the gold-diggings be true. Cannot you marry, and turn to money-making at home, instead of going abroad on a speculative errand?

W. F. A.—We would not recommend that all Shakespeare's plays might safely be placed in the hands of the juvenile student. Shakespeare—writing for a grosser age than this—too often wrote grossly. He had to tickle the ears of the groundlings of all classes. A judicious selection might be made from the tragedies. Macbeth, Hamlet, Coriolanus, Julius Caesar, and Richard III. are perfectly unexceptionable.

HAWKLEY Z., a lady, desires to be informed of a cure for blushing—the habit annoys her so much when she goes into society. We do not know of any remedy but mixing frequently in company and studying the art of self-command, as practised to freezing perfection in the higher circles. But blushing, per se, is not a sign of weakness—it is rather a blooming index to unsophistication of character. The wicked and the evil-disposed never blush, for when they are confused they turn fiery red or scarlet, or pea-green, or saffron, or any colour save the delicate carnation of a perfect blush.

DOUBTFUL has a jealous lover, who cannot bear her to go out of doors unless with him; and, as she often prefers going out alone or with a friend, his lectures are very distasteful. Doubtful should yield a little in this respect to her lover's apprehension of danger, but not too much—for if she does now, what will he not insist upon after marriage? Woman's proper place is certainly home, but it is irrational to cage her up like a bird.

DESPAIR.—The etiquette of courtship is in direct opposition to that of every other condition in society. You may violate every known rule but that of propriety. Go boldly to the lady's parents.

AGNES must dismiss the trifler from her esteem with contempt, and strive, by future attention to her mother's wishes, to atone for her previous indiscretion. The man's object is to make you as docile under his will as a negro slave is under his master. As you will have money, and he has none, and is not likely to have any, his motives are sufficiently apparent. His heart is ashes—himself dross.

MERCATOR, who has spent many of the years which compose his age (thirty-one), amidst the perils of the deep, especially in the Arctic regions, would wish to correspond with some dark-haired girl, of a loving disposition, and accomplished; one, in fact, who would endeavour to render his home happy, he having retired from the naval service, possessing an ample competency.

H. L. A., having a fear of being left in a state of single-wretchedness, takes the present opportunity of responding to the appeal of "W. A. M.," stating that she is in her twenty-fourth year, rather under the middle height, neither fair nor dark, domesticated, but at the same time fond of music and innocent gaiety.

ELISE KENT could not resist the inclination to respond to the appeal of "Alfred Travers." When eighteen or twenty, she was said to have had her share of beauty; and now, though turned thirty, is considered good-looking. Why not? At thirty a single woman is in the full summer bloom of life. She adds, that she feels there is within the inmost recesses of her heart a deep font of fervent love, which, at the bidding of a master mind, would well forth a clear, bright stream, that only death could check. She could never love a coxcomb, however high his position:

"Give me a man of sterling worth,
Of temper all benign,
Whose heart with every feeling beats
In unison with mine.

One who can revel 'mid the lore
Of classic Greece or Rome,
Yet not disdain to spend an hour
In happiness at home."

PAULINE feels much flattered by being made the object of so many inquiries, and thinks she would prefer "Arthur."

ERNEST, who is very much pleased with the description of "Ernestine," begs most respectfully to submit to her notice the following particulars respecting himself. He is connected with a mercantile house in the City, from which he derives an income of £400 per annum. He is twenty-seven years of age, about five feet eight inches in height, with dark hair and eyes, and dark complexion, and would seek in "Ernestine" a loving and intellectual companion to cheer, warm, and brighten his solitary hearth.

THEODORE B. TO NELLY TRENT.

I have read your description, full fifty times o'er,
And Nelly, I love you, what can I say more
To the purpose in hand, without being a bore?
I wish I was handsome, but as I am not,
Complaining I know, will not alter my lot;
But my face is expressive, I'm told by the fair,
And I know very well I've a fine head of hair,
And not of hair only—I make some pretence
To a quantum sufficient of good common sense.
Twenty-four is my age, my complexion is dark,
I'm loving and steady, tho' fond of a lark,
In an innocent way, mind, and just to amuse,
And this (when you know me), I'm sure you'll excuse.
Nelly Trent, you have money (three thousand) you say,
I am very glad of it, 'twill brighten our way;
I've not much myself, tho' I wish for your sake,
I had three thousand also, that both might partake
In an equal degree of the blessings of wealth.
However (thank God), I have excellent health.
You'll accept me of course, I don't doubt at all,
So arrange the preliminaries—when shall I call?

LETTERS RECEIVED.—A. Sanders (The verses are not so very poor)—H. R. (The "O" is a numeral in conjunction with others, but not by itself, yet without it the figures would be useless for higher quantities than 9. A very good essay might be written on "O stands for nothing")—Q. Z. (The translation is, "Nothing in life is lasting or secure")—R. B. F. (There never was an English "Drake of Butler.") The latter is the name of the distinguished Orinda family.—Rabea Mico (Advertise for a situation in the daily Times. Clerks with a knowledge of one or two foreign languages, especially French, are in great demand in the metropolis at the present time.)—Semstress (Is referred to the advertising columns of the WEEKLY TIMES.)—Uncle Tom (Until the law of gravity is destroyed, you may have every confidence in Mother Earth. You cannot have read Newton)—Scribs (Clerks are not the class to succeed in Australia)—G. H. L. (At any of the large publishers)—J. W. A. (Gutta serena and India rubber may be dissolved in spirits of naphtha)—Fred. (The copper coinage of Geo. IV. was extremely limited, hence the popular idea of the supposed value of the penny pieces of his reign.)—J. W. G. (The address of the Insurance Office is Moorgate Street, London.)—Meditation (You cannot compel your master to provide you with clothing)—R. T. Y. C. (Apply at the Admiralty)—G. W. B. (Advertise the portrait for sale. Charles II. may have admirers at the present day.)—W. H. (Doctor of Laws)—Nauta (Apply at the office of a shipping master)—J. B. (There are no export duties on any articles of British manufacture exported to the colonies.)—C. S. (Chariton Crescent, Pentonville)—E. M. L. (Declined, with thanks.)—M. D. (Must peruse the advertisements in the WEEKLY TIMES)—J. S. G. (The "Sequels to Don Juan," by unknown hands, were vulgar parodies on that clever, but offensive poem)—J. D. Harford (See "Cunningham's Hand-book of London")—W. A. (Apply at the dockyard, Woolwich)—Gus (Being twenty-one, you are free, but, as a matter of honesty, you ought to serve your full apprenticeship.)—A. Conservator (Is too thin-skinned. He should not father upon us the evil deeds of that wicked fellow, Punch)—J. W. (The surname "Williamson," is simply "William's son")—R. D. (Is thanked for his communication, but, as he will perceive, it has been anticipated)—Runcorn (The name "Egerton," is generally pronounced "Edge-er-ton")—G. R. S. (There are several establishments of the kind in the metropolis.)—W. Davies (The thoughts are vigorous, the diction pretty fair, but the orthography is extraordinary. Four mode of spelling liqueur (likewise), would do credit to a Professor of Phonography)—M. S. L. (The subject has had its day.)—Rorey (In some parishes in England, public-houses are allowed to be kept open, during Divine Service; on Sunday afternoon, but the custom, we apprehend, is merely founded on usage.)—Good Temper (Is positively a Monomania.)—Sancho (The majority of situations in the civil departments of the English government, are in the gift of the lords of the treasury. The mode of application is by memorial.)—Henry B. (Any first-class modern treatise)—X. Y. (The Emigration Commissioners are not at present sending many single men to Australia.)—W. Moreland (In the event of the father having paid for the stamp, the master had no right to charge anything for filling up the indenture of apprenticeship—indeed, he would have rendered himself liable to a very heavy penalty, for practising as an attorney, without being qualified.)—Selah (Send one question at a time.)—W. Zamira (Apply at the Herald's College. The fees, we believe, are 8s. 6d.)—J. S. (We must decline embarking in any theological controversy. Both were right, but their arguments were naturally irreconcilable.)—W. W. R. (Ascertain in what part of the United States the testator died, and then apply to the American Embassy, in London, requesting to be informed where the will would most likely have been deposited.)—Hierichos (How could you make a melancholy case of intemperance a subject of comment in a public journal?)—F. W. (You would be liable. The property had better be disposed of before marriage.)—F. W.—Zenophon—J. Atkins—E. B.—Questioner—M. D. H.—E. J. H. B.—W. C. W.—A. Liberal—Elizabeth Bartock—J. K.—H. F.—Yorkshire—Ellen May—John Deane—Wm. Ellis—H. G. D.—G. P. J. James—L. R. Green—Walter M.—Mint Mead—T. C. Z.—G. T. D.—Cochin China—Edwin Fell—Gulielmus—An Amateur Gilder—C. R.—J. B. Glasgow—James Douglas—E. L. H.—G. D.—J. W. R. D.—Annie—St. Clare—Amy.

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the Office of "THE WEEKLY TIMES," 334, Strand, in the Parish of St. Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex,—March 12, 1853.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 421.—Vol. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MARCH 19, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[MARTIN'S VISION IN THE LIBRARY AT CARROW ABBEY.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXII.

But truth shall yet be heard—no human power
Can stifle or corrupt her purposes:
Thro' superstitious gloom her voice is heard—
It pierces e'en the silence of the tomb,
Bursting the barriers of mighty death.
And injured virtue walks triumphant forth,
Freed from the taint of calumny and crime.

HEIR OF THE SEPT.

WHEN Lady Mowbray recovered from her long swoon, Henry Ashton was kneeling at her feet, bathing her hands with tears; every sympathy of his generous nature was touched by her unmerited sufferings—he felt as if he had been culpable of slandering an angel, by having, even for a moment, expressed a doubt of her virtue. The thought of the joy Sir William would experience at learning she had been true to him—of restoring her to his arms—of seeing his declining days cheered, as he fondly hoped, by the love of the woman whose seeming frailty he had mourned—filled his young heart with emotion. What a picture of their reunion did his imagination paint! Little did he dream that such an event could only take place in that better world, where friendship knows no treachery, and love has no alloys.

"Forgive me, injured martyr!" he exclaimed; "orgive the involuntary wrong my tongue, in echoing the judgment of a misled world, has done you! I can atone it!"

"Atone it!" repeated the religieuse, mournfully. "Oh, never—never! What atonement can restore to me my husband's love and confidence—the years of my lonely, blighted youth—the caresses of my boy—the name of wife and mother?"

"All!" replied the young man, with enthusiasm, "except the days you have wasted in this gloomy retreat of penitence and solitude! The heart of your husband, when he hears the proof of your innocence—the act which inscribes your name on the same glowing page with the heroic women of the olden time—will more than acquit—it will love and honour you! The past will appear only like some hideous dream or storm which has clouded the noonday of your existence—whose sunset shall appear as unclouded as its dawn!"

"You forget, my young friend," interrupted Father O'Hara, in a tone of deep interest, "that our sister is a canoness of the holy order of St. Therese—that the vow she has taken is irrevocable!"

"True!" said the nun, pressing the cross suspended round her neck yet closer to her bosom; "it has bound me to my God alone!"

"Not more than your marriage vow," replied Henry, warmly, "bound you to your husband: that was given with the full sanction of your youthful heart—rose spontaneously at the altar to your lips—was given with the sanction of unclouded reason; nature and religion alike approved the act—heaven smiled upon the words as the recording angel wrote them down: it cancels every other—your husband and your son alike possess the right to call for its fulfilment."

The tone of confidence in which the young man spoke imparted something like a hope to the unhappy lady: the thought of once more beholding the husband of her youth—the child from whom she had so long been separated—of closing her days in the land of her birth—caused the blood to mantle in her thin, pale cheek, and she cast an inquiring, almost an imploring glance at the priest, whose countenance remained cold and impassible as a sculptured statue's on a tomb.

Let us not do the worthy Capucin injustice: his heart felt deeply for the sufferings of the outraged woman; but discipline prevailed over feeling. He knew the difficulty, the almost impossibility, of procuring the dissolution of her vows—knew that the congregation of rites, before whom the question must be mooted, would oppose so unprecedented a step—felt assured that the virtuous but feeble Pius VII. would never exert his apostolic power, as sovereign pontiff, in opposition to their decision: therefore it was that he remained silent.

"Speak, father!" said our hero; "tell Lady Mowbray that the religion of which you are the minister is one of mercy—that it exacts no sacrifice from an unwilling heart!"

The old man shook his head.

"What!" continued Henry, "will Rome, when her husband shall demand her, dare to separate those whom heaven has joined?"

"It is against the discipline of the church," meekly observed the monk—"the canons."

"England hath cannons that will reply to them!" exclaimed the youth, impatiently; "a volley of British thunder, in the harbour of Civita Vecchia, would teach Rome reason, and its priests humanity!"

"Not for me!" interrupted Lady Mowbray, hastily; "not for me! In the hour of my madness I found pity—in that of sorrow, consolation! The cross hath shielded me from the sneers of the world!"

"Say rather," observed Henry Ashton, "from its atonement."

"I must be brief," continued the recluse. "He—the man I dare not name—was a Catholic. He had a relative high in the church—a holy man, whose influence, when reason at last resumed her sway, procured me an asylum here. To his care I committed my boy, to be conveyed to England. I parted with my heart's last treasure at the shrine of duty. When they took him from me—when I pressed my lips to his little cheek for the last time, and heard him lip the name of mother, I felt that the stone of the sepulchre was sealed upon my affections in this world for ever!"

"The angel's hand shall call it back again," gravely replied our hero; "pray, answer," he added; "does the priestly relative of the ruffian whose death was at once your vindication and an act of justice, yet live?"

Lady Mowbray looked towards the priest—not for advice but information. It was evident, that she knew but little of what passed beyond the walls of the convent.

"He does!" said the old man.

"And his name?"

"The Abbate Lucas, superior of the Benedictines."

At the name of Lucas, the inquirer observed that the countenance of the religieuse became deadly pale, and she shuddered visibly—but whether from the recollection of the false friend who had fallen by her hand, or from dread of his living relative, of course he had no clue to.

"I must see this man!" he said.

"Nothing more easy," observed O'Hara; "his convent is in Rome. He is one whom all who have the happiness of knowing, reverence and love. His name is uttered with blessings by the poor. His conduct in the affair of this unhappy lady," he added, "has been dictated by the purest charity and duty."

"Possibly!" answered Henry, doubtfully; then, seeing that his tone had wounded the good monk's susceptibility, he took him by the hand, and added: "at least I doubt not yours."

"Farewell!" said Lady Mowbray, mournfully; "I need not ask you to vindicate my memory to my husband—your own heart will teach you to be more eloquent than my entreaties: to him and to the world my name must remain a memory—nothing more. Should you succeed," she added, "in convincing him that I was innocent—in restoring to his arms his long-lost son, Father O'Hara will inform me of your success, and from her lone cell the sad recluse will bless you!"

With these words, the speaker dropped her veil, and disappeared before her visitor could sufficiently master his emotion to reply to her—to entreat her to reconsider her determination. His heart trembled as it did when he first beheld her at the church of the Capucins, and the low, musical tones of her voice continued to vibrate on his ear, long after the speaker had retired to reconcile herself to her sad destiny by prayer and meditation.

He was aroused from the reverie into which he had fallen, by his companion informing him that it was time for them to depart: without reply, he followed him once more to the little church of the convent, where O'Hara renewed his prayer before the altar.

As he knelt there, our hero could not help mentally reflecting how many broken hearts and blighted hopes had been offered up a sacrifice there—had sought it as a refuge from the sorrows and disappointments of life—and found that in flying from the world, they had only exchanged its sympathies for a living tomb, in which their agonies were benumbed—not cured.

As soon as the old man had finished his devotions, they returned to the Capucini, where Henry laid aside the robe he had assumed: he felt a relief to his spirits in getting rid of it—it had pressed upon him like an untimely shroud.

Before leaving, he had a long conversation with his conductor, on the chance of procuring for the recluse, if not a dispensation from her vows, at least the permission to visit England. The priest assured him that the attempt would be hopeless; he had never, during his long residence in the Eternal City, heard of such a thing: he admitted that the Sovereign Pontiff possessed the power; but that it was never, or very rarely exercised.

"Impossible!" thought the youth to himself; "we shall see!" at the same time he mentally repeated his favourite proverb—from which the title of our tale is taken:

"Where there is a will there is a way!"

At the same time the monk explained to him that the cross of canoness, which the Pope had conferred on Lady Mowbray—or Sister Mary, as he called her—gave her no other privilege than that of visiting the churches of Rome on the great festivals, and certain honorary distinctions in the choir of her own convent.

When Henry reflected on the adventure of the night, he perfectly comprehended how the unhappy wife of his benefactor—finding herself despoiled of fame, dishonoured in the eyes of the world and her husband—had yielded to the soothing influence of that religion which promises so much to its professors, and became a convert to the Church of Rome. To a spirit crushed like hers—reason still tottering on its throne—the gates of the convent had appeared like some port of refuge to the shipwrecked mariner. Nor was it difficult to understand how the Abbate Lucas, anxious to conceal the crime of his nephew, and the scandal which his death, under such circumstances, would reflect upon himself, had done all in his power to induce Lady Mowbray to take the veil, and employed his influence to baffle the researches of her husband.

But that which our hero could not comprehend, was the conduct of the abbate with respect to the heir of the baronet—why he had kept him so many years from his father.

"Was it," he asked himself, "knowing the wealth and rank which the boy would one day inherit, to bring him up as a member of his own church, and thereby extend its influence? Or had death removed the infant before he could restore him to his parent?"

"I will see this priest," he said, "and judge for myself. The good monk I have left judges others from his own excellent nature. He has studied books only, but never read that more difficult page—the human heart! And who can read it?" he mentally added; "not even the angel nearest the throne! He who framed it alone can trace its secret workings."

Still he resolved to try; for although the secrets of the heart may not be read, they will sometimes betray themselves.

As the hour was too late to admit of his returning to the Palazzo Barghese, Henry Ashton resolved to go to his hotel. During his solitary walk his mind naturally reverted to England, and the inexplicable silence of his friends, which began to alarm him: not for the fidelity of Ellen, or the friendship of her uncle—his trust in both was too firm for that; but for their health—for the machinations which he doubted not his rival would contrive against his happiness.

Little did the generous youth suppose to what extent Meeran Hafaz had already carried those machinations.

On reaching his hotel, he could not avoid being struck by the air of consternation and confusion which reigned in the courtyard; the entrance was guarded, too, by a party of police: something unusual, he felt convinced, must have occurred.

"You cannot pass, signor!" said the chief of sbirri.

"But I reside here," replied our hero.

"In that case," observed the fellow, lowering the point of his weapon, "you may enter."

"What has occurred?"

"An Englishman has been assassinated," said the official, in a tone which proved how little there was to shock him in the event—by no means an uncommon thing in Rome—"that's all!"

Henry heard no more. He knew that himself and Walter were the only Englishmen residing in the hotel. With a groan, he darted up the broad flight of stairs leading to the upper apartments of the hotel, and entered the chamber of his friend. His worst fears were realised: Walter was lying on a couch, pale, and all but speechless; his shirt and the white lining of the cloak, which was still wrapped round him, were saturated with the blood which still continued to flow from a wound in his breast.

At the sight of Henry, a faint smile lit his features, and he tried to extend his hand—but had not strength to do so: it fell listlessly by his side.

"God!" exclaimed our hero, "how is this?"

Walter strove to reply, but his head sank upon the shoulder of his friend, who called loudly for assistance, at the same time holding his handkerchief firmly against the wound, to prevent, if possible, any further flow of blood.

"Dying!" he murmured; "dying!"

The next instant Freeborn, the English consul, accompanied by Dr. Kissock, the most eminent practitioner in Rome, entered the room. By command of the former, the police compelled all but his companion and Henry Ashton to withdraw.

CHAPTER LXIII.

From trials only do we know our strength.
As the sword's temper is not proved till tried;
Sorrow which crush the strong, make strong the weak,
When virtuous love sustains them.—OLD PLAY.

POOR Ellen was delighted to escape from the bustle and confusion of London, and eagerly pressed Lady Mowbray to fix the time for their departure to Mortlake. Her faithful attendant, Susan, was not half so anxious: her suspicions of treachery were more than awakened—they were confirmed—by the insidious manners and half-dropped hints of the heartless woman of the world, and the repeated visits of Meeran Hafaz to the colonel, who remained closeted with him for hours in the library; still, as she had no proof of any evil design against her young mistress, she was compelled to remain silent.

The morrow at last arrived; and, after a delightful drive, they reached Cromwell House.

Ellen was much struck by its antique air, and the solitude of its situation. Although far less magnificent than Carrow, it reminded her somewhat of the abbey: the same vast apartments, panelled chambers, and long, gloomy corridors. The gardens at the back extended to a lofty terrace, with a pavilion in the centre, separated only by a road from the river. Between the terrace and the lawn were the traces of an ancient pleasure, skirted on either side by a wall of yew-trees, whose interwoven branches excluded the rays of the sun, and even the air—scarcely a breath could penetrate it.

In this secluded spot she loved to walk—to meditate on the past, or indulge in hopes for the future. Towards the close of the evening of the second day after her arrival, whilst still lingering in one of these secluded avenues, the fair girl was startled from her reveries by a rustling in the branches near her. She started, and would have fled, but, ere she could accomplish her design, Meeran Hafaz was at her feet.

"Ellen!" he exclaimed, in a voice of anguish; "why fly me?"

"This is ungenerous!" replied the orphan. "Why persecute the being you profess to love?"

"In the very question you are answered," replied the young Indian, passionately; "because I love!" Why does the sunflower turn its leaves to the bright orb of day? Because it draws its life from its warm rays—deprived of its glorious presence, it expires."

"Words—words!" interrupted Ellen, who felt, however painful the task, that it was her duty, both to her absent lover and herself, to end his hopes at once. "True love is no selfish passion, seeking its happiness at the expense of a broken heart! Hear me, Meeran!" she continued, firmly; "there is a gulf between us, which even death cannot o'erleap. Were I driven to the choice, I would prefer my murdered uncle's funeral pall to the bridal couch with thee! There is a nameless terror in thy presence! I cannot hate thee, though my heart whispers thou hast merited my hate!"

"Thy hate!" repeated the youth; "why Ellen—why?"

The dying groan which haunts thy midnight pillow—the voice none else may hear," replied the orphan, bursting into tears, "which bids thee sleep no more the balmy sleep of innocence and peace—must answer thee! Farewell! Forcé me not to appeal to Colonel Mowbray for protection!"

"You shall hear me!" exclaimed Meeran Hafaz, seizing her by the hand. "I will not be condemned unheard! Dim and obscure as are your words, I must be dull indeed did I not comprehend them: they point at me—the brother of your childhood, the companion of your youth—as the assassin of Sir William Mowbray!—is it not so?"

His appeal failed to wring from the terrified girl a word to answer it—her convictions were not to be shaken.

"Hear me!" he continued. "For days before his death I was wounded—helpless as a new-born infant—stretched on the couch of fever and of pain! This accusation is the frenzy of your dreams!"

Still she remained silent.

"Or the malice of my rival," he added. "Say at least that you acquit me!"

"God will not acquit you!" replied Ellen, mournfully. "I cannot teach my tongue to utter the words my heart denies—belie the strong convictions of my soul! Forcé me not to denounce you at the bar of human justice, or to claim the protection of my relative and guardian!"

"Claim it!" said the young Indian, sarcastically; "and see if Colonel Mowbray disapproves of my presence, or dares to drive me hence! Unlike his moonstruck brother, he will not sacrifice his niece and the honour of his name to her mad passion for a low-born churl!"

Great as was the indignation of the fair girl, at the disparaging terms in which the speaker named her absent lover, it was forgotten in the deep terror his words inspired. If true, they implied a compact between her guardian and himself.

"You slander my uncle!" she faltered.

"I repeat it," exclaimed the young Indian, "that I am here with the full permission of Colonel and Lady Mowbray, who approve my suit, and have promised me your hand."

"You must take it when I am in my coffin, then!" answered Ellen, firmly; "living, it can never be yours! God help me!" she added, in a tone of bitterness; "I am very wretched!"

"And why wretched?" exclaimed Meeran, suddenly throwing his arm around her waist, and endeavouring to press her to his bosom; "when my love promises all that earth can yield of happiness. Consent to be my bride—return with me to India. No other hope drew me from the land of sunshine and of flowers to the cold region of the north. Time with me shall seem one golden holiday—our home the abode of that deep, sweet content which knows no cloud nor tears! In India you shall reign a queen, and I will be your slave—forestalling every wish!"

"Release me!" said the indignant girl, breaking from him; "you will make me hate you!"

With a step light as that of the startled antelope, she darted down the avenue, and reached the lawn. As she passed the catalpa tree in her flight, she fancied that she saw a female figure crouching under its branches—but terror gave her no time for closer observation.

Lady Mowbray and the colonel were seated in the drawing-room, which was upon the ground floor, and opened into the great hall. The lady was busily engaged in admiring a parure of diamonds, which Meeran Hafaz that very day had presented her with, in order to confirm her in his interests.

"Silly girl!" she said—alluding to Ellen—"to refuse such a lover! So rich and generous!" Then added, with a sigh of regret that her own daughter had lost him: "Poor Isabel! How happy she would have made him!"

"Perhaps not!" drily answered her husband.

The lady regarded him with an air of surprise, as if to ask the reason for such a singular opinion.

"Because," continued the colonel, replying to her look, "there are beings in the world who demand a heart in exchange for their hand; and I question if Miss Harebell ever possessed one to bestow!"

"Romantic!" exclaimed the lady, with a sneer. "And at your age! Fie! I thought you knew the world!"

"You, at least," added the gentleman, "have studied it to more advantage!"

"Perhaps!" said her ladyship, carelessly—for, having secured his hand, she felt little anxiety about his respect; "women are naturally more observant."

The cool sneer annoyed him.

"I can understand, madam," he continued, "bowing to a necessity we cannot avoid, but not the heartlessness which finds a pleasure in evil! Those diamonds would have purchased your very soul, had the follies of a selfish life left you the right to barter it!"

"They certainly are very brilliant!" observed her ladyship, with provoking coolness, at the same time holding them up to the light; "and as I am never likely to wear the Mowbray jewels, it was very considerate of Meeran Hafaz to present me with these!"

The door of the drawing-room was thrown open, and Ellen, breathless with indignation and terror, rushed into the apartment.

"Bless me, child! continued the speaker, what has happened?"

The colonel was confused. He had still sufficient sense of honour left to feel ashamed of the part he was acting towards his dead sister's orphan daughter.

"Uncle!" said the poor girl, advancing to him—and it was the first time she had ever addressed him by the loved and once-familiar name—"he—that fearful man whom we came hither to avoid—whom you and Lady Mowbray promised me I should not meet again—waylaid me in the garden—pleaded a passion which he mis-called love—boasted that he had your authority to address me! Say that it is not so—that I have been deceived! I have no other protector, now, to whom to fly for refuge—say you have not deceived me, or my heart will break!"

The man of the world both felt and looked abashed before the innocent girl whose confidence he had so cruelly betrayed, and he bit his lips in silence. Lady Mowbray saw his embarrassment, and, like an expert general, hastened to his aid.

"This is folly, Ellen!" she exclaimed; "you cannot expect that either your uncle or myself will consent to quarrel with our friends, because you happen to dislike them! What objection can you have to Meeran Hafaz?"

"That, madam," replied the orphan, "is a question you have forfeited all right to ask!"

"Ridiculous!" ejaculated the lady.

"He knows!" continued the fair girl, turning extremely pale, at the same time pointing to Colonel Mowbray: "the mystery is becoming clearer! God!" she mentally added to herself, "for what am I reserved?"

It was in vain that both husband and wife endeavoured to persuade her to receive the young Indian on the footing of a visitor merely. She continued firm in her refusal, and declared her resolution of returning the very next day to the rectory. Then it was that the last mask fell, and she discovered how completely she had been betrayed.

"You will ask my permission first!" replied her uncle, laughingly. "If I have hitherto humoured your absurd prejudices against my friend, it was in the hope that time and reason would correct them; but since I find my indulgence thrown away, I shall try what my authority as your guardian can effect!"

"It can effect much, uncle," replied his niece; "it can break my heart, blight my dream of happiness, drive me, possibly, to despair and death—but never to the arms of a man whom I abhor! I can never be the wife of Meeran Hafaz!"

"What should prevent it?" demanded her ladyship.

"The memory of the dead!" solemnly answered Ellen.

"Say, rather," exclaimed the angry woman, piqued at the firmness of one whom she considered as a mere child, "your disgraceful attachment to a low born boor—a base-born churl—who—"

"Madam!" replied the indignant girl, the rich blood rushing in eloquent denial to her cheek; "he"—she feared to say Henry, lest her tongue should falter—"he to whom you allude is noble, if nature's proudest gifts can make man so—nobler far than his unworthy rival; his greatest enemy cannot reproach him either with falsehood or deceit; his heart is the abode of every manly virtue! Would," she added, yielding at last to her feelings, and bursting into a passionate flood of tears, "that he were here to protect me!"

Lady Mowbray raised her shoulders with a pitying shrug. Her worldly spirit could not comprehend a nature such as Ellen's.

"You had better retire to your room child," she said; "you will think differently in the morning!"

Without a word, she left the apartment—for the poor orphan felt how hopeless it was to attempt to touch the hearts either of the colonel or his lady. As she withdrew, her eyes glanced from the open ecrin, with its sparkling contents, to the countenance of the unprincipled woman. So eloquent was the reproof her glance conveyed, that even her ladyship blushed beneath her rouge, and hastily closed the case.

"Impertinent!" she muttered, with a disdainful toss of the head; "and such a child, too!"

"Say, rather, firm," replied her husband. "Ellen, in character and temper, resembles her dead uncle. You may crush, but you will never bend her."

"We shall see!" muttered her ladyship; "we shall see!"

When her young mistress entered her chamber, Susan perceived, from her agitated countenance and pale features, that something painful had occurred. Her first act was to secure the door—that done, she returned to her side, and, throwing her arms around her, entreated her to tell her all that had taken place.

"He," murmured Ellen—"my persecutor—is here!"

"I guessed as much!" replied the faithful girl. "Oh, why—why were you ever induced to quit the rectory?"

"Would to heaven I never had! I was safe there!" sighed the orphan; "but we will return! I shall not rest or sleep in peace till we are once more under the roof of the kind old Doctor Orme. Little does the good man dream," she added, "of the cruel persecution I endure!"

Susan remained silent: she knew, better than Ellen, how little chance there was of being permitted to quit the lonely house to which she had been so artfully ensnared, with the consent of Colonel and Lady Mowbray. By the direction of her mistress, she slept beside her; but it was long—very long—ere slumber sealed the eyelids of the broken-hearted, persecuted girl.

After an agitated, restless night, they both rose, and it was agreed that Susan should descend to see if there was any possibility of their quitting the mansion before her uncle and his watchful lady were stirring. During her absence, Ellen addressed herself in prayer to that Being who, in the hour of suffering and trial, is the orphan's surest friend. To Him she poured forth the sorrows of her innocent heart, and drew from her devotions that holy confidence which religion gives. Whilst the last words of supplication were still trembling on her lips, she heard a step approaching the door of her chamber: as she rose from her knees it opened—and, to her indignation and astonishment, the ayah entered the room. Ellen uttered not a word either of reproach or entreaty—both, she felt, would be useless; but, with the calm dignity of virtue, turned silently from her.

"I told you," said Zara, with a mocking smile, "that we should soon meet again! You cannot struggle against destiny, and yours is marked to be the wife of Meeran Hafaz!"

"Death, sooner?" mentally ejaculated her former mistress, as she seated herself near the window, and took up a book, to avoid reply or conversation with the woman she had once loved with all the girl-like confidence of her nature.

CHAPTER LXIV.

Why I can smile, and murder whilst I smile.—SHAKESPEARE.

WHILST Doctor Kiskoek proceeded to examine the frightful wound of Walter Mowbray, Henry remained in an agony of suspense, watching every look, as it to glean, from the expression of his features, if there was any hope. Each groan the sufferer uttered, as the probe searched into his flesh, wrung the affectionate heart of his friend, who mentally wished a hundred times that he could have endured his sufferings for him—for he loved the noble-hearted fellow with a brother's love—and reproached himself for having quitted the hall at the Casa Borghese, leaving him to return alone: had he been with him, he fancied that it would not have occurred.

With the endurance of a martyr, he stood gazing silently on till the last bandage was applied; then, seizing the doctor by the arm, he whispered, in a broken voice:

"What hope?"

"None!" replied the man of science, in the same undertone; or at least so little, that I scarce dare call it hope: it is true the vital parts have escaped; but the exhaustion from loss of blood has been so great, that it alone is sufficient to cause death; should fever intervene," he added, "no skill can save him—the least agitation in his present state must be fatal."

Faint as was the chance, still there was one; and the heart of our hero felt relieved, as if a heavy pressure had been removed from it.

"Save him!" he said, fixing his eyes imploringly upon the doctor; "he is the truest friend—the noblest spirit—he could not continue—his voice became thick—something appeared to be swelling in his throat; and he turned aside to conceal the tears which honoured his feelings and his friendship, far more than they shamed his manhood."

"Rest assured," answered the kind-hearted practitioner, moved by the accents of grief in which the young man uttered his entreaty, "all that skill and attention can achieve shall be accomplished."

Drawing a pungent essence, contained in a small crystal flask, from his pocket, the speaker advanced towards the bed, and, whilst Henry raised his friend in his arms, applied it to the nostrils of the sufferer, who slowly opened his eyes. As he recognised the anxious countenance of our hero, he faintly smiled, pressed his hand, and murmured the name of Therese.

Dr. Kiskoek laid his finger upon his lips, to impose silence.

"Not a word!" he said, in a low tone; "not a syllable! every breath you draw must be low and gentle, not to destroy the hopes of your friends, or render useless the skill of your attendant."

At the word "hope" the dim eye of Walter Mowbray flashed with something like its former fire. It is hard to die in the full flush of youth—the heart intoxicated with its first dream of love; to quit the joyous scenes of this fair earth ere age has cooled the fever of our blood, and scattered its snows upon the brow of manhood.

The man of science next prepared a gentle opiate, which he administered; and shortly after, the wounded youth sank into a light slumber, his hand still grasped in that of his friend.

"You had better retire," whispered Dr. Kiskoek, addressing our hero; "your dress is stained with blood! Rest will —"

"I cannot rest," interrupted Henry, in the same undertone; "of consent to quit the side of my friend: should a fatal crisis occur, I should never forgive myself. No," he added, "it is the sad office of friendship to receive the last sigh of those we love. Lonely indeed must that man be, whose dying eyes are closed by the hands of strangers!"

"For twelve hours, at least, I will guarantee you against any such misfortune. Whilst he sleeps, science may prove a better guard than friendship. The instant he awakes you shall be sent for."

"Before," said Henry, reluctantly consenting to the arrangement—"before he awakes! Were his state mine, I should wish my wakening glance to fall upon the features of a friend."

The practitioner promised faithfully that such should be the case, and our hero, gently disengaging his hand from the cold, clammy one which grasped it, stole quietly from the chamber.

As he passed along the corridor, a female, whose features were completely hidden by the dark mantilla drawn over them, laid her hand upon his arm, and asked, in accents which proved how deeply her heart was interested in the question:

"Is he dead? Is there still hope?"

Henry started, for he recognised the voice of the speaker as that of the beautiful Therese Colonna, whose passion for Walter Mowbray he had long suspected. Respecting the maiden modesty which sheltered itself beneath the dark veil, he answered, not as he would a stranger, but without appearing to know her.

"Better—much better!" he replied; "his wound has been dressed by Dr. Kiskoek, and he is now enjoying a calm sleep."

"You deceive me!" exclaimed the youthful scion of the patrician house of Colonna; "and the sleep you allude to is the sleep of death!"

"What!" exclaimed our hero, reproachfully; "Think you I am so heartless?"

Then, with a tact which only a lover could have used, he took her gently by the hand, and led her towards the chamber of his friend. There was no occasion to bid her tread lightly—her timid step would scarcely have crushed the budding flower, unfolding its tender leaves to spring's first breath—it was light as affection's, watching round the couch of the object of its love.

Her conductor opened the door of the apartment so gently, that even Dr. Kiskoek scarcely noticed the sound.

"You see," whispered he, "that I have not deceived you."

"Forgive me—pray forgive me!" murmured Therese, in the depth of her emotion involuntarily pressing his hand: he could understand her feelings and the devotion of her girlhood's love.

Therese advanced into the apartment, and, after gazing upon the manly form of the wounded youth for a few seconds, loosened from the tresses of her dark hair one of those exquisite small white roses so admired by the Roman ladies, from the absence of that which renders them comparatively of little esteem in England—perfume—and, gently depositing it on the bed, she retired from the chamber.

"Thanks!" she murmured, in the ear of our hero, as he led her to her carriage. "Should—any change—any fatal —"

Her voice faltered, and she could not proceed.

"You shall be warned," replied Henry Ashton, his heart interpreting the half-uttered request; "but heaven will spare us both so severe a trial. Rely upon my assurance, that all which watchful friendship can achieve, or skill effect, will not be wanting. Dr. Kiskoek and myself are the guardians of Walter Mowbray."

"Oh, love—love!" thought our hero, as he mounted the staircase of the hotel, after having seen the beautiful Therese to her carriage; "well have poets figured the young god blind! The fair girl, in concealing her features, deemed her secret concealed: she forgot the arms of her princely house upon the panels of her carriage—the historic column from which it takes its name!"

He had noticed the action of the princess with the flower, and that alone, had any other evidence than her visit and agitation been wanting, would have convinced him that Walter Mowbray was her accepted lover.

On entering the saloon, he was encountered by Mr. Freeborn, the English consul, and the chief of the Roman police. The former inquired, in a tone of kindness, after his friend; the latter, with the cold, professional indifference of his office, began to question our hero, in order, if possible, to obtain some clue to the perpetrators of the outrage.

His first inquiries related to the name, age, and quality of the wounded youth.

"Has he had any quarrel since he has been in Rome? and if so, with whom?"

"None!" replied Henry.

"Has he any enemies?"

"Enemies!" repeated our hero, warmly; "he is too good and generous! All who know him, love him; he never had an enemy."

"Pardon me, sir," replied the functionary, with an incredulous smile; "but my experience proves that the very qualities you assign your friend too frequently excite the bitterest hate; permit me," he added, "to ask you one simple question more, and I have done."

"Certainly; anything which can possibly throw a light upon the motives or the perpetrators of this most infamous outrage upon my friend."

"You just now received the visit of a lady?"

Henry Ashton remained silent.

"I need not ask it," continued the man who could conceal few faces from me in Rome!"

"I presume as much."

"Was that visit," added the chief of the police, "a more serious tone, intended for you or your friend?"

"That is a question I must decline to answer."

"In declining it," observed the officer, "I am answered!" and, after a whispered conversation with the consul, he left the room.

It was evident, from the questions of the functionary, that his suspicions glanced at the father of Therese, who was known to be a fierce, revengeful man: had he entertained the least idea of his daughter's passion for the heretic Englishman, his anger would have been as intense as bigotry, pride, and prejudice could render it.

Mr. Freeborn, with many expressions of regret, took his leave, promising to address a report immediately to the cardinal secretary of state, who, he doubted not, would exert every means in his power to discover the assassins of his friend—unless—here the prudent little consul hesitated.

"Unless!" repeated Henry Ashton; "can there be a doubt upon the subject of the anxiety of the Papal government to pursue the murderers of Walter Mowbray? I do not comprehend your hesitation."

"Unless," said Mr. Freeborn, "they should prove to be the instruments of one too great to be punished."

"Too great?"

"Such as the Prince Colonna, for instance!"

This was uttered in an under-tone, as he left the apartment.

"God help me!" exclaimed Henry, with a sigh; "but misfortunes thicken round me! The inexplicable silence of Ellen and my friends in England was sorrow enough; I doubted the possibility of adding to it; but this last blow has crushed me!"

So saying, he retired to his apartment, and removed the traces of Walter's blood from his clothes and person.

At an early hour the following morning, Robert Martingale, fully convinced that his infamous design against the life of our hero had been executed—for his instruments had affirmed it, and public rumour informed him that an English gentleman had been murdered on quitting the Borghese Palace—directed his steps towards the hotel of his intended victim, and was shown at once into the apartment of the two friends.

A sarcastic smile lit his features, as he noticed the large blue cloak, lined with white, saturated with blood. He turned it over once or twice with his cane, to examine it.

"The villains struck sure!" he said; "they have well performed their fearful task!"

"Not so sure as you imagine!" replied a low voice behind him.

The conscience-stricken man started, and, to his astonishment and terror, recognised in the speaker Henry Ashton, so pale and careworn, that he deemed it was his spirit come to reproach him for his untimely death. With a deep groan, he sank upon the seat from which he had risen, and remained, with blanched cheek and distended orbs, gazing upon him.

"God!" he faltered at last; "can such things be?"

"What things?" demanded our hero, advancing towards him, and extending his hand.

Martingale shrank back, and veiled his face with the cloak still red with the blood of Walter Mowbray.

Scarcely knowing what to imagine, Henry laid his hand upon the shoulder of his visitor, who started at the touch as if he had received an electric shock.

"Living!" he exclaimed.

"Yes!—it is poor Walter who has been wounded," answered the unsuspicious youth.

With a violent effort his visitor mastered his emotion, and returned the pressure of his hand.

"My dear fellow," he exclaimed, "I cannot tell you how you have terrified me!"

"I!—how so?"

"The stupid people at my hotel told me that it was you who had been murdered! Judge, then, of my surprise—my joy—"

"I see it all," interrupted Henry, with a faint smile; "you took me for my own ghost!—no wonder your reception of me was so strange!"

Martingale mentally congratulated himself that it had not been stranger still.

CHAPTER LXV.

Dreams are but recollections drawn
From memory's store—forgotten treasures,
Lost or mislaid in life's dark struggles.

OLD PLAY.

LAWYER ELWORTHY still remained an inmate at Carrow Abbey, under pretext of examining into the condition of the estate, making a fresh valuation of the land, and looking into the leases, as he had been directed by the late Sir William Mowbray. The colonel was secretly annoyed. Without knowing why, he felt uneasy at the protracted residence of his late brother's legal adviser, and more than once wrote to him, requiring his presence in London, but invariably met with a refusal, couched in terms so exceedingly polite, that it was impossible for him to quarrel with them.

He next ventured upon a stretch of authority which subjected him to still greater humiliation. The man of law delicately reminded him that he was neither the baronet's next heir nor entitled to exercise any legal control over the property; and that without an order from the chancellor, he could not, consistently with his duty, and the instructions he had received from his late lamented client, accede to his demands. He concluded his reply with a detailed statement of their respective positions with regard to the Carrow estates, purposely couched in terms which, if they did not enlighten his correspondent, served to increase his rage at the check he had met with.

Law, like religion, is sublime and recondite in its mysteries; reason cannot grasp them. In fact, we have sometimes doubted whether its ministers have any very definite science upon the subject. Consult two of the most learned of its professors on any given point. Each sees it in a different light, according to the interests or passions of their clients. There never was a question mooted yet, but, like Janus, it had two faces. Had one been wanted, the lawyers would have made it.

Whatever were Mr. Elworthy's motives for remaining, he was thwarted and annoyed at every step by the warren, who seemed to have no other occupation than dogging him in his walks. The only spot in which he found himself free from his intrusion was in the library of the abbey,—it appeared that the spy dared not enter there.

It was with no inconsiderable degree of satisfaction, therefore, that the worthy gentleman heard of his departure for London, an hour or two after he had seen him sleeping in his cottage. He had seized the occasion of observing his features well—considering them at his ease—for, somehow or other, whenever he encountered Will Sidelar face to face, he experienced a choking sensation and a giddiness in the head. Strong as were his suspicions that they had met before, he had not as yet obtained the least proof.

The morning after he found himself unwatched, he sought out Joe Beans, whom he found, as usual, in the churchyard, with Martin and the gravedigger. The old man, since the interference of the warm-hearted young groom to protect him from Will Sidelar, was evidently regarded by the harmless idiot with affection: he remembered him, and whenever he saw him approaching, would look up in his honest countenance with childlike confidence, faintly smile, and welcome him.

"Joe," said the lawyer, "do you think you could bring your old friend down to the abbey?"

"Certainly, if you wish it; he would follow me anywhere!"

"I do wish it," replied Mr. Elworthy; "I have a strange sort of idea that if we could suddenly introduce him into the library in which the murder of Sir William took place, that memory would return: if but for an instant," he added, "it might afford some clue."

Several schemes were discussed and rejected. Joe at last suggested, as the only practicable one, that Martin should be conveyed at night to Carrow, by himself and the sexton. He was in the habit of accompanying the latter to ring—as is the custom in some country places—the church-bell at daybreak, and would follow him like a child.

"Excellent!" said the lawyer; "you have more imagination, Joe, than many give you credit for!"

The honest rustic felt not a little proud of the commendation; like most of his class, he had a mingled feeling of reverence and suspicion for anything connected with the law.

"You must accompany him," added Mr. Elworthy.

The young man hesitated. He was as courageous as most men by daylight, or with enemies of flesh and blood; but a visit to the abbey—whose reputation had not improved in the opinion of the villagers by the murder of its late possessor—at night—and to the library, too—he could not bring himself to that.

"Noa, lawyer," he replied, "noa; by day I shouldn't so much mind"—this was rather reluctantly uttered—"but in the dark I can't say I should exactly like it."

"Why, what do you fear?"

"Oh, nothing—that is—nothing particular."

"Why I often remain there," observed Mr. Elworthy, thinking to give him courage by the assurance, "till late."

"You are a lawyer!" replied Joe.

"What has that to do with it?"

"Lawyers and parsons, I have heard, fear nothing."

The scruples of the speaker were finally overcome by the old gentleman pointing out to him how necessary it was for the happiness of his friend Henry Ashton, that the murderer of the late baronet should be discovered, and the will restored. The honest fellow would have risked his life without a thought for Master Harry, as he invariably called him; indeed, he had done so. He now gave a still greater proof of his attachment, by vanquishing his fears of the supernatural and terrible.

"You promise to come, then?"

"I do," said the poor fellow, with a sigh; "though all the ghosts of the Mowbrays should stand upon the threshold of the hall to scare me back!"

And so they separated.

Agreeably to the proposed plan, Martin was conducted by Joe and the sexton on the same night to Carrow. They had both observed with pleasure that the old man's mind appeared less clouded than usual, and the latter entertained a hopeful belief that the scheme of the lawyer would succeed.

To insure this, it was necessary that Martin should not have the least idea where he was being conducted—that no familiar object should strike him: this was difficult to arrange, but his conductors at last contrived it.

Before approaching the mansion, they threw a thick handkerchief over his eyes, but so as not to intercept his breathing. As long as he heard their voices, he was calm; they therefore continued to converse as he walked between them, leaning on an arm of each: his only observation was: "Dark, dark!"

The veil was not removed till he was seated in the library, directly opposite the chair in which the murdered baronet had been found. Elworthy, Joe, and Chettleborough watched the countenance of the old man with intense interest.

Gradually a phantom form—the offspring of Martin's imagination, or rather recollection—appeared to be seated in the antique, high-backed chair—it was Sir William—his hand holding a book, and his eyes resting upon the page.

"Master!" murmured the idiot—"dear master!"

"He sees him!" groaned Joe, his cheek turning pale with terror, and his teeth playing an involuntary tune in his head.

"Silence!" whispered the lawyer, impressively.

"Ha!" exclaimed Martin, his eye flashing brightly—"Will! the passage! blood! blood!"

At the name of "Will," the listeners exchanged mutual glances.

The faithful servitor of the Mowbrays started wildly from his seat, and in expressive action appeared to struggle with some phantom antagonist, calling aloud for help, and shrieking "Murder!"

He continued this species of pantomime till he reached that part of the library where he had been discovered by the domestics, when, roused by the cries of Ellen, they first entered the apartment: he clasped his hand to his head, as if he had received a sudden blow, and fell upon the ground, with a deep groan.

"God help us!" observed Joe; "but this is very strange! would parson were here! Who could he be fighting with?"

"His imagination!" drily answered the lawyer.

The young man felt but half assured by the reply: to him it appeared as if some supernatural means had been employed to produce the scene he had witnessed.

"Maybe!" he said; "maybe!"

"It is the work of heaven!" observed the sexton, whose solitary life and habits had rendered him less accessible to fear.

"Whom did he mean by Will?" inquired Mr. Elworthy, after his companions had raised the old man, and restored him to himself.

Both, without a moment's hesitation, made answer:

"The warrener!"

"I think so, too! But the passage?"

Joe observed that Martin had pointed with his finger to a particular portion of the room. All three advanced to the spot, and began to examine the panelling. At first it appeared equally solid with the rest.

"I fear," observed the lawyer, "that it is but a dream!"

"No, it beant!" exclaimed Joe, in a joyful tone—for he felt it gradually shaking, and at last yielding beneath the pressure of his broad shoulders; "it be giving way!"

His companions added their strength to his: the oak bent and cracked—at last there was a crash—the spring which closed it had yielded, and the panel flew back, discovering the narrow entrance to a concealed flight of stairs.

"The passage! Martin was right!" they all exclaimed. "Through this the murderer must have obtained access to his victim!"

At the urgent solicitation of the lawyer, Joe consented to explore the gloomy passage. Taking one of the candles with him, he descended the steps, at the bottom of which he discovered a small vaulted chamber, in the centre of which was a table with several articles, which, to all appearance, had been hastily thrown upon it.

Although his hand trembled as he did so, he slowly raised them. One was a handkerchief stained with blood, as if the hands of the assassin had been wiped upon it.

The other, a wallet containing papers.

"I think," muttered Joe, as he re-mounted the staircase, "here be something, lawyer, at last!"

(To be continued in our next.)

THREE SONNETS ON "GREAT MEN."

BY H. SEWELL STOKES.

THE WORLD'S GREAT MEN.

THEY say the great men of the world are few:
Cyrus was called the Great; so Philip's son;
Like title Alfred bore, and Cromwell won:
And Louis and Napoleon claim'd it, too;
And glory be to whom is glory due!
Some greater call the blind old Chian bard,
And him whose lyre for epic fame strove hard,
Yoking the Olympic coursers as they flew;
Him next, whose dust sleeps at Parthenope;
Then the stern Tuscan who saw Virgil's shade,
With him who sang the Holy City free,
And Nature's child on Avon's banks who stray'd;
Nor least, who sightless found lost Paradise:
That these are the world's great men none denies.

YET GREATER MEN.

YET greater men, perchance, are those whose names
Never yet reached Fame's lofty vestibule:
Meek pupils of Adversity's hard school,
None cares to note their unobtrusive aims,
Their silent sorrows and un murmuring claims.
In garret chill, in cell deep underground,
May noblest magnanimity be found;
The fortitude oppression never tames;
The resignation that with tearful eyes
Still upward looks in child-like confidence;
The love that lasteth till the latest sigh;
The charity that suffers long offence;
The honesty that is not to be bribed:
These, these will be in heaven's high roll inscribed.

GREAT AND GOOD.

Nov. 18, 1852.

But some there are who stand alone in glory,
Like mountains rising o'er the level earth;
We gaze and wonder at their lustrous worth,
Each like a light on some high promontory,
Oh! such was he the Warrior-Statesman hoary,
For whom his Queen's, his country's tears are shed,
Now number'd with the World's heroic dead,
Whose names are written in immortal story.
With reverent awe, 'neath England's loftiest Dome,
Around his bier Earth's gather'd chieftains stood,
And all pronounced him brave, and wise, and good;
The guiltless Julius of a mightier Rome;
Supreme in council, as in action great;
True to his God, his Sovereign, and the State.

THE LADIES OF ST. PETERSBURG.—In the burgher circles at St. Petersburg, the two sexes usually group themselves very much apart from each other. Even at meals, the gentlemen take one-half of the table, and the ladies the other. I will not venture exactly to praise such an arrangement, but certainly it spares many an old grey-beard, or busy merchant, engrossed with agios and percentages, the trouble of having to entertain a simpering sixteen-year-old neighbour. The chief subjects of conversation with the ladies of St. Petersburg, at the dinner-table, and in the circle they subsequently form round their coffee-cups, are music, theatricals, the gossip of the town, and literature. On this last subject they are inexhaustible. They do not as many a distinguished national assembly has done, waste their time in fruitless theories. Every project devised speedily becomes an accomplished fact; plans are no sooner sketched than carried out; theory quickly blossoms into practice; no undertaking is too difficult, no obstacle insurmountable, no sacrifice too great, for these devoted priestesses of the Graces.

READ CAREFULLY.—"There is nothing worth reading in this paper," is an exclamation which the impatient often deliver, as they throw aside the well-filled newspaper. Could such persons but know the many hours, ay, the many years, which have been passed in toil, in study, in hard labour, before the facts therein were born of the brain, they would not throw the paper so contemptuously aside. "Nothing worth reading!" Forbid your lips from ever uttering these three words again—for we believe that type never yet gave to the light of day that which was entirely worthless. It has been observed that there never was a book—good, bad, or indifferent—from which a utility of some kind might not be extracted. The remark is equally applicable to newspapers. Our advice is to read the newspapers carefully. Would the editor who has written, revised, selected, or translated, have published twenty or more columns without there being something worth reading? We think not. Impatience often causes us to throw aside that which, if closely investigated, would prove valuable. We do not know how soon this or that fact may prove of value to us; we do not know how soon we may be called to a position when information, which we have neglected to glean, would prove of immense value.

[MEETING OF PRINCESS ELIZABETH AND CECIL.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER III.

Adversity, thy iron lore,
With patience many a year she bore.

THE Lord Admiral, finding that Elizabeth was too prudently advised to accept his hand without the consent of her brother and his council, renewed his addresses to the queen dowager, whose suitor he had been previous to her marriage with the king. The indiscreet haste with which the match was concluded, deeply offended the Princess Mary, who wrote to her sister a loving letter, in which she advised her to quit the house of the newly-wedded pair, and take up her abode with her. Elizabeth declined the invitation, on the plea that, as she had received so much kindness from Catherine Parr, she could not, without ingratitude, put such a public affront upon her. The real cause of her refusal may be found partly in the deep policy which, even at that early age, was the mainspring of her conduct—for the Lord Admiral was well beloved by the king her brother; and partly in the disinclination which she felt to identify herself and her cause with Mary, who was looked up to by the Catholic party, with hope and expectation, as their head; the Protestants manifesting the same feeling towards Elizabeth.

On the death of William Grindal, who had been her first tutor, she was placed under the care of the learned Roger Ascham, with whom she read the works of Cicero and Livy, the orations of Isocrates, the tragedies of Sophocles, and the New Testament, in Greek; added to which, she was, as there is abundant evidence to prove, well skilled in French and Italian, and possessed a passable knowledge of German and Spanish—accomplishments very unusual at the present day in a young girl of fifteen.

It was whilst residing at Chelsea, with her step-mother and the Lord Admiral, Sir Thomas Seymour, that the queen dowager was startled by discovering the disgraceful familiarities which passed between her husband and her royal ward. If they did not amount to actual guilt, they approached so near it, that Elizabeth did not escape scandal; a report was even current that she had a child by him, which, according to some, was destroyed at the moment of its birth; by others it is stated to have been sent to Ireland, and secretly brought up there.

After much investigation, we cannot find that the evidence rests upon any stronger grounds than Elizabeth's levity of conduct with him. One thing at least is certain—that in order to separate her husband from the princess, the queen dowager arranged for the latter to take up her abode at her own house at Cheston. This separation—which was much commented upon at the time—occurred a week after Witsuntide, 1548.

So generally unfavourable was public opinion on the conduct of Elizabeth in this matter, that it cost her years of hypocrisy and retirement, affected simplicity in dress and manner, to efface the impression.

The Lord Admiral appears to have been a bold, ambitious man. His aim was to dispossess his brother, Somerset, of the Protectorate, and get the reins of government in his own hands. His marriage with Elizabeth was to have been one of the stepping-stones to his greatness. At this period of her life, the future queen was much to be pitied: barely sixteen, surrounded by intriguing dependents, without one true friend to counsel her, it is almost a miracle that she escaped the snares set for her.

The designs of Seymour became at last so apparent, that he was arrested for high treason. He was committed to the Tower, and not only his own dependents were arrested, but those of the princess, amongst whom were Mrs. Ashley, her governess, and Parry, her cofferer—both of whom were deep in her confidence, but had tampered largely in the plot of her marriage with the admiral, whose creatures they appear to have been. Elizabeth herself appears to have been put under some degree of restraint, Sir Thomas Tyrwhit having been sent down to Hatfield to take command of her household.

Either there was nothing really to confess that could inculpate their mistress, or the prisoners saw that their only chance of safety lay in that of Elizabeth. No admission could be extorted from them beyond a repetition of idle gossip, and a relation by the governess of certain familiarities which had taken place in the life-time of the queen dowager. Elizabeth's correspondence at this trying epoch, betrays not only deep dissimulation, but much firmness and readiness of judgment.

Although Tyrwhit had been sent to Hatfield by the Protector to terrify the princess into a confession, nothing, except by gentle means—as he acknowledges in his letters to Somerset—could he extort from her. He more than hints that, in prevision of their plans being discovered, Elizabeth and her servants had agreed upon their tale.

It is more than probable that the knight was correct in his opinion—as their mistress, on their restoration to liberty, treated them with marked favour, and not only restored them to their offices about her person—although it was proved that Parry had been a defaulter—but, after her accession to the crown, continued her protection.

When the Lord Admiral was brought to trial, one of the articles in the bill of attainder was his attempt to obtain the hand of Elizabeth—in which scheme her governess, Mrs. Ashley, and the cofferer, Parry, were deeply implicated. Yet Elizabeth did not desert them in their peril: although resting under suspicion herself, she ventured to write an eloquent letter, in their defence, to the Lord Protector—in which she even pleaded the relationship between Ashley and herself, as a justification of the interest she expressed in her favour. The hold of her servants on her fears or affection must have been very strong, to have induced the politic princess to take such a step.

This remarkable letter is preserved in the Lansdowne MSS.

On the evening preceding his execution, Seymour endeavoured to atone in part for the danger his ambitious projects had involved the youthful Elizabeth in, by writing letters both to her and the Princess Mary, in which he warned them of the Protector, Somerset—who certainly appears to have been the enemy of both the sisters of his sovereign. Being denied the use of pens and ink, the unhappy man traced the letters with the point of an aglet—one of the tags, formed either of silver or gold, with which the gentry and nobles of the period laced their hose. For greater security, he hid the letters in the lining of his shoes. Unfortunately they were discovered and destroyed. Their purport can only be drawn from the fact, that Latimer, in a sermon which he preached to justify his death, stigmatised them as being both dangerous and evil-minded, tending to excite a suspicion in the minds of the king's sisters that the Lord Protector was their greatest enemy: from which circumstance it would appear that the letters, either before or immediately after the execution, fell into the hands of the council. No copies of them, or traces of the originals have been discovered.

During this trying period, Elizabeth was held in honourable captivity, at her own manor of Hatfield; surrounded by spies, who watched her every word and look, and entirely under the superintendence of Sir Thomas and Lady Tyrwhit; her mental sufferings must have been great—for there is little doubt but that she loved the Lord Admiral with a strong and devoted affection: else, clear-sighted and politic as she had proved herself, she had never encountered the risks she ran on his account.

In fact, it may be observed of this remarkable sovereign, that most of her troubles arose from her lovers. She appears to have been susceptible of the influence of the tender passion even to the last. Witness her weak love for her last favourite, Essex. But we must not anticipate.

The execution of the ambitious admiral took place on the 20th of March, but it was some days before the news arrived at Hatfield. There was no post in those days, and intelligence travelled but slowly.

Elizabeth was seated, surrounded by her six ladies of honour—whose names and qualities have been handed down in one of Sir John Harrington's quaint poems—in the great hall of Hatfield, reading, most probably, some classic author—for she affected much learning—when Sir Thomas Tyrwhit made his appearance, accompanied by a messenger from the council: he was the bearer of letters from the Protector to the knight, and charged to report the effect which the news of the death of Seymour might produce upon the princess.

"Your grace's pardon!" said Sir Thomas, bowing respectfully to his charge—for he was exceedingly courtly in his manner towards her; "but a messenger hath arrived from London, and I thought it might be your good pleasure to question him."

"Hath he brought an answer to my letter from my Lord Protector?" demanded the princess, scarcely raising her head from the volume; for most probably she suspected that the courtesy of the speaker concealed some snare.

The man answered in the negative.

Elizabeth quietly resumed her reading.

This was not what her enemies wished; they desired to mark the effect the death of Seymour would produce upon her spirit—to read the agony of her heart—to catch her unguarded expressions, born of the impulse of the moment—and to report them as the groundwork of some future accusation against her.

"Hath he no news," maliciously inquired Lady Tyrwhit, "concerning the Ashleys, who are still in the Tower?"

"No!"

"Or the Parrys?"

The negative was repeated.

"And what of my Lord Admiral?" demanded the lady. "I am sure her grace must feel interested in aught which concerns so fair a gentleman!"

Elizabeth raised her eyes, and looked menacingly as well as reproachfully at the speaker—whose sex, at least, might have taught her more consideration.

"True, madam!" she replied; "though somewhat boldly spoken. As the husband of the late queen, I do feel an interest in his fate!"

The blood of the Tudor swelled within her, and she determined to learn the fearful intelligence of her own free-will—not have it officiously forced upon her. Turning to the messenger, who knelt before her, she demanded, in a cold, calm voice:

"How goes the trial of my Lord Admiral?"

"Against him!" replied the man; "he is condemned."

"And executed!" added Sir Thomas Tyrwhit. "His head fell for the just punishment of his treasons."

Every eye was fixed upon Elizabeth, whose countenance remained unmoved.

"Then died Sir Thomas," she made answer, "a man with much wit, and very little judgment!"

A speech which may be considered both an epitaph and an epigram, and one which it was impossible even for the most bitter of her enemies to construe to the disadvantage of her head, however it may call in doubt the qualities of her heart.

The hostility which Elizabeth evinced to the Lady Elizabeth Tyrwhit, her new governess, seems to have given way during the year which followed the death of Seymour. The similarity of their religious views promoted a better understanding between them.

The rude lesson the princess had received in the injury done to her reputation by her love for the admiral, was not without effect. She devoted herself ardently to study, and affected such simplicity of dress, that she neither wore jewels nor cloth of gold or silver. Her costume resembled that worn by the followers of the Church of Geneva: a sacrifice of vanity to prudence, which she amply compensated herself for in after years—as the three thousand gowns, and immoderate quantity of jewels, enumerated in her wardrobe book, sufficiently testify.

When the Protector, Somerset, in his turn fell before the influence of the Dudley faction, and he was a condemned prisoner in the Tower, he had the meanness to write to Elizabeth—who had been restored to her brother's favour—to supplicate her intercession, that his life might be spared. Had he known the real temper and disposition of the daughter of Henry, he would have spared himself the degradation. In her reply, she coldly assured him that she had no power to do anything in his behalf.

Yet her credit with Edward at the very period she wrote the letter must have been considerable: since, soon after, she ventured openly to express her anger that Dudley, who had just been created Duke of Northumberland, should presume to retain Durham House, which Somerset had illegally deprived her of. She even appealed to the chancellor—a step which Elizabeth, with all her pride and energy, had not ventured to take, without first being assured of the countenance and protection of the king her brother.

CHAPTER IV.

Woe wot the day! my perils do increase:
My troubled bark is driven by hostile tides
To an unfriendly shore.

OLD PLAY.

It became the policy of the Duke of Northumberland and the council, who acted with him, to estrange by every means the love of the youthful Edward from his sister, whom he used to term his "Sweet Temperance"—in allusion to the simplicity of her dress and inclination to learning. Conscious that the power he so unworthily wielded must shortly pass from his hands, the duke, who had married his son, Lord Dudley, to Lady Jane Grey, the cousin of the king, conceived the traitorous design of causing the claims of the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth to be set aside in favour of his daughter-in-law—in which treason Latimer and Ridley were both accomplices: since they publicly preached in favour of the exclusion of the daughters of Henry VIII. from the crown, under pretence of the danger which might possibly arise to the Protestant institutions of the land by their marriage with foreign princes: a danger which, as far as Elizabeth was concerned, was purely imaginary—since her attachment to the reformed religion was a matter of public notoriety; and she had not only positively rejected an alliance with a foreigner, but evinced a disinclination to marriage.

Elizabeth no sooner heard of her brother's sickness, than she set forward to visit him. But every movement of her grace, it would appear, was watched and reported to those who were most interested in keeping her at a distance from the dying monarch. When her journey was half performed, she was intercepted, and received, in the king's name, strict orders to return to Hatfield—which orders she had nothing left but to obey.

It is on this occasion that she is supposed to have become for the first time personally acquainted with Cecil, who appears to have had strong claims to her gratitude before her accession to the crown.

As Elizabeth was returning slowly and sadly towards Hatfield, after the discourteous message she had received, her train was overtaken by a single horseman, who demanded speech with her. At first the attendants, naturally anxious for the safety of their mistress, would have forbidden his approach; but Elizabeth, who inherited, with many of his evil qualities, at least the courage of her father, commanded that they should show him no hindrance; perhaps, too, she felt assured that it was not by assassination—at least a public one—that her enemies would venture to assail her life.

"Now, sir," she said, as the disguised horseman drew rein before her, "we have somewhat inconsiderately, perhaps, permitted you to approach our person, in what can our humble power pleasure you?"

"I came to serve," replied the young man, bowing respectfully, "not to solicit favour!" Lowering his voice, he added: "there is a foul conspiracy afoot to change the order of the succession—to substitute the Lady Jane for her grace the Lady Mary!"

The countenance of Elizabeth flushed with anger: not at the thought of her sister's claims being set aside by the ambitious Northumberland, but at the blow levelled at her own rights.

"The traitor!" she muttered.

"You have been refused visiting your royal brother," continued the mysterious stranger, "by the duke's directions. The king knew not of your intention: he deems himself deserted by the sister whom he loves!"

"I know it," sighed the princess; "my heart divined as much. It is the fate of princes to be deceived by those they trust. Poor Edward! But why," she added, fixing a searching glance on her informant, "have you not revealed the dark projects of the traitorous duke to my sister?"

"Men worship the rising, not the setting sun," replied the young man. "The Lady Mary's reign will pass like an autumn day—brief and clouded! Her sovereignty will serve to herald yours!"

For a moment a suspicion crossed the mind of Elizabeth, that the speaker who had thus interrupted her in her melancholy progress was some agent of her enemies; but when she gazed upon his handsome, though serious features, and reflected that words unsupported by evidence could work her little danger, she dismissed the thought.

"And what is the service, sir stranger," she demanded, "which you came to proffer? God help me! I have need of friends! Although the daughter of a king, I have lived to envy my own bower-woman!"

"You have need of friends," observed the young man; and never more so than at the present crisis. Northumberland, on the death of Edward—which is not, cannot be far distant—will doubtless attempt to get you and the Lady Mary into his power!"

"The traitor!"

"I would warn your grace to obey no summons to attend the dying king, unless accompanied by a sure token from a trusty friend!"

"And where shall I find that friend?" inquired Elizabeth; "since it can only be one about the court. The clouds are gathering darkly, and I see no shelter. If, ill-advised, I refuse compliance with my brother's summons, I fall in peril of his anger."

"Better that," observed the stranger, "than in the power of Northumberland, who will pause at no crime to secure the crown for the Lady Jane. As for the friend you name, I will be that friend!"

"You?"

"I!"

"It must be one about the court."

"I am about the court."

"One of the council," added the princess.

"If not of the council," replied the young man, "I know all that passes in it. As soon as the breath has left the body of your royal brother, I will contrive to send your grace safe token."

"Which token," said Elizabeth, all her former suspicions aroused, "you would first have of me. Is it not so?"

Master Cecil—for the gentleman who had thus waylaid her was no other than the future minister—smiled at the suspicion, so characteristic of the speaker's prudence.

"No, madam!" he made answer; "the token shall come from me; but I must first be well assured your grace will recognise it."

So saying, he placed in the hand of his future sovereign a small book of prayers and meditations, beautifully illuminated, and bound in gold. They were written on vellum, and Elizabeth recognised the writing as that of her former tutor, the learned Protestant, Grindal.

The sight of the book which was to serve as a token between them at once confirmed her confidence—for she felt assured that he could only have obtained it from a sure friend.

"Your grace will recognise it?" he said.

"From a thousand!" was the answer.

"When next you see it," observed Cecil, bowing to the saddle-bow, "you will be one step nearer the throne—perhaps nearer. Farewell, your grace, till better days for England and yourself!"

"Farewell!" replied the princess, courteously. "I give my confidence to few, but there is something whispers me that you will merit it. Fortune lies in one word—fidelity!"

"And I will be faithful!" thought the future minister, as, replacing the precious volume in his bosom, he prepared to return upon his way.

"Stay, sir!" said the princess; "we would not wittingly offend our brother Edward, or appear wanting in a sister's love. Should he summon us to London, be it understood that we shall obey the summons, unless forewarned by you."

"Be it so, madam; neither the heart nor head of him you trust will fail you!"

And so they separated. This was the commencement of that confidence between the great Protestant Queen and Cecil, which remained unbroken to the end of her long life and reign.

TWENTY-TWO DAYS AT SEA IN A CANOE.

We have obtained a copy of the following declaration, made at the police-office by the Malagasy Botto, who arrived lately from Rodrigues in a canoe, after having been twenty-two days at sea:

"My name is Botto. I am a native of Nosbé, Madagascar, where my father and mother still reside. I am a field labourer. I cannot state my age (seems to be about twenty-four). I arrived in this colony some years ago, but cannot say in what year. I engaged with a person named Baba, a Creole of this island, to go with him to Rodrigues, to be employed by him there as a fisherman. I left Mauritius for the above island a few days after my engagement, in a small colonial vessel (the Anais), in company with several Creoles and three Malagasies, who, like myself, had engaged themselves as fishermen, but to different masters. From the period of my arrival at Rodrigues to the day of my leaving that island, I was continually the victim of abuse by several Creoles, who were employed by my master. They not only abused me, but I was several times threatened to be beaten by these people. I frequently complained of their conduct to my master; but he seemed to treat my complaint with derision, telling me to give one or two of the Creoles a good thrashing, and then the others would not dare to torment me; but I could not do this, as I should have had the whole gang upon me. I did not go to the police to complain, because the place where I was employed was too far from the police-station. From the conduct of the Creoles to me, their constant abusive language, and their never-ceasing threats to beat me, I found my existence at Rodrigues altogether insupportable, and I made up my mind to leave the island, and endeavour, by the assistance of Providence, to reach Mauritius. I mentioned my project to a Malagasy fisherman, named Tchaphahera, who was employed by another master; and after telling him my numerous grievances, he recommended me to carry my project into execution. On Saturday, the 30th of October, in the middle of the night, I put into one of my master's canoes about eight pounds of uncooked rice, a small barrel of water, a slender spar for a mast, and a piece of white cloth to serve as a sail. Having done this I embarked, loosened the canoe, and set sail. I did not know in what direction to steer for Mauritius, but I thought if I allowed the canoe to sail before the wind I might be lucky enough to arrive either at this island or Bourbon. After being at sea for seven days, I found my small stock of rice had been consumed, and I began to experience the cravings of hunger, and did not know what would become of me, as there was no land in sight, and not a vessel to be seen. Having a knife in my possession, I scraped some wood and ate it, washing it down with water. I found this appeased my hunger. During the eighth, ninth, and tenth days after my departure it fell dead calm, and the weather was very hot. I now began to feel very much exhausted, not having slept since I had been at sea; however, I sometimes found myself almost asleep; but the oar by which I was steering always kept me awake by shaking me. After being twenty-one days at sea, during which time I continued to satisfy hunger by eating the scrapings of wood, I had the inexpressible pleasure to see Round Island right ahead of me. I landed at Grand River, and then proceeded to Fort Louis in my canoe, where I made my report to the shipping master. During my passage to this island I experienced much heavy rain, with a heavy sea; but I did not consider the weather to be bad, as my canoe did not ship any water, but scudded over the waves with the greatest ease."

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XIV.

SCENE—Gardens and ornamental grounds adjoining the castle; statues of the Classic Deities grace the many beautiful walks and vias. Enter LADY BERTHA and ANNETTE.

LADY BERTHA.

MOST sweetly sang you; but though music be Almost a passion of my being, still The verse, like to a silver swan, should float Upon the stream of melody, and clear Its graceful presence should be borne along, Defined and perfect in its loveliness: Note following note, like wave succeeding wave, Should lift its theme still higher than itself, Not drown it in the tide of harmony, Lose it in billows of ambitious sounds, As thou didst now. 'Twas passing sweet, I own; But there were words as sweet, the which I lost, And should be glad to hear. Let's have them; come, And that without the music.

ANNETTE repeats the song.

I told my lips they must disguise
The secret of my soul;
But, oh, my heart flew to my eyes,
And told almost the whole!
Oh, eyes too swift of love to speak,
No more such thoughts reveal;
'Twas vain: Love next upon my cheek
Wrote all I would conceal!
And thus by every glance betrayed,
My hidden love made known,
I'm of my very heart afraid,
For it seems not my own!

BERTHA.

'Tis as I thought, words worthy of the notes;
If both thou canst not give, though both were best,
Then sacrifice the music, not the muse!
Sounds must be winged with thoughts and living words
To touch the heart; without them sweetness dies,
Like odours robbed from flowers.

I'd sit and list

The simplest village air that lips could breathe
If in its simple spirit lay enshrined
The poet's warmth, the poet's ardent soul.
Remember this: better to read than sing;
One task well done outvalues two done ill.

ANNETTE.

I will remember, madam; but in this
I followed out the method I was taught!
To give the note, nor heed, they said, the words,
Which were to music but subordinate.

BERTHA.

Hear this, ye spirits of harmonious song!
Poets that language have immortalised;
Enriched it with expressions sweet as love!
Speak, mead and river, singing bird and brook,
Mountain and vale, forest and flowery dell,
Speak for your poet! Oh, there's not a bud Whose odorous birth the winds are conscious of
But owes associations sweeter far
Than its sweet self unto the poet's song!
There's not a feeling, passion, sentiment,
Grace, beauty, or attraction, but receives
A charm from his melodious utterance,
A spiritual gift, which half connects
The earthly with divine; makes beauty's self
Accordant to harmonious influences!
Oh, passionate spirit of poetic song,
How could I worship thee! . . .

But I forget . . .

ANNETTE.

Look, dear lady, what marble god is this,
Whose noble head bears such resemblance to . . .

BERTHA, interrupting her.

To Falkner, thou wouldst say. Apollo, girl:
It is, indeed, most like that lofty front;
Where intellect doth sit as on a throne;
The mouth instinct with gracious eloquence,
The grandeur of that all imperial air,
The majesty of manhood and of grace!
And yet unlike; for he, my love, seems sad,
Though all things smile as happy in his presence:
This god wore joy upon his conquering brow,
Yet sorrow dwelt where'er his footsteps trod;
No, 'tis not like, it is not like my Falkner!

ANNETTE.

The very children of the village love him,
Hold out their little hands with gifts of flowers,
Or aught to win a word, a look, a smile.

BERTHA.

Would they were here with flowers to win him now,
For all the world is dark without his smile:
My Falkner; no, he hath no paragon:
His voice is as the music of his looks—
Mournful, yet sorrowful as not of earth,
But as an angel thought of others' woes!
Oh, he is all that Love may idolise,
Exalted by its own idolatry!

ANNETTE.

Yes; Love is still its own interpreter,
None but itself should be its advocate.

BERTHA.

Oh, there's but one sweet word in all the world,
And that is Love: to love this beauteous earth,
This brilliant heaven, and Him that holds them thus,
In glory and perfection absolute,
Lasting as Truth, in His almighty hand!
To gaze upon the earth's majestic face,
And say, Here breathes the genius of a God!
To love the world, yet single from its breast
(One being to be loved beyond the world,
(Oh, then it is we live; then, then we live!
Affection is a child of Love, but wayward;
The mortal child of an immortal mother!
But Love itself! Seek from the centre, first,
To shake the sun ere shake true steadfast Love!
Harshness and cruelty, hate, coldness, scorn,
May make Love weep, but never make Love change.
Rob every flower from earth, and Love will find Some way to bid it bloom! Cover Love's path
With sharpest flint; and though her life ebbed forth
At every step, un murmuring would she tread:
For in her breast—deep in her holy breast—
One flower still grows, root of celestial soil,
And angels' tears have watered its blest bloom,
Angels have wreathed its leaves around their heads,
So beautiful it is, and called its name,
That sweet flower's sweeter name, Forgiveness!

ANNETTE.

My dear, dear lady, God in mercy grant
Such love may find abundant recompense;
Yet thou'rt so sanguine, ardent, confident,
I tremble, lady, for thy happiness!
What wouldst thou do should accident befall him?

BERTHA, alarmed.

Accident? Falkner? he's been gone full long:
Know'st thou aught of it? Hath some evil chanced?
What is it? Speak! quick—quick, whilst I can bear it!

ANNETTE.

Nothing, dear lady; no, I but surmised . . .

BERTHA.

Surprised? did but surmise! 'tis very strange!
And yet he has been long, full long away:
I marvel it escaped me.

From the turret

The rough, wild road for miles is visible,
Haste, tell me what thou seest; and if him
Wave thy hand thus.

[Exit ANNETTE.]

O God, what fear is this?

Enter FALKNER, who starts, as though wishful to have avoided her.

BERTHA.

Thou com'st at last!
Falkner, dear Falkner, thou hast lingered long!

FALKNER, after several ineffectual efforts, in a broken voice.

"They linger long who bring unhappy news;
Slow are the steps which bear a heavy heart;
Tardy the tongue that utters words like mine—
I come to say, farewell.

BERTHA.

Farewell?

FALKNER.

But for a time.

BERTHA.

Farewell? Impossible! thou mean'st it not

FALKNER.

Farewell; 'tis but a word that startles thee;
Were it "Good night," 'twould breathe of earlier meeting;
But many say "good night" who meet no more!
Death fluds them at the turning of an hour,
And from their hopeful pillow to their grave
Is but one step.

Why, say 'tis not "farewell?" and let us part
As though to-morrow bound our lot again.

To-morrow comes—

A new to-morrow dawns for time to leap,
And our farewell is but a sleep, a dream,
To find that morn where parting weeps no more.

BERTHA.

Parting? Farewell? Am I alive? Falkner?
Thou lov'st me? I have not offended thee?
I have said nothing to have wrought this change?
Or have I loved thee so devotedly
My very truth is turned into offence?
What I have done that I should see thee thus,
With looks that do avoid, and love me not?

FALKNER.

That love thee not?

When all within my soul grew desolate
'Twas Bertha grasped the thorn to save me pain;
'Twas Bertha's love, like sunlight, o'er me fell;
Bertha, whose pity gave me back the world,
Robed in the brightness her own beauty flung,
And earth once more resembled Paradise!
That love thee not? With looks that love thee not?

BERTHA.

Oh, be thou merciful, and kill me, Falkner!

[Walks in violent agitation.]

Oh, it was most unkind, unfeeling, rash:
I saw thee not—I knew thee not—had been
Most happy in my quiet orphanage,
Hadst thou not come to shew my day, like night,
With all the magic of thine intellect,
Thy thrilling tenderness of look and voice,
To win the love of mine enchanted heart!
Oh, Heaven can witness how intensely dear
The sound but of a passing word became;
And thou—for pastime, for mere vanity—
Hast nursed this flower to cut it from my heart,
No matter how it bleed beneath thy knife!

FALKNER.

Bertha?

BERTHA.

Oh, was it right—or kind—or generous—
To woo—yet wound: to sue—yet sting the heart?
Whose only weakness was in too much faith!
Honour is love's vicegerent upon earth—
Was—was it honourable?

FALKNER.

Bertha?

BERTHA.

You spoke of wealth:
But what was wealth to me who had thy love,
Or, oh, too fond—too weak—seem'd that I had:
Love far surpassing wealth! Of title spoke;
But, weighed 'gainst nobler natures, titles seemed
The trinkets of a throne. Higher than kings
Is He who true pre-eminence creates:
Greater is He who stamps upon man's brow
Nature's high patent of nobility.
Wealth, title, all, were penury compared
To that best wealth, best title to be thine:
"Thine own!" "thine own!" I asked no other name,
No other rank, no dearer dignity;
To be "thy wife," in its sufficient love,
Comprised all riches, honours, and degrees.

FALKNER.

Yet hear me, Bertha. . . .

BERTHA, passionately.

Hear me!
And pause; yea, pause awhile, my Falkner;
I am not one to bear this agony;
Nor wait the gradual breaking of a heart;
And should we meet, indeed, no more on earth,
Then tremble, Falkner, lest we meet hereafter!

FALKNER.

Thou'rt not so rash? Let time bring time's account,
And let us meet it!

Heap fire upon me—torture me with words
Which, if thou think'st I merit, speak, nor spare,
Though every syllable's a poisoned thorn:
Yet is my heart so full of direst pains
It scarce can writhe much more!
Oh, misery of memory, to be
What I have been; to hear what I now hear;
Whichever way I turn, is wretchedness.

Not love thee? no, not love thee? Witness all
Ye blessed powers whose element is love;
Be witness heaven, which, like a shrine of love,
Sends light, and life, and union to the world;
Witness all holy and all beautiful
How dear, how passionately dear, I love!
And witness, too, this dreaded destiny,
That ever and for ever dogs my steps
Like the foul shadow of some spirit doomed,
Alone constrains my tongue to say. . . .

BERTHA, shrieking.

No, say it not!

Thou wilt not say farewell?
Oh, Falkner, shew some pity: or, if thou goest
Then fear what I may do! Fear and despair!
I am distracted, wild—'twere madness now
To leave me to myself.
I know not what I do—or what may do!
I am distraught with more than brain can bear.

FALKNER, aside.

Be iron, nerves: be firm, my faltering heart:
Thou hast an eagle's flight, and not a dove's:
To waver now were to relinquish all.
And yet

BERTHA.

Thou canst not go—thou'rt not the heart to go.
What, crush the dove which made thy breast her home?
Thou canst not do it, or looks belie the heart;
'Twere cruelty to do it—alas, thy pride—
I knew thy pride but not thy cruelty!

FALKNER.

Of what should I be proud—of misery?

The victim at the rack shrieks not—for pride!
Such pride should even be thy Falkner's now.
And yet—and yet—I weep, my Bertha, weep;
Tell me these tears are but false witnesses—
Say that this quivering lip is still untrue—
This throbbing pulse—deceit; tell me this heart,
That with tumultuous beatings cleaves my breast,
As though 'twould find a passage to thy feet,
Is hypocrite!—say still 'tis cruelty!
'Twere blissful to be aught but what I am;
Madness were mercy to this misery!
Again, that word again, 'twere what to do it?

BERTHA, imploringly.

Yet, for all this, thou didst not say farewell?

FALKNER.

God knows I did—and must.

BERTHA.

Then, guise it as thou wilt, 'tis cruelty!
Thou dar'st not see the heart bleed thou hast broken;
Thou stabb'st and leav'st thy victim.

FALKNER.

Am I so base!

I who've sought honour's path—
As to the height of all achievement here;
Who, were death cast between my path and it,
Had clung to honour rather than to life!
To hear—

[BERTHA droops; he supports her]

Bertha, my love, I will not say farewell!
Tears, tears—still tears to kiss away!
I am a boy, a child, and not a man,
An infant that the fates dash where they will!
I'll see thee, love, again, and speedily—when,
If thou'lt take this hand 'tis thine for ever!
But we must quit this spot: be patient, love,
Thou canst not hear me if thou weapest thus.

[A pause—she recovers—FALKNER retiring.]

BERTHA.

Stay, Falkner, I conjure thee!

I command thee, stay!

[FALKNER turns, she steps before him.]

Thou goest not hence.

FALKNER.

Not hence?

BERTHA.

No!

FALKNER.

What can restrain me?

BERTHA, sinking and exhausted with agitation.

A fragile thing—a slight and powerless thing—
Yet one thou could'st not, ingrate as thou art,
Thou would'st not tread upon! no, no, nor scorn,
Nor roughly pass; no, nor for kingdoms leave!
Though thou regard'st it little now perchance;
Yet then, my Falkner, then 'twill rivet thee,
As though an angel cried, "Thou goest not hence!"

FALKNER.

Nor earth, nor all earth holds, may stay my foot!
It is my fate; I act not of myself,
But am the very thrall of destiny!
What's that may grapple fate and bar its path?

BERTHA.

My corpse!

[Swoons at his feet.]

FALKNER, kneeling and raising her tenderly and pityingly.

Straws—straws are we upon the stream of fate!
Oh, worse than blind not to have this foreseen!
My poor, wronged girl, thus pale and stricken down,
How in thy desolation dearer far
Than in the beaming beauty of thy hope!
How weak looks vengeance near thine angel face;
It palsies so the hoarded hate of years,
That guilt might stand within the dagger's reach,
Yet vengeance turn aside with tears—not blood!
My love, my Bertha, have I veins of stone,
Unknowing mercy—knowing scarce myself!
My very hand seems changed and strange to me!
My love, I will return! a little while!
But for a little while, I do not say farewell!

[He bears her off with great tenderness and sorrow.]

(To be continued.)

A TEST OF TRUE AFFECTION.—A man of fifty years of age, and unmarried, who resided near St. Omer, was lately taken seriously ill, and, as it was known that he had some money, a host of nephews and nieces at once flocked around him, protesting their affection. As he was not the dupe of all these demonstrations, he told them very briefly that above all things he desired to be left tranquil, and that, in consequence, whoever came near him during his illness should be disinherited. They all withdrew accordingly, but not the less were most anxious to learn how the patient was going on. His state became every day more and more grave, and his relatives abstained, according to the orders given, from going to see him—all but one, a niece, named Josephine, who insisted on attending him during his illness. "If you persist in remaining here," said the sick man, "I will certainly disinherit you." "Do so," said she, "but you are too ill to remain without some relative to take care of you, and I am determined to stay." The uncle sent two days after for his notary, and made his will, which was duly witnessed, and the rumour was soon in circulation that the disobedient niece was disinherited. Some days after the uncle died, and, on the will being opened, it was found that everything he possessed was left to Josephine, on the ground that "she was the only relation he had that felt for him a disinterested affection." The property left amounts to about 80,000*l.*—Galignani's Messenger.

[GEORGE JOHN DOUGLAS CAMPBELL, DUKE OF ARGYLL.]

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

THE love of old familiar names has not yet died away in this country. The descendants of the men who were dear to the national heart of our warlike ancestors, are not only cherished by their immediate dependents and neighbours, but that great aggregate majority which is emphatically the people; and the exhaustion of a distinguished family is still regarded with unaffected regret. This traditional affection is natural; for, although old ties have been weakened by the force of those astonishing circumstances which trade, commerce, and manufactures have introduced into society, history will always retain its wondrously eloquent voice. And so long as that brilliant expositor sheds a light on present associations, so long will great historical names be honoured in the persons of their possessors. In Scotland this feeling is stronger than in England, owing probably to the more poetical character of the people, their mountainous country, and the more recent date of their emancipation from the restraints of feudalism. The subdivision of the people into clans, and the interminable feuds that existed between them until so late as the past century, may also have left memories behind not to be extinguished within so short a space of time as two generations; and so have perpetuated attachments which have resulted in a warmer sentiment for the living links between the past and the present, than is entertained south of the Tweed. The war-note of Lochiel is silent, and the boast—

How in the noon of night that pibroch thrills
Savage and shrill—

has faded into a myth—a very shadowy myth, too; but the historical reminiscences of coarser, and, par parenthèse, more romantic times, have still a charm for the Scottish breast, and, as at Waterloo—

Evan's, Donald's famo rings in each clansman's ears—and the noble families of that now more gloriously employed land are yet held in the utmost respect and veneration.

Of the number of these ancient families who have survived the ruin brought about by confiscation, by rebellion, and the slower, but equally fatal processes of domestic strife and improvidence, that of which the Duke of Argyll is at the head, has not been the least conspicuous in the exciting annals of Scotland. The clan Campbell had a name that was never nameless by day; but never more will the alarm, "The Campbells are coming," resound over the hills of bonny Scotia. The clan has been dispersed over the whole world; art, science, poetry, commerce, and agriculture have long ago adopted its sons and daughters; and this race, among others of the shepherd warriors that in their day were famous, is extinct. The chief alone remains, to mark the progress of inevitable change, and mingle in scenes more ennobling than heading a foray, or being perched on a rugged hill, like an eagle—

That had long acquired
Absolute sway—the lord of a domain,
Savage, sublime.

The contrast between the past and the present is powerfully exemplified in the position and conduct of our titled nobility. Formerly they were, when at home, mere chieftains of a district or lords of a county; and when abroad, soldiers, either fighting as mercenaries, or engaging in a party quarrel, with all the ardour of a barbarous desire for excitement, and untamed propensity for war. Their lives were as rude as their manners and policy: physical renown was the highest object of their ambition, and, when not intriguing at court, they were hunting, or, through their want of occupation, tyrannising over their vassals, or getting up extempore quarrels with their neighbours.

How different is their position now. Without being deficient in one grain of the courage, or one atom of the chivalry of the best of their ancestors, they combine the refinement of high life with the intellectual dignity of the commonwealth of art, science, and literature. Instead

Of mounting barbed steeds to fright the souls
Of fearful adversaries, or burying themselves in the seclusion of grim castles, they step forth into the public arena of busy, everyday life; and, by mingling in genial intercourse with their fellow-men, soften the features of a distinction "full fraught" with the tendency to become harsh in the presence of new institutions, and, by vigorous example, excite emulation to become not only wealthy, but wise, learned, and moral.

In ancient times, authorship was invariably associated with high rank. Most of the Roman writers were distinguished for their birth, and the high employment they had held. Knowledge was then the birthright of the few—it was never communicated to the people, who were scarcely considered as forming a part of the nation. Until almost recently, the reverse was the fact in this country; for men of genius of every variety sprang almost exclusively from the ranks of the people, and the patrician order was left an immeasurable distance in the rear. Thus threatened with complete intellectual ostracism, the young nobles of the present generation have gallantly entered the field of peaceful contention, and taken a creditable share in the labour of building up a brilliant civilisation, by contributions to every branch of literature—and, we might add, to the rich treasures of art and science. Many of them have undertaken downright practical work. They have become sanitary reformers, promoters of education, and lecturers at mechanics' institutions. Lord Carlisle does not consider "the blood of all the Howards" polluted by such familiar contact with the people; nor does Lord John Russell; and most assuredly so does not the subject of the present notice—the Duke of Argyll, the head of all the Campbells; for it is not many months since he delivered an address to the members of the Athenæum Institute, Glasgow, on "the importance of literature to men of business." If "the Campbell's come" in this fashion, heaven send many of them to this side of the Tweed, for such mountain pipes are filled with a pure and generous sympathy—not a fierce brag about native daring, or

The stirring memory of a thousand years.

Such conduct puts iron feudality to the blush, and, in introducing the manly lineaments of such a patriotic nobleman to our readers, we could not resist the temptation to hold before the mind's eye the rare difference there exists between a ducal Campbell of the present day, and one of those hard-headed, soldierly chieftains, who flourished in periods when it was jocularly said: "The crown of a loon was hardly worth the cracking."

The Duke of Argyll, as most of our readers are doubtless aware, holds office under Lord Aberdeen, as Lord Privy Seal, and is one of the youngest members in the administration, for he is only in his thirtieth year. And here we would remark, that probably there never before was a ministry formed which embraced so many comparatively young men. The Colonial Secretary is not forty-two, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is forty-one, the President of the Council is forty-three, the Lord Privy Seal is not yet thirty, the Solicitor-General for Ireland is thirty-six, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. F. Peel), is under thirty, and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is not twenty-seven.

Well, the young and clever Duke of Argyll is Lord Privy Seal; and as our readers would like to know something of him personally, we beg to inform them that his baptismal patronymics are George John Douglas Campbell, and that he is the eighth duke in succession, the first having been created in 1701. Eight dukes in a century and a half—why that only gives about nineteen years possession to each: a brief time, indeed, some of them must have basked in the sunshine of a coronet.

However, the present Duke of Argyll was born in 1823, and in 1844 he married the eldest daughter of the second Duke of Sutherland—so that he is son-in-law to the present fascinating Mistress of the Robes, still a queen of beauty, and connected with some of the most ancient as well as wealthy noble houses in the kingdom. He succeeded his father in the dukedom in 1847, and, after the customary period of mourning had expired, has ever since been conspicuously before the public.

His maiden speech in the House of Peers was delivered on the 25th of May, 1848, on the second reading of the bill for admitting Jews into Parliament. He supported that measure, on the ground that Jews were entitled to all the rights of citizenship, and there did not exist sufficient reasons—either political or religious—for their exclusion. At the same time he eloquently declaimed against the assertion of Mr. Macaulay, that religion had nothing to do with the question, or that "Christianity had no more to do with our legislature than it had with cobbling." He believed that "Christianity had nobler and wider fields of action than those defined by the exclusionists," and argued, that "Christianity was best advanced by not maintaining these distinctions, which only produced division and perverted Christian union."

The speech was extremely favourably received, and those who differed in opinion from the youthful orator were equally warm with his friends in prognosticating that such brilliant promise of future ability as a statesman was not destined to be unredeemed. In the same year he spoke frequently, and on topics that showed he had not contented himself with the study of vague theories, but gone into practical details, and familiarised himself with the science of statistics, that key to all material truth.

At the opening of the session of 1849, the Duke of Argyll supported Free Trade, in opposition to the amendment on the Address, moved by the Earl of Derby. He afterwards, on all opportune occasions, gave to our Free-trade policy the energetic support of a liberal and enlightened Conservative; and generally, in other respects, supported the measures of the Russell administration. Since then he has diligently applied himself to his duties as a peer of the realm, and delivered several masterly speeches: one in particular—that on the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, in 1851—materially strengthened his oratorical and political reputation.

But the Duke of Argyll has earned quite as much renown as an author as an orator, being the writer of several works on the Scottish Church—all of them of a controversial description—and of an essay on the Ecclesiastical History of Scotland since the Reformation, which attracted much notice, and must have hit some parties hard, for some of his views were hotly assailed, both from the press and the pulpit. His Grace is also a devoted lover of science, being well known as a sound practical geologist. His sympathies with literature, and his ardent desire to promote the mental and moral welfare of those who are least able, or who neglect to help themselves, are all pure and unaffected; and when we mention that he is a powerful and eloquent speaker, we think we have said sufficient to warrant the unqualified presumption that the Duke of Argyll is destined to play a more important part on the stage of public life than that of Lord Privy Seal.

[CRESTED PIGEONS, FROM AUSTRALIA.]

AUSTRALIAN CRESTED PIGEONS.

OUT of the 249 pairs of pigeons exhibited at the late Great Metropolitan Poultry Show, probably no pair attracted more attention than the Australian Crested Pigeons, the property of Mr. G. C. Adkins, of Edgbaston, Birmingham.

The golden wonders of the land of their origin, the extraordinary emigration from these shores to that distant territory, and the future consequences of that alarming inroad on our population, about which everybody possessed of ordinary sense is now beginning seriously to think—all tended to invest these “winged inhabitants o’ the air” with a peculiar interest, which was much increased by the beautiful shape of the birds themselves, and the extreme brilliancy of their plumage.

This pair, of which we present our readers with an engraved illustration, obtained a prize, and we may mention that, with respect to the exhibition of foreign varieties, Mr. Adkins was the most successful competitor.

This variety were very much admired, but it seems they have not been, as pigeons fanciers express it, yet recovered from a state of nature.

They frequent the low and marshy grounds in all parts of Australia, and are but very rarely, if ever, found in the high lands. They have never been domesticated; and, although they have bred at the Regent’s Park Gardens and at Knowsley, the number reared has been very small.

In one respect they differ so far from the ordinary pigeons, that the feathers come off at the least touch. Their management requires great care, but they must at all times be kept confined, and if a portion of the pen is wired over and exposed to the weather, they will always remain in the open air during the night, however inclement the season.

This is not at all a singular trait, when the wild habits of the bird are taken into consideration; but it is far from improbable, that in the course of a few years they will have become so familiarised with our climate and mode of treatment, as to be as docile as the carrier—originally an oriental pigeon—by no means a social bird, but, on the contrary, wild and retired.

ESSAYS.

No. CLXXX.—HOW TO MAKE SUNDAY REALLY SUNDAY.

THE Divine law is, that “the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath;” but we apprehend that man should not abuse the sacred gift, or attempt to wrest it from its original purpose. If we are to religiously accept a certain incontrovertible truth, we cannot do without certain forms, for the highest faith requires observances that, to a great extent, operate as a check upon that freedom of action which is essential to human free agency.

Sunday in the realm of Christendom is an established institution—it has the sanction of the conscience, of the moral law, the political law, and that undefined code which, under all conditions, we are glad to avail ourselves of, under the general title of expediency. This is so universally recognised, that it is self-evident that the Sunday is essential to the discipline of the general church, and its observance a ceremonial portion of our conduct which cannot be neglected with impunity.

If there be a time for all things, there surely is a time for spiritual communion with the everlasting Unseen; but as all ceremonies, whether of the church or the laity, must necessarily be purely material, the question arises, and is daily being discussed—Can the observance of this particular day be consistently—in the temper of the present time, we might add, practically—enforced, either compulsorily or by such prohibitory enactments as would in their operation amount to compulsion.

For our own part, we do not like the thought of the Church of England flying to the police-office and to Parliament to help it in getting people to go to church. A voluntary compliance with any prescribed form is the only complete identification with it that can be freely admitted; and, without embarking in any discussion upon the spiritual proprieties involved in the question, we must candidly say, that if the church wishes Sunday to be really Sunday, it must have more faith in itself, and the efficacy of its teachings, than in the secular arm of the law.

It is a trite but expressive adage, that “one man may lead a horse to the water, but twenty cannot make him drink;” and, following the saying to its obvious application, it might be affirmed, that Parliament might command Sunday to be scrupulously observed, but twenty Parliaments, each twenty times stronger than that of Great Britain, could not enforce that command, even if only a section of the community chose to be refractory. The civil law is one thing, the religious law another; and they are so far irreconcilable, that the former is comparatively powerless without the aid of the latter; and the latter never so strong as when it does not stand in need of any assistance from the former. Therefore, we say, let the Church fulfil its mission—let it appeal to the heart and the conscience of British society—and, if it does its appointed work well, it cannot fail to succeed. Let the London clergy trust themselves and their own teaching—let them fall back upon the church. If she cannot win the people by her own high appeals, it is certain that closing the Crystal Palace and the National Gallery will not do the work which she cannot achieve. The clergy would act more wisely were they to let these things take their course.

As in logic so it is in religion. A person who has acquired a knowledge of religion, will afterwards speak and write religiously without ever thinking of the rules of religion. Knowledge of a truth must precede its appreciation and adoption. You cannot coerce a multitude into the belief that the whole infinite contrivance of everything above, around, and within us, appears directed to certain benevolent issues; and all the laws of nature are in perfect harmony with the whole constitution of man. All such knowledge comes by the slow process of induction, in its higher manifestations by intuition, or that equivalent for intuition, which invariably accompanies an improved standard of general intelligence and morality. Therefore we say to the clergy, do not commit the mistake of supposing that people can be driven to church on a Sunday like flocks of sheep under shelter, on the approach of a storm. First make the church, and the people will enter it without much asking; for not only is a congregation necessary to the solid foundation of a church, but a properly managed church indispensable to the collection of a proper congregation—that is, a sincere, earnest, voluntarily attending congregation.

Could we hope to be listened to by the London clergy, we should say: Meet the Crystal Palace, and even “all public museums and galleries,” on their own grounds—hold out counter-attractions. Englishmen are not naturally irreligious. Make your churches popular, convenient, and comfortable; arrange your Sunday services so that a man may do his duty to God and see the blue sky all the same. As matters stand—as you manipulate the Sunday—this is simply impossible. If you teach, that to travel on Sunday is to profane the Sabbath, you must take the consequence; and the consequence is, empty churches. But this need not be. Make your services earlier, shorter, and more attractive; make your churches clean and handsome; abolish your big pews; abolish your beadies; do not insult the poor by “free seats” under the gallery: as there is but one heaven for rich and poor, so there ought to be no distinction of cushioned and curtained boxes for the wealthy, with dark, cold “free seats” for some twenty poor in a parish of 20,000. In music, in decoration, in singing, in getting the people to join in the prayers, the church has attractions far higher than those of “public amusements.” Divide your services; get rid of the horrible absurdity of reading prayers to your congregations; and, above all, make your sermons much shorter and a great deal more lively. In a word, be true to yourselves and to the principles of the Church of England—encourage public worship and common prayer—and you will have nothing to fear from Crystal Palaces, or from all the museums and galleries in London.

Do all this, and then you will have a right to declaim against all violations of the sanctity of the Sabbath Day.

Compulsory religion is a mistake. Sion College met on this subject some months ago; and what is the result on the minds of the humbler classes? Simply this: that the religion which proscribes green fields and the treasures of nature and art, is somehow out of keeping with man’s physical and moral nature.

THE number of sea-going vessels in the world is about 85,000, of which two-thirds belong to England and the United States.

CURIOUS INCIDENT.—A curious occurrence took place lately at Letham Grange House, the residence of John Hay, Esq. While Mr. Hay was engaged in writing in his library, two panes of the window were simultaneously broken, and the glass scattered upon his writing-table and about the room. Mr. Hay’s first impression was that a couple of shots had been fired, occasioning the crash; but, on further examination, he discovered that a blackbird, which had been pursued by a large sparrow-hawk, had, in its eagerness to escape, dashed through the window, and taken shelter, in a terrible state of trepidation, between two panes which were lying on the rug before the fire. It would seem that the hawk had been no less anxious to get at its prey than the blackbird to elude its pursuer; and that it had also flown against the window, broken a pane, and precipitated itself into the room, at the further end of which it lay extended. The poor blackbird, though much exhausted, after a time recovered, and was set at liberty. In securing the sparrow-hawk, Mr. Hay had his hand slightly injured by its talons.—Edinburgh Courier.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

PREVENTION OF INCrustATION IN BOILERS.—Mr Overman recommends to use charcoal to prevent incrustations in boilers. That made from hard wood is preferred, and is to be broken up into lumps from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ in. cube, and then thrown into the boiler, in the proportion of two bushels to a boiler of 20 or 30 horse power. At the end of a month it will require to be renewed. It is said not to condense the salts of fixed alkalies—as those of potash and soda—but will effectually absorb all salt of lime, alkaline earth, salts of iron, and almost all other heavy metals.

GAS.—The superiority of the Edinburgh gas over that of London arises from two causes—first, from the difference of the coal used for the manufacture of gas. In Edinburgh Cannel coal is used, which generates gas of a highly illuminating power. In London, Newcastle coal is used, which produces a very inferior quality of gas. In the second place, from the difference of the systems in use. In Scotland, the coal is only suffered to remain in the retorts a sufficient time to give out its gases, attention only being paid to the quality of the gas manufactured. In London, the coal is allowed to remain a much longer time in the retorts, and, by excessive baking, a very weak gas is generated, of little illuminating power, and of little value for lighting purposes; indeed, it is well known that in London they are coke and gas manufacturers; in Edinburgh, only gas manufacturers—the one manufacturing light gas, the other gas-light: five feet of Cannel coal gas will give twice as much light as ten feet of the ordinary London gas; consequently, at the same rate of charge per 1000 cubic feet, the one costs only half as much to produce the same quantity of light, the products of combustion, and all the disagreeable attendants upon the use of poor gas, being lessened to a very great extent.

AN AUSTRIAN LAND STORM.—A land storm in the neighbourhood of Vienna is unique in its display of the effect of wind upon dust; and he who has only encountered a March gale on a high road in England, knows but little what those unfortunate Austrians endure who leave the walls of their city in dry and dusty weather. The effect of the visitation is curious: through the closed windows of a carriage one may be admiring the sparkling, sunshiny morning, the gaiety of the equipages on the road, the buildings in the distance; but in an instant, by one rending blast, the roads are swept clean of every atom which a square foot of dust to every foot of road may contain; the day's work of thousands of scavengers is done at a blow—the whole is up-whirled, a solid, dun-coloured mass rises against the windows, and gives the idea of solitary imprisonment, or of being buried alive.—Tour in Austria.

DISCOVERY OF A BURIED CITY.—A buried city has been discovered in Egypt, named Saccakrah. It appears to be situated about five hours' journey from Cairo, near the first cataract. An Arab having observed what appeared to be the head of a sphynx appearing above the ground near this spot, drew the attention of a French gentleman to the circumstance, who commenced excavating, and laid open a long buried street, which contained thirty-eight granite sarcophagi, each of which weighed about sixty-eight tons, and which formerly held evidently the ashes of sacred animals. The French gentleman has got a grant of the spot from the Egyptian pacha, and has exhumed great quantities of curiosities, some of them ancient earthenware vessels of a diminutive size. This street, when lit up at night, forms a magnificent sight. It is upwards of 1600 yards in length. Many of the curiosities dug out have to be kept buried in sand, to preserve them from perishing.

MEXICAN MODE OF TEACHING HORSES TO STEP OUT.—I was consoled by watching the beautiful horses, mostly high-stepping Brazeadors: they were prancing along, looking as conceited as any man, and twice as handsome. I have been positively assured that they teach them to raise up their fore-legs immensely high—which they almost all do—by putting on them magnifying spectacles when young, by which means the stones on the road are made to appear like large blocks in the way, and they lift up their legs in order to step over them, and so acquire the habit. I dare say that the reader will laugh incredulously, but I tell him what was told me as a fact; and I am further informed this is also constantly practised in South America.

PROPOSED METHOD OF RESTORING THE BLACKENED PORTIONS OF OIL PAINTINGS.—One of the chief drawbacks to the employment of white-lead in artistic painting, consists in the facility with which it becomes blackened by the sulphuretted hydrogen, and hydrosulphate of ammonia, both so prevalent in the atmosphere of towns. A very elegant way of instantaneously restoring those discoloured parts to their original whiteness was suggested by M. Thenard, the discoverer of peroxide of hydrogen, otherwise called oxygenated water. It is a prominent quality of this liquid to impart oxygen—and hence, if applied to a coating of black sulphuret of lead, the latter immediately acquires oxygen, and is changed into the white sulphate, thus restoring the original tint. Unfortunately, however, this peroxide of hydrogen is so difficult of manufacture, and so expensive, that its use for the purpose in question is almost impossible. A much easier plan, but founded on the same principle, has been suggested by M. Schonbein, of Bale, who, in the course of his studies on ozone, discovered that oil of turpentine, if exposed in an open glass vessel to the atmosphere in the sun's rays, and agitated from time to time during the space of two or three months, acquired such oxydising properties, that it was capable of acting on sulphuret of lead just like the oxygenated water of Thenard—that is to say, capable of changing it almost instantaneously into the white sulphate. Professor Schonbein has himself suggested the value of this oxygenised oil of turpentine to artists and picture dealers. Many other liquids, besides oil of turpentine, can be oxygenated in a similar manner, and would probably be as advantageous.

DEATH IN THE JAM POT.—The Lancet gives the following summary of the results obtained from a chemical examination of thirty-five samples of preserves: That the raspberry jam analysed contained a very considerable quantity of copper. That the four samples of gooseberry jam examined all contained copper. That copper, sometimes in large amount, was detected in twelve of the fourteen samples of orange marmalade analysed. That three of the marmalades were adulterated with large quantities of vegetable substance—most probably either turnip or apple. That the nine samples of greengage jam were all more or less impregnated with copper, it being present in considerable amount in five of the samples. That the greengages contained in three different boxes of crystallised fruits owed their deep-green colour to the presence of copper. That the limes and greengages present in a little glass jar of fruit, preserved in jelly, also owed their brilliant colour to a salt of copper. That copper was present in the three samples of candid citron peel subjected to analysis. That copper was detected in no less than thirty-three of the thirty-five samples of different preserves analysed; three contained traces only; in eleven the metal was present in small quantity; and in nineteen, either in considerable, or even very large amount.

TRIUMPH OF GENIUS.—Our readers are aware that Prescott, the historian, is blind. In a letter addressed lately to an American publisher, he thus explains the mode in which he prepares his MS.: "My dear sir,—As you desire, I send you a specimen of my autograph. It is the concluding page of one of the chapters of the 'Conquest of Peru.' The writing is not, as you may imagine, made by a pencil, but is indelible, being made by an apparatus used by the blind. This is a very simple affair, consisting of a frame of the size of a common sheet of letter paper, with brass wires inserted in it to correspond with the number of lines wanted. On one side of this frame is pasted a leaf of thin carbonated paper, such as is used to obtain duplicates. Instead of a pen, the writer uses a stylus of ivory or agate, the last better or harder. The great difficulties in the way of a blind man's writing in the usual manner, arise from his not knowing when the ink is exhausted in his pen and when his lines run into one another. Both difficulties are obviated by this simple writing-case, which enables one to do his work as well in the dark as in the light. Though my trouble is not blindness, but a disorder of the nerve of the eye, the effect, as far as this is concerned, is the same, and I am wholly incapacitated from writing in the ordinary way. In this manner I have written every word of my 'historicals.' This modus operandi exposes one to some embarrassments; for, as one cannot see what he is doing on the other side of the paper, any more than a performer on the treadmill sees what he is grinding on the other side of the wall, it becomes very difficult to make corrections. This requires the subject to be pretty thoroughly canvassed in the mind, and all the blots and erasures to be made there, before sitting down to my desk. When there, the work becomes one of memory rather than of creation, and the writing is apt to run off glibly enough."

GENÈVRA.

OR, THE HISTORY OF A PORTRAIT.

(Continued from our last.)

PASIPHÆ told me, some days after, that the corpse had been buried in a cemetery two miles from the castle—that M. de Serval had gone to the room and looked at the dead, and she saw, or fancied she saw him shed tears. The old woman, now her insane charge was dead—so strong is habit—really seemed to regret the loss, and continually talked of her. For myself, I felt wretched, and wept at early dawn, at bright noon, and again when dark night came on. I thought of my husband: I regretted his behaviour; and notwithstanding all, I wished—oh, I don't know what I wished; but one thing I know is certain, that death, had he come then, would not have found me unwilling to go.

For two weeks after Isodore's death, I remained alone in my apartments—the communication between them and monsieur's having been, by my order, closed, lest he might intrude upon me. I neglected my dress, and my long ringlets hung in wild disorder around my face. I wore a black dress, as if in mourning, for my soul was mourning; and thus attired, and thus lonely, I sat opposite a mirror, in which I beheld myself—not the joyous bride of six months ago, but pale, dejected, and melancholy; and thus I sat and mused to no purpose, when my waist was clasped by a well-known hand, and a mouth, whose kisses I can never forget, imprinted one on my cheek, as Rinaldo's voice murmured in my ear:

"Genevra, I am miserable, living thus without you! Let the past be forgotten and forgiven; let us love each other as we did before this sad affair. You cannot so quickly have learned to hate me, have you?"

I hesitated a moment, I confess: then love triumphed over every other feeling, and, throwing myself into his arms, we fervently kissed each other, and he promised to lead a better life. Of that, however, from what I now comprehended of my husband's character and habits, I had little hope; for any habit, when once confirmed, be it rouésm, gambling, or drinking, obtains such fascinating influence over the mind, that it is rarely, if ever, relinquished. Still I endeavoured to cherish a fondness, which I felt his outlandish behaviour would soon oblige me to abandon.

The novelty of possession had now worn off, and he began to wish for other society than mine: accordingly he resumed his acquaintance with the neighbouring nobility, and frequently the banqueting hall resounded with their boisterous conviviality to a late hour of night. Then my husband would be carried in the arms of his grooms in a state of drunkenness to bed, while his guests were borne off in a similar condition to theirs. At first, when I gently reproached him with his excesses, he seemed grieved, listened to me quietly, and answered, sorrowfully, that he knew he did wrong; but soon this gentleness changed to roughness, and if I spoke reprovingly, he sternly bade me be silent, and not presume to admonish him of what he was the best judge of. Thus, in alternations of coldness, reproaches, quarrels, and reconciliations, a year of married life passed away.

As I became more estranged from him, I missed the gaieties and pleasures of Naples, which his affections had for a few months compensated me for the loss of. I often thought of Blanche, of my teacher, and the kind Madame Bonni. Monsieur Belmont had heard nothing of Blanche, though within the year inquiry had often been made by him concerning her. My kind hostess had not forgotten me, and her love was often sent; my teacher's letters I carefully treasured, and read each one with double care, they seemed like tidings of life—for the quiet chateau, the rustic neighbourhood, could scarcely be designated by that name; and my regular existence, systematic as a clock, partook largely of lifeless monotony. Rinaldo, it is true, made amends to Bacchus for my dullness, for night after night found him at the gaming table, playing high, or carousing with his noisy companions. When, sometimes, I saw him excited with wine, I could with difficulty realise that it was the same refined man, whose sweet voice and gentle ways had won my virgin heart, on the beautiful shores of Parthenope. Guilo, my husband's valet, said, that although his master had always lived high and been very gay, yet, during the first months of our marriage, he had behaved much better than formerly—and the worthy domestic appeared astonished to see him return to his old habits; but he did not reflect, that the object for which this good behaviour was cultivated was attained, and there was no longer any need of playing a part.

I sometimes took long walks through that fair valley, and among the lofty hills which majestically surrounded it. I amused and entertained myself with the observation of nature, in its many different yet all beautiful modifications: I saw the birds, as they floated on the wing; I saw the waving of the foliage of the forest-trees, and the clouds, as they moved through the dewy atmosphere—for an eternal mist ever hung over those mountains and that valley. The shepherds tended their flocks there, and thither, in harvest and vintage time, came the pretty village girls and the hardy mountaineers, to gather the fruitful grape. Sometimes, sitting beneath some lofty tree, I reflected on the sottishness of the heart, which, the more it possesses, the more it wants; I wondered if there was any such thing as happiness, in what it consisted, and where to be found; and then I wondered if it was exemplified by the Epicurean belief, that happiness must consist in banishing from the mind all painful thoughts, and wholly surrendering oneself, spiritually and bodily, to pleasure; or, if the doctrine of the Stoics was true, that happiness or misery, pleasure or pain, was a principle of the mind, and could not be affected by external objects; that if the mind was properly tutored, it would be incapable of any other feeling than that of rational, quiet contentment—it would be insensible to the cares and sorrows of life, regarding all things with the proud eyes of ethereal, idealised philosophy. I inclined towards the Stoics, and resolved, if possible, so to school my mind, that no earthly disappointment should surprise or vex me; but, unfortunately, it is much easier to make resolves than to keep them.

Sometimes I extended my rambles to Isodore's grave—a simple mound of earth, unmarked by tablet or tombstone. She had now been dead several months, and the grass and wild flowers grew luxuriantly above the mound. I often sat down on it, and, fixing my eyes on the starry worlds overhead, at twilight, sought to penetrate the secrets of futurity, and read my destiny in their eternal light. I thought of the thousands and thousands of years that had passed into eternity since they were first hung there. "Why—oh, why?"—I cried aloud, from the fulness of my heart—"why is it, that the beautiful, the great, the good, all moulder back to dust, and are forgotten—while these shine on, bright as when first placed there, coeval with the Great Spirit, from time to eternity?—while we die, and, oh, worse than all! know not what is to come hereafter!" Such gloomy thoughts occupied my mind as I slowly returned home, after twilight had deepened into sombre night, my clothes damp with dew.

"Pasiphæ!" said I, as I flung myself into my fauteuil, tired and sorrowful, "get me some dry clothes, and arrange the fire. Where is Monsieur de Serval? is he at home?"

"Master was inquiring for you, my lady, this evening, and I sought for you, and could not find you, when Guilo told me he saw you go out of the castle gate, and take the forest road. I told master, and he went away to his shooting-gallery."

As she spoke, he entered the room in his hunting-dress, looking very pale after his night's carouse. We kissed each other; but the salute had little of the fervour of former days.

"I was looking for you this evening, Genevra, but you were not in your apartments."

"No; I went to take a walk in the woods."

He began whistling as he walked up and down, evidently wishing Pasiphæ gone. Anticipating his wish, after I had changed shoes and stockings, I dismissed her.

"I wished to see you," said he, after she had gone, "to tell you that I am going away again, a hundred miles back into the country, on a hunting party, to be absent a week. When I return, I shall bring a friend with me—the Count Malabrella—to spend some days."

"Yes," said I, mechanically.

Continuing his walk, he looked at me as I sat.

"You don't look well of late, Genevra! your face has lost its freshness; your eyes, their brightness."

"I feel altered, externally and internally."

"I think I am somewhat changed myself, within the last year. Let me see," said he, reflectively; "yes: this is the anniversary of our marriage—the year has been an eventful one to me." He seemed to expect some remark, and I determined to touch him to the quick.

"Yes," I replied, as if unconsciously, "it is five months since Isodore died: how sad her death-bed was!" His face flushed, and he exclaimed, fiercely:

"Why do speak of that woman? why do you remind me of her? She is dead; well, let her rest in peace, and cease to torment me with recollections of her!"

But I wished him to hear of her: I thought it only an act of justice to her injured memory, and I continued, quietly:

"You feel, then, no remorse for your past conduct towards her, monsieur? no regret? Yet she loved you much; and, if she erred, it may have been through unhappy circumstances, or through an overweening attachment to you."

"She sinned through nothing of the sort!" cried he, sharply: "her affair with me was not the only one she ever had; she had been a notorious woman long before I ever saw her. As for the deep regrets you talk of, I feel none. I consider I acted honourably in taking care of a lunatic, and suffering myself to be frequently annoyed by the antics of a crazy woman. She is better off where she is."

I saw my husband was impenetrable to any feeling on the subject, and, feeling misanthropic myself, I cared not to enter into a wordy war. Relapsing into silence and thought, I sat motionless. One thing I plainly perceived: that he was piqued that I pitied the dead Isodore, and manifested neither anger, contempt, nor hatred for her memory. He would rather have seen me furiously jealous, retaining the recollection of her error, and hating her name. But I had lost all hatred for anything and everything, and was sinking into a listless apathy.

"Well, farewell till we meet again!" said Monsieur de Serval, abruptly, after a moment's pause.

"Farewell, monsieur."

We shook hands, and he departed. I watched from my window, and saw his close travelling carriage rolled into the courtyard. Guilo placed numerous packages, boxes of cigars, and comfits, on the front seat; then my husband entered it, his hat slouched over his eyes, and enveloped in his great coat. Guilo mounted behind: the postilion huzzaed, and they rattled down the valley road.

I did not miss him: his society was no longer necessary to my very existence. We could live apart for days, weeks, months, without the same regrets and longings we should have experienced during the first months of married life. During his absence, I busied myself in household affairs, rode on horseback, played and sang, and endeavoured to kill time as fast as possible. I was very young, and my tastes and habits still bordered closely on girlhood—I might almost say on childhood. Pasiphae, with her weird-like countenance, as she sat over the fire in the banquetting-hall, on those chilly autumnal nights, and told me strange ghost stories, often laughed at the childish alarm I showed at her tales. She was my confidante, and, in fact, only friend, in that wild region. To her I confided all my thoughts, my griefs, and fears, and hopes. She sympathised with, but could not advise me.

The week of his absence passed quietly away: nothing of moment occurred worth relating; and I was sitting in my saloon, reading a romance, when Pasiphae entered, saying, Guilo had arrived in advance of his master, and announced that Monsieur de Serval would be with me in half an hour. Upon the delivery of this message, I consulted my mirror. Pasiphae declared herself satisfied with my appearance. I remember with vivid distinctness the dress I wore: it was a dark, deep crimson velvet, made high in the neck, and long sleeves concealed my arms; the rich, heavy falls of the robe swept the floor; a Grecian head-dress of lama lace formed my coiffure, and my hair fell in long ringlets to my waist.

"Ah, my lady, I never saw you look so beautiful!" said the faithful creature, in an ecstasy of delight—for the slightest thing will throw an Italian into a fit of enthusiasm. "That head-dress is so charming, and the robe so handsome! Ah, if fine dress only made people happy, it would be worth wishing for!"

"Pasiphae, I think I heard monsieur's carriage driving into the courtyard. See if it is him."

As I spoke, I heard voices and heavy steps in the hall: before she could reach the door, it was opened hastily, and my husband entered, followed by a figure so wrapped up in coats and shawls, that I could scarcely discern what it was. Pasiphae hastened to relieve this muffled form of its incumbrances, after disburthening my husband; and when the stranger, stepping towards me, bowed, the first glance at his face told me that I beheld the stranger of the opera. The same beautiful eyes were bent upon me, and the low, deep tones of his voice struck my ear, as he said:

"Madame, I am happy to make the acquaintance of the wife of my friend."

I felt the blood rush to my brow, my neck, my very hands, as I tremblingly replied:

"Count, you are most welcome to our home."

Rinaldo did not notice my embarrassment: he was occupied in giving orders about the luggage, the game, and a hundred other things; and when he had completed these commands, turning to me, who had been saying some confused nothings to the visitor, he said:

"Come, count, and you, madame, let us proceed to the supper-room; and after we have rendered our duties there, we will return hither for conversation."

All my husband's movements were abrupt and singular, otherwise I should have been astonished at this sudden interruption. Count Malabrella offered me his arm, and, leaning on that strong arm, and looking on that handsome, energetic face, which afterwards became, oh, how dear to me! I followed my stern lord, who strode before me to the banquetting-hall. Rinaldo sat at the head of the table, myself and his guest at each side. By the brilliant light of the lamps around us, I could more fully observe the stranger. The count was opposite in appearance to my husband: he was taller, of an athletic form, strong, and manly. His eyes, large, languid, yet sparkling, sometimes flashed fire, sometimes were the impersonation of repose. His hands and feet were rather large, not so delicate as Monsieur de Serval's. His whole appearance was rather massive; not feminine, or soft, as was the look, the whole person of my husband.

Rinaldo's face was flushed from wine, and he talked loudly and gaily, not to me, but to his friend. He talked most of his success on the boar-hunt, cursing the ill attendance of the servants and grooms. He drank glass after glass of wine, and his evanescent spirits grew higher and higher under the influence. I regarded him with feelings of painful regret, but he seemed not to observe my earnest looks, save by a return glance of scorn.

The count appeared embarrassed. I saw he felt for me and for his friend, and looked relieved when the repast was over, and we returned to the saloon. He must have seen the coldness existing between my husband and myself, for he also seemed infected by it; and, after several efforts at a general conversation, asked me to favour him with a song. I did so with alacrity, to relieve the tedium which seemed to pervade the drawing-room; yet, though I sang, I did so mechanically. One idea dwelt in my mind: who was this Count Malabrella; this man, whose beautiful eyes had so long before haunted me, like a foreshadowing dream of futurity? How strange, that he should so unexpectedly cross my path now, when a married woman—now, when his acquaintance could be nothing to me. Still the same presentiment haunted me, that my destiny in future would have something to do with him; and as I glanced around at him, as he sat near my husband, listening to the song, leaning on the arm of the sofa, his strongly marked features distinctly shown by the glancing firelight, what a contrast did that manly form, so energetic, breathing, living—speaking of nobility of soul—what a contrast did it not present to my fair, yet dissipated, reckless husband! He had thrown himself in an attitude of ease upon a sofa, and with his eyes closed, seemed half asleep. That was scarcely polite to his guest, but Rinaldo cared not what any one thought: he cared more for his own comfort than for fixed rules of etiquette.

The count drew his chair towards me, and remarked: "Your castle, madame, is delightfully situated here, in this beautiful ravine: I have often heard Monsieur de Serval speak of his mountain home, but never, till now, had an opportunity of seeing it."

"Yes, the castle is a charming summer residence, though rather dreary in winter."

"I have never," continued he, "been so far north before; my attendance on his majesty has hitherto prevented me from travelling to any great extent; and Naples and its environs, you know, do not afford any great variety to one who has been accustomed to it a lifetime."

"You are, then, from Naples—beautiful Naples!"

Numerous recollections were recalled by that name; and I looked down, and almost unconsciously sighed. When I raised my eyes, I met those of the stranger, bent curiously on my face: he seemed endeavouring to read my thoughts; and I blushed as I met that look, though I scarce knew why myself.

"Yes," said he, in reply to my remark, "beautiful Naples was my birthplace; and there I have lived the principal part of my life."

Here Rinaldo, raising himself from his recumbent position, joined us, and began turning over the music leaves on the piano.

"My wife sings one of these songs magnificently, count," said he, as he sought among the other music for it. "Oh! here it is: oblige us, madame, by singing it."

It was the song of Ajesha: "We have lived and loved together, in sunlight and in tears; and I felt the tears gush into my own eyes as I executed it. It brought back, bright as yesterday, the night of its first representation—Blanche's spirited acting—the presence and applause of the royal family. The tones lingered on my lips, as if they obeyed the impulse of my heart, and, by remaining, could recall bygone hours more forcibly to my mind.

"That is a charming melody," said the count; "and it is needless to admire that voice, whose far-spread fame has roused all Italy!"

I felt weary, and, as it was growing late, on a look from my husband, we retired; he accompanying his friend to a bed-chamber, and I returning to my cheerful apartment, where, by the blazing fire, I sat down to dream and reflect on what, alas!—on what too many mortals while away existence in—dreams—unsubstantial, unreal dreams.

CHAPTER X.

I HAD for some weeks remarked the visits of several mysterious-looking strangers, who came often, and were closeted long with Monsieur de Serval in his studio. These men were dressed in the costume of the peasantry, but they all wore brown cloaks, with cowls drawn over their faces, which they jealously preserved from sight—perhaps from pity to those unfortunate hearts on whom they should bestow their glances. There was something very strange about them; and, as none of the domestics knew from whence they came, or whither they went, I determined to ask my husband their business at the castle.

The morning after his arrival, I rose early. I heard my husband about his room till a late hour, when silence proclaimed he had gone to rest. We no longer sank to rest cradled in each other's arms; and sometimes, when my lonely, impassioned heart fairly ached for companionship, I compared our present estrangement with the joyful hours we had formerly spent together; and then the midnight hour saw convulsions of passion, I should have been ashamed any one should witness, save that faithful, silent monitor, Time; but it was no fault of mine: the gay roué, whose fickle fancy was momentarily caught by my beauty and virtue, had wearied by possession; the same face, the same enduring love, no longer attracted him; he had not known his own heart when he promised fidelity—he was incapable of it. I sometimes felt disposed to forgive him the wild life he had led during the past year, could I have seen any indications of a reformation: I could have returned to my old love, and have been happy once more, would he have acted differently; but he would not. To reproaches, alienations, and recriminations, had succeeded a polite coldness, which, between husband and wife, means far more than the alternations of hot and cold feeling.

I often wept myself to sleep, hugging my pillow to me for company; my mind dwelt in the past, or speculated on the future. It was void and empty—for it is only when we are with one we love that we live in the present; and who loved me now—who, save old Pasiphae?

I sought the saloon, where, to my surprise, I saw the count seated. On entering, he rose, placed a chair for me, and made some general observation on the beautiful day. I replied, seated myself, and fixed my eyes on the fire, for there was a magnetic attraction in those orbs that influenced me strangely when I met them. The gentleman suddenly remarked:

"Madame, you are much improved since I first saw you, the night of your first appearance at Naples."

"Ah! you saw me, then, at that time?"

"Yes; and I shall never forget your look, your manner, your acting, and whole appearance: the tones of your voice, indeed the whole scene, is engraven on my mind."

The tone in which he said this, made the expression, and sent the blood to my cheek. How true it is, that looks and tones give the sense to conversation, far more than the words themselves. I knew not what reply to make to this extravagant compliment, and bowed in silence.

"I never thought my friend would ever marry," he continued—I thought to relieve my obvious embarrassment—"he used to be so volatile and gay; but I am glad he has, and that the correction of youthful errors has fallen to the guidance of one so gentle." And as he looked at me, the same light shone in his eyes. "We have been almost like brothers for many years; at one time he was aide-de-camp to his majesty, and during that period we were constantly together; being older than he, I naturally advised and guided him; but now I see how much better he is tutored by that power that rules the world—the influence of love."

The arch smile that played upon his lips called the blushes to my cheeks, while my mournful heart, alas! too truthfully denied the assertion.

At this moment a servant announced the breakfast: the count, rising, offered me his arm, and we went in together. Rinaldo was not there; I sent to request the honour of his presence, while the count entertained me delightfully with a description of his journey to the shores of the Dead Sea, and travels in Arabia. His descriptive powers were fine, and I listened eagerly: we were thus engaged when Rinaldo entered. The lassitude and dissipated air my husband had acquired of late, from negligent habits, had never so forcibly struck me before, as then, when he came towards me; his eyes were sunken, his form thin, and the expression of his features cadaverous—he looked worn out. He smiled on his friend, said "Good morning" to me, then sat down on the other side of the table.

"The morning is fine, count," he remarked, as the attendant handed him a cup of coffee: "it is a charming day for rambling, and I will show you over the grounds."

"I shall go with pleasure," answered he; and then continued his description of Mecca, and the grave of the Prophet.

"Of what are you speaking?" asked my husband.

"My travels in Arabia," said the count: "I have been there within the last three years. Since we parted at Naples, I travelled through the East."

"Ah!" said Rinaldo; "I did not know that. How desolate those countries of the Levant are now! what a contrast they present when we recall the olden time!"

"Desolate enough; and the means of travelling miserable, and stopping-places filthy."

"All life, all commerce, all enterprise seem progressing onwards to the north of Europe, leaving the East, and even us, far behind: we are on the decline, never, probably, to be revived again."

"Thus it is with everything on earth—everything has its beginning, its zenith, and its fall. But do not let us involve madame in a didactic controversy; we will continue our philosophies when alone, my friend," said he, bowing to me, as I accepted his escort to my saloon, when my husband and himself departed for their walk.

As I crossed the corridor to my bedchamber for my tapestry, to amuse myself during the morning, I again met some of those shrouded forms which seemed to haunt, like ghosts, the castle. One of them, pushing partially back the cowl he wore, disclosed to my view a remarkably sunburnt, repulsive physiognomy, whose harsh, dark features appeared to me the index to a harsh, dark soul.

"God save thee, lady, but I wish to see the master Monsieur de Serval,—is he at home?"

"No, my good fellow," said I, in a gentle tone, wishing to ascertain what these men wanted; "what is your business with him? tell me, and I will communicate it to him when he returns."

"We have orders, lady, from our chief"—at that, one of the others frowned on him, and he confusedly went on—"that is—I mean to say—it is a private matter of business with the master—I cannot tell any other than him."

"Well," said I, "You can go to the lower hall, and wait for him: he will return soon;" and, calling Guilo, I bade him conduct them thither, and added, in a whisper, an admonition to watch, and not permit them to depart till my husband returned. They seemed unwilling to remain, and the chief said he would come again at a more convenient season; but I gently detained them, bidding them wait monsieur's return. Reluctantly they followed Guilo, who regarded them with suspicious glances.

An hour afterwards, I was walking on the terrace, when I saw Rinaldo approaching, with Count Malabrella: he was speaking with great earnestness, and peering with penetrating eyes into those of his friend. They were evidently engaged in some deeply interesting discussion, in which the count, from his cloudy brow and downcast eyes, did not seem to acquiesce.

As they ascended the stone steps, at the summit of which I stood, both became silent, and the count, lifting his hat to me, made some remark about the beauty of the grounds. I hastened to tell my husband about the strangers.

"Monsieur de Serval,"—addressing him by his surname, as was most polite—"three strangers of very mysterious appearance, whom I have often seen here before, now await you in the lower hall. As you were out, I asked their business, but they declined telling, and preferred waiting your return."

"In the lower hall, did you say?" said he, abruptly, and with a disturbed look. "Why did you not send them to the studio? It must be him!" he added, as if to himself. "What can have happened? how strange!"

And, without saying another word to me, he walked rapidly away, and entered the castle. I looked after him with surprise—for by his startled looks and distorted manner, I plainly saw that this was some affair of importance, and could not refrain from wondering what it was. I had a vague presentiment that his conversation with the count in some way related to these men. I could have wished to have asked the count what had been the subject of their conversation, but he was almost a perfect stranger. I could not do so with propriety, and so, silently, he and I retired to the saloon. There was something so inexpressibly delicate and gentle in his manners, in his looks, in everything he said or did, that it threw a charm around him; and this magic influence, soon extended to those of his acquaintance. He had sojourned with us but two days, and yet had ingratiated himself into the good graces of the domestics, and by his fine conversational powers had whiled away some of the many lonely hours I daily passed. My husband, too, possessed, at first sight, the most attractive and winning ways, but these soon gave place to capricious variations of feeling, which soon ended in complete indifference; like all roués, the difficulty constituted the charm; that overcome, the graces, the charms soon vanished.

I often regretted—as I sat alone, gazing on the flicker fire-light—I often regretted having left the stage, and having exchanged the certainty of a brilliant fame, unbounded admiration, and a fortune in perspective, for the uncertainty of love.

My husband had been closeted with his visitors two or three hours, when I saw them depart, and he came from the room, pale and anxious. With hasty strides he reached the courtyard, and, having ordered one of the fleetest horses to be saddled, mounted quick as lightning, and rode off.

I pulled the bell, and Guilo answered the appeal.

"Guilo, where, in the name of heaven, has Monsieur de Serval gone to? I this moment saw him depart on horse-back!"

"I know not, madame! He seemed very angry at something: he swore and muttered to himself as he mounted. I supposed you knew where he was going, my lady."

"No; I know not. I have no idea!"

"I wish I could tell you, my lady; but master has acted so singularly lately, I am not surprised at anything he does. I never saw him seem so queer before!"

"Did the strange men take the same road your master did?"

"No, my lady; they went away before him, and took the opposite direction."

"Very well, Guilo; you can go!"

"Will you be pleased to have dinner served now?"

"What is the hour?"

"Five o'clock, madame."

"Well, serve it, and announce it to the count."

Guilo did so. When I went to dinner, my guest had preceded me: he looked very thoughtful. When I said we must excuse Monsieur de Serval, he having been called away by a matter of business, his face clouded; but it passed quickly away, and he was as entertaining as usual.

That night, after I had retired to rest, the clattering of horses' hoofs sounded on the valley road. They neared the house: now they were beneath my window—then stopped—then I heard the stamping of heavy boots, and loud voices in the hall; then I distinguished Rinaldo's piquant voice—for he had a bright voice, soft and cheering; and next I heard him enter his own room. Satisfied that he had returned safe, I composed myself to sleep, wondering what this mystery could mean—longing to ask, yet restrained by pride!

Next day Rinaldo appeared to have recovered himself entirely from his temporary agitation, and I ventured to inquire, indirectly, the cause of his sudden journey. He carelessly replied, that it was a small matter of business which demanded his presence, and avoided the subject. I was not satisfied, however—I knew better; but I also waived the subject, as I could elicit nothing by questions.

A fortnight of dubious calm succeeded. Three gentlemen of the neighbourhood, my husband's friends, came to visit him. The same old scenes of riot and late hours were enacted over again; but I observed that the count avoided, as far as was consistent with politeness, all participation in these midnight revels, and often retired early to his chamber, to avoid them. This added to his attractions in my eyes; and, meeting me one evening, as I was gliding past the banquet-hall—whence I heard the drunken revels, the noisy songs and clamorous uproar of my husband and his friends—he came to my side, and, quietly placing my arm in his, silently conducted me to my salon, closed the door, to shut out those noisy sounds, drew my fauteuil to the fire, then placed another for himself, and, looking at me very sadly, said, in mournful tones:

"This behaviour of your husband is very distressing to you, I know."

"Yes; it saddens me much to see him wasting his life in such dissipations!"

"Has he always led this sort of life since he married you?"

"The first months of our wedded life we spent happily. He acted differently then!"

"Rinaldo always was very wild, very unprincipled in his views of women, yet the first day or two of my arrival here, I confidently thought you had reformed him!"

"Alas! that is not so. I wish it were!"

"Marriage is a mere lottery, at best!" said the count, thoughtfully. "I have always viewed it in that light; and my observation of its unhappy results, has deterred me from choosing a wife. Some frequently draw prizes—most get blanks! You, dear lady, have unfortunately—"

He paused, and did not complete the sentence, probably fearing to wound my feelings; for so strange it is, though you may despise your husband, yet to hear him depreciated will wound.

"In a month from now, I shall probably be at Epirus. I only feel happy in continual motion: travelling, war, politics—something to excite. Onward, seems to be my watchword; onward, as we on our little planet continually whirl round, and other worlds follow us, unceasing, eternal, in the sublime organisation of nature."

I had never seen my guest so animated before; his eyes sparkled, his alabaster face lit up with the warm glow of feeling and enthusiasm. The announcement of his intended departure somewhat surprised me, as we had expected to retain him for several weeks.

"We shall regret your departure, count," said I, trying to force a smile, but it was a sad one. "Monsieur de Serval intimated that we were to have the pleasure of your society for some time to come." As I spoke, my eyes met his, and their expression of intense interest riveted mine: those beautiful, sad eyes—those eyes of love, of ingenuousness, of truth and fidelity. He sighed, and withdrew them, and I resumed my contemplation of the carpet of the salon.

A long, loud laugh, from the apartment where my husband was revelling, startled me. I thought I heard footsteps coming, and, not wishing to see him in his present condition, I rose to retire to my room.

"Good night, dear lady!" said the count. "Remember me in your prayers, for I need them."

Some evenings after this, twilight found me in the beautiful garden of the castle, seated beneath a wide-spreading palm-tree, that threw far before me its blooming branches. From beneath this natural bower, lulled to repose by the beautiful scene before me, by the sweet, balmy air that played around me, and the glorious sky above me, I contemplated the landscape.

The sun went down behind a veil of heavy purple clouds, whose ragged edges were tinted with his parting rays; his smile dwelt lingeringly along the mountain's brow, as if he must, yet wished not to say farewell. The warm, oriental light illumined the summits of the trees, and showed forth more distinctly the tall gothic turrets of the castle. Part of the building remained in shadow, and the rising ground of terrace behind me concealed my view of the courtyard and its marble fountain.

The grounds, disposed in flower-beds of divers shapes and patterns, were thickly planted with exotic flowers, which, as if tired of their admiration of the god of day, now drooped their heads in mournfulness at his departure; the golden butterfly flew gaily from flower to flower, his purple and gold wings glittering in the glowing light;—the grasshopper hopped on the tall, thick grass; and the birds sang in the trees, carolling their love-notes so thrillingly, I almost envied them their joy. Their songs were the only voices of the hour, and in listening to them I felt soothed, consoled; sweeter, calmer thoughts came over me—etherealised feelings—and, leaning my head against the rough bark of the tree, I fell into a gentle slumber.

Cracking of brushwood, breaking of boughs, aroused me from my dreamy trance. I started, looked around;—I heard the sound of coming feet, and presently my husband emerged from the copse. The sun had disappeared, and the mellow dusk was gathering her dusky veil around me. Arousing myself from dreams, I spoke to him as he seated himself by me. He looked absorbed with melancholy pre-occupation, as was his wonted air of late; his dress was disordered.

"What an exquisite evening!" he observed; "how gloriously that sun declines along the hills!"

"Yes, it is indeed beautiful. I have been watching his departure for the last hour."

"I have been on a long hunt through the forest: some of the people said they thought they had discovered a boar's trail but I sought in vain—I found no traces of one."

"How can you like those boar-hunts—they are so dangerous?"

"They are exciting—I like excitements."

We mutually became silent, watching the clouds drifting across the sky, and the different hues of eve, as they blended into one. The air began to distil dew heavily. I rose, apprehensive that my health would be injured by exposure to it. As I rose upon my feet, a strange sensation came over me. Earth, air, mountains, clouds—all objects seemed to swim before my eyes. I felt as if falling, I knew not where, and, stretching out my hands for support, instinctively, I was received into my husband's arms, and lost to all consciousness.

When I recovered my senses, I found myself in my saloon, my husband and Pasiphae anxiously bending over me: my bodice was loosed, my hair undone. I gasped for breath, and, partly raising myself, leaned on some one's shoulder—it was Rinaldo's. Everything in the room seemed indistinct, confused.

"Dear lady, what ails thee? what has happened?" I heard poor Pasiphae say, as she bathed my face and rubbed my hands.

"Your mistress fainted as we sat in the garden together," was my husband's reply, rendered inarticulate by tears. He kissed me repeatedly, smoothed my hair, and manifested by his emotion the grief he felt, not only at my illness, but his own incomprehensible, cruel conduct.

When strong aromatics had thoroughly brought back to earth my truant senses, Pasiphae watched that night my fitful slumber, broken only by strange starts and convulsive movements that half affrighted her; my husband tenderly attended me. For days, they said, my life hung on a thread; and when exhausted nature resuscitated to life and health once more, I had a beautiful, a lovely boy!

My health for weeks after his birth continued delicate. I seldom left the room—that cherished infant, whose life had so nearly been purchased by my own, my constant companion. And Rinaldo was kinder in those days; if our old feelings were not renewed, at least our child turned a connecting tie; we seemed drawn more nearly to each other. Pasiphae manifested, at seeing the child, the joy of a child itself at seeing a new toy. She would carry the little thing in her arms, admire its undefined features, and playfully caress its tiny hands.

Count Malabrella, at my husband's urgent entreaty, prolonged his visit, and often came to pay his compliments. The charms of his conversation and manners won daily upon my esteem; I never could look upon that animated face, nor listen to that melodious voice, which distilled such noble thoughts, such chivalrous sentiments, without wishing that Rinaldo was more like him—that he did not desecrate to unworthy uses the abilities with which nature had endowed him. Time fled, and I again resumed my walks in the castle garden and on the terrace, in which Pasiphae sometimes followed me, bearing the child.

We named him Raphael: it was a fancy of his father's to bestow on the little one the name of the great painter. As day by day developed his senses, and he became conscious of the difference of persons, would extend his baby hands towards me, and weep if I left him, I realised in this love a mother's pride, a mother's joy; often when caressing him I imagined I saw him grown to manhood, noble in his principles, handsome in appearance, and that he would reward me by his tenderness and duty for all the mental anguish I should have to endure before that time came. When he pressed his little hands on my face, or tried to bite my finger, as infants do, I always kissed that sweet little mouth, and sometimes tears followed the kiss, and fell upon that face.

On one occasion, when I was passing through the corridor, on my way to take my daily promenade, the door of my husband's studio was suddenly thrown open, and the mysterious stranger who had accosted me before in that corridor, rushed violently past me, and disappeared down the marble staircase. The sight of that shrouded form inspired me with a vague foreboding of horror. I had never been able to gather from my husband the object of their frequent visits, and I often attributed his dejection and gloom to his communications with them.

"Who can that man be, Pasiphae? and what can he and his companions want with monsieur?"

"Indeed, my lady, I know not; they come very often, I know, and I dislike them much!"

"God grant they bring no ill-fortune here; but I feel as if contaminated by their vicinity!" I devoutly exclaimed, as we stepped from the oriel window out upon the terrace. We did not walk much that day—the wind blew hard; the infant gasped for breath, and hid his face on his nurse's shoulder: we went in.

The next day I was occupied in my apartment with my tapestry, when Guilo abruptly entered, without knocking, and, with a countenance pale and troubled, requested me to come immediately to his master—he wanted me. Laying aside my embroidery, I left Pasiphae with Raphael, and went. What was my amazement, when, entering the banquetting-hall, I found it filled with strange men, wearing the uniform of state-officers, and, seated in their midst, Monsieur de Serval and Count Malabrella; my husband affrighted and shrinking, the count self-collected and calm, as usual. I moved hastily towards my husband, and seated myself at his side—the officers making way for me as I passed them.

"What does this mean, Rinaldo? what do these men want?" I cried, seized with a strange presentiment that their presence in some way related to, or was concerned with, the visits of the mysterious strangers.

"Be composed, poor child!" replied Rinaldo. "I will tell you: I must leave here—I must go away!"

"Leave your castle—go away! Wherefore? for God's sake, explain!" I demanded, perfectly bewildered.

"It is a dreadful thing to tell—but it must be told! I am arrested by these men for high treason! They have come to take me before my sovereign! I am utterly ruined! My castle is no longer mine—I am a bankrupt!"

"Oh, God!" I exclaimed, as if struck by a sudden blow. I fell down upon my knees, burying my face in my hands. "It is but too true! I have suffered myself to be engaged in a piratical expedition against the government! It has been discovered—destroyed! and I am commanded to answer the charges laid against me. I am to leave here to-day, in company with these men!"

"Engaged in a piratical expedition against the government! to be arrested—perhaps imprisoned for life! and where are they to take you? Cannot I also go?"

"You go with me to ignominious disgrace!—to a prison's walls! Oh, no!—that cannot be! and yet you cannot stay here! This house will pass into other hands. I know not what to do with you—where to send you! I must return to Naples, but I do not wish you there, amid the general contempt, the disagreeable publicity that will attend me: no, you will be better off away. I want you to go to Baie: you can remain there until the issue of affairs is known; then, if favourable, you can come to me."

"I will obey you. I will go there, if you wish it! But tell me one thing, Rinaldo, I entreat you: are not those singular men who used to visit you, the cause of this?"

"Yes," said he, hesitatingly; "they are!"

"I knew it. I felt they came for no good purpose!"

"Gentlemen," said my husband, addressing the king's officers, "will you allow me a private conversation with my wife before I go?"

"Certainly, monsieur!" replied the principal of the officers; and with their officials they filed slowly from the apartment—the count, who had not spoken during our dialogue, following them with a dejected air. When the great door of the banqueting-hall shut heavily behind them, Rinaldo, as if overcome by this sudden, unlooked-for misfortune, threw his arms around me, and, weeping, kissed me!

"Genevra—my poor Genevra! we are about to separate, and, it may be, you will never see your unhappy husband again! I have not been to you the kind husband I should have been; my conduct has often been harsh and cruel! My love for you has been an enigma to myself! I have not acted rightly towards you; and now, a strange fatality—as unlooked-for as strange—is about to tear me from you and that dear child!"

Sighing, he kissed me again.

"Let the past be forgotten and forgiven!" I answered, as I folded my arms around his neck: "let it go; it is done—it is nothing—I have forgotten it—only let me accompany you now! Why should sorrow separate a wife from a husband? I can share imprisonment with you, and take Raphael with me! I fear not its isolation nor its gloom!"

"No, no! do I as wish! What could be more brutal than to inclose in prison walls a young woman and her child—shut out from God's air and human society! Go to Baie: you will not be far from me—you shall hear from me often! Perhaps this unfortunate affair will be happily ended: then, reunited, we will seek some new home—since this will no longer acknowledge me as a master—some sweet, quiet place, where our days shall be spent more happily than the best part of our married life has been!"

"But that prospect is far distant—perhaps it may never come! You may be convicted of high treason! Oh, heaven! you may be decapitated!"

"Well, if that is my fate, I shall meet it bravely! I am not afraid to die—let death come in what shape it will!" And he laughed recklessly. "No, Genevra—I fear no such catastrophe; I shall be able to clear myself: tremble not for me!"

"How unfortunate this has been—how disastrous for you to have embarked in this ill-omened business! Why did you do it?"

"Talk not of that which is past, Genevra," said he, with something of his former sternness; "but come with me; the officials wait. Let us bid each other farewell at the bed-side of my child!"

He took my hand in his: the officials stationed without the door respectfully made way for us. We ascended to our bed-chamber, where, slumbering in his oaken cradle, lay Raphael—his rosy hands crossed upon his bosom, which rose and fell with his gentle breathing; his long night-robe hung without the cradle, and the calm little face, so innocent, so passionless, expressed the unconscious happiness of infancy. A large lamp, the shade depressed, to shield the glare of light from his eyes, was on a table near; and his nurse sat by the cradle-side and watched him—her strongly-marked features of dusky hue, and fantastic dress, thrown strongly into relief by the effect of the lamp.

I sent her away, not wishing a witness of this scene; and my husband, kneeling by the cradle, gently took up the child in his arms, but did not awaken him—he still slept on. He looked at the babe long and wistfully: his very soul seemed gushing into his eyes as he contemplated the features of his son. He seemed looking forward into future years; he seemed inspired; he took one of the little hands in his, and kissed it: the child, with a slight start, withdrew it, and re-crossed his arms on his bosom.

"Sweet little lamb, as yet innocent of guile, pure as thy Maker: of such, if there is a heaven, should it be composed; sleep on, and mayst thou ever remain as innocent as now!"

His thoughts appeared too deep for words; he replaced the babe, laid its satin coverlid over it, and rose on his feet; once more he wistfully regarded it, then turned to me.

"Let us kiss each other; adieu here, Genevra. You had better not come down stairs again: those officials are rude sometimes, and I, being under arrest, cannot protect you against whatever they choose to say to you. Farewell! you shall hear from me soon; be comforted—you know your religion teaches you that out of much tribulation shall arise joy; be comforted, all is not lost."

But I would not be put off with that abrupt farewell. I went down with him into the lower hall, where, standing around on the marble floor, in various attitudes, were the king's functionaries. Count Malabrella had offered large sums of money to the chief, making himself responsible for Monsieur de Serval's appearance for his trial in any state they should name—but the men were inexorable. Their commands from government were to bring him in person to Naples. No influence, no money could shield him. The count was traversing the hall with hasty strides, and gloomy expression of countenance, his steps resounding as he walked: seeing me approach, on Rinaldo's arm, on which I leant heavily, he came towards us, endeavouring to conceal his uneasiness by a forced smile.

"This is a most singular affair. How came Alcantara to be detected?" he inquired, speaking in a low tone.

"The stupid fool had the imprudence to boast of what we were doing in the coffee-houses: some persons informed the government, which led to my exposure."

"I have been trying to persuade them to return alone, naming some day for your appearance, promising to come with you myself—but they will not consent: what is to be done, my friend?" he anxiously inquired, looking sorrowfully at Rinaldo.

"What is to be done? why I am to go, of course, my dear Alfieri. Don't be annoyed, don't be alarmed at this! you know I told you, weeks ago, I was prepared for the worst: all that troubles me is the welfare of my wife and child. This old castle, though partly ruinous, is still a home; but even this I am obliged to part with. I sold it some days ago to a friend, to raise money for this expedition; and that is also gone. She and the infant must leave here; I wish you to attend her to Baie, where she will be not far from Naples, and can hear from me often. Promise me to see her safely there to-morrow."

"I will do all that mortal man can do for Madame de Serval, you may be sure; whatever she wishes I will perform," said the count, with fervour.

"Thank the fates, then, I do not leave them friendless—utterly uncared for!" ejaculated Rinaldo.

The chief of the officers now came out of the banqueting-hall, and whispered to my husband.

"Very well," said he, in reply; "in an hour I shall be ready, if you wish it, to start."

"In an hour! are you going in an hour?" I cried. "Oh, cannot they stay till to-morrow? do make them stay till then!"

"To-morrow, child—to-morrow I shall be far away from you."

We three continued to walk up and down: I tearful, desponding; the count abstracted, silent; Rinaldo with a sort of affected reckless gaiety, assumed, doubtless, to conceal his real feelings. The men were sent away into the servants' hall, and what little luggage my husband was allowed to take with him brought down. I imagined I had a world of things to say in that hour, yet, when I went to speak, they escaped my recollection. I could think of nothing but the suddenness of this separation, and my own sad situation. The hour elapsed, it fled: the man came to summon Rinaldo, the carriage was ready, the luggage was placed behind, the officers got into their carriages, the chief came to escort my husband to his!

"I regret extremely that it should be my misfortune to convey such disagreeable tidings, and to be the cause of bringing sorrow to such a lady," said the man, politely raising his cap to me.

"It is not your fault; we excuse you; you merely act officially. If the carriage is ready, I am. Proceed, sir."

I walked with him to the courtyard, notwithstanding he cautioned me not to do so, saying I would catch cold. Four carriages contained the inferior men, and their principal occupied the same carriage with my husband. He did not kiss me farewell there before others, but, relinquishing my hand with stoical energy, he entered it with his companion, and closed the door. He shook hands convulsively with the count, who went round to the carriage window to bid him adieu. I did not move; I was riveted to the spot where I stood. The carriage started, it whirled through the avenue, it passed the lodge—it was gone, the others following it. When my eyes could no longer discern any traces of it—when I was fully convinced that it was reality—no dream, but reality—stern reality—I turned within the hall, went up stairs, fell upon my knees by the child's bed-side, laid my cheek by his, and wept bitterly.

CHAPTER XL.

REASON almost failed me, when I awoke the next day. I wandered into the banqueting-hall, calling for Rinaldo. The count followed me, entreated me to recollect myself, to bear misfortunes with calmness, with fortitude; asked what he could do for me. I answered not: I began to doubt my own identity. I only remembered distinctly that I was to leave that day, to go to Baie: everything else seemed blank, intangible.

I summoned Guilo to my salon, and told him that the castle was sold by my husband to another, who would come in a few days to claim it. I offered to pay his expenses to any city he chose to go, or he might stay in the vicinity of the castle, and endeavour to obtain employment of the new owner. He thanked me for my kindness to him, and said he preferred remaining. The other domestics were sent away; my household was broken up.

Pasiphae determined to accompany my precarious fortunes as the nurse of Raphael; and so all things being definitely arranged, Count Malabrella, myself, Pasiphae, and my beloved babe, started that afternoon for Baie. I, almost unconscious, allowed myself to be placed in the barouche, and, without looking back at those proud turrets and massive walls, within whose confines I had passed two years of alternate joy and grief, I was borne away. We rode all day. The count, anxious to beguile me from sad thoughts, conversed charmingly, but though ever agreeable and fascinating, yet my mind was too pre-occupied to listen, and the object so kindly intended failed of its purpose; nor did my melancholy abstraction cease, when, on the second day of our travel, we entered Baie.

Oh, Baie! classic, beautiful, time-honoured Baie! when again shall I revisit thy tranquil, lovely shores? when again shall I gaze upon thy pellucid waters, or roam over thy gentle, verdant hills, once the home of happy thousands—thrilling with life, hope, perhaps happiness—now silent, deserted; the seat of ruins, the abode of solitary peasants, who lead their flocks over the spot where once rose stately Roman villas, temples, theatres, and all the haunts of what was human vanity and life—all which have faded into fragments, into dust, leaving those few remains to tell that the tide of human life had once passed there.

"Why am I not also gone?" thought I, despondingly, as the barouche rolled over the smooth road, among the ruins. "Why do I still live on, unfortunate, unhappy? my husband arrested for high treason; myself and child alone and desolate; our home lost to us for ever! What has the future for me but disappointment, continued isolation; and my child, my Raphael! what is to become of him?"

The stopping of the carriage aroused me from my gloomy reflections. It paused at a small cottage kept as a place of accommodation for strangers. Tired, faint, and weary, I found myself in the parlour of this rustic abode, scarce knowing where I was. The apartments were comfortable and scrupulously clean, but in contrast to the elegant home I had just left, they appeared contemptible to me. An image of the Virgin stood in one corner, under it a crucifix; some pictures decorated the plastered walls, and flowers were trained to creep outside the latticed windows—a gaily-coloured parrot, in a gilded cage, mockingly imitated our words, repeating them after us in playful tones; the hostess, a peasant vintner's wife, came curtsying in to receive us, wearing a Neapolitan dress, which reminded me forcibly of Naples—the domestics of the castle wearing another style—embarrassed and awkward at the sight of one so far superior in worldly station. Ah! how far happier, if they did but know it, are those lowly ones of earth! how quiet, how untroubled by ambition are their lives! Very little envy is theirs; very little of those fierce hatreds we see in society! Calm, peaceful, obscure, they walk to their graves, seldom known, seldom wishing to be known—yet often tasting much real, substantial happiness.

The count explained that I wished apartments for myself, nurse, and child, and the woman left the room to prepare them.

"And you, my friend," I said to him—"you also are going to stay here?"

"Until to-morrow I shall have that honour," said he; "but after that I shall not have the pleasure of being near you."

"Oh!" I cried, "will you also desert me? Shall I be utterly alone?"

"Alone! oh, no! not all alone, with the companionship of your own sweet thoughts and your lovely child. Do not grieve; to meet to separate is the inevitable law of nature. Why should we cavil at that we cannot change? Existence is, as I have often told you, a play, a farce; do not let us be its most miserable actors. Your husband will doubtless be liberated soon. You will be restored to him; life will put forth new buds and blossoms from its giant tree. In his renewed affection you will find new joys; and I shall pursue my solitary travels, rejoicing at your happiness."

"But if you were not there, the measure of our joy would be incomplete. If what you predict comes to pass, will not you partake of our joy?"

"I! what shall I be to you, but a strange dream, associated with unhappy circumstances, disagreeable to your memory? I shall have been but the witness of one of those vicissitudes of fortune which always fall to the lot of the talented and beautiful. No! I had better be forgotten. To be forgotten! how mortifying is the reflection! Yet, has it not always been the law of destiny?"

"Do not philosophise now; let us be matter-of-fact. I thought, when my husband was so cruelly taken away, that you, who have always been so kind, would be spared me—at least for some time—till I should recover a little from this violent shock; but I am disappointed in this, as in all other things."

"Lady," said he, bending a piercing glance upon me from his expressive eyes, "the request you make would be as dangerous to myself (if granted) as it would be useless to you. The charms of your person, your judgment and talent, I appreciate to their fullest extent; and nothing could give me more delight than to revel in the sunshine of such presence; but that enjoyment would be as injurious to you as perfidious in me to my friend."

The sad tones of his voice and significant manner of expression, did not allow me to misunderstand him. In my careless innocence I never recollected the cruel interpretation malice would put upon such companionship.

"My departure," he continued, "will be all the more advantageous to you, since to-morrow I will proceed immediately to Naples, and, perhaps, through intercession with his majesty, be the means of liberating your husband. I shall, of course, see him immediately, wherever he is; and write you a description of affairs."

He became silent; and mechanically stroked my infant's cheek. The winter's wife came tripping into the room, saying she would attend me to the apartments; Paspahae, sad and quiet, preceded me, carrying Raphael; the count remained absorbed in thought. The rustic stairs were climbed, and with many low curtsies I was ushered into a large chamber, in which I noticed nothing but an immense fautuil, into which I sank mechanically, completely overpowered. After making numerous demonstrations of respect and duty, the hostess withdrew.

In the meantime, Raphael, who had slept nearly all the way from the Chateau of the Ravine, awoke from the slumber in which he had been wrapt all day, and looked inquiringly for me: I took him in my arms, and kissed him. The little one laid his tiny hands on my face, and raised his large eyes wistfully to mine. He was too young to miss his father, or know that father's fate—that unhappy, wayward man who now inhabited, perhaps, a prison's gloom; and as I childishly toyed with the ribbons of his dress, and watched the light and play of his features, I wished—oh! what does not a mother wish?

I did not go down stairs again that afternoon and evening; but I distinctly heard the footsteps of the count, as he continued to pace the floor of the lower room till a late hour: My own heart was the prey of contending emotions—of conflicting thoughts: Raphael fell asleep on my breast—his tiny hand clasped in mine—with an expression of conscious happiness on his smiling countenance. I fixed my gaze upon a crucifix which hung in a corner, and invoked to my support that invisible influence whom we worship in an earthly form; but, in spite of myself, other thoughts came stealing over me, and the recollections of the happy days of love and sunshine I had passed during the first part of my married life, were mingled with regrets at my husband's misfortunes.

(To be continued.)

FACETIÆ.

A farmer, when flagellating two of his unruly boys, was asked what he was doing. "Thrashing wild cats," was his reply.

The young lady who caught cold by drinking water from a damp tumbler, is convalescent.

"WHY is it," asked a Frenchman of a Switzer, "that you Swiss always fight for money, while we French fight only for honour?" "I suppose," answered the Switzer, "that each fight for what they most lack!"

LINES ON LINES.—A modern poet gives this axiom:

Curved is the line of Beauty,
Straight is the line of Duty;
Walk by the last, and thou wilt see
The other ever follow thee.

A gentleman travelling in Ireland, said to a very importunate beggar, "You have lost all your teeth." The beggar quickly answered, "Un, it's time I'd parted with 'um, when I'd nothing for 'um to do."

BLESSED is the woman whose husband has a wooden leg, as she will have but one stocking to knit.

WHEN should an innkeeper visit a foundry? When he wants a bar made (barnaid).

If you wish to collect together all the pretty girls in town, advertise a "Lecture to Young Men."

WHEN is money damp? When it is dew in the morning and mist at night.

WHAT islands ought to be good singers? The Canaries.

JONES asked a friend to go with him to church. "No," said the gentleman, "I'll send my wife—I never go to church except by the proxy." "Ah," said Jones, "I am afraid that people who worship God by proxy must expect to go to heaven the same way."

THE GARB OF NATURE.—In Spring, Nature puts on her newest livery, but, during the rain of Winter, generally appears in "slops."

VEGETARIANISM EXTRAORDINARY.—An enthusiast so detests the very name of animal food, that he refuses to partake of kidney beans.

NOTHING so much vexes a physician as to be sent for in great haste, and to find, after his arrival, that nothing, or next to nothing, is the matter with his patient. We remember an "urgent case" of this kind, recorded of an eminent English surgeon. He had been sent for by a gentleman who had just received a slight wound, and gave his servant orders to go home with all haste imaginable, and fetch a certain plaster. The patient, turning a little pale, said: "Heavens, sir! I hope there is no danger?" "Indeed there is," answered the surgeon; "for if the fellow doesn't run like a race-horse, the wound will be healed before he can possibly get back!"

DIRECTIONS FOR FAINTING.—Never faint when you are alone. Always select some good opportunity. The more persons there are about you, the more successful will be your fit. A friend's house, when there is a dinner or an evening party going on, is far from a bad opportunity. Never faint more than once in the same evening, as there may be a falling-off in the sympathy on the second experiment. A woman should not only faint well, but be above suspicion. Be very careful, therefore, never to risk a faint, unless you have some object in view, such as going out of town—or a new gown—or at a box at the Opera—or being taken to some fête—or any other little caprice which your husband may have obstinately refused you. In such cases hysterics are sometimes justifiable.

WARNING TO YOUNG LADIES.—Do not too soon pronounce your lover a duck, lest you should afterwards discover him to be a goose.

THAT monstrous tyrant, Henry VIII., was so little prone to shilly-shally; that he married his wives first, and axed them afterwards.

A Yankee has invented a new and cheap plan for boarding. One of the boarders mesmerises the rest, and then eats a hearty meal, the mesmerised being satisfied from sympathy.

A SNAKE HOOP.—An English sportsman, when in America, being one day in pursuit of game, observed a snake lashing about after a small animal, which he could not readily capture; it was near a declivity, of which the animal took advantage, and down hill he ran, beating his pursuer in speed to a distance. The snake's reserved power soon became conspicuous; by placing his tail in his mouth, and forming a perfect circle, down the hill he trundled; and, after a very extraordinary chase, captured his prey. The Englishman's astonishment was put forth in the first village he came to. Yankee told him "it was nothing new he had discovered; as a little boy, a few days ago, in our village," said Jonathan, "having picked up one, and mistaking it for a hoop, sported with it for some time, until the lad attempted to tie a few bells to his plaything; but the snake, not liking a rattle of music as an appendage, modestly thinking, no doubt, it would appear in imitation of one of a superior grade, and not pleased with the compliment intended, let slip his tail and glided away to the great regret and dismay of the astonished playmate."

HORSE-DEALING EXTRAORDINARY.—A novel case of horse-dealing came off at the Albion Hotel, in this city. The landlord (Mr. Gale) had a nag which attracted the attention of a horse-dealer, and negotiations were opened for its purchase. The animal, named Faugh-a-Ballagh, had done his late master good service, and so he demanded a considerable sum as the value of his steed; but the dealer, with the tenacity of bargaining peculiar to his calling, stuck to the offer which he had made, for a considerably less amount than that asked by the landlord. As a last resource, therefore, it was suggested that the horse should be sold by weight. This was assented to by both, and 5½d. a pound was the price agreed to. The horse was quickly put upon the scale, and ascertained to weigh 6 cwt. 3 qrs. 14 lbs., which, at 5½d. per pound, amounted to £17 12s. 11d. We understand that the value fixed upon the animal by its former owner was 20 guineas; so that he has rather lost by his odd deal. In the evening, the animal which had been disposed of in so droll a manner was taken up the steps at the front entrance to the house, into the smoking-room, and exhibited to the company.—Gloucestershire Chronicle.

DANIEL WEBSTER AND THE POACHERS.—He was once tramping over the Marshfield meadow, shooting ducks with Seth Peterson, when he encountered a couple of Boston sporting snobs, who happened to be in trouble just then about crossing a bog. Not knowing Mr. Webster, and believing him to be strong enough to help them over the water, they begged to be conveyed to a dry point upon his back. The request was of course complied with, and after the Cockneys had paid him a quarter of a dollar each for his trouble, they inquired if "Old Webster was at home," for as they had had poor luck in shooting, they would honour him with a call. Mr. Webster replied, "That the gentleman alluded to was not at home just then, but would be so soon as he could walk to the house;" and then added, that "he would be glad to see them at dinner." As may be presumed, the Cockneys were never seen to cross the threshold of "Old Webster."—Private Life of Daniel Webster, by Charles Lanman.

WHAT BECOMES OF ALL THE GOVERNESSES?

Isn't it strange, Nelly, but there doesn't appear to be a real governess in the world—I mean a governess who was really educated to be one. They are all governesses by accident. And yet we know there are many poor girls who are brought up young to the business, and intended for nothing else. I wonder what becomes of them? All I know is, that out of all the governesses we have here, there is only one who has received an education for it. That one is Twigg. All the others have been driven into it by necessity. I will run through our governesses, Nell, and you shall judge for yourself. Why, there's Blight. Her father kept his hounds, and it seems they ran through his property in no time. Then there's Snapp, she has danced at Almacks (so she says), and had her lady's maid—not an English one, but a real femme de chambre, direct from Paris. Our French governess has been just as unfortunate. She had chateaux innumerable in the south of France, and domains covered with the richest vines, olives, and truffes, only she lost them all during the revolution. The same with Fraulein Pinchinertz. One half the Danube would have been hers, if it hadn't been for the Hungarian war. And even down to poor Mrs. Dove; she would be a rich woman if her fool of a husband hadn't taken a theatre, and squandered all her fortune in less than a year. These reverses are very pitiable, dear; but I must say that, for ladies who have been accustomed in their youth to so much wealth and luxury, they have settled down to their present drudgery with the greatest ease and the happiest contentment. I am sure if I had ever a couple of powdered footmen standing up behind my carriage, that I could not have brought myself to wash and small-tooth-comb little girls in the unconcerned way they do, without a precious deal of grumbling.—Letter found at a Pastry Cook's.

WHO'S AFRAID?—Every one in a railway train has good cause to be.—Diogenes.

AUSTRALIAN CROTCHETS.—Some of the pianoforte-makers are said to be exceedingly busy in making instruments for exportation to Australia. Contrary to expectation, the plenitude of gold creates a great demand for notes.—Ibid.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.—There was a great fall of chalk from the Dover Cliffs on the 20th, and it is remarkable that on the same day the French funds went down at a rapid rate. The connection between chalk and credit is thus singularly impressed upon the public mind.—Ibid.

AN IMPORTANT OMISSION.—The American ladies taunt their English sisters with the number of working tailors in London that are underpaid. A master tailor begs us to remind them, that a great number of his fraternity are never paid at all.—Ibid.

THE GREATEST WORK OF FICTION OF THE DAY.—Bradshaw's Tales of the Trains.—Punch.

THE AUSTRALIAN BANKING SYSTEM.—The banks of the Australian Gold Fields are so constituted, that you draw money out of them with a scoop instead of a cheque.—Ibid.

THE THEATRICAL FRANCHISE.—The registration of a box costs as much as the registration of a vote, which makes the one privilege of a Briton as dear as the other.—Ibid.

AN ELECTRIC LADY.—The German papers give an account of an Austrian lady who is so charged with electricity, that sparks are constantly given out from her fingers' ends. It is seldom that a lady is found sending sparks away from her, though it is a common attribute of the sex to attract sparks, and even to twirl them round the finger with the utmost ease. We suspect that the account in the German papers is—like the electric lady herself—a little over-charged.—Ibid.

A BURNING SHAME.—The City of London Coal Tax.—Ibid.

A CAPTAIN BOLD.—A certain Captain Henry Hugh Clayton has greatly distinguished himself by caning a housemaid; because the aforesaid maid would not listen to the advantageous offers—as no doubt he considered them—of the man of valour. She spurned him, and the warrior caned her. Well, for this caning Mr. Long, the magistrate, fined the captain 50s: a mere trifle, for the hero—as it appeared—was perfectly ready to pay fifty pounds. We are not aware whether the prowess of the captain will be duly gazetted; but, any way, it ought to be marked in some very especial manner. We suppose he cannot be made a K.C.B.: but, nevertheless, he ought to be distinguished. We think it clear that the warrior who canes an honest housemaid ought himself to receive the Order of the Broomstick.—Ibid.

LONG RANGE FOR THE PEACE SOCIETY.

A scheme has been submitted to us for the pacific conquest of despotism throughout Europe.

This great victory over persecution and tyranny it is proposed to achieve by means of an intellectual Long Range.

Balloons are to be provided, each carrying a bale of books, to be detached and dropped, at a certain distance, by means of a match calculated to burn accordingly. Each mass of information is to be connected with a parachute, that it may fall gently, and not break any of those heads it is destined to benefit.

The books shall consist of various enlightened periodicals—besides the principal one—newspapers, works on natural science, metaphysics, history, moral philosophy, and, in general, such volumes as are interdicted on the continent on account of their truth—including Bibles.

To make sure of dropping the books in the right place, an extensive series of meteorological observations will be instituted, to ascertain at any given time how the wind blows. The only difficulty likely to be encountered will consist in raising the wind.

It is hoped the Peace Society will patronise this grand project, whereby it is designed to reduce tyrants and bigots to reason, or bring them to book, by a peaceful bombardment with shells loaded with useful knowledge: exploding only to demolish falsehood and nonsense. If human liberty can be vindicated by such means, we so far agree with our friends above-mentioned, as to be inclined to resort to them in preference to ordinary bombs, and other appliances for sweeping oppressors from the face of the earth.—Ibid.

THE WIZARD AND THE SHERIFF'S OFFICER.

EVEN the conjuror's trick has to give way before the practical little device of the sheriff's execution recently applied to the effects of a bankrupt "Wizard of the World," at Chicago, United States. In the hurry of departure he unluckily left at the depot a couple of large boxes, which the creditors of his wizardship immediately pounced upon, and which were found to contain the implements of his trade. Still more unluckily for professors of diablerie, the articles revealed the modus operandi of their business—showing how it is done and how it isn't. The most cumbersome article of this "stock-in-trade" is the large copper kettle, in which Doctor Faustus and the Devil were wont to boil their dinners. The kettle is suspended before the audience, and into it are thrown several pailful of water which is suddenly converted into solid ice, or mysteriously metamorphosed into half a dozen pigeons, rabbits, &c., which, on removing the cover, hurry away in every direction. This is the silliest jugglery in the world, to such as can perceive that this mysterious kettle is made with double sides, with a vacancy between them into which the Water passes, and thence is drawn upward through the ball and suspending rods, which are hollow, and passes off in the manner of a syphon to a tub below the stage. The cover is sufficiently large to contain the birds and rabbits, which, by turning the knob of the cover, are let down, together with the separatrix that concealed them, into the kettle. The celebrated "bottle feats" of pouring a great variety of wines and liquors from a common glass bottle is no less simple, and, when understood, no less silly than the foregoing. The "common glass bottle," borrowed from the audience, is of course not the one used on such occasions, but is exchanged for another, made of jappaned tin, and furnished internally with receptacles for the different kinds of liquor. Each receptacle has a valve, and these valves may be opened or closed at pleasure, by stops on the outside of the bottle, arranged for the fingers like the keys of a musical instrument. The compartments having no connection with the mouth of the bottle, except by the valves, the bottle may at any time be rinsed with water, and more liquor poured out. There are a couple of these "inexhaustible bottles" in the "present collection," both of which are soon to be sold to the highest bidder.

INQUIRING BOY.—"Father, it speaks here about illuminated manuscripts. What were they lighted with?" The father hesitated, and when the question was repeated, answered desperately: "With the light of other days, my son!"

INQUISITORIAL ENACTMENT.—In some countries a stocking is looked upon as the family bank. In France, however, the Emperor has resolved for the future to see what the stockings of each of his visitors contain!—Diogenes.

NOTHING NEW.—An invention has been advertised as a new application, by which is substituted for corks "a more convenient and equally secure method of closing bottles." The invention is explained thus: "A machine has been patented, which makes the thread of a screw outside the neck of a bottle manufactured." The inventor says: "For years the thing has been attempted, but unsuccessfully." We differ from him quite. The "screw" principle has already gone so far, that our bottles are almost closed entirely.—Ibid.

IMPORTANT TO HOUSEKEEPERS.—The following announcement has just met our eye: "Burglary prevented for half-a-crown." This certainly is a step in the right direction; for hitherto the Crown has not been able to prevent the crime specified; although, indeed, it may be said, that in such cases the policeman's crown has rarely been proffered at the right time.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

LOVE one human being purely and warmly, and you will love all. The heart in this heaven, like the wandering sun, sees nothing from the dew-drop to the ocean but a mirror which it warms and fills.

The love of ruling and the love of accumulating are the two furies which torment mankind beyond all others.

OLD AGE.—Beautiful is old age—beautiful as the slow-dropping, mellow autumn of a rich, glorious summer. In the old man, nature has fulfilled her work: she loads him with her blessings; she fills him with the fruit of a well-spent life; and, surrounded by his children and his children's children, she rocks him softly away to a grave, to which he is followed with blessing. God forbid we should not call it beautiful! It is beautiful; but certainly not the most beautiful. There is another life, hard, rough, and thorny, trodden with bleeding feet and aching brow—the life of which the Cross is the symbol: a battle which no peace follows this side of the grave—which the grave gasps to finish before the victory is won; and, strange that it should be so, this is the highest life of man. Look back along the great names of history: there is none whose life has been other than this.

Oh! never let us lightly fling
A barb of woe to wound another;
Oh! let us never haste to bring
The cup of sorrow to a brother.
Each has the power to wound, but he
Who wounds that he may witness pain,
Has learnt no law of charity,
Which ne'er inflicts a pang in vain.
'Tis god-like to awaken joy,
Or sorrow's influence to subdue;
But not to wound nor to annoy,
Is part of virtue's lesson, too.
Peace, winged in fairer worlds above,
Shall bend her down and brighten this;
When all man's labour shall be love,
And all his thoughts a brother's bliss.

By contemplating beauty, the character becomes beautiful; and in this wearisome world, I deem it a duty to speak genial words and wear cheerful looks.

Wit is brushwood, judgment is timber; the first makes the brightest flame, but the other gives the most lasting heat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The following countries use postage-stamps for the prepayment of letters, viz.: England, France, America, Portugal, Rome, Wurtemberg, Canada, and New South Wales.

In some parts of the country, owing to the late rains, wells which have been dry for forty years are now filled and running over with water from springs.

GREAT CITIES.—The area of Babylon was 225 square miles, that of Nineveh 216 square miles; while that of London and its environs is but 114 square miles.

PRESENCE OF MIND.—Many years ago, Mr. John Amos, one of the oldest settlers in Swan Port, whilst ploughing, with his feet bare, accidentally trod upon a large black snake, close to its head. With admirable and surprising presence of mind, knowing that it could not hurt him while in that position, he let go hold of the plough and stood fast, whilst the reptile twined itself tightly round his leg, and struggled to get away; but he held on stoutly until a knife could be brought to cut off the snake's head, and free him from a situation which very few would have nerve enough to endure, notwithstanding the prudence of doing so.—Mrs. Meredith's "My Home in Tasmania."

A WHITE CROW.—A gentleman from Augusta, who has taken up his residence in Portland, brought with him the stuffed and mounted skin of a crow, purely white. He took two of the kind, with one black one, from the same nest, near Augusta, and kept them alive for awhile, when they suddenly died—he supposed from something poisonous which they had eaten—and he had this one stuffed.

BRAMHAM MOOR.—Upon the middle of this moor a man may see ten miles around him. Within those ten miles there is as much freestone as would build ten cities, each as large as York. Within those ten miles there is as much good oak timber as would build those ten cities; there is as much limestone and coals to burn into lime as the building of those ten cities would require; and there is also as much clay, and land, and coals to burn them into bricks and tiles, as would build those ten cities. Within those ten miles there are two iron forges, sufficient to furnish iron for the building of those ten cities, and 10,000 tons to spare. Within those ten miles there is sufficient lead for the ten cities, and 10,000 fadders to spare. Within those ten miles there is a good coal seam, sufficient to furnish those ten cities with firing for 10,000 years. Within those ten miles there are three navigable rivers, from any of which a man may take shipping and sail to any part of the world. Within those ten miles there are 70 gentlemen's houses, all keeping coaches, and the least of them an esquire, and ten parks and forests well stocked with deer. Within those ten miles there are ten market towns, one of which may be supposed to return £10,000 per week.—An Old Writer. [Is there another spot in the kingdom of which as much may be said?]

SHOCKING SUPERSTITION.—A short time ago a respectable looking man, with an elderly female on his arm, accosted a person in Castle Street, requesting to be shown the whereabouts of a celebrated fortune-teller, notorious in the purlieus of that street as one of the most wretched of its inhabitants. On being asked what was his intention in visiting the spawwife, he very plainly intimated that he had come from his farm in the neighbourhood of Montrose, where one of his men had been robbed of a sum of money, supposed to be perpetrated by a fellow-servant. The person accosted, of course, could hardly repress his feelings, but as the individual was known to him, and having a desire to satisfy a gentleman, he went with him to the croon, who readily consented to denounce the delinquent; but first of all requested her palm to be crossed with half-a-guinea. She then began to ask a variety of questions—as, where was the money placed? when was it stolen? and how? To all the interrogations, the gentleman promptly replied—and, in addition, whispered the name of the suspected party. The "spawwife" retired to a closet for a few minutes, and, on returning, told the gentleman that the suspected person had the money. He no sooner received this intelligence than he hid homewards in a twinkling, and (will it be credited?) immediately charged the suspected person with the robbery; but, greatly to the chagrin of the credulous gentleman, he was informed that, in his absence, the money had been found in the servant's over-coat, which had been overlooked in the previous search.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.—A rich farmer, named Denel, of Champigny-les-Saint-Maur, near Paris, was lately walking in one of his fields near a wood, when all at once the earth gave way beneath his feet, and he fell in. He uttered a loud cry before disappearing, and three labourers who were near hastened to the spot. But as they saw the earth falling in for a considerable distance, they were afraid to attempt to render any assistance. A gendarme, who was passing, hastened to the spot, and, in spite of danger, seized a spade, and began digging to get at the man. His example encouraged the labourers, and they aided him, as did also some persons who came up. But though they worked hard, it was three hours before they reached the unfortunate man, and he was quite dead. The falling of the earth was caused by the recent heavy rains having soaked to a great depth, and then filtered to a stone quarry at a short distance.

THE LARGEST ORGAN IN THE WORLD.—At St. George's Hall, Liverpool, they are erecting the largest organ in the world. Mr. Willis has sent down a considerable portion of the frame-work of the organ, with the bellows, wind-chests, and a portion of the pipes. The committee are about contracting for the case and platform, which will cost together about £3000. The bellows will be worked by a steam-engine, having two 8-inch oscillating cylinders turning a crank, but without a fly-wheel, that the power may be more under rapid control. This is probably the first application of steam-power to the production of music on record, except the frightful railway whistle, suggestive of a train of thought of a very different nature. The organ will be the largest in the world—some think too large.

WET SEASON IN 1348.—Accidentally looking into Holinshed some time ago, I found that our present unusually wet season is not without a parallel—indeed, much exceeded; as, on that occasion, the harvest must have been a complete failure, and dearth and disease consequently ensued. Providence, however, has kindly blessed us with an average harvest; and, exclusive of the disasters attendant upon storms and floods, I trust we shall escape any further visitation. I annex an extract of the passage in Holinshed: "In this 22d year [of Edward III., A.D. 1348], from Midsummer to Christmase, for the more part it continually rained, so that there was not one day and night drie together, by reason wherof great floods insued, and the ground therewith was sore corrupted, and manie inconueniences insued, as great sickenes, and other, inso-much that in the years following, in France, the people died wonderfullie in diverse places. In Italie, also, and in manie other countries, as well in the lands of the infidels as in Christendome, this grievous mortalitie reigned, to the great destruction of people. About the end of August, the like dearth began in diuerse places of England, and especiallie in London, continuing so for the space of twelve moneths following. And vpon that insued great barrennesse, as well of the sea as the land, neither of them yielding such plentie of things as before they had done. Wherevpon vittels and corne became scant and hard to come by."—Notes and Queries.

CHINA FOWLS PRESENTED TO THE QUEEN.—By a late steamer from the United States, a cage of very choice domestic fowls was brought to her Majesty, Queen Victoria, a present from George P. Burnham, Esq., of Boston, Mass. The consignment embraced nine beautiful birds—two males and seven pullets, bred from stock imported by Mr. Burnham direct from China. The fowls are seven and eight months old, but are of mammoth proportions and exquisite plumage—light, silvery-grey bodies, approaching white, delicately traced and pencilled with black upon the neck-hackles and tips of the wings and tails. The parent stock of these extraordinary fowls weigh at maturity upwards of twenty-three pounds the pair; while their form, notwithstanding this great weight, is unexceptionable. They possess all the rotundity and beauty of the Dorking fowl; and, at the same age, nearly double the weight of the latter. They are denominated Grey Shanghaes (in contradistinction to the Red or Yellow Shanghaes), and are considered, in America, the finest of all the great Chinese varieties. That they are a distinct race, is evident from the accuracy with which they breed, and the very close similarity that is shown amongst them; the whole of these birds being almost precisely alike, in form, plumage, and general characteristics. They are said to be the most prolific of all the Chinese fowls. At the time of their shipment these birds weighed about twenty pounds the pair.

A WILD BOY.—There is a singular exhibition in Philadelphia, which is perhaps worth the attention of Barnum. It is described as a "wild boy;" he is double-jointed; goes on all fours; sees with the whole pupil of his eye; lives on bread and water alone; possesses great strength in his arms and legs, although no muscles are discernible. He has been examined by a great number of medical gentlemen, and the reason they give of his not walking erect is, that his heart lies directly in the centre of his body, which compels him to move both hands or both legs at the same time. He has no articulation of sounds, but speaks without moving his lips or tongue. He measures when standing erect thirty-three inches, and weighs twenty-seven pounds.

THE REAL SEA-SERPENT.—Some evenings since, when the tide was high, and a gale blowing, there was cast ashore at Torduff Point, parish of Grainetay, a large tree, which was at the time mistaken for some monster of the deep, and may have led some who saw it in far distant latitudes to believe that it was, in verity, the mysterious sea-serpent himself. The tree is thirty-eight feet in length, and at its thickest part six feet in circumference, and is estimated to weigh about five tons. The huge roots are still attached to the trunk, and from one end to the other the tree was covered with sea-weed from one to two feet long, while adhering to the end of each strip is a shell-fish. The sea-weed was thrown round the tree, as it rose and fell with the waves, like a flowing mane; the shells made a rattling noise against each other; and as the roots now sank under water, now rose above the waves, there is little wonder that the vegetable was taken for some huge production of the animal kingdom.—Dumfries Courier.

A GOOD RULE.—A man who is very rich now was very poor when he was a boy. When asked how he got his riches, he replied, "My father taught me never to play till my work was finished, and never to spend my money until I had earned it. If I had but an hour's work in a day, I must do that the first thing, and in an hour. And after this I was allowed to play; and I then could play with much more pleasure than if I had the thought of an unfinished task before my mind. I early formed the habit of doing everything in time, and it soon became perfectly easy to do so. It is to this I owe my prosperity." Let every boy who reads this go and do likewise.

TAKE MY HORSES, TAKE MY MEN.—When Messrs. Smith, the distillers, were requested to lend the twelve horses from their stud to draw the funeral car of the late Duke of Wellington, they at once consented, but added, "You must have our men with them." "No," was the reply. "Well," said Messrs. Smith, "see what you can do with the horses before you take them." Accordingly, the men who were to take them away did their utmost, but the horses knew nothing about the noises which were expected to have effect upon them; whereupon their own drivers came forward and showed that the monstrous steeds would do just what they told them. So the carmen received a new suit of clothes and two guineas per man, to attend the horses that day.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WILLIAM JOHNSON.—After the lapse of twenty years, a legacy is not recoverable.

C. G. B.—Marriage with a deceased wife's sister is not lawful in England or any part of the United Kingdom. The law in this instance is injudicious, and opposed to scripture reason and expediency.

IVANHOE.—When a wedding party walks to church, the bride should be conducted by the bridegroom. This is the etiquette we have always seen observed, and very proper it is, too—for who is more fitting to escort the future wife than the future husband?

ROMEO informs "Joe Beans" how he may assist a lady to dismount from her horse. After releasing the lady's foot from the stirrup, you ought to make a rest for it with your left hand, pass your right round her waist, and, with her leaning on your shoulder, gently lower her to the ground.

WILL NEWTON.—The salaries of law clerks in the metropolis average from £50 to £500 per annum.

R. W. G.—Stationers may charge a per centage on the postage-stamps they sell; but when stamps are sold at the cost price at the post-offices, the public has only itself to blame for its patronage of the stationers, who, like every other class of tradesmen, must have a profit on the articles they vend.

LUCY BEAUMONT.—The Lancers, being a set of French quadrilles, La Fontaine is the best authority. Promenade means a gentle walk to slow time; gallopade a quick movement—in fact, a furious race to quick music.

KLEBER.—Two-pence divided among three persons, would give to each a halfpenny and two-thirds of a farthing.

W. P.—The consumption of tobacco is indirectly an encouragement of the slave-trade. But the same may be said of coffee, rice, and cotton. Slavery is one of the curses of this world, and it can only be removed by the growth of a new intelligence, and the creation of fresh material conditions. Slavery in England died a natural death—it never was abolished, either by the crown, the parliament, or the church; and that is the only probable termination we can see to slavery in America. In another century the beginning of the end will be discerned.

E. G.—We do not think it foolish to give publicity to every new invention in war, for the more the means of destruction are multiplied or rendered more certain, the less chance there will be of war. Gunpowder, by making wars less protracted, has saved hundreds of thousands of lives, and so has proved a material promoter of modern civilisation. When more formidable forces are brought into requisition, war will cease altogether.

PRINTED.—Recruits for the Life Guards must be young men of good character, at least six feet in height, and proportionably stout in figure.

ALBION.—A widow leaves a will properly attested, but one of the legatees having misconducted herself, the testator wishes to revoke her legacy without giving the trouble of making a new will. She has added a codicil, but has not thought it necessary to have the same witnessed. The alteration would be null and void; for a codicil, to have effect, must be executed with the same formality as a will itself. No portion of a will is revoked by any presumption of an intention to revoke or alter it on the ground of altered circumstances or change in intention.

UNCLE TOM.—The act for embodying the militia does not extend to either Scotland or Ireland.

DOLLY VARDEN.—In filling a decayed tooth with gold-leaf or tin-foil, the only preparation required is to cleanse the cavity of the tooth of all impurities, and remove from it every particle of moisture.

J. MARTIN.—The title of emperor is higher than that of king. It means authority over several countries—king refers to rule in one country merely.

A. B. C.—In pronouncing the letter "G," the tongue should touch the roof of the mouth. Dr. Johnson was quite correct in stating so.

IVYSTER.—The Earl of Aberdeen did not marry his deceased wife's sister, but the latter's sister-in-law, the widow of her brother, Viscount Hamilton.

J. M. R.—The Rev. Doctor L., late Professor of Trinity College, Dublin, happened one day to overhear one of the students in the act of swearing at something that crossed his temper. The Dr., who was a strict disciplinarian of college rules and morals, severely lectured the student on the heinousness of his sin, and in conclusion told him such practices would send his soul to perdition; adding, with ludicrous emphasis, "and more than that, sir, you will be fined by the board."

E. H.—A father dies intestate, leaving a second wife, and a son and daughter by a former marriage. The freehold property would go to the son, and the personal property, including leaseholds, would be divided between the widow and the son and daughter, the widow taking a third, and the son and daughter two-thirds between them.

NORRIS.—You are one of that large class who seek happiness in the wrong direction, and, not finding it, waste their powers in the cultivation of those high aspirations, which their peculiar temperaments, or the combinations of peculiar circumstances, render impossible to be realised, and because they have tasted the bitterness of failure, they turn even former pleasures into present sorrows; and a cultivated intellect, which should be the kindest of nurses, they teach to envy the past, slander the present, and create distrust of the future. This is a lamentable weakness, and if you go on as you have commenced, your heart in time will be a Dead Sea apple—filled with ashes. Turn to some profitable pursuit, and because profitable, useful and elevating.

IGNORANT.—The personal property of a father dying intestate, and leaving a second wife, and a son and daughter by a previous marriage, would be divided as follows: one-third to the widow, and the remaining two-thirds to the children, equally. We may add, that if the father died intestate within the province of York, or was a resident freeman of the City of London, the division would be—one-third to the widow, one-third to the children equally, and one-third between the wife and children in the same proportions as if the deceased had not been a freeman of the City of London, or resident within the province of York.

DOUBTFUL asks whether the soul of man is a material body or an immateriality. Should it be material, he argues, he cannot conceive how it can be immortal; and if immaterial, how it should exist at all save as the phenomenon termed life, which depends on organisation for its appearance. For matter, however subtle, is still matter, and therefore subject to the same natural operations that entirely change the aspect of the most durable material forms. Do we know of any quintessence, however fine, that may be said to constitute a medium between existence and non-existence—any link to unite that which is with that which is not? Such inquiries are the result of vain speculation, and a daring repudiation of revelation. Draw, in his inimitable treatise on "The Immortality of the Soul," settles this question, as far as it can be settled by human argument; and we will only remark, that if from the manifold proofs of design in the world, we infer the existence of a designer, it is very easy for the mind to admit that the highest intelligence known on earth could scarcely be limited to a present existence. Nothing is created in vain, and we will refer you to Dr. Cumming's "Sermon on God in Science," for a consoling exposition of the most solemn of mysteries; also to Dr. Croly's Sermons, Paley's "Natural Theology," and the "Bridgewater Treatises."

LILLY M.—There would be no impropriety in your marrying the son of your stepmother.

UN HOMME.—All taxes, with the exception of the Property Tax and a third of the Sewers' Rates, fall upon the tenant.

ALEXIS.—The share classic literature had in creating a good taste in Europe, has been very much overrated. What has been called the revival of letters in the west, cannot be attributed to the influence of the few Greek scholars who fled from the sword of the Turks after the fall of the Eastern empire. The Greeks were not more enlightened than the other nations of Europe. They who could write and they who could read with pleasure such works as the "Meadow," and the "Ladder of Paradise," could not with justice reproach their western neighbours with any deficiency of taste. Knowledge, indeed, became more common, a disposition to read was more generally spread throughout Europe, immediately after the taking of Constantinople; but that circumstance had nothing to do with such a state of things. The invention of printing—by rendering books more common, by bringing them within the reach of a greater number of readers—readily brought about the change. When the difficulty of reading was removed, men soon found out its pleasure. This important discovery had preceded the fall of the Caesars. The same year that saw the standard of the Prophet waving on the walls of Constantinople, beheld a splendid edition of the "Psalter" issue from the presses of Mentz. But it is useless to heap up facts in refutation of the theory. The present age knows full well that mere learning is only the mechanism of intellect, and can no more claim the merit of genius than the steam-engine can the hand and head that sets it in motion. Had the Turks never crossed the Bosphorus and driven away a horde of idle bookworms, knowledge in the west would not have progressed less rapidly.

PARVO.—The maxim may be carried beyond its meaning. "Trust in Providence!" Very well. We all trust in Providence—we could not get on at all without trusting to Providence—our very life is a continual trust in Providence; but, in material matters, we should discard the tradition of a clouded age of thought, and go at once to the fountain-head of interpretation. What does the text, that every one ought to read, say? "If any man provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath not the faith, and is worse than an infidel." The Rev. Dr. Cook has vigorously commented on this view of "trusting to Providence." "What right," said he, "has any man to trust to Providence to do for him, directly, or through the mediation of others, what it has enabled him to do for himself? The wisdom and goodness of Providence appear in giving him this power, and placing him in circumstances in which he can exercise it. Not trust in Providence, but disregard of Providence, and of its plain and manifest design, is shown by neglecting to use that power. Would a man show his trust in Providence by entertaining the expectation that though he neither ploughed nor sowed, somehow a crop might spring up, which he should be permitted to reap? Is not the right trust shown, by ploughing and sowing, planting and watering, and then, after all, looking to Providence for the increase?"

DOCTOR ORME has been for these nine months past paying his addresses to a young lady, who informs him that she does not intend to keep company with any gentleman above twelve months. He has entirely dependent upon him an aged parent, and could not possibly afford to be married in so short a time. We suspect the lady is a quizz. But should she be in earnest, the loss of her won't be overwhelming. A man cannot be called upon to sacrifice his earliest affection and bounden duty, to gratify either the ardour or coquetry of any woman.

EDWARD HIND.—Although slightly defective, we admire your song very much, and willingly publish it.

SHE passed by me slowly, in beauty so fair,
Ah, would that I gazed on its loveliness now!
With her blue merry eye, and her bright, satin hair,
And the soul of an angel express'd on her brow;
I raved to the winds as I roamed in the shade,
Oh, to be but the greensward she moves o'er! how sweet
To be press'd by the steps of that beautiful maid,
Sighing forth my pleasure in flowers at her feet.

As lovely as virtue her beautiful face;
As tender as pity her delicate form;
My heart brighten'd up in the glance of its grace,
Like a cloud thro' which passes the bow of the storm;
Sigh, my harp, to the winds, as I rest in the shade,
Oh, to be but the greensward she moves o'er! how sweet
To be press'd by the steps of that beautiful maid,
Sighing forth my pleasure in flowers at her feet.

Alas! she is gone from my vision. No more
Do I see that sweet face where all charms were contained;
And remembrance alone can but feebly restore,
The beautiful being their excellence shrined.
Sigh, my harp, to the winds, as I rest in the shade,
Oh, to be but the greensward she moves o'er! how sweet
To be press'd by the feet of that beautiful maid,
Sighing forth my pleasure in flowers at her feet.

REGINALD KEMP inquires how it is that all our lady correspondents, with but rare exceptions, have so great a prepossession in favour of tall young men. R. K. is only five feet six inches in height, and must confess that he often feels inclined, when perusing the page set apart for correspondents, to tear it off and commit it to the flames. Let it be hoped that the incessant demand for tall gentlemen will very soon tell in his favour, as it can hardly be possible that many can remain to supply the extraordinary requirements of the times.

LIZZY, having been jilted by a man she never loved, but whom she would have married rather than have broken her word, now finds she really is in love with another gentleman, who has not the slightest idea of her strong partiality, but she fancies he has a secret regard for her. What shall she do? Why, penance, to be sure. Her want of principle in the first engagement deserves some punishment, and as the loss of the man she never liked is no punishment at all, she must wait a wee while. After Cupid has sufficiently revenged the slight cast on his mission, he will bring Lizzy's dear ideal to her feet.

PECULIAR.—We have not much respect for the time-honoured and solemn ceremony of petitioning for anything either to a legislative or less august body—for the thing asked for is never granted, unless conceded to some strong necessity. Forms are essential, and should be respected, but formal precedents are not vital principles. And we would ask, did the barons, who extorted the Magna Charta from King John, petition? Did Henry VIII. humbly request the Pope to relieve this country from the usurpations of the Romish Church? Did Elizabeth go down upon her sovereign knees and piteously ask the Spanish Armada not to approach these shores? Did the Commons, after they had discovered the utter faithlessness of the man, ever beg of Charles I. that he would have a greater regard for his royal word? Did England petition James II., or William III., or the Jacobites, or the Pretender? Did the United States of America obtain their independence by pen-and-ink appeals to George III.? We might enumerate many modern instances to prove that the fact has been made sufficiently apparent—that the memorialisation process has had little to do in bringing about great changes. Still it is a respectable preliminary, and will always keep its ground among a people whose intelligence keeps pace with their material developments.

W. EVANS.—The merit of introducing Christianity into England, has been attributed to St. Augustine; but it is a received opinion among learned men, that St. Paul himself preached the Gospel in Britain.

OXFORDIAN would be happy to correspond with "Aggie." He is twenty-five years of age, is rather tall, and has striking features. He has an income varying from £350 to £450 per annum. He is thoroughly tired of a single life, and perfectly coincides in the opinion, that a bachelor is an inconsistency.

J. M. thinks she would suit "Constant;" her parents are considered to be worth money. She is eighteen, fair, with brown hair, rather short in stature, but animated, and considered rather a good housekeeper by a very fidgetty brother.

W. A. is anxious to meet with an affectionate and domesticated partner, and thinks "Edith" would suit him. He is a physician, thirty-two years of age, considered good-looking and of gentlemanly manners; has seen much of foreign countries, and is in comfortable circumstances.

ALICE EVELINE to THEODORE AUGUSTUS.

DEAR sir, I'm tired of a single life,
And though I fear perhaps you'll think me bold;
Still, as I learn you're wishing for a wife,
In spite of blushes shall the truth be told:

I am an English maiden of nineteen,
Soft, azure eyes; complexion very fair;
And my high forehead, placid and serene,
Is shaded by long curls of anuburn hair.

With deep affection doth my heart o'erflow—
A heart that ne'er before has bowed to love;
But how I long my constant truth to show,
To one dear object cherished all above.

I have not wealth, it must not be denied,
He will not marry me who weds for pelf;
But sure, a youthful, gentle, loving bride,
Must always be a treasure in herself.

In some accomplishments I do excel,
In manners quiet, but distinguished, too;
Speak French, dance, sing, play, the piano well;
Sir, I have sketched myself, shall I suit you?

L. E. L. is struck by the remark that "J. B." wants a wife of "genuine worth;" she therefore concludes he is a man of sense, who is seeking for happiness of the higher sort, and not mere beauty, which fades as a dream. She would therefore be happy to correspond with him. She is the daughter of a very eminent member of the legal profession, is twenty-two years of age, rather short, with dark hair and eyes, and has been termed a pretty brunette, of a lively temperament, kind-hearted, affectionate, and longs for a husband whom she could love with all the depth of a profound attachment.

EVA, feeling interested to save "W. A. M." from the miseries of a bachelor life, begs to say she is twenty-two, about the middle height, with dark hair and eyes. Having received a good education, she flatters herself she would make a good wife. She is of a lively disposition, and would make home happy.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—John Atherton (Work harder and think less about your "rights," as you call them)—G. C. M. (You must abide by the agreement)—A Carpenter (The name is of English origin. See the derivations given by Dr. Johnson)—Yak (No such street in London)—W. B. (Eclat is pronounced something like "a-claw")—M. R. S. (You will be free at twenty-one)—J. E. T. (You are incomprehensible)—Puck (Apply at the company's offices)—W. J. F. (Our authority for the statement was one of the largest iron-masters in Staffordshire)—S. Early (The only guarantee for the security of a Savings' Bank, is the character of the trustees and respectability of the officers)—Old Banbury (The seven-shilling pieces were a gold coinage)—Roy (The recommendation of your friend would be sufficient)—John Peters (Liverpool is a parish by itself, and does not form part of any other of parishes, as regards the operation of the Poor Laws)—Aquarius (At the same place)—Florence Howard (Don't marry yet. It would be too great a risk, for the marriage would be illegal, and you would only have your brother-in-law's sense of honour to look to)—W. L. (Lists of bankrupts are kept in the Bankruptcy Court, London)—G. M. F. G. (Dead, buried, and forgotten long ago)—G. W. B. ("Gideon Giles" was published in Vols. VII. and VIII. of this Journal. The price of each volume is 6s.)—B. Allen (The salary of a good violin player at a first-class theatre averages from £2 to £4 per week)—John Eaton (The answer is "Wellington")—P. Q. (Your father can make any legal disposition of his property just as he pleases)—F. Withers (We must refer you to the "Lives of the Poets")—Rev. J. Robbards (Lay the particulars of the case before the committee of management)—C. J. F. (The lady, we believe, is afflicted with blindness)—Glastonbury (One of the large publishers)—John Crewe (Write more explicitly)—A. A. A. (The general address, "London," will be sufficient)—"Purchase" (Warren's Introduction to Law Studies)—Isaac Harrison—M. Y. Z.—H. L.—Hy. S.—Fanny and Anne—J. R. Ward—Como—S. B.—Thomas Ashton—Charles Lemon—J. P. W.—Stanislaus—A. Schoolboy—S. A.—Ben Brust—C. G. Y. Z.—Fanny—Adam Burns—Mary S. J., jun.—Desdemona—Frugality—A Merry One—Lizzie W.—Eliza—Claude—Sarah—A. Marshall—Emmeline W.—Affection—A. B. Lindsay—W. F. P.—Maria—F. G. C.—G. W. D.—Leander—Elmira—W. R.—Ruth Pinch—Mary Serena—Theodoris—S. D.—Clementina—G. W.—Roland Grame—Charles—Edward—Adolphe—Ego—Teresa and Agnes—J. F. Gordon—Edward G. P.—P. H. P.—Eveline M.—G. A. M. S.—F. V. G.—F. A. F.—St. Clair—F. H. H.—Bessie—J. B.—Willie—Shakespeare—Sunderland—Andrea—J. L. A.—Medicus—Henry William—Emma—Ada—Evangeline—S. M. J.—Eva—Aggie—J. L. S.—Kate—K. M.—E. M. J.—Juliette—L. M.—J. P. Barlow—J. S.—Marion and Fanny—S. P. T.—Lavinia—M. A. W.—Edwin and Henry—J. W. W.—Arthur William—Mignonette—Mrs. Lupin—Augustus—W. A. W.—Euclid—Kenneth Howell—Anne—Charles Brand—Edith and Grace—E. F. Y.—Holland—J. T. Bamford—X. X.—Ela—W. W.—J. Banister.

CONTRIBUTIONS RECEIVED, AND RESPECTFULLY DECLINED.—"The Blind Boy," and "The Poor Slave," by J. G.—"Think ere you speak," by J. M. L.—"A Fire-side Reverie," by J. A. B.—"Scotch Poetry," by W. T.—"The Spirit's Home," by W. H.—"The Draught of Death"—Pieces, by E. Simmons—"Night," by M. W.—Several Pieces, by E. H.—"The Wreck," by R. H.—"Brotherly Affection," &c., by P. H.—(Attempt a tripping love ballad)—Lines, by R. K. S.—"The Rhine," by A. N. B.—"The Heart," by M. L.—"Do Good," by C. H.—"The Autobiography of a Slate," (This class of compositions have gone completely out of the esteem of the public, and deservedly so, for the best were puerile)—"Twins in this Cot," by J. R.—"Tell me where is Happiness found," by E. P.—"Forbear," &c., by C. B.—"I'm Weary," by M. F.—"Star of the Night," by Claudian—"The Soul's Ideal," "The Funeral of Youth," by P. Q. R.—"We've Happier Days in Store," (One defective line in the first verse spoils an otherwise pretty little poem).

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the Office of "THE WEEKLY TIMES," 334, Strand, in the Parish of St. Clement Danes in the County of Middlesex,—March 19 1853.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 422.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MARCH 26, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[THE AYAH RESCUING SUSAN.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXVI.

Owls make their home; the raven haunts each tower;
The crumbling walls are with strange echoes fill'd;
The peasant, homeward wending from his fields,
Quickens his toil-worn steps as they approach
The solitary pile.

KIRWAN.

WHEN Susan descended from the chamber of Ellen, where she had passed the night, to the servants' hall of Cromwell House, she was startled at finding the warrenner seated by the fire, which burnt briskly in the grate; everything else in the place bore that lonely, deserted appearance which strikes a chill both on the heart and mind. With all her self-possession, she could not conceal the alarm which the presence of the ruffian occasioned her. She had heard her lover, Joe Beans, speak of him frequently as a man suspected of many crimes—a fellow fitted by the malignant depravity of his heart for any act, however desperate; a ready tool for those who could minister to his ruling passion—avarice.

The honest rustic, in his moments of confidence, had imparted to her his vague suspicions that he was no stranger to the death of Sir William Mowbray; also his attempt upon poor old Martin in the churchyard. No wonder, therefore, that she looked upon his presence as an ill omen for her young mistress, and probable danger for herself.

Will, who was probably aware of the courtship between Joe and the pretty rustic, eyed her with a glance in which insult and mockery were blended; and the idea of avenging himself upon the man whose strong arm had struck him down, glided like a serpent into his heart.

"Good morning, my pretty lass!" he exclaimed; "this old house does not appear half so dull since I have seen you."

"You will see but little of me," replied Susan, endeavouring to suppress her fear and indignation at his familiarity; "my time is generally passed with my young lady."

"We can relieve you of that portion of your duty," observed the ruffian, sneeringly; "the silly girl has one to attend her who will replace your services—one to whom she is more accustomed, and quite as faithful!"

"Indeed!" answered the girl, with affected indifference; "the place is not so agreeable that I care to remain in it: I can return home."

"Return home!" repeated the warrenner, in the tone of a man very much amused by some absurd idea; "of course you can—what should prevent you? Nothing! nothing in the world!" he added, mockingly. "I should advise you by all means to return home—as soon as you can!"

The marked emphasis which the speaker laid upon the last words of his insulting speech, caused the heart of the pretty Susan to beat with apprehensions which had never startled her innocent heart before. While uttering it, the eyes of the ruffian had wandered over her person with an expression which mantled her cheek with blushes. In her distress, she almost regretted having yielded to the solicitations of her lover, and accepted the dangerous part she was acting.

"We shall see what Lady Mowbray will say to this!" she exclaimed, as she attempted to leave the room.

"Lady Mowbray," replied Will Sidel, with provoking calmness, "left last night for London."

"The colonel, then?"

"He accompanied her," added the ruffian. "With the exception of Miss Ellen's new attendant, you and I are the only persons in the house: the keys are in my possession."

As he spoke, he drew from his pocket a large bunch of keys, and shook them insultingly in her face.

"We shall be excellent friends!" he continued; "especially at night, when the hours are dark and long, and the wind wails and cries like a human thing, through the corridors and halls of this old mansion: we shall be glad of each other's society then—I hate the night!"

"Perhaps," said Susan, bitterly, "it reminds you of your evil deeds!"

A dark scowl overshadowed the features of the warrenner: he sprang from his seat, and advanced towards her, demanding, as she retreated before him:

"What deeds, fool? what deeds?"

In his fury, the wretch most probably would have struck her, or have proceeded to some other act of outrage equally unmanly, had not the door of the room suddenly opened, and a boy, apparently about thirteen years of age, made his appearance; he was clad in a wretched suit of parish clothes, the most glaring imperfections of which were covered by a smock-frock; he had neither hat nor cap to guard his head from sunshine and showers—but nature had provided him with a substitute, in the enormous mass of red, shaggy hair with which his skull was thatched. His features were broad, flat, and inexpressive; the only symptom of intelligence was in his small, deep-set eyes, which never seemed for an instant at rest: they glanced first from the countenance of Susan to that of the warrenner, then became suddenly attracted to the smoke-jack, set in motion by the fire, which, probably for the first time for many years, had been lighted in the enormous grate.

"Who in the fiend's name are you?" demanded Will Sidel.

"Eh!" ejaculated the boy, with a stare of wonder.

"Who are you, I say?" continued the ruffian, seizing him by the shoulder, and shaking him violently; "and how did you gain admittance here?"

"I be Remnant's boy, and looks arter the cows! Who be thee?"

Remnant was the name of the tenant who farmed the land attached to Cromwell House. This the warrenner knew, and his alarm at once was dissipated.

"And how did you gain admittance here?" he continued.

"Can't ye see!" replied the lad, holding up a large, rusty key, which was instantly snatched from his hand. "Who be that young woman?" pointing to Susan.

While the poor girl was meditating how to make the intrusion of the speaker available in some manner for her protection, her persecutor, who had never once quitted his hold of the boy, drew him from the room—led him through the courtyard to the side-door by which he had entered, and dismissed him with strict injunctions not to intrude there again, as the gentleman who had taken the place had a great dislike to strangers.

"But I beant no stranger!" observed the intruder. "I know'd the house ever since I wor no older than Brindle Bet's last calf. Mother lived here in old lady's time."

Without listening to any further explanation or excuse, Sidel pushed the lad through the gate, and added a blow, by way of intimating the treatment he might expect if ever he ventured to show his face upon the premises again.

As the door closed, Bed Ralph, as he was generally called in the village, cast a bitter look towards his assailant, and muttered between his teeth, that he would return in spite of him.

He kept his word.

Accustomed from his earliest childhood to wander about the place, he had none of the superstitious fears respecting it which were entertained by the lower orders in Mortlake. As he used to observe to his master, he had never seen anything worse there nor himself—the ghosts had never hurt him; and he felt a secret pride in having terrors which he took no small pains to propagate. Many a half-pint of home-brewed had he obtained from the wives of the market-gardeners, for relating the tales of Cromwell House.

The instant the warren left the servants' hall, Susan ran, as fast as her agitation permitted her, to the chamber of her young lady—the door was locked.

"Open, Miss Ellen!" she exclaimed; "for heaven's sake open the door!"

"I cannot, my poor girl," replied the orphan; "I am a prisoner!"

The ayah smiled.

"In the hands of my bitterest enemy!" continued the speaker.

The silence which Ellen had hitherto observed towards her former attendant, had only tended to raise the evil passions of the Indian woman, who, by one of those strange contradictions in our nature, both loved and desired to be loved by the being she was persecuting; but when she heard the child she had nurtured at her breast designate her as her bitterest enemy, her eyes became clouded: the words struck upon her heart; the first impression was made, although she was scarcely conscious of the change here.

"Bitterest enemy!" she repeated; "because I will not see you disgrace yourself by bestowing your hand upon a churl—a peasant! Because I wish to see you rich and happy! Be it so! I can bear even that for your sake!"

Her former mistress disdained to reply to her. It appeared like treason to the absent to vindicate her choice. It was her pride and consolation. A heavy step was heard ascending the staircase: it was the warren's. The heart of poor Susan beat wildly with terror and disgust. Clinging to the door, she entreated—almost shrieked for admittance; using, in her deep agony, the words which women utter when alarmed by the approach of brutal violence, threatening more than life.

"Open, for mercy's sake!" she exclaimed, addressing the ayah; "as you are a woman, have pity on your sex! I have never injured you! Why blight my young existence? Pity! Pity!"

The loud shriek which followed, announced that her persecutor had already laid his grasp upon her shoulder. Still she clung to the door of the apartment with desperate strength. Zara remained unmoved.

The features of Ellen became dreadfully convulsed, as she listened to the cries of her humble friend, and felt her inability to save her. Pride, resentment, all gave way before the danger of the despairing girl, whose shrieks were mingled with the half-uttered oaths of Will Sidel, whose passions were now completely roused. She cast herself at the feet of her gaoler, with the intention of imploring her interference—but the words choked her, and, with a wild sob—like that which comes from a broken heart—she sank senseless on the floor. The ayah raised her, and saw, to her terror, that blood was oozing from the lips of the unhappy orphan.

With the rapidity of thought she raised her desolate charge, placed her upon the couch, and then threw open the door of the chamber. The ruffian had already succeeded in dragging his victim partially down the great staircase. We say partially, for Susan still clung with the tenacity of despair to the massive oaken bannisters. More than once Sidel had recourse to blows to induce her to quit her hold. Just as he had succeeded in dragging her to the great hall, Zara confronted him. Despite her devotion to Meeran Hafaz, her heart was not all of clay, and her womanly nature was roused to indignation when she witnessed the state to which Susan was reduced.

Few, judging from her slender figure, would have imagined the great personal strength of the Indian woman. In an instant she snatched the all-but senseless girl from his fierce grasp, and stood like a roused pantheress, with scornful lips and flashing eyes glaring upon him.

"What now?" muttered the villain.

"Fool!" exclaimed the ayah; "miserable fool! Is it for this that your employer has bought you body and soul—paid for your services with gold which might have gained a Brahmin's faith?"

"She is a spy!" muttered the warren.

"She is a woman!" replied Zara.

"And what do you call the one up stairs?" demanded the fellow, insolently. "Is she less fair—less young—less delicate—less helpless? I but follow the example of him we both serve."

This was the second time, during the morning, that the ayah had had her conduct towards Ellen reflected, as it were, in a mirror before her—that she had been compelled, as it were, to see herself, the moral depravity into which, step by step, she had been led—and the lesson was not thrown away.

"You cannot judge my motives," she said.

"Nor you mine!" replied Will Sidel. "It is not that I care so much for the girl, as the hatred I feel towards her lover, who struck me—spurned, insulted—more, who threatened me! I swore at the time to be avenged upon him, and shall keep my promise: so you had better," he added, in a conciliatory tone, at the same time advancing towards Susan, who clung in breathless terror to her protectress—"leave the wench with me, and attend to your own charge in the chamber above."

"Save me from him!" faintly murmured the poor girl; "I have no hope but you!"

"I will not fail you!" answered Zara, resolutely; "although I have little cause to love you, for you have supplanted me in the love of my foster-child! Back, ruffian—back!" she added, addressing the disappointed warren; "lay but a finger on her, and I will slay thee as I would a cub from the jungle, or a reptile that had crossed my path!"

It was not the first time that Will Sidel had seen the keen, sharp blade which glittered in the hand of the speaker—for, as we before had occasion to observe, the ayah never went unarmed. He knew her courage, and more than suspected her address in the use of the weapon.

In the struggle which had just taken place, his neck-cloth had fallen, and the eyes of Zara were fixed upon his throat, like those of a serpent meditating where to strike. He was cowed, subdued; for, like most cruel natures, his heart was cowardly—courageous only with the helpless and unarmed.

Muttering something about "women's fancies" and "another opportunity," he retreated sullenly from the hall, baffled and disappointed—but still bent on destroying, if possible, the happiness of his enemy, Joe Beans, and the innocent Susan.

On reaching the chamber of Ellen, the Indian and the rescued girl both occupied themselves—despite the weakness and recent agitation of the latter—in recovering the unhappy orphan from the state into which the scene of the morning had thrown her.

It was long—very long—before their efforts were successful. When life returned, it was evident that the mind of the persecuted prisoner had received a shock from which it would not easily recover. At the sight of the ayah she screamed violently, and hid her face in the bosom of Susan, calling upon her murdered uncle and Henry to protect her. Each time the guilty woman attempted to renew her attentions, the paroxysm returned, and she found herself condemned to witness her foster-child receive from another those services which her heart yearned to offer. Like many other passionate natures, she had calculated only her strength—not her weakness.

Dissatisfied with herself and the part she had undertaken, but still resolved to persevere, she removed to a distance, and sat silently watching them. Instead of abating, the exclamations of Ellen increased in incoherency, the expression of her eyes became more wild. It was evident that fever had seized upon her brain.

Susan was in despair, and Zara—the conscience-stricken Zara—truly wretched. Her crimes became their own avenger.

A lightstep was heard upon the stairs. The sufferer, with the quickness of insanity, recognised it: it was Meeran's. With a shriek which made the walls of the old chamber ring, she sprang from the arms of Susan, and would have dashed herself through the window to avoid him, had not the ayah intercepted her, and bore her back to the bed, upon which she replaced her in a state of insensibility.

It was fortunate that the guilty woman still retained her presence of mind. Leaving her charge to the care of the weeping girl who hung over her, she left the room, time enough to prevent the entrance of her persecutor, whose presence she felt assured would cause her death. Raising her finger to her lips, to command silence, she motioned him to retrace his steps. The young man wonderingly obeyed her.

"What has happened?" he demanded, anxiously.

"The hound," replied Zara, speaking in the figurative language of the East, "has presumed to hunt on its own account, and startle the deer reserved for its master!"

"What mean you?"

A few brief words put him in possession of all that had taken place: the ruffianly conduct of the warren, the danger of Susan, and the state into which it had thrown the unhappy object of his persecution and love.

As the ayah concluded the latter part of her narration, the usually impassible countenance of Meeran Hafaz became dark with passion. Bitterly did the proud youth feel the degradation of the association into which his evil genius had betrayed him.

It was a fortunate thing for Will Sidel that he was not present at the outbreak of the storm, whose lightnings would have scathed him.

"Dog!" exclaimed the young Indian, his eyes glancing round the hall as if in search of the object of his wrath. "Miserable villain! Was it for this I bought and trusted him! I'll trample the life from his hideous carcase, and leave his felon limbs to blacken in the sun!"

"You dare not!" observed Zara, calmly.

"Dare not!" he repeated, scornfully.

"You are in his power!" added the woman. "Oh that my child had never visited this accursed land! Had she remained in India, her young heart would have known no other love—she would have been free from crime as well as danger—and I happy in the union of my foster-children, which now appears a dream—a hopeless dream!"

Meeran eyed her for an instant suspiciously.

"A dream which shall be realised!" he exclaimed, advancing towards the staircase which led to the apartment of Ellen.

"The only hand which could oppose it," quietly observed Zara, "has passed between you!"

"Whose?"

"The hand of death!" she calmly replied; "its shadow is already over her! At the sound of your step she sprang from the bed, and would have found refuge in the grave from your approach—by dashing herself through the window—had I not prevented her: your presence at once destroys her!"

The heart of Meeran—in which every generous impulse was not yet entirely crushed—sank fearfully at her words; for they convinced him how deep must be the love of the orphan for his rival—how hopeless his chance of supplanting that love; true, he might obtain possession, by violence, of her hand and person—reconcile her, perhaps, to a dull and soulless existence; but win from her the exchange of heart for heart—the sympathies which twine the hymeneal chain with flowers, make suffering pleasure, and gild the snows of age with spring's sweet sunshine—never—never.

As the conviction gradually pressed upon him, then commenced his punishment.

Ellen was ill, suffering—perhaps dying—yet he dared not visit her, lest his voice and presence should in an instant snap the slender thread of life—or, in the desolation of her soul, the fever of her brain, her lips should curse him. Should he call in medical aid, all would be discovered—and yet to risk the loss of her!

Meeran Hafaz clasped his hands to his burning brow, to hide the tears which, despite his pride and passion, fell like drops of molten lead upon his cheek.

The ayah was moved by the agony of her foster-son. At present she was a stranger to the promptings of her own heart—she heard its whisperings, but without comprehending them.

"She must be saved, at all risks!" murmured the young Indian.

"Leave her to me," replied the woman; "thou knowest that I possess no mean skill in herbs and plants of many virtues. I have sat too oft beside the couch of those I loved, not to discern the approach of death—the gradual dimming of the eye—the fluttering pulse—the moisture of the skin—the hard-drawn breath: should such signs appear—"

"Send instantly for the best advice gold can procure!" interrupted Meeran. "Day and night a horse shall be saddled in the stables! I will leave Zadag—this was the name of the Indian boy who attended him—with you! Stay!" he added, the fear of losing her blinding him to every other fear; "I will seek and bring you aid myself!" So saying, he rushed like a madman from the house, to give orders for his departure.

"He is worthy of her!" muttered the ayah, with a look of affection; "and never shall another call her bride!" Then, as if some secret monitor reproved her words, she added, slowly; "unless the bride of death!"

Full of this resolution, she returned to the chamber of the suffering girl.

CHAPTER LXVII.

Friendship, like love, is oft the hollow mask
Of a more hollow heart. Words are the coin
With which men cheat their fellow-men.
Fools only trust, to be deceived.

HEIR OF THE SEPT.

TEN days elapsed before Doctor Kiscock, who really took a deep interest in the progress of his patient, ventured to give any positive hope of his ultimate recovery. Meanwhile the Roman police pretended to use every exertion in order to trace out the assassin; but, as usual, without success. They had been too well paid to compromise each other. It is rarely, very rarely, that those who attempt the life of a foreigner are brought to justice in the Eternal City; consequently, the tariff for assassinating a foreigner is much lighter than for a native of Italy, or a citizen, who have generally friends to clamour loudly, and stimulate, by their indignant remonstrances, the laggard steps of justice.

During this anxious interval, Henry Ashton was a close prisoner by the bed-side of his friend; who would receive no medicine but from his hand, nor permit—with the waywardness of suffering—any other to smooth his pillow. Fortunately the fever which supervened was slight, and, at the end of the tenth day, totally disappeared.

Then it was that the kind-hearted physician ventured to express his first decided hope.

Amongst the visitors which interest or curiosity drew to the hotel, none were more constant than Robert Martingale: true, he was not admitted into the chamber of the wounded man—but our hero contrived when he came to quit it for an instant, press him by the hand, thank him for his sympathy, and express how deeply he felt the friendship which displayed itself at such a moment. He even commissioned him to make daily inquiries for him at the post-office for his long, anxiously-expected letters from England.

It was not till the fourth or fifth day that the arch-deceiver ventured to present him with one which he had fabricated, from Ellen: he smiled as the deceived lover pressed the superscription to his lips, and murmured, in accents which indicated how much they relieved his heart:

"Thank heaven! at last!"

We presume that it is scarcely necessary to explain to our readers that the correspondence of the lovers had been suppressed at the post-office—by bribing the employees. At Rome such persons are generally so wretchedly paid, that they would not only risk their appointments, but their salvation to boot, for a handful of ducats—and Martingale was most liberal.

Possessing the letters thus cruelly intercepted, it became no difficult matter for an expert master of calligraphy like himself, to imitate the hand and even the style of the artless writer.

"You smile!" he said, as our hero eagerly perused each line of what he believed to be the writing of Ellen. "Pleasant intelligence, no doubt!" he added; "and not the less welcome for having been so long delayed!"

"Welcome—most welcome!" exclaimed Henry Ashton; "it has relieved my heart of the worst agony—suspense; informs me of the recovery of a dear and valued friend from a most dangerous illness: the writer, like myself, has been chained by affection to the bed of sickness," he added, "but, thank heaven! every cause for uneasiness has passed!"

The emissary of Meeran Hafaz was secretly delighted at the gullibility of his dupe—at the tact with which he had deceived him. So cleverly had he described the pretended illness of Sir William Mowbray, and the cares and fears of his niece, that the confiding youth doubted not for an instant but the letter was from Ellen; not a word which did not breathe the deep and earnest love of the graceful girl for her second father. Little did he imagine that the baronet had been for weeks the tenant of an untimely grave.

During the long hours he had passed by the couch of Walter, Henry Ashton had occupied himself in drawing up a statement of the melancholy circumstances under which Lady Mowbray had been induced to accept the veil—the extraordinary disappearance of her child, whom for many years she had been led to believe safe in the arms of its father—and concluded by a demand for a dispensation from her ill-considered vows—or, if that were refused, permission to visit England. This, as his friend was still progressing favourably, he resolved to lose no time in forwarding to the congregation of rites, to whom such demands were usually preferred; for which purpose he sent for a procurator. The man was an honest one.

"Have you any interest to back your memorial?" he demanded, after he had carefully perused the papers.

"None," replied our hero, "but the justness of my prayer."

His visitor shook his head.

"What!" exclaimed the indignant youth, "a wife—an English matron—foully lured from the arms of her husband—her son, the heir of one of the noblest names and fortunes in England, disposed of—no one knows how! Such an appeal cannot be permitted to remain unanswered!"

"It will be answered!" replied the procurator, with a smile.

"And how?"

"Unfavourably!" replied the experienced legist: "the prayer itself is most unusual. But that is not the greatest difficulty," he added; "the Abbaté Lucas is a member of the sacred congregation to whom it is addressed."

This was a blow which Henry had not expected; he determined to persevere, nevertheless, and directed the procurator to forward the memorial. In a fortnight it was returned under an official cover: the demand was rejected.

"Henry," said his friend, who saw, despite the effort which he made to conceal it, that something had occurred to irritate and vex him; "I must insist upon your once more mingling in the world. I am better—much better, now! I know by experience how wearying are the long days and nights passed in a sick chamber, even when suffering enchains us there; in health they must be doubly irksome!"

"Irksome!" repeated Henry, in a tone of deep feeling; "no, dear Walter—no!"

"Not to friendship, Harry," continued the invalid, with a faint smile, "but to love—to duty, if you will. I know not what has occurred, but something, I am sure, which gives you the desire of freedom—action. I can read it in your eyes," he added; "therefore it is vain for your lips to deny it!"

Our hero could not deny it—therefore remained silent. "If only for a few hours," urged Walter; "Martingale will, I am sure, remain with me!"

The deceiver, who had been within the last few days a constant visitor in the sick room of the speaker, eagerly expressed his willingness to undertake the task of nurse, in the absence of Henry.

"I shall not be as kind, but I will endeavour to prove as faithful a one!" he observed, with affected bonhomie.

It would have been unkind longer to have resisted their solicitations, and the young man suffered himself to be persuaded.

"My first visit," he said, aloud, "will be to the duchess, whose inquiries have been incessant after your progress; my next to the Palazzo Borghese. Have you any message," he added, sinking his voice to a whisper, "for any one I may encounter there?"

The blood faintly rushed to the still pale cheek of Walter Mowbray, as he pressed the hand of his friend, and then pointed to the withered rose which Therese Colonna had left on the occasion of her visit, and which was carefully preserved in a silver vase beside him.

"I understand—I will be eloquent!"

"And discreet!" added the invalid, in the same suppressed tone.

"As all who love should be," replied our hero, as he withdrew to make preparation for his visit. "You are quite safe!"

On entering the boudoir of the Duchess of Devonshire, who welcomed him with the warm interest of a friend, Henry Ashton was much struck by the appearance of a gentleman whom he had not previously encountered in any of the salons of the Roman nobility: this was no other than the celebrated Sir Thomas Lawrence, who, if he was not the first painter, was certainly one of the most elegant men of his day. His visit to the Eternal City had been made by command of the Prince Regent of England, in order to paint the portrait of the amiable Pius VII., who then sat in the chair of St. Peter. From his easy, graceful manner, and the studied absence in conversation of everything which might have a political allusion, he had become a great favourite with the Pontiff, who used to call him "my painter," and frequently declared that no one, save the heretic Englishman, had ever made at the same time a portrait and a picture of him. How far the commendation was merited, those who have seen the likeness in the gallery at Windsor can judge—at least in the latter instance.

"And what do you intend to do?" demanded the duchess, as her visitor concluded his narration of the refusal of the congregation of rites to accede to the prayer of Lady Mowbray.

"Appeal to the Cardinal Gonzalvi!"

Her grace shook her head discouragingly. She knew that his eminence, although minister, seldom ventured to interfere in such matters—his influence being regarded by the sacred college, the holy office, and the congregation of rites, with extreme jealousy: the reason was, that, although a cardinal, he was not a priest.

"He could not serve you," she said, "even if he would; he has too many enemies to risk it!"

"In that case," replied Henry, "I will appeal to the Pope himself: he has suffered, and suffering should have taught him mercy. But permit me, your grace," he added, "to doubt the disinclination of the cardinal to serve me. I have some reason to believe that it was to his interference I owe the privilege of an interview with the unhappy Lady Mowbray."

"Hush! that was easily arranged," whispered the kind-hearted woman; "because it could be done privately. Had you demanded such a permission through the usual channel, it might have been a year before you obtained it. Stay!" she continued, a thought suddenly striking her; "here is the very person who can best assist you."

She gracefully invited the artist to approach, and rapidly related to him the history of Lady Mowbray, and the difficulty of her protégé. With the former portion of her narration Sir Thomas was already acquainted: he had painted her soon after she became a bride, and heard of her supposed lapse from virtue with regret. As the duchess proceeded, he became deeply interested.

"Poor lady!" he exclaimed, with a sigh; "her fate is indeed a sad one, and, I believe, unmerited; but, as respects her husband, your efforts, unfortunately, are too late."

"Too late!" repeated both the duchess and our hero.

"Yes; a letter, which I received at least a month since from England, mentioned his death. Some think he died a suicide; others, that he was murdered."

"Murdered!" exclaimed Henry Ashton; "impossible! I this very morning received a letter from"—his niece, he was about to say, but delicacy restrained him—"one," he added, "who watched by his sick couch with the affectionate solicitude of a child! Read!—read!"

He placed the letter which Martingale had brought him in the hands of the duchess.

"Your informant must have been deceived, Sir Thomas," she observed, as soon as she had perused it, and marked the date; "this was written not quite three weeks since—written by the side of his sick bed, by one who must have known."

"Possibly," replied the painter, doubtfully: your grace knows how report is liable to err; and yet—no matter; as you say, I must have been misinformed."

Although fully convinced that his information was correct—for the details of the unhappy affair had been too circumstantial to admit of a doubt in his own mind—the speaker resolved to make himself yet further acquainted with the particulars before he alluded to the subject again, and begged of her grace to point out in what way he could have the pleasure of obliging her, or being useful to Mr. Ashton.

"Present him," said the duchess.

"Willingly," said the artist, after a pause, during which he considered that, as his portrait was nearly finished, the cardinals, many of whom, from jealousy, made a point of being present at his sittings, could not interfere with that. "The first time I am summoned to the Vatican, I will drop your young friend a note. I do not think," he added, with a smile of benevolent interest, "that the Holy Father will receive him less cordially that he is presented by a poor painter, instead of a prince of the Church, as he was promised."

Our hero was profuse in the expression of his gratitude, and soon after took his leave. The kind-hearted hostess seized the occasion of a tête-à-tête with her remaining visitor, to relate all that she had heard from the late baronet respecting his young protégé. The heart of the painter warmed as she proceeded. Like Henry Ashton, he had risen from the people, and, despite his courtier-like manners, and the artificial atmosphere in which he moved, his sympathies were with them.

"What a noble head he has!" he observed, with professional gusto: "it would show splendidly upon canvas."

"And, from your easel," replied the duchess, "would be worth a thousand guineas, at the very least; although I fear it would scarcely realise as many shillings on the shoulders of its possessor, were he in poverty."

Most women, it is said, reserve the most important parts of their correspondence for the postscript: her grace, faithful to the tactics of her sex, kept the request she was most anxious to make to the last; it was not till Sir Thomas Lawrence had risen to take his leave, that she ventured to urge it.

"Come," she said, extending her hand, with one of her most winning smiles; "you must not refuse me. I ask it, by the recollections of our old friendship!"

The courtly painter bowed, and kissed the fair hand held out to him, gallantly observing that it was impossible to refuse a request so flatteringly urged.

"You promise, then?"

"I promise!"

And her visitor took his leave.

What that promise was, and how it was fulfilled, must appear in another place.

Henry Ashton next directed his steps to the Borghese Palace. The groom of the chambers, accustomed to admit him at all times to the salons and even the boudoir of his mistress, ushered him at once to the apartment in which the beautiful Pauline was seated, with her mother, Madame Letitia, and her sister Caroline, the ex-Queen of Naples.

"Who is this young man," demanded the mother of the fallen Emperor, in a severe tone, "admitted thus unceremoniously to your presence?"

Although the words had been uttered in a whisper, Henry Ashton heard them. He remembered the words of the Duchess of Devonshire, at the Princess Doria's ball, and he hesitated to advance. He respected even the prejudices of the woman of so many sorrows—

"The Niobe of modern years,"

As Byron poetically called her.

"I believe," replied her daughter, "that he is an admirer of Therese Colonna."

"And an Englishman?"

"Something of that kind," added Pauline, petulantly. "How can you expect me to remember the nationality of all the men who are presented to me?"

"Inglese!" exclaimed Caroline, spitefully; "I can read it in his eyes!"

"You have been accustomed to do so!" replied her sister, sarcastically; for she cared little for the opinion of the ex-queen, however she might dread the severe rebuke of her mother. "You courted so many of his countrymen at Naples, that poor Joachim used to complain at last that your accent became English!"

Remembering what was due to his own dignity, our hero advanced, and paid his homage to the mistress of the mansion, with that quiet ease and self-possession which marks the consciousness of merit.

"The Signor Ashton," said the princess, presenting him to her parent and sister by name; "on a mission from the English government to Italy."

This sounded well, and the brow of Madame slightly unbent as she returned the profound salute which the young man made to her misfortunes, rather than her titular rank, as mother of a fallen sovereign.

The ex-Queen of Naples was too deeply offended by her sister's unkind allusion to utter a word.

"I have met but few of your countrymen," observed Madame, struck by the really distinguished air of the young diplomat; "and they have not all produced the same favourable impression as the Signor Ashton."

"The honour of this presentation is doubly grateful to me," replied our hero; "and I cannot sufficiently express my gratitude to her imperial highness for making me known to the mother of the illustrious man whose genius has left its impress on the progress of nations—whose fail," he added, in a tone of deep respect, "even his enemies deplore!"

At this moment Therese Colonna entered the apartment, in her usual quiet manner; with Madame Mère she was really a favourite.

"Come hither, child," she said, extending her hand to the fair girl, "and aid me to thank the first Englishman who has rendered justice to the misfortunes and genius of my son!"

Henry bore in his hand a full-blown rose. Therese understood the signal. When her lover was first wounded, he had sent her a bud of the same flower, scarcely developed. Every morning, as the patient slowly progressed towards convalescence, the token had been renewed, its tender leaves more and more unfolded. The eyes of the high-born daughter of the Colonnas sparkled as they glanced upon the flower in his hand—it announced the certain recovery of his friend.

As well as her agitation would permit, she murmured a few words expressive of her gratitude.

Pauline was too experienced in the language of the heart and eyes not to notice her embarrassment, and a pang of jealousy rose within her breast. For, without being absolutely in love with the young barbarian—as she once called him—she had taken a caprice, which, in Italy, is near akin to it. Suspecting that the rose contained a billet intended for Therese, she stretched forth her hand, exclaiming:

"Oh, Signor Ashton, what a beautiful flower!"

He had nothing left but to present it. This he did in so unembarrassed a manner, that her suspicions were dissipated, and soon after he took his leave, satisfied with having given consolation to the heart which beat so warmly for his friend.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

Could we but analyse those secret springs
From which the heart's strange contradictions rise—
Its changing purpose—bright imaginings—
Its vain regrets—a word which never dies—
We should discern 'mid passion's strife, that all
Of Eden fell not in our parents' fall.

ITALY, BY THE AUTHOR OF THE JESUIT.

WHEN Meeran Hafaz started from Mortlake, he was in a condition scarcely less to be pitied than his victim's. His heart was torn by remorse at her danger. Horror of himself—pity for her sufferings—the thought that his cruelty had driven her to the verge of madness—to the grave, perchance—was more than he could bear. The hand he had so recklessly braved at last had struck him.

"God!" he murmured, apostrophising the Deity whose laws he had broken; "spare me this proof of Thy power, and I will own Thee! Fresh in her youth and innocence, let not the worm pollute her lip—her voice of music be hushed in death! Death!" he repeated, with an involuntary shudder, "to the guilty soul more tremendous than annihilation!"

With the usual inconsistency of his ill-regulated mind, he forgot that there was an embrace that could pollute more than the earthworm's kiss—a cry to whose despairing agony the silence of the grave would appear as mercy.

The colonel and Lady Mowbray were both seated in the drawing-room of their London mansion, when the young Indian, with bloodshot eyes and haggard features, appeared before them. Even the heartless woman, appalled at the change a few hours had produced, demanded what had happened.

"She is dying!" hoarsely murmured Meeran. "We have murdered her!"

He cast himself upon the seat beside her, despair in every look. The colonel rose from his seat, and whispered a few words in his ear. The young man started as if a serpent had hissed in it.

"No!" he exclaimed; "I am not that monster yet! I would win her love—not destroy the perfume of the flower I prize! I am not so vile a thing as your base nature would suppose: from any act of unmanly violence of mine she is safe! Safe," he added, with a burst of remorse, "as an infant nestled at its mother's breast! Safe as an angel at the shrine it worships!"

"Quite poetical, I declare!" observed Lady Mowbray, with a sneer. "This penitence is a fit episode for such romantic passion! Better at once resign her, send for your rival from Italy, place her hand in his, and die; or return to India a wiser man than you left it, but not a happier one!"

At the allusion to Henry Ashton, the evil principle in Meeran's nature once more prevailed. The artful woman had touched the chords aright, and the response answered to her wish.

"Never!" he exclaimed bitterly; "never—never! I would rather see her dead than in his arms! The agony of losing her would be nothing in comparison to the torment of knowing that she was another's! My brain is fevered! I am unreasonable—wretched—mad! Pity me—counsel and console me!"

This was the very state of mind to which Lady Mowbray wished to bring him. She treated the illness of Ellen as something slight—an hysterical attack, from which a few days' repose would see her recover. The heartless woman even suggested that she had deceived the ayah by imitating illness.

"Zara has watched her from her childhood," answered Meeran, somewhat more collectedly; "and is not to be deceived."

"Bribed her, then?" added the colonel.

"And what price could bribe the foster-mother to deceive her child?" demanded the young Indian, scornfully. "Her life has been devoted to me. To see me happy in the love of Ellen, she would sacrifice it without a sigh, and think that happiness too cheaply purchased. She has descended even to crime for my sake," he added. "Zara, the Hindoo, must not be judged as you would judge one of your faith and country. She is not to be bought!"

The unprincipled woman of the world coloured, even through her rouge, at the reproach thus sarcastically conveyed; and, to conceal her confusion and anger, left the room.

"Meeran," said the colonel, as soon as they were alone, "for the first time you have betrayed irresolution and weakness."

"How so?" haughtily demanded the young man.

"By bandying words with a woman: they are their natural weapons—men should disdain them; but enough of this—the danger of my niece requires action, not reproaches. I am acquainted with a man whose skill as a physician is unquestioned, but whose character is more than doubtful; for gold," he added, "he would lend himself to any action, however vile or good—provided you gratify his avarice, he is indifferent which."

"Where does he reside?"

"In a miserable street near the Almonry," replied the unnatural relative of the persecuted girl. "I forget its name, but know where to find him."

Meeran's impatience would not permit them to lose an instant. His carriage was still at the door, and in a few minutes they were on the road to the French doctor's, as he was usually called in the neighbourhood where he resided.

Quitting the carriage at the abbey, the colonel and his companion threaded their way through the infected purlieus of the Almonry, till they reached a close, narrow street, which has since disappeared before the hand of modern improvement. Without hesitation, or once mistaking his road, the former walked hastily on till he reached a small shop, with old-fashioned windows, through which it was impossible even for the lynn-eye of curiosity to peer, so dim were they from the accumulated dust of years. A few vases, filled with coloured waters—a solitary snake in spirits—together with the head of a New Zealand chief, were the only indications of the pursuits of the occupant of the house: not even his name appeared over the door—and yet that name was well known to many who dwelt in curtained saloons, and were waited on by ivied menials; but vice brings round strange acquaintances.

"Where is your master?" demanded Colonel Mowbray, of a simple-looking country boy, who was pounding drugs in a mortar upon the counter.

"In the study, with a lady."

"Say I wish to see him."

"I dare not!" answered the lad.

"Why so?"

"He has forbidden me," was the reply; "he has many such visitors," continued the youth; "not poor people, but ladies—real ladies, who pay for his services in gold! He is a wonderfully skilful man—and that is why the regular doctors are so envious of him."

After waiting for nearly half-an-hour—which, to the impatient Meeran seemed an age—the door of the inner apartment opened, and the shrivelled form of Doctor Guyot appeared upon the threshold, ushering out a female, whose simple but rich attire denoted that she was of no ordinary rank. The folds of the large cashmere which veiled her form, without concealing the grace of her walk and manner, betrayed to the experienced eyes of the two gentlemen that she was of the same class as themselves. As she passed near them—although the shop was sufficiently obscure to render recognition, even had they known her, all but impossible—she raised her handkerchief to her features, which were covered with a thick veil.

"That was no vulgar hand!" observed the colonel, in a whisper, to his companion, who simply nodded assent.

"Now, gentleman," said the owner of the singular establishment, "what is your pleasure with me?"

"A consultation."

"Private?"

"Private!" repeated the colonel, placing a marked emphasis on the word. "You shall not have to complain of your recompense!"

The doctor led the way to the back room which he had so lately quitted—carefully closed the inner and outward doors, which separated it from the shop—then quietly seated himself, with the air of a man who expected some important communication.

"I never visit," he replied, after Meeran had explained to him the danger of Ellen and the nature of her illness; "it is against my custom."

"What sum will tempt you?" demanded the youth, indignantly.

"Scarcely any," was the reply.

This, as the young Indian afterwards discovered, was merely said to enhance the value of his services. At his repeated entreaty, the old man at last consented to name a sum.

"It shall be doubled," exclaimed his visitor, joyfully, "provided that I may rely on your silence and discretion."

"Discretion!" repeated the man of science, with a chuckle—for the prospect of gain made him jocose—"the grave is far less likely to disclose a secret than I am! Means have been found to extort a confession from mouldering bones—even from the earth to which the flesh has been converted; but not from me: my secrets are locked here—here, in my brain! I never trust them to my heart—for the heart is flesh, and therefore weak!"

He struck his withered hand upon his forehead as he spoke.

"But this is unnecessary," he continued; "you know that you may trust me; else you had not sought me."

"And how should I be assured of that?" demanded the young man, struck by the singularity of his manner, and his mode of expressing himself.

"He sees that I am with you," said the colonel; "Guyot and I are old acquaintances—are we not, old mummy?"

"Since you are pleased to recognise me, Colonel Mowbray," replied the old man, with mock humility, "we are old acquaintances—so old, that I almost forget when first we met!"

Up to the moment he uttered the words, the speaker had not betrayed, either by look or tone, that he had ever encountered either of his visitors before. The proof was enough—Meeran was at once convinced that he might trust him.

"I will but give directions to my boy," said the doctor, "and provide myself with some necessary drugs; I will then attend you. I presume," he added, "you have a carriage near—I am not fond of walking?"

Both the gentlemen assured him that they had.

The singular man—singular both in his person and his professional pursuits—left the little chamber in which they had been closeted, and gave directions to his apprentice—for such the lad in the shop was—respecting the answer he should give to any inquirers, and then disappeared through a second door. In about half an hour he returned, fully equipped for his journey: he was accompanied by a person closely muffled in a cloak, whom he conducted to the door of his shop, and then dismissed.

"A patient?" observed the colonel, carelessly.

"No—a pupil," replied the old man, "who is possessed of the singular desire of treating one disease—and one alone."

"His name?" asked Meeran.

"I do not know it."

"His country, then?"

"I am still less acquainted with it," replied the singular personage; "his knowledge is as varied as the tongues he converses in; he has studied in many lands, and possesses something of the wisdom of all. Were I to venture a guess, I should judge him to be from —"

"The East!" interrupted Meeran, bitterly; who fancied that he had recognised, in the person of the doctor's mysterious pupil, his former friend and preceptor, the Khan.

"No," replied Guyot, without moving a muscle or expressing the least surprise; "from Italy: his genius, like his person, bears all the characteristics of the race who first imposed the yoke of conquest, and then the one of superstition, on the world. Yes, yes!" he added, thoughtfully, as if debating within himself; "he must be from Italy!"

There the subject dropped: Meeran either was, or affected to be, convinced: the interest he felt in discovering some clue to the intentions of his former friend, were absorbed in the danger of Ellen; added to which, he oath of the Khan reassured him.

(To be continued in our next.)

GENEVA;

OR, THE HISTORY OF A PORTRAIT.

(Continued from our last.)

A GLORIOUS morning sun, beaming through the lattice, awoke me at an early hour: a beautiful landscape met my eyes on going to the window; it commanded a view of the sea-coast, which was not far distant; and I beheld with delight the blue, rolling waves of the ocean, crested with foam, and swelling proudly as they rolled onward, and came and beat against the rocks on the shore, with a hoarse, echoing sound; the high cliffs at the water's edge melted into quiet, unassuming hills, as they disappeared in the distance. The light fishing skiffs of the fishermen, chained to the shore, danced on the bosom of the blue waters, and the joyous song of the men, as they drew in their nets, was wafted to my ears by the clear morning breeze. The shepherds, and their flocks browsing on the hill-tops, diminished by distance to the size of mice, were dimly visible. On that classic, quiet shore, silence and repose kept vigils gentle and imposing as such presence should be.

When I descended, I found the count below in the parlour: he said his sleep had been disturbed by dismal dreams, and his sad face bore testimony to his words. After breakfast, at which little was said, he proposed a walk on the beach: mechanically I consented, put on my bonnet and shawl, and we went forth together.

We pursued a path through a small forest of palm, linden, and fir-trees; their thick shade formed an impenetrable bower, relieved at their base by wild flowers of every description; the meandering course of numerous rivulets ran through the wood.

We continued on, the count occasionally making some remark about the beauty of the scenery, to which I responded by monosyllables; my mind was too intensely absorbed to talk. The forest was passed. The sun broke brightly from a cloud, and the beach and the murmuring waves lay before us; a small schooner, contending against the tide, was drifting slowly along.

"That bark, struggling for anchorage, is like your life, dear lady; now it rises, now falls amid the waters; the sails gathered in—the pilot endeavouring to gain a position of safety: presently she will rest quietly, securely anchored on the bosom of that bay; so will it be, I predicate, of thee."

"God grant it may!" I murmured.

As he said, after many tacks and manœuvres, the little bark succeeded in gaining safe anchorage, where, riding tranquilly, it rested. The birds of the ocean surrounded it, flapping their wings, and making the air resound with their mournful cries.

A road wound along the shore, bordered by a footpath: on this we wandered at random, stooping sometimes to pick the flowers strewn the way. The count philosophised on nature in his sweet voice, and nature smiled upon us, wearing her fairest dress. At last, after we had gone some distance, he looked at his watch.

"The hour has come, dear lady; I must go: the carriage will be at the house to bear me away, and your forebodings will be relieved when I shall arrive at Naples and write to you."

Seeing that he was really bent on going, we retraced our steps to the house; the barouche which brought us was already there: he did not enter the dwelling, but, pressing my hand with earnest fervour, stepped into it, and drove away.

A week of quiet, daily routine and intense mental anxiety succeeded the count's departure; the days sped slowly in monotonous regularity; the nights were lonely, and would have been terrible, had it not been for my child and faithful servant.

The evening of the sixth day after he went to Naples, I was sitting at the window of my room, abstractedly gazing on vacancy, when I saw a man rapidly approaching on horseback, urging his spurs into the animal's sides, and moving his arms in such a ridiculous manner, that, had my mind been at ease, I should have laughed at his absurd gestures—but in my grief they were unnoticed. Suddenly, reining in his horse at the door, he handed a letter to the peasant who was taking his siesta before the door, and rode away as rapidly as he had come. The man brought it to me, and I eagerly yet tremblingly opened it, and devoured the contents: it was from my husband, superscribed in the count's handwriting, and as follows:

"Barberini Prison, June 11th.

"Dearest Geneva,—

"Count Malabrella will find means to send you this. Were it not for him you would hear nothing of my condition, as I am under such close surveillance, that nothing concerning me escapes suspicion. The principal agent in this sad affair exposed all by his blunders; and this has brought me, perhaps, to a felon's death! It is not known when my trial will take place—I hope soon, as I have secured powerful mediation in my behalf. These prisons are dark and cold—frightful from their solitude! I sit in one corner of my cell, and write this by the light of a lantern, while the count waits to take it away. I wish I could see my boy again! but the strange, inexorable fate which has pursued me from my earliest years, will probably continue its malice to the close of my life. Farewell—farewell! take care of yourself! Remain at Baie till the result of this is known. You shall hear from me soon again. Yours till death.

"SERVAL."

This strange epistle, written on a piece of paper evidently torn from some book, and almost illegible from blots and blurs, was too general and incoherent to satisfy me. Perhaps, for fear of being surprised by the gaoler or some of the officials, he was unable to write more; yet he told me of nothing that had transpired. Perhaps it would have harrowed my heart too much had he told me all—he wished to spare me the sorrow.

Then came a note, within the other, from Count Malabrella.

"Most respected lady,—

"Immediately upon my arrival I asked permission to be admitted to see your husband, but was refused the favour, and only obtained it yesterday, through the intercession of a cardinal of the church, a friend of mine. I then hastened to see Monsieur de Serval. I found him sad, but not as desponding as I had expected. Of course you can imagine what was said of you, and I should be rude to repeat to you what you will have already anticipated. We then conversed upon this ill-fated affair. I told him that Alcantara was arrested, of which fact he was ignorant—the minor confederates had fled. We conferred as to what was best to be done; and I decided on soliciting the intercession of the foreign ministers, and some of the cardinals, together with as many others as I could secure.

"When I left him I hastened to the house of the French minister. I was admitted to an audience. He received me most politely—listened attentively to my explanation of the facts of the case, which it is needless to trouble you with. I entreated him to interest himself for his countryman. He did not definitely say he would, but deferred the question for re-consideration. I think, however, I shall be able to persuade him into doing something. I have secured the interests of several cardinals, and intend to do much more before the trial comes on. Believe me, everything that is within the range of human possibility shall be done. I do not despair: and I entreat you also to be consoled—to hope. Yours in faith,

"MALABRELLA."

This letter partially revived my drooping spirits, for it breathed hope and elasticity of mind. My husband's was gloomy, but that was attributable to his unhappy situation. I had expected an explanation—I received only general assurances of brighter times, which to me seemed far distant—dubious—if not impossible.

I resigned myself to the course of circumstances, and patiently abided my time. Beautiful sunny days and moonlight nights fell upon Baie at that time—the warm, bright glow of the sun, and the calm, sweet light of the moon was soothing as its rays. I often walked, beneath its light, up and down the road on which the house faced.

One evening I started before sunset, and walked in the direction of some curious ruins, situated on a cliff on the shores; the road diverged in a fork leading down to the beach. I preferred this walk, and followed it; when I had walked some distance I reached the beach, the waters now quietly swelling and falling beneath the brilliant rays of the sun; the road was thickly strewn with shells, some of which I picked up and examined; then, my mind naturally running back to philosophy, I compared human life, human joys, human expectations, to those shells at my feet, and those ruins on the cliff before me. As the light played upon the broken archway, the desolate courtyard, the ruined chambers, the falling turrets, I felt my old feelings of gloom and morbid thought come wandering back.

I ascended the hill by a beaten pathway, and wandered in and around the little temple; myself and my thoughts were the only inhabitants of the place. I gathered a bouquet of flowers, and was preparing to return, the moon having now risen: when, glancing up at the sky, I saw that which had been a few moments before so serene, dark and lowering; the horizon obscured by immense black clouds, which were rapidly spreading over the sky; heavy gusts were borne howling along, and the glaring foam of the waves was visible far away.

It was impossible to take the beach road under such circumstances—the tide having arisen, I was in danger of drowning; it was impossible to go through the woods the other side of the ruins—I was in danger of being lost in their density. I knew not what to do. Meanwhile the sky continued to darken; the moon was completely overcast; the wind continued to howl around me; the only thing to do was to remain in the temple, and claim the precarious benefit of its shelter. I could scarcely see to re-enter the ruins, and seated myself on a broken column in their midst; everything was buried in stones and darkness; the gloom was so intense I felt it.

The storm increased rapidly; the waves, lashed to fury, broke against the rocks with a roaring noise; the waves in the distance shone with phosphoric light; the clouds swept hither and thither over the face of the sky—now in tremendous masses, now scattered, white, dim, and ghost-like; such a scene as this was calculated to inspire any one with horror, and the blood ran cold in my veins as I sat and listened.

Thus it raged for I know not how long: I could not reckon time in such a place. I thought it must be two hours. Then another sound was mingled with the gale: a strange crashing, a wild, unearthly yell rang out on the storm—then all was absorbed in the rushing gale. Presently another interval of calm succeeded to these sounds of terror, when the waves and winds apparently paused to take breath, and gather their strength for another onset. The uproar of echoes, reverberating around me, was frightful: I almost thought demons from a lower world were playing their fantastic tricks within the old ruins. The weather during the day had been delightful, but the storm had rendered the air severe; and, as I sat shivering on the column, my hair standing on end, and teeth chattering with fear, the moon momentarily broke through the clouds, and disclosed the lurid landscape, strange and unearthly-looking by the mysterious light. I could not express on paper the agony I suffered, till, by the faint streaks of morning light in the east, I perceived day would soon dawn. The roar of the gale gradually subsided, the clouds became less strongly dark, the ocean's waves less tumultuous; and, an hour afterwards, when I could fully perceive objects, I saw the light of day—and it shone upon a strange scene! When assured that the danger was over, I summoned strength to rise; my trembling limbs almost refused to support me. I wished to return to the house, anxious about my child. Walking down the hill towards the beach, my attention was attracted by pieces of spars, rigging, and a small boat, stranded by the waves: this explained to me the horrid sound I had heard during the storm. A ship had been wrecked off the coast, which in that part abounded in breakers. Numerous other objects now caught my astonished eyes: a little further on a number of bales and some personal property lay scattered about; an object, clothed in white, was stretched across my way: going towards it, I knelt down and sought to distinguish what it was: it was a corpse—a female form; the drapery concealed the face. I raised the robe from the countenance, and beheld! yes—no—yes—it was Blanche!

Blanche! Great heaven! what could it mean? Yes, it was her! There she was, dead: the same calm, sweet features; the same graceful form, dressed in white; the fair arms crossed on the breast. From the position in which I found her, she seemed not to have made the slightest effort to save herself: the angels of heaven seemed to have fanned her with their wings—so innocently calm—so pure looked she. But how came she on board this unhappy bark? Where was she going to? I had supposed that when she fled from Naples, it was to some foreign land—not to remain in Italy. And where was her lover? I resolved to leave the body, and go to some fishermen's huts on the cliff behind the ruin, and seek assistance—to have the body conveyed to town. As I prepared to do so, several other bodies presented themselves to my gaze, and, in the corpse of a man, lying with his face exposed, I recognised Lord Glenfells. He was dressed in royal blue cloth, such as he had always worn (preserving his English customs) at Naples. One hand was buried in his bosom, the other hung stiff and cold by his side; and, even in death, he retained his perfect beauty. This unexpected, incomprehensible event, coming so suddenly upon me after my own sorrows and the fright from the storm, overpowered me; and, sitting down on a fragment of stone, I wept over the bodies. Along the beach for a quarter of a mile the wreck was strewn in confusion: masts, cargo, rigging, luggage, all lay in different positions. The principal part of the passengers and crew probably had perished. One or two bodies came floating along as I frantically rushed up the hill again, in the direction of the fishermen's huts. They were not there when I reached them—gone, an old woman told me, to plunder the wreck. She and a young girl were the only occupants of the hut, and I earnestly entreated them to return with me to the shore, and carry the body of Blanche to their house, to remain there till I could obtain assistance from Baie. They consented to accompany me, and we returned together: they talking incessantly about the storm and the wreck, wondering what the name of the vessel was, and whence it came. The bodies were undisturbed when I reached them. The woman, apparently used to such scenes, carelessly took up the inanimate form of my beloved friend, and strode away to the house again, while the girl remained to watch that of Lord Glenfells.

Meanwhile the sun had fully risen, and threw his golden rays on the scene. The waves had subsided somewhat: they were growing calmer. The sky was bright and glowing; the hues of morning lit up the shores.

The wreckers were busy at their plunder—wretchedly dressed—some of them in tatters, running here and there—even the dead bodies they spared not. The girl sat down on the sand, near the gurgling waves, and I, standing on my feet, regarded the fair young Englishman. His eyes, which in life had been a soft, brilliant blue, were wide open, and their unnatural glare startled me. The deadly pallor of his features, and the languid air his form and face bore, too surely showed that life was not there. Presently the old woman returned, and, with the aid of her husband, an athletic peasant, they raised the corpse, and I and the girl following, went back whence we came.

They laid the two beautiful, yet guilty lovers, side by side on a rustic bed, poor and lowly as the lot of those to whom it belonged. Then the woman began to wash away the sand which thickly obscured their faces, and gathered on their clothes, all the while uttering sad cries that two so beautiful should die. Wiping the tears from my eyes, I turned to the peasant, and asked him if he could proceed immediately to my house at Baie, procure biers to take the bodies thither, and tell my maid and some of the peasants there to come also? He replied with alacrity that he would, and departed.

When the sand and red clay of the shore were entirely cleared from their persons, I regarded the corpses more attentively. Two years had not changed my Blanche: she was as beautiful as in those times past, when we sang together at Naples. I remembered the night of her departure, and her nocturnal farewell—so sad, so strange. Where had she gone then, and whither was she going now, in this ship? Perhaps again to Parthenope, when the scissoring of the fatal sisters cut short the thread of her days. Oh, unhappy fate—sad destiny!

Lord Glenfells then continued faithful to his vows of faith and love. Oh! marvellous instance of attachment in a man, that his love should last two years. Perhaps, if there were more women like her, their love would last longer. Together they had died, and now it was my sad task to see them buried amid the wild, romantic scenery of Baie.

I was alone with the bodies for more than an hour, ere the peasant came back with my poor, astonished Pasiphae, accompanied by several men, bearing handbiers. News of the shipwreck had reached the town, and great fear had been entertained lest some evil had befallen me, as hour after hour passed away, and I came not, and the terrible storm arose. Great was their amazement when they beheld me watching two corpses, and when they saw the agony imprinted on my face. The sympathising Pasiphae threw herself at my feet, and weepingly buried her face in the folds of my robe.

"This is a most inexplicable affair, my poor Pasiphae!" said I. "I will tell you some other time. I could not return to you last evening. I spent the night in the ruins of the temple, to avoid the storm. I wish to get home quickly."

"The sweet child wept much last night, my lady, but I hushed him to sleep at last," said my faithful servant.

I turned to the men, who had placed upon the bier Lord Glenfells and his beautiful Blanche, and, after paying the women for their attention, the mournful cortege set out.

We took the road along the beach to the fork, whence it diverged to the house; then following that, we soon arrived at home. The women came rushing to the door to see so strange a sight, and scarce believed their eyes when they beheld what I brought. They were carried up stairs into an empty room, next to mine, placed on a bed, covered with a white coverlid; and I left the room, locking the door and taking the key with me. I returned to my child.

I buried them at Baie. They have a lonely grave on that rock-bound coast, at the top of the cliff on which the ruined Temple of Fortune stands. The ocean's waves wash the base of the rocks, and the flowers and trees are gathered thickly around it. No splendid monument marks the last repose of one of England's brightest, handsomest sons; no inscription tells of the fair, ill-fated songstress. Her death, like her life, was isolated. But her memory, at least, is still fondly cherished by one who knew and loved her well.

When last I visited their graves, I found them overgrown with flowers—odoriferous and beautiful as had been the character of Blanche. There the rose, the acacia, japonica, myrtle, and cypress, form unfading bowers, unfailing mourners, over their graves. When the sea is calm, the quiet murmur of its waves seems to utter unknown regrets. In storms their swelling tumult sounds like a requiem. Vain would it be for me to describe the many sad hours I passed there, silently offering as an ovation the grief of a sincere heart. During my stay at Baie, not a day elapsed but found me a visitor there. There the sadness of the scene taught me to moderate my own regrets—taught me to uplift my heart to God—taught me to be humble, thankful, and resigned.

A month passed without my hearing anything further from my husband or Count Malabrella. I was terribly anxious: I dreaded lest something of a frightful character had happened, and that they feared to tell me of it. I sometimes walked half the night up and down my room, conjuring my brains to imagine the reasons of this mysterious silence; but I could bring my mind to no clear explanation. I could resolve on nothing; everything was dark to me. At length the dreaded, yet wished-for explanation came. Another courier came with another letter, which I have still preserved. I submit it to you:

"I have made my escape. I have left Naples and Italy for ever. Had I awaited my trial, I know I should have been utterly lost. I jeopardized my life in getting out of prison; but am safe now. I release you from all faith, all allegiance to me; forget me—heaven never intended us for each other. Return to the gay world: may you be happy. Kiss my child for me. I had a presentiment, when I stood over his cradle, that I should never see him more; his baby-features are imprinted on my soul; they will only be obliterated when I shall cease to breathe. Remember me in those prayers you so fervently offer to your God, and may that God watch over you.

"I go to seek a new fortune in some foreign land; as yet I know not where: everything in the future is dark and uncertain. Farewell! Farewell!"

"SERVAL."

When I had read this strange epistle, and fully comprehended it, I remained petrified with amazement: the tone of it was so reckless, wild—almost incoherent—I scarcely believed it to be my husband's. He gave me up; he told me to forget him; to return to the world I had quitted for him. He seemed to write without feeling any regret, any sadness at this eternal separation. His child alone elicited a sentiment of humanity: and this was all the reward I received for the forbearance I had manifested towards him—the devotion I had practised for more than two years to that unhappy man. I was thrown off—cast away!

After reflection, I resolved to go to Naples, to learn something definite. Our travelling arrangements were soon made, and the following afternoon we left Baie.

The classic ruins, the ocean, the beautiful shore, and the graves of Blanche and Lord Glenfells, were soon lost to my longing eyes, in the windings of the road. The town, the mountains, sea, rivulets, ruins and all, were enveloped in the blue mists of heaven.

The next day I again beheld the fair city of Naples rising on the hill, with her lofty towers, gardens, churches, castles, and splendid private dwellings, rearing their superb height one above the other; and again I drove through the beautiful street Toledo. I hastened to the house of Madame Bonni; but two years had created changes in Naples. The good woman was gone, and another dwelt in her house. I secured apartments, how, ever, in one of the most retired hotels, and then sent for the Court Guide, to ascertain the residence of Count Malabrella, whom I regarded as my only friend in this great trouble: it was brought, and after ascertaining his address, I sent mine to him.

He came immediately. When he entered my parlour I rushed towards him, and, showing him the letter I held in my hand, exclaimed:

"Is this true? Oh! tell me, dear count, is it true?"

"Be calm, dear lady, I entreat you; be composed; this is an unexpected meeting. I had intended coming to you at Baie to-morrow, to tell you the strange news."

"But tell me, I entreat you, is it true? has my husband really escaped from prison? has he left me in this way?"

"He has escaped, and gone I know not where. Three days ago I visited him, to tell him some favourable news regarding himself: he seemed cheerful; spoke much of you, and confidently of the result of the trial. Yesterday it was noised abroad that he had fled from Naples. Doubting whether it was not mere rumour, I inquired, and found it true: it astonished me much. Knowing your husband's determined character, I had been actively engaged in obtaining all the influence I could in his favour. I doubt not, myself, had he awaited his trial, it would have terminated favourably."

"Gone! gone!" I cried—thinking only of the desertion—"for ever gone! and what is to become of me and the child?"

"Don't give way to grief, madame; be comforted; you will find numerous friends—those who have known and loved you before your marriage."

"Oh, count! I feel as if this were the acme of my misfortunes!"

"I know life has had many changes for you; but sorrow will not last for ever; and destiny sometimes presents a pleasant face."

Thus for an hour he endeavoured to divert my mind from dwelling with too much intensity on this inexplicable affair; but in vain did I try to talk or think of something else; and he, perceiving the abstraction of my thoughts, probably thought that quiet and repose would be the best consolers at that moment; and, after repeated adjurations to be calm, to hope, he went away. I appreciated the delicacy of his behaviour in not reverting to anything that could pain me: he had impressed me agreeably at first, and acquaintance had not dissipated that impression. I was determined, however, to learn more concerning my husband; and that day, calling a calesso, bade him drive to the Barberini prison. It was situated in an obscure quarter of the city, down near the harbour, surrounded by dark and dirty-looking buildings on all sides, and itself presenting an appearance of dark, impenetrable gloom. I alighted, and entered the keeper's room, where he sat, amid old papers of all descriptions, reading from a great book, which looked to me like a ledger. Great bunches of keys adorned the smoked walls, dirty and old as their proprietor; and an old writing-desk stood in one corner, with a high stool before it.

He rose civilly as I entered, and asked in what he could please me. I told him that I had come to ask the particulars of my husband's escape, and then informed him that I was the wife of Monsieur de Servat. He seemed surprised at that; and, on my requesting to be shown my husband's cell, immediately acquiesced, locking the door of his stronghold previous to accompanying me.

We threaded several long stone galleries, off which, on either side, opened the doors of the cells. Then we descended a long flight of stairs; then came another gallery; then he paused, and unlocked an iron door, and ushered me into the dreary cell, lighted by one window, in which Rinaldo had written me the letter I received at Baie. One of the iron bars of the window was gone; the keeper pointed to it, and said:

"Through that aperture your husband made his escape, two nights ago. I know not how he obtained possession of the file with which he sawed apart the bar; but he did so, and swam, probably, to the opposite shore; at any rate, nothing has been learned of him, though government has sent spies everywhere to look for him."

I looked down at the stone pavement at my feet—and up at the dim light above my head—and soliloquised, that a month in a dungeon like that must be equivalent to ten years in the world.

"Did not one come to see my husband during his imprisonment?" I asked, wishing to learn if any one besides Count Malabrella had visited him.

"A tall, dark gentleman came often; and once another man came—but he wore a cloak, and I could not see his face: as he presented a permit, I admitted him."

"That must have been the man who was accessory to his departure," thought I; and having nothing further to say to the keeper, I left the cell and returned to the carriage, and was driven home to the hotel.

All the inquiries I made were baffled; all my suppositions were useless; nothing further concerning my husband's dubious fate was learned. I found myself once more thrown out on the world, obliged to resort to my usual resources for a support. The old manager of the San Carlo theatre, hearing I wished to return to the stage, called on me, and I entered into an engagement with him to perform in one of my old operas. I cannot describe the heartaches I experienced at being obliged to resume the laborious and distasteful profession I had so gladly resigned: but something must be done—I could not remain idle—I knew of no other means by which I could maintain myself as well as by singing, and therefore decided on that.

The night of my reappearance, a crowded house awaited me; and the Austrian nightingale, in her misfortunes, was more admired than had been the gay Genevra; yet, could those brilliant crowds have looked into my heart, and have seen the bitter sadness imprinted there, even my rivals would have pitied me; but the world only beheld the celebrated beauty—the great singer; and my rivals could see nothing—their envy blinded them. My only joy was to return from those crowded houses—to run away from the plaudits of the multitude, the dubious admiration of the men, the patronising envy of the women, and bury myself in the solitude of my own room—devote myself to my smiling, happy boy. It was generally understood that I denied myself to all visitors: consequently I was not annoyed by any of those disagreeable attentions so often extended to actresses. I even wished to deny myself to the count, dreading the consequences of such companionship; but gratitude forbade such incivility, and he came.

One evening Raphael had fallen asleep on a sofa, after creeping about on the floor till sleep overcame him. As I sat near him, listening to his gentle breathing, I heard a light step on the carpet, and turning, saw the count. He sat down on the sofa, at the feet of Raphael, and, looking at him, said:

"How sweetly he slumbers how innocent is the sleep of a child!"

"Yes, their unsuspecting innocence is a charming attribute which they soon lose."

I never could raise my eyes when the count was present without encountering his fixed gaze—and I met it now, as I looked up from my child. He turned his away as I did so, and changed his hat from one hand to the other with a confused air.

"Can nothing be thought of? can nothing be done, to find out something more about Monsieur de Servat?" I suddenly inquired, reminded more strongly by the presence of the count, of my unhappy lord.

"Everything that the ingenuity of the government could devise, or I or others suggest to find him out, has been done—but in vain. He has baffled pursuit. Perhaps some day in future will find you reunited to him on some fair isle, of which you and your child will form the Venus and Cupid—your husband the Mars; then, in those days of sunshine, all recollections of unhappy hours will be forgotten: that will be another sphere of existence."

"It is very kind of you to reassure me, but I am convinced that will never be."

"It is possible, and whatever is possible is probable. As for me," he continued, "I wonder what fate has in store for me: a life of loneliness, I suppose, as it always has been—travelling, wandering alone."

"Oh, say not so!" I cried; and, anxious to soothe, I laid my hand on his; "not if you were near me, should you be lonely; friend to me and my husband, I would always cheer you."

"You!" he exclaimed, catching my hand; "oh, heaven itself would seem to dawn upon me, could I always be near you as I am now!" Then, as if amazed at the fervour with which he had spoken, he dropped my hand, and confusedly looked down. An agitated silence followed; this singular avowal had been so abrupt, it startled me into a tumult of thoughts I had not dreamed of for a long time past; my cheeks blushed carnation hues as I looked away. My confusion, however, did not last long; for the count, as if struggling against some feeling he wished to hide, rose abruptly, and ejaculated, as if with an effort:

"I have alarmed you; I have acted foolishly; but God knows it was involuntary; I did not intend to wound your feelings; forgive me, dear Lady Genevra—forgive me; good night!" He extended his small, thin hand for mine: with my head averted, I placed mine within his. He shook it gently, and when I looked up, he was gone. Oh, how fervently I wished I had a right ever to retain that hand—ever to lean on that arm, and gaze into those star-lit eyes—to feel that some one human being on earth cared for me, was true to me, would not desert me or disdain my love! Oh, how I wished for that faithful heart! And then to think I had found it, but under such circumstances that it was guilt itself to think of it! Had I not better determine never to see him again—to deny myself the syren-like attraction which was drawing me I know not where? Ought I not to think of my husband—to mourn his loss, regret his destiny? Yet he had himself bade me forget him—abandon all allegiance to him—be happy without him. What was to become of me? Whither should I turn for consolation? Monsieur Belmont had gone to Paris, to direct the opera there; Madame Bonni had left the city; sweet Blanche was dead, and Inez far away. Oppressed with these thoughts, I sank into a reverie, when my child stirred, and, turning, I took him in my arms.

CHAPTER XII.

In my loneliness, I reminded me of the words of the superior of the convent of Sacre Cœur, and resolved to visit her. The same nun admitted me, and I again found myself in the little convent parlour.

Presently I heard the rustling silk dress, and the superior stood before me. Her features bore the same calm expression of severity—her manner the same impressive solemnity. She immediately recognised me, and, pressing my hand, almost cordially said:

"Well, daughter, I see you again; you have remembered me; and how fares the world with thee? has not its hollow heartedness already tired you?"

"I feel tired of it sometimes, mother; and, remembering the invitation to visit you, which you gave me two years ago, I have come."

"You have done rightly, daughter: I am glad to see you. I think you told me you were a Catholic; I hope you still remain faithful to our blessed faith?"

"It has often been a consolation to me in much trouble."

I was about to enter into more general conversation, when other visitors came, and I took leave, the superior cordially bidding me adieu, and inviting me to come to mass in the chapel of the sisters.

Thinking upon the solitude of a convent life—the austerity of such an existence—I sought my room, where I found the count playing with Raphael's baby-rattle, to amuse him. He came towards me, as if doubtful of his reception after the incident of our last meeting; but, forgetting the slight pique I then felt—thinking only of the happiness of seeing him—I smiled, and extended my hand.

"You see I have been endeavouring to amuse little Raphael during your absence."

"For which I am very much obliged;" and, not knowing what to say—for his presence, of late, always embarrassed me—I sat down on the sofa, and, as the infant began to cry, told Pasiphae to take it away—which she did, and we were left alone. I turned, momentarily, to look from the window on the busy street; an audible sigh fell on my ear: when I turned round, the count was at my feet.

"Genevra! let me call you by that name!" said he. "Why should I seek to conceal a passion which I know you must have already discovered? why should I hesitate to declare that, of all the women I have ever seen in all the lands I have ever been, I single you out as the fairest, the noblest of all; that when I first saw you in the opera, I was struck with your beauty; and afterwards, in that lonely castle, where you led so isolated a life, a personal acquaintance did not dispel that illusion. Now, when I see you struggling against the adverse tide of life—forsaken by your husband—surrounded by envy, with no happiness save the society of your child—why will you not let me consecrate to your pleasure a soul which would be only too happy to dedicate itself to you? Why will you evade my sympathy? Why not let me be the sharer of those sorrows which you try to conceal?"

"Oh, count!" I cried, bursting into tears, as he held my hands; "you must not talk thus to me—remember I am a married woman: respect my situation. Whatever may be my sentiments towards you, I must smother them, and you, for my sake, must do the same!"

"I? No, never can I do that! your sweet image is too deeply impressed upon my heart: there shall it remain, a sacred solace to me. Oh! why did we not meet before your marriage, when you first made your appearance here—why do we only understand each other when it is too late?"

"Yes! ask the question of fate: in vain have I demanded it! Why do I continually long for a shade which eludes my grasp? Why does solitude ever haunt my footsteps?"

"But I offer you society, happiness; everything on earth that I can command shall be yours. Has not your husband deserted you? What faith do you owe to him? If you returned my love—if you would honour me by your confidence, imagine, my Genevra, what days of happiness might be in store for us!"

"Count!" I exclaimed, clasping both hands before my eyes; "forbear—I pray you forbear! I do like you—I acknowledge it; but this must be our last meeting. This must be the first, last, only expression of my feelings, and I feel I am doing wrong even in saying this. Consider, what happiness could I feel in doing anything that could reflect upon my character, hitherto so unblemished? What joy could I experience in a future clouded with shame? How differently should I regard you from that calm, abiding sentiment of security with which a wife regards her husband! What a tempest of emotions would succeed the happy quiet I have always enjoyed! And can you wish me to change even the uncertain life I now lead for such a scene? Depend upon it, dear count, we are better as we are. The feelings we now entertain for each other are pure: do not let us dim them by guilt!"

"You love me, then?" he whispered, still holding my hands; "you acknowledge it; say it again: if we are to be hereafter separated, let me at least be sure of that; say so, Genevra?"

"Why—oh, why do you still tempt me? If you know I like you, you know it without my telling you: words are easily spoken—they might deceive you!"

"Not words from your mouth, my Genevra! I distrust the world generally, but I know in whom to confide; and who could distrust you?"

"Oh! if you only knew how miserable I feel, you would pity me!" I passionately exclaimed, comprehending the necessity of our separation, yet feeling wretched at that thought. "Let us talk of something else; let us try and remain friends only."

"Friends!" said he, vehemently, starting from his knees, dropping my hands, and rapidly walking the room. "My feelings could never answer to so cold a title, nor could yours, if they are what I wish them to be. No, dear lady, we can never again be merely friends!" and he emphasised the word scornfully. He walked on for some minutes, then, suddenly pausing before me, looked long at my face.

"How beautiful, how truthful you are! How misplaced is your present position!" Then, as if animated by a frenzy of feeling, he again caught my hands, and, drawing me to the open window, said: "Genevra, look there—look at that beautiful scene! see how the sun glids the lofty domes; the tall trees, the gardens, the flowers! See how he warms whatever he looks upon, and his light might also warm two loving hearts, if my prayer was heard! Fly, Genevra—fly with me!" and he moved, drawing my hand towards the door; but I, though penetrated by a profound emotion, remained immovable, and, suppressing all external indications of it, quietly drew him back to the casement, and, pointing to the clear blue sky, now near twilight, said to him:

"You spoke to me allegorically; I will answer you the same. As you said to me at Baia, when we together stood upon the shore, watching the little schooner struggling for anchorage, which it at last secured, and you predicted that thus would it be with me; so do I say to you now—behold that heavy white cloud, obscuring the light of the sky; see, it gradually moves away, and the light shines clear again: so will destiny alter for us: wait and hope—everything is comprised in these words."

"No, Genevra, I have no hope now; this is not an occasion on which hope is permitted me. If this is our last meeting, and your refusal has signified it, give me one of those fair curls, that, when I look upon it, I may recall the lovely head on which it grew; yes, give me one of them, and let me paint your beautiful eyes, your lips, your cheeks, your whole face, your whole figure, on my heart; but memory has been the artist: who could paint as well as she?"

A pair of tapestry scissors lay upon the table: he took them up, and tremblingly severed one of my curls. It was soft and silky, and at least half a yard long. He smoothed the glossy tress, then laid it in his bosom, and turned from me as if to go. I saw nothing, felt nothing, but that he was going away.

"Stay! stay! you are not going from me thus indifferently; not thus for ever?"

"Have you not said so? have you not bade me go? am I not obeying you?"

"Yes, you are obeying me. I meant what I said; but stay yet awhile—I have something to say. I —," overpowered by my own sadness, my head sank upon his shoulder, and, with my hands pressed to my eyes, the tears forced their way through them. Suddenly he encircled me with his arms, and, bowing that proud yet noble head on mine, smoothed the ringlets from my brow.

"My beautiful Genevra—you will let me call you mine, will you not?" I bowed acquiescence—I could not speak. "Since you refuse my love, decline my visits, I shall write to you: you will not refuse me that pleasure, will you?"

"No," I stammered.

"To-morrow, then, a letter shall explain. Farewell, now—farewell, beautiful one!"

He went towards the door. I stood motionless. As he turned half round before opening the door, I involuntarily stepped towards him. He extended his arms—I rushed into them, and clung convulsively to him, as a drowning man catches at a straw.

"My God! how hard it is!" he ejaculated, as he tore himself away, and the echo of his footsteps died away on my ear. I still grasped at air, as if seeking him, and it was some moments before I could convince myself that he was really gone. Then I went to the windows, pushed back the curtains, admitted air and light, and sought to cool my burning forehead—to recall my scattered thoughts—but neither air nor light brought me relief. Objects were dim; nothing appeared as it had in the morning. The noise of voices and carts in the streets below sounded strange and unnatural. One only thought haunted me, dwelt in my mind, lingered in my ears: he was gone—I had sent him away. I knew I had acted honourably, uprightly; that I had shown myself to be virtuous and high principled; but I was miserable—utterly wretched. I recalled his winning ways, his lofty mind, his handsome person; I imagined my destiny united to his—imagined myself his wife—I could be his on no other terms. Then I revelled in ideal happiness—then no invidious fate stood between us, but I stood lawfully by his side—then I was happy.

Thus pre-occupied, agitated, and desponding, I sat till dusk had thrown a veil over the fair city. I did not notice, but dreamed on, and was only aroused from my meditations by the entrance of Pasiphae with lights.

The next morning, more dead than alive, I went to rehearsal. The performance was tedious—the theatre cold. I hurried through, glad to escape from the tiresome scene, and returned home, where Pasiphae handed me a letter. In haste and confusion I opened it. It was from the count:

"You have told me I cannot be to you what I wish to be. You have bade me be your friend, and as I cannot be that with safety either to you or myself, we must see each other no more; at least not now, as you say; but to me the prospect of a future lawful reunion is very dim and remote. But you have not denied me the honour and pleasure of writing to you, and that shall be a slight link of friendship between us when I am far away—for I intend leaving, a few days hence, for Epirus, having to-day resigned my commission as chamberlain to his majesty—and I shall treasure the precious replies you send me as mementoes breathing your own pure spirit.

"I shall resume my lonely wanderings in the Levant, where, two years ago, I spent many happy hours in silent contemplation. To those scenes I shall transport your fairy form, and in your imaginary society, the ruined grandeur of Athens, the stately remains of Agrigento, the classic shores of Troy, will acquire new beauties for me, from association. Would that you were with me—that your dreamy, philosophic mind, might conjure up visions of past magnificence, and revel in the recollections of what it was, contrasted with what it is!

"But why do I wander into dreams again? Suffice it to say, that I must go while yet I have the will to do so, and in bidding you farewell, I feel as if bidding adieu to life. But most generally in life so it is. No sooner have you found a sympathetic mind—one in whose society existence would wing itself away only too delightfully—than some fatal accident tears her away, as if Providence envied human felicity, so rarely is it found on earth. I know, however, that that angelic virtue which has so nobly sustained you thus far, will continue to do so to the end; and that it will, of itself, be a great reward. And that heaven may shower upon your pathway roses, the brightest, the most beautiful, is the fervent prayer of your own

"ALFIERI MALABRELLA."

Below his signature, was written in small characters: "I shall write you next from Epirus, and expect an answer there."

I read it again and again; I kissed the words and examined the handwriting; then I folded it, and carefully laid it away in an album. Within a week, then, he would be away on his journey to Epirus. Far away from me, I should only hear from him through the indifferent communication of letters; and how unhappy I should feel when I actually saw him depart. But I felt in my own heart that I had acted rightly, and the consciousness of moral rectitude upheld me.

That night I played the part of Norma to a crowded house. Again the lips and eyes of royalty applauded me. Never did I look better: the excitement of my mind had sent the hot blood to my cheeks, and my long auburn hair, falling to my waist in spiral ringlets, relieved my face. An unwonted inspiration came over me that night, and my voice was unusually clear; the house was in an uproar of delight; but neither elated by my triumph, nor caring for the admiration I elicited, I was about leaving the stage, when the silk curtains of the lower stage-box were drawn aside, and the beautiful, but pale and sad face of the count presented itself to my view. So sudden was the encounter of our eyes, so strange this unexpressed adieu, that I scarcely had recollection enough to leave the stage.

Determined to avoid the crowd which always awaited me in the green-room, I requested the manager to hand me to my calesso—which he did, and I drove to my hotel.

It was one o'clock. Pasiphae sat in the bed-room, near an open window; Raphael lay on his bed in a sweet slumber. I thought I saw something glitter on my dressing-table. Going towards it, I perceived a small Tripoli chain, with a tiny gold heart attached to it, and a slip of paper pinned to it, with these words written upon it:

"Let the child wear this in remembrance of me."

"MALABRELLA."

I asked Pasiphae who had brought it. She said an African servant had left it half an hour before. It was a delicate parting gift to my child, and a souvenir for me; but no—I was mistaken: so slight a present was not intended indirectly for me. Three days after, a small package was handed me. I opened it, and beheld an exquisite miniature of the count, set in brilliants. The beautiful black eyes seemed to smile on me with their languid fervour; the clear white complexion, the long nose—slightly aquiline—and waving black hair, were all detailed naturally; the blending and commingling of expression, which gave an air of haughtiness and benevolence to his countenance, was all there.

That was his parting gift; that day he left Naples.

If I had been unhappy in the struggle between love and duty, how much more so was I when left utterly alone in that great city; when I looked forward, and saw nothing; when I looked back on strange scenes, and at the present, which was so unsatisfactory.

I renewed my engagement, and continued to sing.

The stagnant calm of a monotonous routine requires little detail: to rise early, attend to my child, then go to rehearsal as often as a new opera was to be performed; practise my favourite songs, then walk on the Toledo, and dine at six, completed my daily existence. I received a glowing letter from the count, dated Epirus, in which he thrillingly described the country, dwelt upon its associations, its desolate, ruined condition now; then, delicately bringing the subject back to reality, spoke of himself, of me. I will not insert it here, nor the many others he sent me equally beautiful; my story is drawing to a close, my kind friend, and I am convinced its length must have already tired you.

He continued his travels in the Levant and through the East, while I went to Florence, to fulfil an engagement there. The charming society of that fair town; the fine scenery of the city itself, and the air of repose so different to the busy activity of Naples, combined to cheer and calm me. There I remained a month, and when I left, it was with feelings of regret. I carried away with me, they said, the hearts and imaginations of all; but if I did so, it was unconsciously, for never had I exerted myself less.

Genoa next claimed my attention, and it was three months ere I saw Naples again. The laurels I won seemed to me to adorn the head of a corpse, so listlessly did I regard my fame.

Visions of my husband and the count haunted my dreams, and I always saw them under strange circumstances, in strange places, when I would seem to be trying to reach either one or the other, but could not get near them—some obstacle always interposed; then, in my despair, I would feel as I felt at parting with the count. From these tumultuous dreams I awoke in terror, thankful they were mere dreams; and my perceptions being rendered more acute by these nocturnal visitations, I would renew my anxious searches for my husband, and send new agents to endeavour to discover him; but in vain—I heard nothing more of him.

Six months elapsed in the same quiet way, when one day, as I was waking up and down my parlour, leading Raphael by the hand, a servant announced that an old man wished to see me.

"Show him in," said I, and he presently returned, ushering in a tall man, attired in sailor's clothes. He came towards me, holding his tarpaulin-hat in his hand, and apparently confused at my presence.

"Is this the lady?" asked he, bashfully.

"I am Madame de Serval—do you wish to see me?"

"Yes, lady; I have a letter for you from Pondicherry."

"From Pondicherry—who can it be from? I know no one there. Give it me!"

I extended my hand, and the sailor placed in it a letter, coarsely folded and sealed. I hastily tore it open, and read the following:

"A gentleman, giving his name as Monsieur de Serval, committed suicide in my house six days ago, by blowing his brains out with a pocket-pistol! Having by accident seen a Neapolitan paper, containing a description of a Madame de Serval, a great singer, I address this letter to the lady in question, thinking, from the names, that there may be some relationship between the dead gentleman and the lady. If there is, I beg she will answer this, and tell me what is to be done with his effects, which consist of several large chests, heavily locked with padlocks, and four trunks, together with a toilette case of rare value—the interior being set with gold—and the utensils of the same metal, adorned with precious stones.

"The gentleman was buried in the English burying-ground, and a small sum of money in his purse paid for his interment.

"Pondicherry, Jan. 10th." "JEROME TUBIA."

When I had read this fatal letter, I endeavoured to look around for the man who had brought it, but I could not see him: the room darkened, and, with a wild shriek, I fell into Pasiphae's arms, and lost all recollection.

* * * * *

I must carry you onward another year. When I had sufficiently recovered from the shock of this unexpected news, I sent to Pondicherry, and had the remains of my unfortunate husband brought to Naples. I thought I should have gone mad when I saw the body: and, with bitter sadness, did I consign it to Mother Earth. A marble tombstone was placed over him, in the cemetery of the convent of Sacre Cour. Of his adventures, or the cause of his going to Pondicherry, I never knew. All I learned was, that he came there, boarded at the house of the man who had written to me, and was gentlemanly and reserved. They knew nothing of him. He told no one anything concerning himself. He had been there some weeks at the period of his self-destruction; and it was merely by accident the landlord had supposed that perhaps there might be a relationship between two persons of the same name. Thus, through the merest chance, after six months of anxiety and sadness, did I once more, and for the last time, look upon my Rinaldo's face.

There is a feeling between husband and wife—that is to say, between husbands and wives of any sensibility, who have ever loved—there is, I say, a feeling of affection, which will sooner or later return, however alienated the parties may have become. As I stood over that lifeless form, and thought of his erratic career, and wayward, uncertain character; of his love for me, and subsequent desertion; his entering into a conspiracy against the government; then carried as a prisoner of state to Naples; his escape and after-wanderings—all rushed through my mind. Why had he acted thus? Why had he not been honest, upright? Why? Of whom could I ask that question? The earth falling on the coffin was my only reply.

Let me pass over those times.

It was in the dawn of spring; I occupied a small Gothic cottage, about a mile from Naples. Two domestics and my child—now a lisping, rosy boy—together with Pasiphae, were its sole tenants. The grounds of this sylvan abode were beautifully laid out, and the fairest flowers planted there. There, too, a marble fountain threw high in air its airy spray—cooling the air, and adorning the garden by its beauty.

Several rustic arbours, formed of the pliable bamboo, and shaped in Gothic turrets, were placed at intervals along the gravel walks, which, meeting in one broad attic before the porch, ended there; the birds sang their sweetest songs in the day-time; and at night the spiritual warbling of the nightingale was the inspirer of the hour.

Here, one sunny afternoon, I sat under the shade of a tree, watching Raphael, and Zoe, his pet dog, running races. The frolicsome glee of the child, the graceful antics of the dog, as he sometimes ran after his baby master—sometimes solicited pursuit in return—amused and diverted me. As the child grew older I could trace his father's lineaments in his young features; and the thoughts which were recalled by that resemblance only rendered me sadder than I was. I was reading Petrarch's sonnets, a volume of which had been presented me by my husband during the first months of my marriage: their gloomy descriptions of love and beauty entranced my soul; and, absorbed, I read on, forgetful even of the playful cries of Raphael, when I saw Pasiphae coming towards me, her face lighted with more than usual animation; and, with a gleeful voice, she told me a man desired to see me in the saloon.

"Ask him to send me word what he wants, Pasiphae. I do not wish to see any one this morning. Why did you not deny me yourself—you know I do not want to talk?" was my reply; for I was indisposed to see visitors, or answer business engagements.

"Do come, my lady—do come!" said Pasiphae, urgently and joyfully; "indeed you won't regret it; the person has something particular to say."

Thus urged, and wondering what it could be, I left my book on the seat, and, taking Raphael by the hand, followed by the dog, went into the house. The rooms were all on the ground-floor; a broad hall ran through the house, and opening off it were four rooms: two were fitted up as saloons, the other two constituted my bed-room and dining-room. They were furnished alike, with red velvet drapery, Turkey carpets, and mirrors. Pasiphae regularly each day placed fresh flowers in the Chinese vases on the marble consoles, and their delightful perfume scented the rooms with oriental fragrance.

I entered the room, holding Raphael by the hand, and, coming from the clear light of the garden into the crimson light of the saloon, I could scarcely discern objects.

A tall figure stood with its back towards me, facing the window. As I stepped forward on the carpet, it turned, and I beheld Count Malabrella. Animated with a supernatural joy, I sprang towards him.

"It is you!" I cried; "oh, is it you? You have come! you have come!"

"Yes, beloved one!" answered he, as he clasped me in his arms. "At last we are united: now the unstable dreams which have buoyed me up through this long separation, and my lonely wanderings, are realised; now we meet, not to feel again the same sorrow we mutually experienced at our last parting!"

"Oh, let me die now!" I answered, as I laid my head on his breast; "for now I am happy, and life cannot have many repetitions of such emotions for me!"

"Instead of dying, let us picture long years of happiness, and be determined they should be verified," replied my Alfieri, laughingly.

Naples once again saw me as a bride: not as at the first, blooming with health and joy, my mind in an ecstatic rhapsody of romance—but a woman chastened by experience, that best of monitors. Subdued, but not downcast, was my mien the morning of my bridal; the sobered happiness of my husband's face was mirrored in mine—and surely I could not have had a more beautiful mirror.

And in that marriage I was supremely happy; my life glided like a fairy dream away. The elegance of mind and manner which captivated at first, did not prove, on mature acquaintance, a fictitious dress, worn merely for ornament. Judgment, tempered by feeling, guided him, and in obeying such a guide, how could he fail to act rightly? The calm good sense, the nobility of soul, and sweet disposition of Alfieri, day by day more completely gained my loved and esteem.

Before leaving Naples, on a journey we took, soon after our marriage, to the north of Italy, I chanced to meet, in the suburbs of the town—while walking with my husband—old Acte, the sybil of the rock. She stopped my way, and, looking at me with her piercing eyes, said:

"Well, fair lady, we meet again: I knew we should; and the other, where is she? You need not tell me: I know already—she is dead. She lies on the shore, where the winds howl and the waters beat. Say, lady—say—have not my words proved true?" demanded she, in her shrill tones.

"Yes, good woman, you were right," was my hasty reply, as I and my husband hurried away, anxious to avoid any further conversation with the weird-woman.

Soon after we took our departure on a tour through the north of Europe. Those magnificent cities, beautiful scenery, and the different nations we visited, acquired new interest in my eyes, when viewed in such society. Then, after we had satiated our eyes and ears with the wonders of other lands, we came finally to the Eternal City, where I have had the pleasure of forming your acquaintance; and I number it as one of the most agreeable episodes of my life; so, also, does my husband.

My tale is done. You have asked it of me, and, knowing your integrity, I feel no hesitancy in complying with the request. The hours I have passed in your studio have been among the pleasantest I have spent in Rome.

Should the count and myself never have the pleasure of seeing you again, at least the copy of my portrait and this diary will seem to be an invisible link to the chain of thoughts between us three.

Adieu, dear Signor Carrara: we shall leave to-morrow, and I have completed this in haste, to leave with you.

GENEVRA MALABRELLA.

The latter part of this diary was very old, yellow, and much torn, from apparently repeated readings: I had some difficulty in deciphering it. Its perusal had deeply interested me, so I folded it up, and rose upon my feet. I saw my little time-piece indicated the hour of one.

The next day I waited on Signor Ferra, the attorney: he lived in a dark, dirty street, in an old tumble-down house. Upon opening Carrara's will, I found, to my utter amazement, that, with the exception of the house in which he lived, and the gallery of paintings, he had made me heir to his considerable property in Rome and the environs, together with the beautiful portrait of Genevra. My kindness to the solitary old artist had not been ill repaid: so impossible it is for us, in this strange existence, to foresee the result of even the slightest action; and which only more fully demonstrated to me the propriety of always being polite.

A few days after, my friend Morton and myself left Rome for Athens.

[END OF "GENEVRA."]

A BOY OF EIGHTY AND HIS FATHER.—There is now living at Tolleshunt Major, Essex, a labourer, named Joseph Bateman, who has reached the advanced age of 102 years. His wife has been dead many years, but he has a son living, eighty years old, and the veteran is often solaced by the boy calling upon him to have a little chat.

PASTIME.—The possibility of putting a bulk so large as twenty shillings, weighing four ounces, into a wine-glass already full to the brim, may be doubted; yet with a steady hand it may be thus accomplished: First procure a wine-glass, wipe it perfectly dry inside and out, especially round the rim; pour the water gently into it from a spouted mug until the glass is full to the brim; then drop the shillings edgewise gently in. Immediately the edge of the shilling touches the water, let it fall. Be careful not to wet the edges of the glass. Spring water is better than soft.

THE LATE MR. GEORGE STEPHENSON.

STATUE OF THE LATE GEORGE STEPHENSON.

It has passed into a proverb, that public bodies are essentially selfish, that, being all head and no heart, they are incapable of gratitude.

We fear the accusation is too substantially founded to be denied; for, when a multitude of money-making interests converge to one point, there seems, by a tacit unanimity, to be amongst them an understood repudiation of all the warmer impulses that actuate mankind individually.

This has always sounded like a reproach—and, in the present day, justly so; but formerly it did not consistently apply, for corporations originally were defensive associations, managed in a defensive spirit. Thus, they were necessarily sordid in their conduct; and that led to such a mean appreciation of everything beyond the narrow boundaries of their operations, that they were as incapable of rewarding merit as of giving liberal encouragement to a splendid suggestion. The same feeling prevails in all those corporations that have been permitted to rest on their ancient bases. The universities are examples in point; the City of London is another; for, while clinging to Smithfield Market and such ugly obstructions as Temple Bar, it has coldly rejected a comprehensive scheme for a central railway terminus.

But, with the establishment of railways, a better spirit began to prevail. The grandeur of the idea, and the magnitude of the works that had to be executed, contributed largely to render these modern corporations more liberal in their management and more enlarged in their views. Owing everything to mechanical genius, the directors of these undertakings have considered mechanical genius worthy of reward instead of neglect. But hitherto, in the majority of instances, the reward has been not at all proportionate to the merits of the recipient. A mere pecuniary payment, the discharge of an ordinary money obligation, is surely not such a recognition of rare mental endowments as ought to satisfy such men as Brunel, Stephenson, or any other of the great engineers whose names are patent to the whole world. Yet this has precisely been the only kind of acknowledgment any one of them has received, beyond formal votes of thanks and the applause of dinner parties. While our towns swarm with statues of naval and military heroes, we look in vain for monuments in honour of Watt, of Telford, of Arkwright, of Stephenson, or of the father of the steam-engine, the Marquis of Worcester. Glory, in this country, would seem to be reflected only in the horrors of warfare; and we think it greatly to the discredit of our railway companies, that they should not have earlier exerted themselves to do something towards rescuing the national character from this ignominy. England owes all her present greatness to her men of thought—it is her boast, and poets have nervously apostrophised the fact:

Thou in the soul of man—thy better wealth—
Art richest. Nature's noblest produce, thou
Beatest with an opulence prodigal; this, thy right,
Thy privilege of climate and of soil.

How we have hitherto estimated this "privilege," is too notorious for comment.

Railway companies, being modern institutions, ought not to have submitted to the trammels of ancient precedents, but boldly have started a new era in the history of British appreciation of native worth, and the immortal influences of power founded on the labours of men who have devoted their energies to the development of newer and grander modes of working out a more perfect civilisation for the human race. The various railway termini might have been so adorned with tributes to "nature's noblest produce," that the legislature so lavish, when a warrior's name is to be graced, and the people so indifferent, unless stirred by "sonorous metal, blowing martial sounds," might each have been shamed into a better course of conduct, and a keener sympathy for the greatness that really builds up the glory of man.

However, we have an impression that this omission, in the course of a few years, will not have to be charged to our railway boards, for there are some promising indications of a more liberal spirit prevailing amongst them—and not the least cheering among them is the evidence we have before us, that the men who planned and executed

Structures of more ambitious enterprises
Than minstrels, in the age of old romance,
To their own Merlin's magic have ascribed, will not go down to posterity unhonoured, save by the ever diligent pen of the biographer, or the esteem of true greatness, which even tradition faithfully transmits from age to age.

At the metropolitan station of the London and North Western Railway, it is proposed to erect—or, before our publication is issued to our readers, it is likely there will be erected—a statue to the memory of GEORGE STEPHENSON, the celebrated engineer.

This piece of sculpture, of which we present our readers with an engraved copy, represents the great constructor of the first long passenger line in England, in "his habit when he lived." The likeness is remarkable, and the whole attitude characteristic of the unostentatious deportment of the man who was "DETERMINED NOT TO BE PUT DOWN,"—although a member of a parliamentary committee, before which he said "it would not be difficult to make a locomotive travel from fifteen to twenty miles an hour," declared that "such an engineer could only be fit for a lunatic asylum," and he had to struggle against opinions which obtained uncompromising advocacy in the highest quarters. The "Quarterly Review," of the time when railways were first proposed, thus assailed Stephenson and his scientific compeers: "As to those persons who speculate on making railways general throughout the kingdom, and superseding all the canals, all the waggons, mail and stage-coaches, post-chaises, and, in short, every other mode of conveyance by land and water, we deem them and their visionary schemes unworthy of notice. The gross exaggerations of the powers of the locomotive steam-engine—or, to speak in plain English, the steam-carriage—may delude for a time, but must end in the mortification of those concerned."

Stephenson was not a man to be beaten by mere writing, or the sarcasms of those who then, as in every period, are to be found resolutely setting their faces against change of any description. He persevered with his brilliant suggestions, as only a man who has unlimited confidence in himself can; and lived long enough not only to triumph over all his adversaries, but to see railways actually supersede "every other mode of conveyance."

In No. 188 of the LONDON JOURNAL, we gave a sketch of the career of this distinguished engineer, and now, while paying to the directors of the London and North Western Railway Company the compliment they have justly earned, by this posthumous tribute to the genius of George Stephenson, it will be sufficient if we direct the attention of our readers to this statue, as a graceful as well as eloquent exposition of what integrity, mental energy, and high moral courage can accomplish, even under the most adverse circumstances.

The late George Stephenson was the son of a poor collier, and he himself worked in a coal-pit until he was fourteen years of age. His first essay in mechanics was in repairing his own old eight-day clock, and his next, putting in order the engine at the colliery in Killingworth, where he was employed as breaksmen. There he began to study the steam-engine, perfected himself in the mathematical sciences, and in 1814, when only thirty-three years of age, he had not only made and tested locomotives, but was the patentee of engines which went beyond all that had previously been constructed, in the perfection and performance of the machinery. Those seventeen years were unquestionably the most arduous as well as the most creditable portion of his life. He had not only to study after his severe daily labour, but to contend with the scepticism of friends as well as the world, and those cold-hearted sneers which enthusiastic genius invariably encounters in the dawn of its career. However, the future railway engineer was dauntless—he toiled late and early. Like the oak—

Type of an honest English heart—

he nobly braved the storm of ridicule and doubt by which he was assailed, and soon demonstrated the practicability of drawing heavily-laden trains of waggons from the coal-pits to the ships in the Tyne. His reputation had extended far and wide; and when the Liverpool and Manchester Company, after surmounting enormous difficulties, obtained their Act of Parliament, he was selected to be the engineer. How he succeeded in his daring attempt to surpass in mechanical hardihood all that had previously been attempted in engineering, the history of that undertaking sufficiently attests. The works were the first of the kind in the world; and, when it is considered that the scheme was quite novel—that hills had to be pierced, embankments formed, viaducts built, and Chat Moss, a spongy bog of four miles, converted into a solid road—some idea may be formed of the skill as well as courage of the engineer, and the confidence of the directors in his ability and resources; for, without the latter, Stephenson must have paused just on the threshold of his triumph.

But probably what contributed more than anything else to the successful establishment of railways as a system, was the successful adoption of locomotives as a tractive power. After the Liverpool and Manchester Company had decided in favour of locomotives, Stephenson, Hackworth, Braithwaite, and Ericsson, entered the lists to contend for a prize, which each knew perfectly well was one of the most dazzling ever offered to competition in the world of mechanical science. The 8th of October, 1829, was the eventful day fixed for the trial, and Stephenson—to adopt a jockey phrase literally applicable—came to the post with his Rocket, Hackworth with his Sans Pareil, and Braithwaite and Ericsson with the Novelty. The test assigned was to run thirty miles along a level, at not less than ten miles an hour, with a load three times the weight of the engine.

As our readers are well aware, the Rocket was the winner, having reached so high a speed at one time as twenty-nine miles an hour. This was astounding. All scepticism on the subject, like a decent old lady, went to bed, and died a peaceful, natural death; and Stephenson thenceforth became, to use an Americanism, one of the most distinguished men of the day. His fame was on every lip, and thus, at the age of forty-eight, in the very prime of his useful life, he had not only securely laid the foundation of his own success, but demonstrated, beyond all cavil or question, the wonderful superiority of the locomotive steam-engine over every other known tractive power. His competitor on that occasion, Mr. Ericsson, has since startled the two hemispheres with his caloric ship—all good fortune and prosperity attend on so faithful a son of science; but we question whether the present generation will date the commencement of a new era in civilisation at any later period than that interesting 8th of October, 1829. The hero of that day is now in his silent grave, but his memory and reputation must endure through untold ages; and those who gaze upon his familiar lineaments, as they appear in dumb significance in the great hall of the Euston Square station, should bear in their remembrance that their living original started in life amid the gloom of a coal-pit, and descended to the tomb rich in everything contributory to the glory, honour, and happiness of mankind.

CHANNING AT SCHOOL.—There was a beaming beauty about the boy Channing; his eye brilliant, his cheeks glowing, his light-brown hair falling in curls upon his shoulders. In the dame's school, where he received the first elements of his education, he was distinguished for his goodness. "I wish in my heart," said his mistress, to an unruly companion, "you were like William Channing." "Oh," exclaimed the poor child, "I can't be like him; 'tis not half so hard for him to be good as it is for me!"

THE FIRST PITT IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Mr. Bancroft, writing on the repeal of the Stamp Act, says: "Early the next day every seat in the House of Commons had been taken; between four and five hundred members attended. Pitt was ill, but his zeal was above disease. 'I must get up to the house as I can,' said he; 'when in my place, I feel I am able to remain through the debate, and cry aye to the repeal with no sickly voice;' and he hobbled into the house on crutches, swathed in flannels; huzzas as he passed through the lobby, by almost all the persons there." [He was partial to appearing in Parliament on crutches, wrapped up in blankets.]

MUTUAL FORBEARANCE.—That house will be kept in turmoil where there is no tolerance of each other's errors, no lenity shown to failings, no meek submission to injuries, no soft answers to turn away wrath. If you lay a single stick of wood upon the hand-irons and apply fire to it, it will go out; put on another stick, and they burn; add half a dozen, and you will have a grand conflagration. There are other fires subject to the same conditions. If one member of a family get into a passion, and is let alone, he will cool down, and possibly get ashamed, and repent. But oppose temper to temper; pile on the fuel; draw others into the scrape, and let one harsh word be followed by another, and there will soon be a blaze which will envelop them all in its lurid splendours. The venerable Philip Henry understood this well, and when his son Matthew, the commentator, was married, he sent these lines to the wedded pair:

Love one another, pray oft together, and see
You never both together angry be.
If one speak fire, 't'other with water come;
Is one provoked? be 't'other soft and dumb.

[THE BRIDE OF NAPOLEON III.]

THE EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.

I looked on the mountains—a vapour lay,
Folding their heights in its dark array;
Thou breakest forth—and the mist became
A crown.

On the 16th of April, 1746, two armies were engaged in furious contest on a barren, black, ugly moor, in the Highlands of Scotland. A crown and innumerable destinies hung on the event. On one side was arrayed the chivalry of Scotland, headed by a prince cursed with the indecision of his race; on the other, the disciplined bands of England, led by valiant captains, who fought by rule and compass, but inspired by, in the true soldier's breast, the indomitable principle of duty. Even now, as the plain of Culloden glooms on the imagination, it might be exclaimed:

Hark to the mingled din

Of fife, and steed, and trumpet, and drum, and roaring culverin.
"Ho, for King Charles!" "Ho, for King George!" are the rival cries; but little reck either side of the far-off future, shrouded in those invocations to the god of battle. Exploded right and stalwart freedom, in the bloody fray of "hot horse to horse and man to man," strive for mastery—nothing but the mastery. Neither cares for the spell it breathes upon the future—of the ruined houses and the broken hopes that wait upon the fortunes of the one—the splendid greatness and magnificent realisations that follow the success of the other. The shadows of coming events are ever drowned in the thick darkness of war. So, "Ho, for Divine Right!" and "Ho, for a people's choice!" and the combat deepens. Vainly do Lochiel and Macdonald brandish the redoubtable claymore; vainly does Lord George Murray make skilful dispositions; vainly does Prince Charles wave his Highland bonnet: Cholmondeley, Price, Burrell, Howard, Wolfe, Cobham, with their "ancient war-cry of 'St. George,'" with some material assistance derived from cannon-balls and grape-shot, hurl back those daring warriors on weeping and wailing Inverness; and, when night closed on the carnage, the power of the royal house of Stuart was spent and broken for ever. The heart of the Highlands was cleft in twain; hushed was the war-note of Lochiel. The day was dark indeed for "exploded right;" but, peering over the horizon, was a star of greater magnitude, portending mightier destinies. Had it been quenched at Culloden, there would have been no England, in the overwhelming greatness of physical power and stirring example, to arouse the spirit of liberty in France; no Napoleon the Great to be crushed—no Napoleon III. to take unto himself a bride, sprung from the wave that rolled over "Divine right," on that 16th of April, 1746, and submerged a cause upheld by men whose romantic bravery will never fail to excite a generous glow of admiration in the heart of every true Briton.

The victory, however, was given to a political combination, which led to the establishment of the highest conditions yet experienced by humanity—but we must not anticipate. While the battle raged fiercely, a father and son fought side by side: their Scottish-Irish blood tingled at fever-heat; and wherever deeds of valour were to be done, thither they flew. In vain. The Highlanders fly in confusion, and Cumberland's dragoons and light horse complete the rout. The son, borne away in the headlong flight, is separated from his parent, and on earth they never meet again. So, let it be imagined that, foot-sore and weary, the poor lad—for, in truth, he was no more—reached London in the ripe month of August. Some ghastly heads, from which the flesh had not all dropped, saluted him at Temple Bar; and when he had found friends and shelter, he learned, to his horror, that one of those grim memorials of dismal Culloden had once spoken to him in the sweet accents of parental love; and the lips, now so dry and withered, had often rested fondly on his cheek. In his strong agony, London became hateful to him; in the land of his birth he was a proscribed fugitive; and, detesting England and everything English, he resolved to leave a country red with the blood of his idolised father.

Whither should he go? He might have hidden himself in the American colonies, but there the fiery flag of England waved; or have gone to Holland, but it was in close amity with England; or to France, but he scorned its perfidy to Charles Stuart: in short, there was no country that offered him anything like a home but Spain—and to Spain he resolved to go. There he could cherish his own faith, and at least receive some countenance from the Duke of Berwick—the greatest of all the Stuarts, although he had the bar sinister in his shield.

Well, to Spain the houseless wanderer went; but of the particulars of his career in that then warlike and commercial country, we are not informed. Most likely the catastrophe which had befallen his father, had induced him on the voyage to cast his sword into the Bay of Biscay; for we find that he founded a commercial family, and in 1823, or thereabouts—a year or two is immaterial—the male descendant of the fugitive from decisive Culloden was firmly established as a merchant in the peaceful port of Malaga, where—so weak are vengeful traditions to withstand the wearing influences of the spirit of trade—he occupied the very honourable and responsible post of British Consul, which obliged him to watch over and protect the interests of the very nation his ancestor had fled from in hatred and disgust.

And now, having brought this historic romance to this interesting point, we must inform our readers that Don Kirkpatrick, the British Consul at Malaga, being, like all men who can boast of Scottish blood, either paternally or maternally, possessed of some imaginative powers, was one calm, summer's evening seated in his sanctum sanctorum, thinking, among other things, of the wonderful events which had occurred since his father or grandfather had arrived in sunny Spain. In three-quarters of a century, England had become the foremost nation of all the earth. France had been the theatre of the most tremendous scenes in the history of the world. Spain had been desolated by a foe from which England had rescued her; a mighty republic had risen in the western world; and, as a Scotchman would say, more propitious to his own traditions, that Goliath of war, Napoleon, had run his meteor course, and left a dazzling trail of light behind him. Unexampled, wonderful, precious period! But as the old gentleman's mind was becoming bewildered by the magnitude of the subjects that presented themselves for thoughtful study, he fancied he heard a manly but very melodious voice, singing an unmistakable love-song beneath his very window.

"That odious de Montijo!" he growled, as he proceeded to take a covert survey of the gallant serenader.

The moon was not up, but he could easily discern the outlines of the person of a cavalier with whom he was intimately acquainted, and who he well knew was young, noble, and extremely handsome.

According to the Spanish custom, he was serenading the beautiful Mona Maria Manuela Kirkpatrick, with whom he had long been passionately in love. When the song had been brought to a conclusion, the British Consul heard the silvery voice of his daughter in reply; and, on putting his head out of the window, he plainly saw her tall, well-developed figure in the balcony below him. He listened—in fact it must be admitted he played the spy on the lovers; and as his aged ear drank in their ardent vows of mutual affection—which reminded him of a spring-time of his own, with a dear one then far away, and very cold, he softened. He forgot the poverty of the young man, and only remembered his worth and devotion to Mona. Probably the meditations in which he had been indulging, combined with the poetry of the still hour, had somewhat idealised his fancy; or very likely he thought what a handsome couple they would make, or that an alliance with a poor member of such a distinguished family as de Montijo's was not to be despised. However, whatever his influencing emotions were, certain it is that he left his window of observation with an increased regard for the youthful noble, which in the course of a few weeks deepened so far, that he cheerfully consented to his taking his lovely child "for better for worse."

And so the charming daughter of the British Consul at Malaga wedded with the best blood in Spain; and her husband having scarcely any fortune of his own, the presumption is, that the consul did not present him with a "tocherless" bride. Fortune, however, as if to compensate the young couple for their early trials, and reward their fidelity to the passion that, when faithfully pursued, keeps a rainbow in every pure human sky, in a few years showered her gifts upon them. To assist in the working out of the destiny that was in store for the great great something of the unfortunate man whose head, in 1746, was grinning on the top of Temple Bar, in London, all the elder branches of the De Montijo family were consigned to the vaults of their illustrious ancestry; and the once poor but proud and aspiring serenader, under the operation of the terribly maligned law of primogeniture, succeeded to the rank of grandee of Spain, and, among other titles, to those of Count de Montijo, Duke de Teba, and Duke de Penaranda. Princely estates accompanied these glittering distinctions, and not to elaborate a catalogue, the grandchildren of the British Consul at Malaga became in time the richest heiresses in Spain.

The eldest daughter of this marvellously endowed younger son, and still more marvellously fortunate daughter of the British Consul at Malaga, married the Duke of Alba and Berwick, the descendant of the celebrated duke of that name, who no doubt befriended the exiled son of the Scottish-Irish gentleman whose connection with Culloden brought him to the scaffold.

The second daughter of this marriage is now the Empress of the French. But, not to let the details of this strange, eventful history bewitch our sober senses, let us mention that the once fascinating and adored Mona Maria Manuela Kirkpatrick, is now a widow, and that, until January 30, she was described by the Spanish heralds as—Countess Dowager of Montijo, De Miranda, Banos y Mora; Duchess de Penaranda; mother, guardian, and administratrix of the person and property of my daughter, Dona Maria Francisca de Sales Portocarrero, Palafox y Kirkpatrick, Croy de Havrá y Lant, Lopez de Zuniga, Fernandez de Cordoba, Leiva y la Cerda, Rojas, Guzman, Luna, Enriquez de Almanza Cardenas, Puehoco y Acuna, Avellaneda, Guzman de Iscar, Rodriguez de Aza Uchoa, Bazan Osorio, Enriquez de Valdes y Cardona, Acevedo, Chaves, Hinojosa, Chacon, Mendoza, Cardenas y Zapata, Vargas, Luna, Vivero, Cabrera y Bobadilla, Lopez Pacheco, Funes de Villalpando, Frances de Arino, Albion, Gurrea, Fernandez de Heredia, Monroy, Aragon, Enriquez de la Carra, Navarra, Loden, Bracamonte y Davila; Countess of Montijo, De Miranda, De Banos, De Mora, De Fuentiduena, De Abilas, De San Estevan de Gornaz, De Casarubios del Monte y de Santa Cruz de la Sierra; Duchess of Penaranda; Marchioness of Valderrabano, De Osera, De Barcarotta, De la Algaba, De la Baneza, De Moya, De Villanueva del Fresno, De Valdunquillo y de Mirallo; Viscountess of Palacios de la Valduerna y su Infantazgo, Y de la Calzada; Lady of the Casa Fuerte de Arteaga, &c. &c.

And that bringing us over the second point in this romance from real life, we will approach the third and final one, by inviting the reader to study the history of the past thirty years, beginning at the very day when the British Consul at Malaga overheard the clandestine courtship of his daughter and the handsome, but poverty-stricken, De Montijo.

While the wife was devoting herself to her children, the throne of the Bourbons was again shattered to atoms, and an elective one, somewhat after the fashion of England in 1688, erected on its ruins.

Louis Philippe began his reign in France when the infant Donna Maria Francisca was in her third year; and little did the fond mother dream, as she watched its cradled slumbers, that shadows of coming greatness silently gathered thick around its innocent head. But when the child grew apace, and she thought, in the grand estate she had afterwards acquired, of the peace and amenities Louis Philippe had established in France, and of the superior educational facilities that country afforded, she adopted that land as the best adapted for the development of the mental and moral nature of the future Countess of Teba in her own right; and when that determination had been carried into effect, she became as well known in the fashionable saloons of Paris as of Madrid. France became her second home, and as Donna Maria progressed towards a brilliant maturity, France, and the countries with which her race had become strangely connected, were either noiselessly or violently passing through their appointed phases.

England was careering along in her own grand, unapproachable way—Spain was throbbing with intestine commotions—France was tuning and fretting under an authority which, to her sicklied imagination, looked like a tyranny. The ceaseless shadow of destiny, within whose circle

The Pyramids look pale—
The festal halls grow hushed and cold—
The everlasting hills wax old!

was marching in its sublime, mysterious silence; and in 1848 its last tremendous doings—the revolutions of that year—broke upon the astonished world. Louis Napoleon, the nephew of that Colossus whom Europe had overthrown, one day saw himself a neglected and despised fugitive in London, and the next at the head of the very people which England, more than any other nation, had frantically striven to restrain. Thus proving in this, as in other innumerable instances, how futile is the attempt to impose terms on posterity.

Well, not to recapitulate the transactions of our own immediate day, this same Louis Napoleon became Emperor of the French. How he obtained "the round and golden top of sovereignty, it is not for us to question. He did obtain it, and that fact is more significant than all the homilies which have been spoken and written on the means.

But "the massy weight on't galled the laden brows" of the bachelor Emperor, and he must needs have a bride to share the burthen, and divide the glory. Newspaper scribes indulged in a vast deal of speculation as to his overtures to foreign courts, to beggarly German princesses, and saffron-visaged Braganzas, in scorching Brazil—but they were all most woefully deceived. Louis Napoleon, with the impenetrable secrecy natural to his adamantine resolution, did not choose to make his election known until the hour which he himself should appoint. Instead of hunting for a bride among aliens and enemies to France, he fixed his regal regard on the tall, fair girl who had haunted his imagination from the moment he had seen her in the halls of the Elysée. Her bright English face and luxuriant auburn hair had captivated his fancy; and her unexceptionable manners, modest dignity, rare mental endowments, and peculiarly fascinating smile, completed the conquest. So that, while all the rest of gossiping Europe were gravely discussing the probabilities in favour of this or that foreign princess becoming "the bright particular star" of imperial France, the Emperor, on the 22nd of January last, quietly called his senate together, and thus addressed them:

"I yield to the wish so often manifested by the country, in coming to announce to you my marriage.

"The alliance which I contract is not in accord with the traditions of ancient policy—and therein is its advantage. France, by its successive revolutions, has ever abruptly separated from the rest of Europe. Every wise government ought to try to make it re-enter the pale of the old monarchies. But this result will be more surely attained by a straightforward and frank policy, by loyalty in conduct, than by royal alliances, which create a false security, and often substitute family interests for those of the nation. Moreover, the example of the past has left in the mind of the people superstitious feelings. It has not forgotten, that for seventy years foreign princesses have not mounted the throne, but to behold their race dispossessed and proscribed by war or by revolution. One woman alone seemed to bring happiness, and to live more than the others in the memory of the people—and that woman, the modest and good wife of General Bonaparte, was not the issue of royal blood. It must, however, be admitted, that, in 1810, the marriage of Napoleon I. with Marie Louise was a great event. It was a pledge for the future, a real satisfaction to the national pride, as the ancient and illustrious branch of the house of Austria, who had been so long at war with us, was seen to solicit the alliance of the elected chief of a new empire. Under the last reign, on the contrary, the amour propre of the country had to suffer, when the heir to the crown solicited, fruitlessly, during several years, a princely alliance, to obtain it only in a secondary rank and in a different religion.

"When, in presence of old Europe, one is borne on by the force of a new principle to the height of ancient dynasties, it is not by giving an ancient character to one's escutcheon (enrichissant son blason), and by seeking to introduce oneself at all costs into a family, that one is accepted. It is rather by ever remembering one's origin, by preserving one's own character, and by adopting frankly, in presence of Europe, the position of parvenu—a glorious title when one obtains it by the free suffrages of a great people. Thus, obliged to depart from precedents followed to the present day, my marriage became a private affair, and there remained only the choice of the person.

"She who has been the object of my preference is of distinguished birth. French in heart, by education, by the recollection of the blood shed by her father in the cause of the Empire, she has, as a Spaniard, the advantage of not having in France a family to whom it might be necessary to give honours and fortune. Endowed with all the qualities of the mind, she will be the ornament of the throne; in the day of danger, she would be one of its courageous supporters. A Catholic, she will address to heaven the same prayers with me for the happiness of France. In fine, by her grace and her goodness, she will, I have the firm hope, endeavour to revive in the same position, the virtues of the Empress Josephine.

"I come, then, messieurs, to announce to France, that I have preferred the woman whom I love and whom I respect, to one who is unknown, and whose alliance would have had advantages mixed with sacrifices. Without disdaining any one, I yet yield to my inclinations, but after having taken counsel from my reason and my convictions. In fine, by placing the independence, the qualities of the heart, domestic happiness, above dynastic prejudices and the calculations of ambition, I shall not be less strong because I shall be more free.

"Soon proceeding to Notre Dame, I shall present the empress to the people and to the army: the confidence they have in me assures me of their sympathy; and you, messieurs, on learning better to appreciate her whom I have chosen, you will allow that on this occasion also I have been inspired by Providence."

For cool, premeditated audacity, concentration of thought, and unblenching firmness, this state document is unequalled. It is unquestionably a glove thrown at the feet of the old dynasties of Europe, and will, we are assured, be hereafter referred to as the first hostile manifesto of the deliberator, but remarkably daring man who now holds the future of civilisation in his impenetrable keeping.

His courtiers were amazed; the press was amazed, also chagrined, at its fancied want of foresight. France exulted—the continental nations writhed under this studied repudiation of their hackneyed traditions. But, before the matter had become a nine-days' wonder, Donna Maria Francisca Montijo was wedded to Louis Napoleon, and now bears on her beautiful brow the crown that never adorned a better or fairer head than Josephine's—the discarded, but, to the end, still loving Josephine.

And thus ends the third and concluding portion of the romance which we have described from the fatal field of Culloden, to the wedding pageant of the Cathedral Church of Notre Dame. The worshipper of destiny has wedded the child of destiny—and their union is consistent. What the future career of either may be, it is beyond all human sagacity to determine. Both have attained the culminating point in their respective lives and family traditions, and both have as dark and illimitable a futurity before them as the ancestor of the Empress had, when, with quivering lips and brows moistened with mortal anguish, he gazed upon the ruined temple of his father's soul crumbling away, bit by bit, on the top of smoke-begrimed Temple Bar.

A century and seven years have passed away since then; and, looking backwards along that broad highway of time—even while pausing to trace the consolidation of England's liberties, and the birth of her modern material grandeur, to the Battle of Culloden—it is impossible not to be much impressed with the singularity, the more than chance-like character of the incidents which, by systematic, uninterrupted occurrence, have conducted to the imperial throne of one of the greatest nations of the earth, the descendant of a bereaved, houseless, wretched fugitive from the last battle-field within the limits of the British territory.

LOST IN THE PRAIRIE.*

WHEN the hunters found that their brother was lost, the first thing they did, in the hope that he had not wandered far, was to fire off their pieces, and then wait a sufficient time to give him an opportunity of loading his gun, in case it had been previously discharged, to answer them. In this way they fired again; and no reply being made, they resorted to the expedient of smoke. Lighting a fire, they took some pieces of burning wad, and, placing them on the open ground, raked together a pile of dry leaves and grass, and ignited it. Upon this sticks were piled, and, on the top of these, green leaves and boughs, with several armfuls of Spanish moss, which hung plentifully from the oaks. A thick, blue smoke soon ascended high into the heavens; and, if the lost hunter should not see such a signal, it must be a proof that he was very far off indeed. In this case he did not see it.

Fortunately, the party had a bloodhound with them. Tying the mule which carried their provisions to a tree, they fixed a piece of paper on its back, directing their brother to remain there, in case he should have found his way back during their absence. Then commenced the operation of "trailing with a bloodhound." Proceeding to the spot at which they had last seen their brother, when he had started on the turkey-hunt, they saw the tracks of his horse distinctly visible upon the turf. The eldest brother dismounted, and, after minutely examining the hoof-print, in order that they might know it again, in case the scent should be lost, called the hound to him. At this moment he held upon his arm the lost hunter's blanket. The dog scented it, uttering, as he did so, a low whimper, and gazing in his master's face with a look of intelligence. The latter now "thung the blanket over his own saddle, stooped again, drew his fingers along the grass, and, with a wave of his hand, motioned Marengo to follow its direction. The hound, uttering a single yelp, bent his nose to the ground, and sprang forward upon the trail."

* "The Boy Hunters," by Captain Mayne Reid.

Dashing forward at a gallop, the hunters followed the dog, now and then stopping to break a branch of some conspicuous tree, in order that they might know their way back. After riding a considerable distance, they observed the dog begin to double, and run in circling courses over the prairie. They now drew up, lest they should ride upon the track, and baffle him. Presently, however, he stopped, with a howl of disappointment: he had lost the trail.

After some minutes of agonising suspense, the eldest brother dismounted, and walked slowly, bent forward and downward carefully, observing the ground as he went. In these cases, the hunter must have many strings to his bow. Fortunately, he had examined the hoof-prints of the lost hunter's horse ere they set out, and now as he recognised them, he sprang forward with a shout of joy. In a moment the dog once more caught the right scent, and started off again, nose down, over the prairie. The brothers followed.

At this moment a new difficulty presented itself. The sun was setting on the high southern plateaux, over one of which they were travelling. They knew there was no twilight, and should it come on a dark night, how were they to follow the dog. It grew darker and darker, till it was difficult to distinguish the dusky body of the hound passing over the sward. What was to be done?

"I have it!" suddenly exclaimed Basil, the eldest, and at the word he spurred his horse forward to overtake Marengo. The next moment he flung himself from the saddle, and, seizing the hound, arrested him in his tracks. Then making his brother strip off his shirt, which was whiter than his own, he tore off the sleeves, and drew it upon the dog; and, having passed the animal's fore-feet through the arm-holes, tied the collar securely round his throat with a piece of string, and knotted the skirts over the flanks behind.

The dog was let loose again, while the brothers mounted hastily, and followed him.

It was not long before they were rewarded by discovering their lost brother.

Such is the mode of tracking with the bloodhound, when any one is lost upon the prairie, and when he is fortunate enough to have friends in possession of the dog and the blanket.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

THE TELEGRAPH LINES OF THE WORLD, UP TO 1853.—The extent of telegraphic communication, completed and in operation throughout the world, at the beginning of the present year, may be estimated, as far as can be gathered from the returns, at nearly 40,000 miles. Of this amount there were nearly 4000 miles in Great Britain, of which 100 miles only were underground, with about 400 or 500 miles in course of construction in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and as many more projected. In America there were 20,000 miles of telegraph completed and in operation, with 10,000 more in process of construction. Russia has just commenced her system of telegraphs between St. Petersburg Moscow, and Cracow, and the ports of the Baltic and Black Seas. About 4000 miles are about to be constructed in India. The only unsupplied portions that will soon present themselves on a telegraphic map of the world, will be Australia, Africa, and China.

IRON PAVEMENTS.—Workmen are paving Howard Street, Boston, United States, with cast iron. The pavement is composed of circular boxes of cast iron, about twelve inches in diameter, and five inches in height, divided into six compartments, so small as not to admit the hoof of a horse. These spaces will be filled with gravel; but some other substances, such as a composition of asphaltum and sand or gravel, may be found more suitable. The surface of the pavement is grooved, to prevent horses from slipping, and on the outer edge of each box are keys which fit into the edges of the surrounding boxes—thus binding the whole firmly together. The thickness of the outer rim and the inner divisions, is about an inch. The street will be covered with a network of iron, filled in with a substance to produce a smooth and durable surface.

PREVENTION OF SMOKE.

At a late sitting of the commissioners for the City of London, who are empowered by Act of Parliament to enforce the consumption of smoke within their district, a very important invention was produced for the approval of the court, the particulars of which are thus reported from the daily journals:

Mr. Lee Stevens, the successful inventor of the fan paddle-wheel, referring to his model and drawings illustrating his invention, remarked, that his proposition in this respect represented facts, and not theories. By a peculiar arrangement at the far end of the furnace, he opposed a column of air of the high temperature of from 800 to 1000 degrees to the gases evolved from the coal, which caused the entire combustion of the latter, without the formation of any smoke; while, by an equally peculiar construction of revolving bars, with screw flanges or worms on their surfaces, at the near end, he supplied the furnace with fuel gradually and continuously, motion being given thereto by the engine itself, without exposing the stoker to the intense heat of the furnace. To prove the utility of his invention, Mr. Stevens read testimonials to the court, chiefly from Mr. William Batley, C.E., manufacturer of portable engines, Bridge Street Works,

Northampton, who, after many weeks' use of it, said, "that the saving of coal, compared with the ordinary consumption, is twenty per cent., and that the smoke nuisance is entirely removed—no smoke being now visible from the top of the chimney in my factory; while in the adjoining corn and oil mills, using the same sort of coal in the ordinary furnaces, a large quantity of dense smoke is produced;" and who concluded by observing that "by this practical experience I have most satisfactorily proved the value of your invention, more especially in ocean navigation, where fuel becomes, from the mode of conveyance, so expensive. And I beg to state that I shall continue the use of your economising system for my own sake."

Several questions were then asked of Mr. Lee Stevens by the chairman (Mr. Deputy Peacock), Mr. Phillips, Mr. H. L. Taylor, Mr. Deputy Holt, Mr. T. H. Hall, Mr. Humphreys, and other members of the court, to which Mr. Lee Stevens replied, that he certainly could not produce smoke and then cut it off, as after the fire was once fairly lighted, his system prevented the formation of any smoke at all. The invention, he said, is applicable to any description of boiler, land or marine, large or small, and requires no more space than a common furnace; and, as compared with other self-feeding furnaces, it is infinitely cheaper—indeed, but little more expensive than common furnaces. He added, that the draught produced by the perfect combustion of the fuel, under his system, will render high funnels for steam-boats, or lofty shafts for land furnaces, wholly needless.

CAPTAIN ERICSSON'S CALORIC-ENGINE.

VARIOUS accounts have appeared respecting the wonders achieved by the caloric vessel of Captain Ericsson. One very remarkable statement is, "That there was a saving of nine-tenths of the fuel, as compared with steam."

If this be true, it will prove only that steam-engine builders are so ignorant of their art as to waste nine-tenths of their fuel. They would be very glad to see this made out, because it would open up a very wide scope for improvement. If Captain Ericsson can do it with an air-engine, by a process of taking up his heat after it has done its work, and using it over again, similar processes may also be applied to steam. For, call them by what names we will, they are both heat-engines, giving forth power by the consumption of fuel, or the conversion of solids into gases—i. e. enlarging the volume of matter by swelling it with particles of heat, the matter being in one case air and in the other case water.

A perfect steam-engine is supposed to waste no heat whatever. All the heat generated in the furnace should pass into the boiler, and so furnish power to the cylinders, except so much as it is needful to pass up the chimney in order to produce draught and urge the fire. If more than is needful passes away thus, it is waste, and an evidence of faulty construction. Heat may radiate very rapidly from the boilers, the chimney, and the cylinders; and the greater the pressure of the steam, the greater will be the radiation. For this reason, the boilers of locomotives worked at high pressure, are clothed in felt and wood and metal, and the cylinders likewise, unless when covered within the smoke-box or base of the chimney. Whenever great heat is experienced in the engine-room of a vessel, it is a proof of so much waste; and the use of a wind-sail to cool the room, although it may diminish the annoyance, does not diminish the waste. A hot chimney is a large source of waste, and an evidence of ill-regulated draught. There is, no doubt, much room for improvement yet. Boilers clothed so as to prevent radiation, and chimneys constructed with double plates and an interstice of air between, would save much waste, and increase comfort and diminish risk. If radiation were entirely prevented, and draught economically regulated, there would be no advantage in a dry caloric over a wet caloric machine.

But Captain Ericsson, it appears, catches his heat after it has done its work in the cylinder, turns the air out nearly cold, and then uses the same heat to inject other air, and pass again through the cylinder. A similar process is used in the steam-engine. High-pressure steam, after having impelled the piston of a small cylinder, is turned in an expanded state into a larger cylinder, and the heat does duty twice.

There is an advantage in high-pressure steam, that a smaller space is occupied by the engines and boilers with a given amount of power; the consumption of coal being the same. Nor does it follow that the risk is greater. A boiler worked at four pounds' pressure may get short of water and explode, as well as one at one hundred pounds' pressure; and with a given thickness of plate, the small boiler is stronger than the large one.

Captain Ericsson, however, claims the advantage of getting rid of explosion altogether. If it should turn out that he gets rid of power at the same time, the advantage would be only of the same kind as using a gun without charging it. If a cylinder of fifty inches area be worked at a pressure of one hundred pounds per inch, we have a power of five thousand pounds. To get the same result with a pressure of four pounds, would require a cylinder with an area of twelve hundred and fifty inches. What we really want to know is—the size of the cylinders and the effective pressure in them, the number of strokes per minute, and the weight and quality of the coal used per hour. If the heat can be used over again to the extent that has been vaguely alluded to, we shall be very near perpetual motion: lighting a fire in the harbour of New York, and using the heat over and over again till we reach England, with perhaps an occasional scuffle of hot coals from the galley.

Captain Ericsson is not the man to propound such things, and his friends are not judicious to do it for him. There was a caloric-engine in the Great Exhibition, but it was never worked. The pressure claimed then was four pounds per inch. I have heard that eleven pounds is now claimed. The heat-catcher, as described, appears to be a sort of gigantic respirator, such as is worn over the mouth in cold weather.

"They drank the red wine through the helmets barred."

As the wires of the respirator catch the warmth of the breath in passing from the mouth, so the cylinder exit is barred with heat-catchers. In locomotive cylinders the exits for the steam can scarcely be made too large; and any attempt to catch the steam, to compel it to disgorge its heat, would be fatal to the velocity: so if a wire cap be placed on a chimney, the draught is impeded. Why the caloric-engine should not be subject to the same law does not yet appear.

By the description, the caloric-engine appears to be very similar in structure to the old atmospheric steam-engine, but with four-pound pressure air substituted for four-pound pressure steam. Whether the saving of the boilers and space be not counterbalanced by other circumstances remains to be seen; but it must be quite clear, that if any advantages are to be gained by the mere saving of waste, that applies to the steam as well as the caloric engine.

W. BRIDGES ADAMS.

AMERICAN SLAVERY.

WHEN on a visit to the United States of America, some years ago, I spent a short time—only a few days—in two of the slave states; but, short as the time was, it was sufficient to let me see the horrors of slavery as practised there. I make the following extracts from my journal written at the time:

On landing in Virginia, two carriages were provided for the passengers. An English gentleman and myself stepped into the first and drove off, there being only two passengers for the other carriage. Having no American in company, I had a good opportunity of questioning the driver, a black man, respecting the slaves and their condition. He appeared to be about 50 years of age, of a quick and intelligent countenance. He informed me that he was a slave; that there were very few free blacks in the state—if any; that he had been sold four times, for 500 dollars each time. He had been married 11 years, and had three children; 13 months ago his wife was sold, by his master, during his absence. This cruel deed took place whilst he was 100 miles from home, on his master's business. On his return home he met a gang of negroes on the road, and amongst them was his own wife. She was sold to the new slave state of Alabama. The poor distracted man entreated the purchaser to sell him his wife again—to which he agreed; but whilst he was trying to make friends to lend him the money, the slave-dealer drove his gang forward, and thus was the wife and companion of 11 years cruelly torn from her husband, and from her three children, never to meet again. I asked him what were his feelings on the occasion? To which he replied, his distress was so great that for a considerable time he seemed almost in a state of insanity, and that for three months he scarcely knew what he did.

Who could hear a husband relate such a tale of woe, and not shed the tear of sympathy—and not feel the horrors of slavery—and not say in his heart, surely the vengeance of the Almighty must fall on those who can be guilty of such wickedness?

He said it was a common thing to sell wives from their husbands, and husbands from their wives; and that when their masters wanted money they would sell any of their children the same as they would their cattle.

On his telling me that the women frequently had children by their masters, I said:

"Surely they don't sell their own children?"

"Yes," he replied, "they sell them exactly the same as any others."

Can any wickedness be greater, or more horrible? The cup must be nearly full.

The children have no instruction, and a slave found with a book in his hand would be liable to a severe flogging.

At Richmond, in Virginia, I was present at an auction, when four female domestic servants were exposed for sale, and I give the following account, as extracted from my journal written at the time:

A variety of articles were exposed in the street for sale—brandy, oats, coffee, earthenware, &c. Four girls were seated on the foot-path—or, rather, the two eldest, who were sisters, one 15 and the other 17 years of age. They were very clean and well-dressed, being domestic servants. The two younger were sisters also, about 8 and 10 years of age.

The sale commenced at 11 o'clock, a.m. The auctioneer first tried some brandy, but not finding such bidders as he expected, he suddenly turned round, saying:

"Well, gentlemen, as there seem to be several inquiries about these negroes, we'll put them up."

He then read the conditions, which were, that according to the will of their late master, deceased, they were to be free at 30.

The eldest girl was first put up. The buyers had crowded round them. She was ordered to stand up. The biddings were too low, only 100 dollars being offered. The auctioneer, finding no one disposed to give more, turned about, saying: "Well, girls, you may sit awhile longer; we'll sell some oats."

During this time the tears often started to their eyes. They endeavoured to repress them; they sat down again with looks of sad resignation. Oh, what a sight for humanity to behold! Whilst the auctioneer was selling other things, I kept my eyes on these poor forlorn creatures, and my ears open to what might be said to them, being a little concealed from view within the door.

There were many unfeeling, indecent, and brutal observations made before them; but through all their countenances never changed: their demeanour was modest, grave, and sad—but not without feeling, as their frequent tears would indicate. One rude fellow, looking at them, roughly pulled the handkerchief from off the head of one of the older girls, which she quietly drew back, and with it covered her face and wiped away the tears which this unfeeling action had brought to her eyes. Another man, who had the appearance of a heartless negro-buyer, seemed much disposed to amuse himself at the expense of their feelings—he ordered the eldest girl to hold out her arm, which he examined as a dealer would the limb of an animal.

After these poor girls had been exposed in the street for about two hours, they were dismissed, to be sold by private contract—as no public buyer was found. A short time after they were dismissed, I met them in the street. I stopped to speak to them, and, addressing myself to the eldest, a good-looking girl, I asked her why their present master wished to sell them? She replied, "I believe he is obliged to sell us for want of money! We have been put up twice: this is the second time, but I don't think the cryers (by cryers she meant auctioneers) have patience enough to sell us." This speech she made in a mild and resigned tone, as if she thought it was their lot, and was concerned that it could not be accomplished. It was a heart-touching speech. She informed me that they were now seeking somebody to buy them, and asked me if I wanted to buy a servant.

On another occasion, a mother, with her three children, were sold. She was advertised as a good cook and excellent washer, ironer, and sempstress; and to be sold for no fault. After the sale, she was seated in a chair on the foot-path, very clean and neatly dressed, her children playing unconsciously about her. She was a respectable-looking woman. I inquired of her who had bought her. She said she did not know, but that she and her children were sold to South Carolina. To my further questions she informed me, that she had a husband, to whom she had been married 13 years. She did not know till that morning that she was to be sold; but her master had ordered her to be at the auction at eleven o'clock; nor was her husband yet acquainted with her sad lot. She could no longer restrain her feelings. Her heart was full, and her eyes overflowed with tears, which rolled down her sable cheeks, and for some time put a stop to our conversation. Poor creature! I tried to comfort her, but I could say little. Thus is the wife of 13 years barbarously torn from her husband, and the three children from their father, never to meet again. Surely this is the consummation of iniquity, and must bring down the judgment of Heaven sooner or later. The people stood about this heart-rending scene with perfect unconcern.

It is very common to sell a few negroes when they want money, without regard to the alliances of nature; and thus are the tenderest and closest ties unfeelingly broken asunder. Virginia being over-stocked with slaves at that time, seemed to make it their policy to breed slaves for the new slave states.

On entering a large tobacco warehouse, an elderly slave came up to me, and said, "Ah, massa, have you any good for the black people? They are the most oppressed people on earth." I knew not how to offer him any consolation, but said, "There is the same God in heaven for the blacks as for the whites." He replied, "Ah, massa, that is true!" and seemed comforted with the consideration.

From all the observations I have been enabled to make, I think the negroes naturally possess much of the benevolent and affectionate disposition. I saw frequent instances of this character whilst amongst them.

The public papers abound with advertisements of human beings for sale, cattle being frequently included in the same advertisement. I collected many of them, which I still have by me; amongst the rest, I took the following from a Baltimore paper:

"FOR SALE.—A healthy Negro Woman, aged about 20 years, with or without her infant male child. The woman is active, and has always been accustomed to house work."

What will English mothers say to this? What would they feel were the case their own?

"A mother to be sold, with or WITHOUT her child at the breast!"

I add the following copies of Advertisements:

AT RICHMOND.

"Negroes at Auction.—On Wednesday next, the 29th of March, at ten o'clock, will be sold, in front of the Eagle Hotel, fine likely Negroes—a woman, who is a good cook and excellent washer, ironer, and seamstress, and her three children; also a remarkable likely boy."

"Will be added to our sale on Wednesday next, the 29th, a likely Negro Fellow, aged 29; also a Milch Cow and Calf."

"At Auction, March 30, prime Groceries of all kinds, to which will be added four likely young Negro Girls, accustomed to house business, aged from 8 to 17; also a very likely young Negro Fellow, a good cook."

AT BALTIMORE.

"A healthy Negro Woman, aged 20 years, with or without her infant male child. She is active, and has been accustomed to housework."

"For Sale.—A hearty strong Negro Woman, aged 24, and her two female children, one aged 5 years, the other 11 months, slaves for life. She is a good plain cook, washer, and ironer; sober and honest."

"For Sale.—Negro Woman, aged 30 years; a good cook, &c. A Negro Boy, 13 or 14 years of age; slave for life."

These are the cases alluded to in the foregoing account.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN J. NEVINS.

Clew Dale, near Bristol, Jan. 31, 1853.

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XV.

SCENE.—A wooded ridge sloping to a ravine; a wild rude bridge spanning a rocky chasm; two of the gipsy-gang are seen crossing the bridge; they come forward.

BROLSON.

THY scheme's o'er long—the briefer plan the better—
A dagger in his throat were quicker done,
And quieter. Granting we seize the lad,
What then? At every step there stands a bar:
Take we the path thy project travels out—
Detection is as certain as the act;
And we may lock the gyves upon our wrists
At once. Egad, I feel them now even with thy talk.

RIVDILL.

Pooh, thou wert born at night, and thus thy brain
Is full of boggart shapes and nervous fears;
I, who saw light one fine bright summer-morn,
Am fearless, enterprising, strong, and bold;
Belike too sanguine—'tis a better fault
Than thine, of meeting trouble half the way.

BROLSON.

If thou demurr'st, why be it so, say I.
But think, his death just doubles our reward.

RIVDILL.

And Wolfbane, too, how wilt thou manage him?

BROLSON.

Lord Kelford doubts this Wolfbane, and demands
Our utmost secrecy, with prompt despatch.

RIVDILL.

Secrecy with Wolfbane? with . . . ha! ha! ha
Were he against the murder of this youth,
If thy quick hand were even at his throat,
Thy knee upon his breast, thy dagger's point
Uplifted for the blow—that Wolfbane's eye
Would, like a spell, arrest it in mid-air,
And fix thee powerless!

BROLSON.

I defy his power! first for the deed,
And next for the reward, which having fast,
We'll put some thousand leagues between this wood
And our abiding-place. What need we fear?

RIVDILL.

Fear? Fear his art, his spells. Laugh on, I care not!
I too can laugh pretended power to scorn;
But Wolfbane's no pretender: he has power!
I've seen, ay, felt it shivering through my frame
Until I stood like ice; no foot could stir,
The ground and I were one, incorporate,
Until he breathed upon each marble limb,
And I stepped free!

BROLSON.

Stand back, for here he comes.

RIVDILL, pale and trembling.

Who? Wolfbane?

BROLSON.

No, 'tis that witch, old Midgley.
And with her comes our prize—look to thy knife:
Back . . . 'neath the trees!
So, we're in luck.

[They conceal themselves.]

Enter MIDGLEY and ADOLPHUS.

ADOLPHUS.

How drear and dismal hang these toppling cliffs,
Haggard with age! It seems a place unblest!

MIDGLEY.

'Tis scarce the spot for thy young eyes, my boy.
They'd better love the free and open fields
Than these o'erhanging, frowning precipices:
There are as strange deformities in Nature,
As many passionate and reckless features,
As there be moods of mind: thy love is yet
For Nature's mild, unrinkled countenance—
It suits the softer memories of thy youth.
But cheer thee; thine's a good brave heart, my boy,
And most unlike thy proud unnatural father.

ADOLPHUS.

My father? You knew my father, then?
I've some remembrance of a lofty form—
A noble soldier whom they called my father
Was he so?

MIDGLEY.

Thy sire was in the army.

ADOLPHUS.

Mine is a dim, deceiving memory:
Sometimes I fancy I have dreamt it all.
You knew my father? Oh, I'm glad to speak
With one that knew my father!
What is thy name?

MIDGLEY.

Call me Midgley.

ADOLPHUS.

Midgley! it seems as in a dream I'd heard
That name before; yet is not all a dream?
This savage wild, these woods, thyself?
The wailing voices of the wind-lashed trees,
As though the storm had scourged them ruefully?
And these strange mutterings of mysterious things

MIDGLEY.

This wood is never silent; its great heart
Beats with a thousand pulses; in the night
'Twould make one think that spirits walked abroad,
Such shapes and sounds startle the eye and ear.
But of your father? Think you of him still?

ADOLPHUS.

There never passed the day I thought not of him:
I love my father; but my heart ne'er beat,
My eyes ne'er filled with tears, my tongue ne'er faltered,
As when I thought of her, my poor, lost mother!

MIDGLEY.

Dead! that, too, I know; woe for her loss!

ADOLPHUS.

Dost thou believe the Dead can list our prayers?
That they, who loved us to their end of days,
Retain their sympathy with human love?
That, conscious of our tenderness, they watch
In angel pity o'er us? Can it be
That our remembrance is yet dear to them?
Oh, blest persuasion! oh, most sweet belief!
Angels of brightness, is there one indeed,
One of your heavenly host, who watcheth now,
With all a mother's tenderness of gaze,
To guard the pathway of her orphan child?
Oh, when, dear angel mother, may I kneel
Beside thy humble grave, in humble hope
That still thou seest my love, and lov'st me still!

MIDGLEY.

I have wept more with thee, and for thee, boy,
Than e'er I sorrowed for my own hard griefs,
Or death of kin, where tears are natural.
If e'er thy mother watched, she watcheth now!
What age wert thou when she, thy mother, died?
'Tis fancy, boy; thou canst not recollect her!

ADOLPHUS.

Oh, yes, I do! Not recollect my mother?
I was not six, yet I remember her:
Though nothing in the room, nor frame, nor furniture,
Nor aught, only my mother; only my poor mother!
How pale she looked! I cannot call her features:
A pale and weeping face, and garbed in black;
So pale, I weep at its remembered paleness!
Oh, I bethink me well—how close she clasped me!
Again, and once again, how sad she spoke,
'Till some one entered, speaking angrily,
And bore her weeping, shrieking, and imploring,
Where I ne'er saw her more!
And now she's dead! my poor, unhappy mother,
And left me with one only wish on earth,
Which I have prayed for daily, yes, and nightly;
It is to see her grave, to kneel upon it,
To say how much I loved, would have consoled her,
How still I cherish her dear memory,
And that I count the swiftly passing days
As steps upon the road which leads me to her!

MIDGLEY.

I know thy mother's grave!
Now, wouldst thou to it?

ADOLPHUS.

Thou know'st it? thou? They said she died abroad,
Was buried none knew where; but let us go!
Thou'rt human? nothing evil? that would tempt my soul,
And make my love the bait for my perdition?
I am a boy, a poor neglected boy,
Wishing to be good, yet no one teaching me;
I know not where begins that sin we read of,
That sin against the Spirit, where it ends.
I may be jeopardising even now
That hope which is the lamp of my existence,
To reach my mother's sainted arms in heaven!
What art thou? thou hast a dark, unpardoned look,
Like one God hides his face against . . .

[Starts away, alarmed.]

MIDGLEY.

I am going to thy mother's grave!
Wilt go?

ADOLPHUS.

Thou wilt not harm my soul?

MIDGLEY.

But one besides myself can shew it thee,
And when we die
All knowledge of her burial-place dies too!
Thine eyes will never gaze with filial love
Upon that hallowed mould!

[Going.]

[Exit MIDGLEY.]

ADOLPHUS.

Hear me! have mercy!
Oh, assist me, Heaven!
Angels, that hover round me in my dreams,
Be near me in my waking! Midgley stay!
Take me! do what thou wilt!
Shew me my mother's grave!

[Exit ADOLPHUS.]

Re-enter BROLSON and RIVDILL, cautiously and stealthily, from under the brushwood.

BROLSON.

Cast thy cloak thus round the old beldame's throat,
Strangle her first, then hurl her o'er yon rocks
Beyond the firs; they have a dismal depth
No eye can penetrate. Leave him to me;
The fewer hands the better for despatch;
I'll finish him, and quickly: hush! be firm!

[Resent severity.]

(To be continued.)

[DEATH OF EDWARD, AT THE PALACE AT GREENWICH.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER V.

Seldom can truth approach a royal ear—
Its avenues are guarded by deceit.
The craft men misname policy—the lust
Of power—the courtier's scheming—bar her steps.
OLD PLAY.

NORTHUMBERLAND, by his unprincipled policy, had succeeded in completely weaning the affection of the dying Edward from Elizabeth, whom he used to call his Fair Temperance, and towards whom, in boyhood, he had evinced so strong an attachment. It does not appear that the Princess Mary ever held any considerable place in his regard. Their intercourse was cold and formal: the gloomy temper and retiring disposition of the daughter of the unfortunate Catherine of Arragon, even more than their religious differences, had divided them.

There is little doubt that the impolitic act which transferred the crown from its legitimate heirs to the Lady Jane Grey, the daughter-in-law of the intriguing Duke of Northumberland, was the result of the youthful monarch's estrangement from his favourite sister, whose letters to him had been suppressed, and actions misrepresented.

The future great Protestant queen had even been accused, by more than one member of the council, of a secret inclination to the Church of Rome. The court were opposed to her; her godfather, Cranmer, the primate, deserted her interests. Amongst those to whose hands the direction of affairs was trusted, Elizabeth had but one friend—but that one was Cecil!

On the 6th of July, 1553, the guards were doubled at the Palace of Greenwich, by the orders of Northumberland, who disposed of everything in the king's name. A report had been circulated that Edward was much better, and the members of the council remained to attend his grace, for the purpose of hearing some fresh declaration respecting his testament, the contents of which had got whispered abroad, and created great discontent amongst the people—who naturally observed, that the exclusion of both the daughters of Henry VIII., on the plea of illegitimacy, was a manifest absurdity, since one of the marriages of Henry must have been lawful. Northumberland disputed the validity of both.

Latimer and Ridley both preached in favour of the exclusion of the princesses, on the ground of the danger which might arise to the independence of the realm, and the safety of the new Established Church, by either of the king's sisters marrying a foreign or a Catholic prince.

These sermons were but coldly received; and bitterly did they pay, on the accession of Mary, for their impolitic conduct.

Along the bank by the landing-place leading to the palace gardens, were moored the barges of the lords of the council, the lord primate, and several of the nobility; their retainers and rowers were seated in groups—for the day was a sultry one—upon the gazon, discussing the greatness of their masters, and the events of the time.

More than one statesman who prided himself upon his shrewdness and clear insight into the politics of the future, might have taken a useful lesson from the opinions and speculations of his domestics.

"And so it is whispered," observed a stout, burly-looking man, whose badge denoted that he served the noble house of Arundel, "that your mistress, the Lady Jane, will succeed to the crown!"

"And why not?" demanded the young esquire to whom the speaker had addressed himself; "is she not worthy of it?"

"I have nought to say against her!" drily answered the old man.

"Or her claim, I should suppose, should the king think proper to leave it to her: is she not of his blood?"

"So are the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth," cautiously whispered the servitor of the great Catholic peer, whose person it had been a part of Northumberland's scheme to obtain possession of.

"Illegitimate, sir!—illegitimate!" was the rejoinder.

"Both?"

"So parliament has decided in its wisdom; and I do not suppose," added the retainer of Lord Guilford Dudley, who naturally felt anxious for the advancement of his lord and the Lady Jane, "that even you, Master Ward, pretend to be wiser than the parliament!"

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed the old servitor, hastily. "I have too great a respect for my ears and neck! But a man may confess he cannot comprehend their wisdom, without disputing it."

"Certainly, certainly!" chimed in some half-dozen of the idlers, who were gathered round them; "there is no treason in that!"

"And what canst not understand?" demanded the esquire.

"How both the ladies can be illegitimate. If Henry's marriage with the Lady Catherine was unlawful, then his marriage with Anne Boleyn was a good marriage!"

"Granted!" chimed the crowd who had gathered round; for the subject was rife in men's minds, and public opinion generally divided upon it. "Proceed!"

"Therefore," continued the orator, "it would appear to me, had not parliament in its wisdom decided otherwise, that one or the other of Henry's daughters must be legitimate. Mark me, I do not pretend to say which."

Many of the boatmen seemed to be of the same opinion as the speaker; for they did not all, like the esquire of Lord Guilford Dudley, follow the politics of the house they served.

"They are only the half-sisters of the king," observed the advocate of the claims of Lady Jane.

"Quite as nearly related to his highness," retorted the staunch upholder of legitimacy, "as the descendant of his father's sister; unless, indeed, her claims to the crown have been strengthened by her marriage with the son of the Duke of Northumberland; of whom, I pray you to observe," added the speaker, with prudent afterthought, "I speak with all respect, as befits the friend of the king and the minister of the crown."

Varner—the name of the esquire of the husband of Lady Jane Grey—was far from being satisfied with the tardy profession. Like most men who discover that they have the worst of an argument, he began to lose his temper, and accused his opponent of entertaining treasonable views: words ran high, the boatmen and domestics siding with the disputants according to their political and religious views.

During the above conversation, a barge, rowed by four men in plain livery, had quietly drawn up to the landing-place, and two gentlemen, plainly but richly dressed, had advanced near enough to the wranglers to catch the subject of their discourse. The first was the Secretary Cecil, as he was generally called, and his companion a young man of good though decayed family, named Throgmorton.

"How now, my masters!" exclaimed the first person, speaking in a tone of authority as well as reproof; "does this loud brawling and unseemly noise befit the palace of his highness? Have ye no regard for your ears, that ye presume to prate of such high matters?"

Every cap was doffed, for the speaker was generally looked upon as a rising man at court.

Both Varner and Ward felt eager to justify themselves in the eyes of so influential a person as Cecil.

"I have no time to listen to such folly," he continued; "the times recommend prudence to every loyal subject: you will both of you act wisely to forget your quarrels, and keep a guard upon your tongues. The good Duke of Northumberland," he added, fixing his glance reprovingly upon the esquire of Lord Dudley, "would feel offended at the indiscretion of the servitor of my lord his son."

Varner coloured at the reproof: his temper began to get the better of his discretion.

"And the Earl of Arundel approve as little," observed Throgmorton, "of the lack of prudence of his boatman!"

Few of those who had witnessed the dispute wished to identify themselves as the advocates of either party. Several, on the approach of the statesman, had quietly retired to the boats; but two or three besides Ward and Varner remained. The latter declared, impetuously, that the time was come when the friends of the Protestant cause must show themselves. For his part—and he cared not who knew it—he looked upon the claims of the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth to the crown as worthless, parliament having pronounced them both illegitimate.

So saying, he turned upon his heel, and directed his steps towards the courtyard of the palace, where a party of Northumberland's men were drawn up, under the command of one of his kinsmen; the old boatman and the two statesmen were consequently left alone.

"You had better leave the palace," good-naturedly observed Cecil; "it is wiser to risk your service than your liberty."

The person thus warned, instead of thanking the speaker for his kindness, fixed his eyes upon him with a peculiar expression, and glanced significantly from him to his companion—plainly intimating that he wished to be alone with him. The politic secretary understood the hint.

"Throgmorton," he said, with affected indifference, "I have left some papers in the barge—bring them to me."

His companion perfectly comprehended the ruse, although he did not appear to notice it, and retired towards the landing-place.

"Speak!" said Cecil, in a hurried tone.

"Is your honour aware that the council are all assembled in the palace?" demanded Ward.

"The council!" repeated the statesman, with an air of surprise, for he had been summoned on a very different pretext. "Yes; doubtless—doubtless!"

"The king," added the boatman, "is in his last agony!"

Cecil started. Like many others, he had not anticipated the death of Edward to be so near. The wily Northumberland, too, had purposely misled him as well as others, by statements of the improving health of the young king.

"Thou art mad to say so!"

"Very likely!" replied the honest fellow; "for I have put my life in your power, by telling you the truth. Men call you a time-server, but I cannot think that you would injure a poor man only for feeling grateful. My noble master," he added, with a sigh, "is a prisoner!"

"A prisoner!"

"He promised to send me a token if the king's highness was either better, or received him; and it has not come!" he added, bitterly.

"Which token you were to convey to the Lady Mary?" observed Cecil, whose cool, calculating spirit at once comprehended the position of affairs. "You need not deny it—I am not her grace's enemy!"

This was one of those prudent speeches which the speaker frequently made use of to mask his feelings, and keep himself secure with both parties.

"It were worth some risk," he added, lowering his voice, "to obtain it—and if I thought that I could trust you—"

The devoted follower of the Earl of Arundel expressed the utmost willingness to remain, no matter at what danger to himself, if the secretary thought there was the slightest hope of receiving the promised token from his lord.

"Enough!" said the statesman; "you shall have it in an hour."

By this time Throgmorton had returned: he had found no papers in the barge, nor had he expected—for he knew his friend too well to suppose him capable of carelessness.

"Throgmorton," whispered the future minister, "you must return to London immediately—not an instant is to be lost!"

The young man smiled, and his expressive countenance beamed with intelligence. He more than guessed the nature of the mission on which he was to be dispatched—it was one which promised to open to his ambition the path he had so long been seeking for.

"Remain at my lodgings," continued Cecil, "until the evening; and that your time may be profitably employed, here is a small volume of prayers, worthy of your perusal: you may find in it," he added, "something suited to the state of the young king."

With these words, the speaker drew from his bosom the small, golden-bound volume which was to serve as a token between himself and Elizabeth, and which his friend perfectly understood the use of. The hint for him to remain at his lodgings until the evening, was that Cecil might have time to assure himself of the state of the dying Edward, before he compromised himself too far by communicating with his sister.

"I will be mindful of your words," replied his friend, "as our own fortunes, as well as the future weal of England, depend on them."

"They do depend on them!" whispered Cecil, impressively, as he wrung the hand of his companion, and motioned him to depart.

It was too late: a guard had just been marched down to the landing-place, with strict command to suffer no boat to depart without an order signed by the Duke of Northumberland.

With unruffled countenances, the two friends at once directed their steps towards the palace—where the closing scene of the youthful Edward's reign was rapidly drawing near.

CHAPTER VI.

You may break, sir, but you cannot bend me;
Honour can hold no parance with vile safety:
Life were not life, if bought at such a price.

HEIR OF THE SEPT.

THE Duke of Northumberland, the primate, the Bishops Ridley and Latimer, together with the members of the council, were assembled in the chamber of the dying king, whose confidence to the last, in the wisdom as well as justness of the arrangement he had made for the succession of the crown, appeared unshaken.

The only person not in the confidence of the duke, or ostensibly of his party, was the Earl of Arundel, whose influence and popularity the intriguer justly feared. He deemed it was a master-stroke of policy to secure the person of that powerful noble, by inviting him, under a false pretence, to Greenwich—where he was exposed to the solicitations of Edward, who begged him to sign the act of settlement which secured the throne to the Lady Jane. True to his honour and principles, the high-spirited peer refused.

"Ask my life, your grace," he replied, as he pressed the hand of the suffering youth, "and I will lay it down freely at your bidding; but I dare not tamper with my duty to the crown!"

"Your duty, my lord," observed the Duke of Northumberland, haughtily, "may be taught you in another place! The council have condescended too far, in advising his majesty to solicit your concurrence in an act which the nation will hail with acclamation—which secures the happiness of the people and the safety of the church!"

"Then why solicit it," demanded the earl, "if you are so positive of the sanction of the people? My liege," he added, turning to the boy-king, "you are deceived—but one voice at least shall utter truth to you! Neither the parliament nor the nation will confirm the settlement you have made—a settlement in itself unjust as well as impolitic—which disinherits the blood of the Tudors for the race of the Dudleys!"

"Insolent!" exclaimed the duke, pale with mortification and rage. "Who is this bold man, that he should presume to censure the wisdom of the council, and the act of his king? Such treasons must not pass unpunished, or rebellion will grow strong in the weakness of authority!"

"Treason!" repeated Lord Arundel, with a scornful look; "if there be treason here, it is thou, Robert Dudley, who art the traitor! The same, too, I brand all who have aided you in this foul act—who have imposed on the weakness and credulity of your trusting monarch, to dishonour and mislead him! Edward," he added, sinking on his knees by the side of the couch, "my sovereign, listen to the voice of one whose fathers have stood by the crown and its just rights for centuries—whose race can number more ages of fidelity and service than these men who have deceived you can claim years—recall this act—disturb not the will of your dead father—touch not the inheritance of your sisters!"

"And let the Catholic Mary succeed!" exclaimed the Duke of Northumberland. "Abandon the church which cries to him for succour!"

"Renew the idolatries of Rome!" observed Cranmer.

"The persecution of the saints!" added Ridley.

"And the war of creeds!"

The last observation was from the lips of Latimer, who appears—in the part he took in endeavouring to transfer the crown from the daughters of Henry VIII. to the descendant of his sister—to have been actuated by a desire of avoiding those religious disputes, which he foresaw would inevitably take place on the accession of Mary.

"They are right, Arundel!" murmured the king. "I feel that they are right! I dare not leave the fold of the church to the mercy of the wolves! Mary is Catholic!"

"But not her sister!" whispered the peer.

"True!" somewhat impatiently answered the monarch—for the recollection of Elizabeth was a painful subject with him—"but Mary comes first! Besides, Elizabeth has forgotten me—she no longer loves her brother!"

"And so, officious lord, you are answered!" exclaimed the Duke of Northumberland, with a triumphant smile; "it is well the state hath been taught to know its enemies! You will remove, my lord, to the Tower, until the pleasure of the council shall be known!"

"Say rather the pleasure of its master!" indignantly replied the earl; "for the council are but the echoes of your will! Farewell, my liege!" he added, turning to the dying Edward; "the blood of your faithful subject rests not on your head, but upon those of your perfidious counsellors!"

Loud murmurs broke from the creatures of Northumberland, as they listened to the charge, which conscience whispered them was too true. Cecil, who at this moment entered the apartment, accompanied by Throgmorton, exchanged a meaning glance with his friend the instant he saw the countenance of the king: it was evident that he had not many hours—perhaps minutes—to live.

"Blood!" said the dying boy. "I will have no bloodshed—there has been too much already!" he added, with a sigh.

"He is thinking of his uncle's!" whispered Cecil.

"Dudley," continued the king, "Arundel came here on our invitation: it suits not with our honour that he should be deprived of liberty; there will be time enough for wrangling when I am dead!"

"Pardon me, my dearest lord!" replied the duke, for the first time venturing openly to dispute his royal master's will; "but reflection will, I am sure, induce you to recall your words—it cannot be!"

"Cannot?"

"Reasons of state—the safety of the realm," he added, in an earnest whisper, "oppose it!"

An expression of painful surprise, not unmixed with suspicion, overspread the countenance of Edward, as he gradually raised himself upon his pillow, and fixed his eyes upon the speaker. All present were struck—perhaps for the first time—with a resemblance between him and his father—a likeness which consisted more in expression than feature.

"Dudley," he exclaimed, "hitherto I have spoken with you only as a friend; my words are now those of a king—although a dying one!"

There was a dead silence in the royal chamber—mistake was upon all: a sudden revolution in the feelings or purpose of the monarch—a few hours more of life—and their lives, as well as the success of their schemes, might be in jeopardy.

"It is my will," he continued; "mark me, lord, my will, that our true and loyal cousin of Arundel be permitted to depart! Let not his path be troubled; harm but a hair of his head, and I will find the means to punish you, even though the blow be struck from my tomb!"

Overcome with the unusual effort, the sufferer sank back upon his pillow, and for several moments breathed heavily.

The countenance of Northumberland was pale as death. He had never but once before heard the royal boy express his will so firmly: this was on the occasion of the downfall of his uncle, the Protector Somerset. Falling on his knees, he exclaimed, with hypocritical tears:

"Forgive me, my royal master! Forgive me, if my zeal outran respect! Think not that Dudley—who has revered you as his sovereign, loved and watched over you like his son—would fail in obedience to your slightest command! My honours, wealth, offices, are all your gift: your bounty gave, your pleasure can resume them!"

"No, Dudley—no!" sobbed Edward, whose feelings were touched by the pretended affection of his favourite. "I do not mean that; but Arundel shall depart in safety!"

"My life shall guard his!" exclaimed the duke; "since I find that it is dear to you! My lord," he added, bowing to the earl in mock humility—for the crafty intriguer had not the least intention of carrying out the directions of the dying monarch—"I will myself conduct your lordship to the courtyard of the palace!"

Although Lord Arundel was not deceived by the specious promise of his enemy, he did not think fit to disturb the last moments of his sovereign, by a scene which would be useless. The members of the council were too deeply implicated in his schemes to venture to give force to the declaration of their master—added to which, they were, to all intents and purposes, as completely prisoners as himself; for the crafty politician had taken care to surround the palace with a body of troops devoted to his interests.

Kissing the hand of the dying Edward for the last time, he thanked him for his noble conduct towards him, adding, "that his heart was lighter, since his sovereign had done him justice."

"Not quite!" whispered Edward; "not quite! but it is in my heart to do so! Would we had met sooner!"

No sooner had the duke conducted the earl to the courtyard of the palace, than, instead of setting him at liberty, he gave him in custody to Sir John Marshall, one of his creatures, and commanded him to convey him close prisoner to the Tower.

"Traitor!" exclaimed the peer, in a tone of cold contempt; "it will not be long before your own turn comes! The block will be dressed for your head sooner than mine!"

His enemy turned from him with a scornful laugh. The block for him—preposterous! The resources of the kingdom were in his hands—the fleet manned by his creatures—every place of trust filled by his friends: what had he to fear?"

"Let him rail!" he said, as he returned to the chamber of his dupe—and, there is too much cause to fear, his victim; for the physicians of the king had been dismissed by his orders, and the sufferer placed under the care of an old woman, whom many accused of vending poisons. "A few moments more, and the crown will have passed from Edward's race to mine! My daughter-in-law, the Lady Jane," he added, "may wear the bauble; but mine must be the power—hers the shadow!"

Casting his eyes round, to assure himself that his orders had been obeyed, and that the posts of the palace were in the hands of his followers and friends, he mounted the staircase which led to the royal apartments, and entered the chamber with an impatient step—for he began to tire of the mask he had so long and so successfully worn.

"In a few moments!" he muttered, as he gazed upon the features of Edward, which were fearfully distorted.

"Hush!" exclaimed Cranmer, sinking on his knees, and commencing the service for the dying. "The death-agony is upon him! Pray for a departing soul! Pray for a dying king!"

FACETIÆ.

"A lass I am no more," as the girl said when she got married.

QUICK IRRESISTIBLE.—As an inducement to their clients, the Circleville Journal says, that all subscribers paying in advance, will be entitled to a first-rate obituary notice in case of death.

WHAT comprises man's life? His follies, his faults, and his misfortunes. That's about all.

THE heart of a flirt settles no more tenaciously on a gentleman's affections, than a button does on one of his shirts—for, in fact, it is no sooner on than it's off again.

THERE is a gaol down east so "shabby," that the prisoners are ashamed of it. One day a great rogue told the keeper that if he didn't get it fixed, he would break out and "thrash" him. Fine place that for the encouragement of honesty.

RUNNING into debt often tempts people to tell falsehoods. This made a great wit say, "Lying rides on debt's back." When you have contracted a debt you may think little of payment, but creditors have better memories than debtors: being a superstitious sect, they are great observers of days and dates.

A locomotive on the Rochester and Syracuse Railroad, has been adorned with the title "I still live." That is more than many of the passengers can say at the end of the journey.

AN ingenious down-easter has invented an umbrella with a gutter all around it, so that the water pours off in a single stream. What next?

A Frenchman has just opened, at Paris, an institution to teach people to smile.

Did you ever know a person to believe you when you explained how you got a black eye?

An old Scotch lady was in the habit of inculcating the duties of charity into her grandchildren after the following fashion: "My dears, when I and your father and mother have finished our meals, when you have all eaten as much as you conveniently can, and when you have fed the three cats, and the parrot—then, my dear children, remember the poor."

COURT SCENE.—"Sir," said a fierce lawyer, "do you, on your oath, swear that this is not your handwriting?" "I reckon not," was the cool reply, "Does it resemble your writing?" "Yes sir, I think it don't." "Do you swear that it don't resemble your writing?" "I do!" "You take your oath that this writing does not resemble yours in a single letter?" "Ye-a-s, sir!" "Now, how do you know?" "Cause I can't write!"

GOOD DESCENT.—It is a question whether being called "the son of a gun" should not rather be taken as a compliment than as a term of abuse, as it is well known that no gun is good for anything unless it descends in a straight line from a good stock.

THE papers have discovered some grass from the "path of rectitude." We fear that path must be sadly overgrown with grass, it is so little travelled now-a-days.

"A rolling stone gathers no moss." A very doubtful adage. We have just seen, in a country paper, the marriage of Peleg Rowinston to Miss Orphelia Morse.

LOOKING OUT IN TIME.—A short time ago, a decent married woman, in whose husband's name a small sum was deposited in the savings bank here, called upon the actuary, and intimated that she wished to have the whole amount withdrawn. It happened to be after bank hours, and she was therefore requested to call back that day so-nigh. The blank aspect of her countenance, when this announcement was communicated instantly betokened that there was something wrong. She was allowed to go, however, unquestioned. Punctual to the hour specified, she made her appearance that day week with her pass-book in her hand, and renewed her request. The visible anxiety which she betrayed induced a question as to the motive for her conduct, when out at once came the secret: The thrifty pair had got a newspaper sent them, in which some apprehensions were expressed as to the probability of a French invasion, and the sacking of the Bank of England by the hostile troops: "So that," quoth she, "the guidman and myself thought that the sooner we wad tak' our money out o' your bank the better, as it wad be safer in our ain keepin'." The good woman suffered herself to be persuaded that her alarm was somewhat premature, and finally became reconciled to the leaving of the "siller" where it was.—Inverness Advertiser.

"How do you get on with your arithmetic and catechism?" asked a father of his little boy, the other night. "How far have you got?" "I've ciphered through addition, subtraction, justification, sanctification, and adoption," answered the little fellow.

EYES are the electric telegraph of the heart, that will send a message any distance in a language only known to the two souls who correspond.

DANIEL WEBSTER AND HIS BROTHER EZEKIEL.—When Daniel and Ezekiel were boys together, they had frequent literary disputes; and, on one occasion, after they had retired to bed, they entered into a squabble about a certain passage in one of their school-books; and having risen to examine some of the authorities in their possession, they set their bed-clothes on fire, and nearly burnt their father's dwelling. On being questioned the next morning in regard to the accident; Daniel remarked, "That they were in pursuit of light—but got more than they wanted."

A wag describing an elephant, remarked, that this sagacious animal takes care never to be robbed, for he always carries his trunk before him.

A REASON FOR NOT LIKING STEP-FATHERS.—A little fellow once observed: "I do not like these new papas; they whip the old papa's children."

A DELICATE LIBEL.—A quiet, elderly gentleman found himself one of four travellers in a railway carriage. The other three were ladies, who talked from the beginning to the end of the journey—kept up, in fact, so lengthened a conversation, that it was exactly two hundred miles long. When nearly at the terminus, the most voluble of the ladies expressed a hope to the gentleman that the incessant colloquy had not disturbed him. "By no means, madam," he said, politely: "I have been married exactly five-and-thirty years."

The most of the trouble in this world is caused by disappointed desires rather than positive evil. Out of every hundred men you meet with, ninety-five are low-spirited: not because they lack comforts, but because they are not blessed with a surplusage. Queer critics!

ONE of the drollest occurrences in the annals of gallantry, is related of Gibbon, the historian, who was short in stature, and fat. One day, being alone with the beautiful Madame de Crouzas, he dropped on his knees before her, and made a declaration of love, in the most passionate terms. The astonished lady rejected his suit, and requested him to rise. The abashed historian remained on his knees. "Rise, Mr. Gibbon—I beseech you, rise!" Mr. Gibbon still kept his posture. "Mr. Gibbon, will you have the goodness to get up?" "Alas, madam, faltered the unlucky lover, "I cannot!" He was too fat to regain his feet without assistance. Madame de Crouzas rang the bell, and said to her servants, "Lift up Mr. Gibbon!"

SCARCER ARTICLES.

- A Parson, who practises all he professes,
- A Beauty that never feels proud when she dresses;
- A Lawyer whose honesty pleads for his client,
- A Braggart whose courage is always defiant;
- A sensible dandy—an actual Friend—
- Philanthropy publishing "money to lend"—
- A skilful Physician regardless of self—
- A stanch Politician forgetful of self—
- A sour old bachelor neatly arrayed—
- And last, tho' not rarest—a cheerful old maid.

PREMONITORY SYMPTOMS OF AN OLD BACHELOR.—When he cuts a certain number of little square bits of paper every night, and lays them on his toilet-table, ready to wipe his razor when he shaves in the morning—that's a symptom. When he carries his fingers perfectly straight in his gloves, for fear of friction on the knuckles—that's a symptom. When he leaves a friend's house in the middle of the evening, to avoid a walk home with a lady—that's a symptom. When he keeps his hat on in a lecture-room, till the latest permitted minute, on account of a draught—that's a symptom. When he wears a large moustache and heard to conceal certain defects—that's a symptom. When he turns a huge coat-collar up over his ears, every time there's a cloud in the sky—that's a symptom. When he refuses a hymn-book in church, because he don't like to be seen using glasses—that's a symptom. When he can't go to sleep till he has ascertained whether the seam of the sheet is precisely in the middle of the bed—that's a symptom. When an anthracite fire and a wadded wrapper have greater charms for him than a pair of bright eyes, jingling sleigh-bells, and a l'le a-l'le under a buffalo robe—that's a symptom. When a whiskey punch and a flannel nightcap are the ne plus ultra of his earthly felicity—that's a symptom. When he says "pshaw!" to children, and has a growing partiality for stuffed rocking-chairs and well-aired linen—that's a symptom.

A COULDER CARD.—Now that the British dominions include the Australian Diggings, her Majesty can add to her present titles that of the Queen of Spades.—Punch.

THE ULTIMA RATIO.—As war has been called the "ultima ratio of kings," so a duel may be stigmatised as the "ultima ratio of fools."—Ibid.

AN EDITORIAL CRY.—(Overheard in the Counting-house of a Shabby Newspaper Office.)—"Give your Orders, gentlemen—give your Orders for the Theatros, gentlemen—the Advertisers are in the room."—Ibid.

A TEMPERANCE FROLIC.—We lately saw, in a paper, an announcement of the promotion of the "Assistant Engineer of the first-class of the Devastation," by name "Mr. R. Grog." We suspect that the paragraph thus connecting Grog with Devastation must have been concocted by some teetotal wag.—Ibid.

EGGING THEM ON.—A country barrister in France, named Billot—and a most tempestuous, frothy Billot he seems to be—has published a pamphlet, in which he humbly announces that we English must all be massacred, and England herself destroyed "in its egg." When this ranting would-be cut-throat talks of destroying England in its egg, he seems to forget that there is something in the shape of shell to be met before the egg is to undergo the process of batter.—Ibid.

THE ALARMING SACRIFICERS.

THOROUGHFARES just now are infested by gangs of suspicious looking characters, who go about for the purpose of thrusting into our hands, throwing into the windows of cabs and omnibuses, or impudently leaving at our houses a quantity of printed letters, having the words "From the Commissioners," "Private Issue," and not unfrequently the Royal Arms on the envelope. These things are becoming an intolerable nuisance, not only in London, but in several provincial towns, into which a set of hawkers have intruded themselves, and getting possession of a room at one of the principal inns, they diffuse their fraudulent announcements among the unsuspecting inhabitants. For the instruction of the public we shall take the liberty of translating one of these swindling circulars into the plain truth, so that people may know what they really have to expect if they visit the "Commission Rooms," "Marts," "Emporiums," "Public Halls," or whatever else these dens of dishonesty may be called in town or country.

ALARMING SACRIFICE OF TRUTH AND HONESTY.

The well-known—and much better known than trusted—firm of SWAG, BRAG, TAG, RAG, AND COMPANY, having purchased, with accommodation bills drawn upon the notorious houses of Swindle, Dwindle, and Co., the whole stock of Damaged Damasks, Rubbishy Stuffs, Short measure Longcloths, and Bad Goods, have determined to get them cleared off in a few days, so that Swag, Brag, Tag, Rag, and Co. may get clear off themselves before they are traced by their dupes and creditors.

The whole must be got rid of without any reserve, but with the usual amount of unblushing impudence, and wholly regardless of cost—to character.

Among the principal bargains will be found 5000 Opera mantles, worth 10s; present price, £1 1s. These elegant articles may be said to be so reduced as to be had for almost nothing, as they are so small that scarcely any use can be made of them.

3000 pieces of Common English Stuff, lately translated into French Merino, and now offered for six times as much as they are worth, as they must be got rid of in order to effect a good riddance.

About 1000 dresses in pieces—every dress being in at least 8 or 9 pieces—but must not be opened before purchase, as time will not allow; at, say 6 and 9 per dress.

Thousands of Lovely Barèges, at a nominal price—the value being literally nominal.

Several Shawls in beautiful designs—the principal design being on the pockets of the public.

170 Dresses at 8 and 6! Very costly—at that price.

1000 Ell Wide Robing Silks at 2 guineas, worth at least ten—shillings.

Several pieces of Satin in lengths, greatly reduced—in length, by short measure.

7000 Transparent Encaustic Shawls, at 25 shillings—the transparency being so complete that the imposition may be seen through immediately.

Several thousands of extraordinary Muffs—quite worthy of the purchasers at this establishment.

All goods—and bads—must be paid for before they are taken away, as, if time were allowed for inspection, no one would ever think of paying for them afterwards. Any article complained of will be rectified on inquiring at the other establishment, Number 2400, Regent Street, with back entrance in Cheapside.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SOMETHING TO SWALLOW.—We have lately been shown a monster egg, laid by a common white fowl, bred by M. V. D. Mark. It weighs no less than three and a half ounces, is six inches in circumference, and seven inches in the oval. The fowl is yet scarcely a twelve-month old.—Bristol Gazette.

WITCHES RAISING THE WIND.—In the reign of the "British Solomon," some poor women, said to be witches, were accused of raising a storm when his queen was to cross the sea. Evidence to the following effect was given in the High Court of Justiciary: They baptised a cat, and passed her thrice through the links of the chimney cruk (on which the boilers hang); then, at Bessie Todd's house, they tied four joints of a dead man to the cat's feet, and at midnight all the witches and their allies at Leith sallied out, and carried the cat to the pier-head; from thence they cast her as far as possible into the sea, and cried out, "See, there be no deceit among us." Poor puss, notwithstanding her impediments, swam safely on shore, from which the whole sisterhood inferred that the queen would arrive safely in Scotland.

STRANGE, IF TRUE.—A considerable quantity of wreck has been recently cast ashore on the Galloway coast, including a quantity of tallow, which has evidently been a long time in the water, as the staves which had encircled it were nearly all decayed. We learn from a ship captain, who has just come from the Isle of Man, that, about fifty years ago, a vessel, partly laden with tallow, was wrecked near the island, and at a short distance from the spot where the fearful catastrophe lately occurred, by which an explosion of gunpowder took place on board the ship Lily, when the vessel was blown to pieces, and thirty lives destroyed. It is supposed that the force of the explosion had been felt for some distance along the shore and that the tallow casks, which had lain for half a century at the bottom of the sea, started from their resting-place, had risen to the surface, and been carried by winds and waves to the coast, where they have at last been recovered.—Dumfries Courier.

AN old sailor, upwards of one hundred years old, met with a miserable death, lately, on the platform of the railway station at Winchester, under circumstances which reflect considerable disgrace upon the police. The corner's inquiry lasted two days, from which we gather the following facts: The deceased was known by the name of James Bennett Welch. He represented himself to have been born at New York, in 1750, and to have served under Captain Cook, when he sailed round the world. He was well known in Portsmouth, and almost wholly supported himself by the pence which were dropped him by the men-of-war's men. One evening, a short time back, he hobbled into the tap of a house near the railway station. He was got out; but it would appear that he was injured by some horse and cart, as his left leg was fractured in two places, and the limb was bleeding. He was again taken into the house. The old man said he could not walk home, and, as twelve o'clock drew nigh, the police were called in. They helped to get him out of the house, left him on the pavement outside, and went to their beats. He attracted the attention of a marine going by, who managed to carry him to the guard-house; and Lieutenant Rawlins, the officer on duty, seeing his distressed condition, directed him some nourishment, and warm water to bathe the leg. A doctor saw him, but it did not seem that he knew the limb was fractured. The officers who had previously ejected him from the house then appeared at the guard-house, and, procuring a wheelbarrow, conducted the poor sufferer to the station-house, and, with his clothes on, laid him in bed. There he remained three days, and another doctor, who visited him and found him shivering with cold—the cell window being open—appeared to have learned little more than the previous one respecting the unfortunate man's broken leg. The police then communicated with Capt. Samuels, a county magistrate, who proceeded to the cell—the deceased being unable to move—and, after hearing the testimony, committed him to the gaol for twenty-one days, as a rogue and vagabond. On the following morning the poor fellow was wheeled to the railway-station in a Bath chair, and placed on the bottom of a carriage, for removal to the city. On reaching the station, he was helped out, and laid on the gravel ground of the platform, while a cart was procured to take him to the gaol. He was observed to gradually sink, and, making a slight effort to recover himself, apparently, he raised his hands, and expired. Medical aid was then sent for, but of course all chance of saving the old fellow was gone. On a post-mortem examination being made, the extent of the injury to the leg was discovered. The surgeon described death to have been caused by the shock which the system had sustained by the injury, and which might have been accelerated by exposure to the cold, &c.

SWEET AND SAD.

'Tis sweet to mark the violet blow,
A spot of Heaven on winter's snow,
To feel the balmy South, in airs
That tremble sweet on icy stairs,
And warmth to buried flowerets bring,
While birds their first blithe carol sing.

'Tis joy to mark the tiny face
Ripen with traits of blooming grace,
To see the light, thro' dawning sense,
Of meaning and intelligence,
While lisping murmurs, careless wiles,
Deepen to words, and tears, and smiles.

'Tis joy to mark the love we store,
From little grow to more and more;
Nurtur'd by gentle looks and deeds,
To those fair buds, the little seeds,
That swell with strength and beauty now,
To bloom on love's eternal bough.

'Tis sad to mark the leafy fringe
Of woodlands take a deeper tinge;
Amid the fall of ripen'd fruit
The forests don their russet suit;
To note, while breezes moan and sigh,
The glorious works of nature die.

And sad to gather round the bed
That shrouds in gloom the silent dead,
To hear the stifled sob, the prayer,
From lov'd ones breath'd, oppress the air,
To take one last deep look, and then
To mingle in the strife of men!

But sadder yet to feel the love
We fondly priz'd all earth above,
Grow cold and careless day by day,
Till all like dreams hath passed away,
And joys so bright in days of yore
Have fled, to beam on earth no more!

PECCIE.

TO OUR READERS.

PERMANENT ENLARGEMENT OF "THE LONDON JOURNAL"

THE PROPRIETOR OF THE LONDON JOURNAL, anxious to convey to his numerous subscribers and readers the expression of his gratitude for the unprecedented patronage he has received, begs leave to offer it in the form which he believes will prove most acceptable to them—namely, the Permanent Enlargement of the work to ONE-FOURTH more than its original size.

THE LONDON JOURNAL is not only the cheapest and argest, but by far the most extensively circulated of the serials devoted to the amusement and instruction of the people. It is the welcome guest alike of the drawing-room and the cottage. Fathers place it with confidence in the hands of their children—assured that not a line which can sully the purity of the youthful mind will be found to disgrace its pages.

In conclusion, the Proprietor begs leave to assure his patrons, that, whilst every exertion will be made to advance with the spirit of the times, in the progress of science, literature, and art, the same moral tone which has hitherto prevailed will be strictly preserved. No expense or effort will be spared to maintain the Journal in its present honourable position, as the head of not only the serial publications of England, but of the world.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

H. W.—Cousins should not marry. The relationship is too close. But there are other objections, equally, if not more powerful. The Church, in not prohibiting these marriages, has emitted to perform a very responsible duty.

POCKET BOOK.—A certificated bankrupt cannot be compelled to discharge any of the debts from which he was relieved by his bankruptcy. The object of the process is to do justice to creditors, and enable the debtor to begin again without any incumbrances.

ZARA.—The conventual system is repugnant to the discipline of the English church; but a section of its members have been attempting some experiments in the way of societies of "Sisters of Mercy." Most of them have been ridiculous failures, and owe their origin to the same disordered moral feeling which finds room for activity in Agapemones.

JOHN CLAYTON.—The first English duke, as the title is now understood, was Edward the Black Prince, whom his father created Duke of Cornwall. In the reign of Elizabeth the title became extinct, and half a century afterwards was revived by James I., who created his favourite, George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

YANKEE.—You say your daughter was married in America, a licence being procured at a court-house, and the ceremony was afterwards performed by a Methodist parson, at his own house, the parson and his wife being the only witnesses. Such a marriage is valid in America, and being so, is good in England; the English law cannot ignore the law of a foreign country.

C. C. S.—As a drop of water incessantly falling on stone will in time wear it away, so will man's devotion overcome woman's indifference. Have patience. The third declaration will be made, but not yet. Having gathered wisdom from experience, he will test your sincerity before he risks his final avowal. There is luck in odd numbers.

A SON.—What! seventeen, and in love! Nonsense! It's only a boyish dream! perhaps somewhat the sweeter for being a boy's dream. Dream on; at twenty-five you will have a very different idea of love.

ONE OF THE CLOTH.—The reason why we advocate the seniority in years of the husband is, because woman's intellect is more precocious than man's; and when the ages of husband and wife are equal, or she is the older, her mind is almost invariably the stronger, and she leads him instead of his leading her, and thus the union becomes discordant—the very institution of marriage is perverted. On an average, girls of eighteen have wiser heads on their shoulders than young men of twenty-two, or even twenty-five.

MONASTOON.—Buckingham Palace being in the diocese of London, and Windsor Castle in that of Oxford, you ask whose parishioner her Majesty the Queen is considered. The Queen is the parishioner of the Archbishop of Canterbury, no matter where she may reside: it was solemnly decided so by Parliament, in a dispute between the primate and the Bishop of Winchester, as to the right of crowning the sovereign.

BLUE PETER.—To avoid the bad habit of liquidising the sound of all words in which the letter "r" occurs, you must accustom your tongue to the sounds which a child makes when first endeavouring to speak. When you find yourself pronouncing "rule" "chule," begin to burr, and rattle your tongue just as a child does. There is no other cure.

POUTER.—In purchasing pigeons, regard must be had to the age, for eight years is about the average duration of a pigeon's life, and it is prolific only during the first four years. The voice is a good guide. The young pigeon squeaks, and it is not until after the expiration of a year that it has obtained its full, deep-toned voice. In young pigeons the eyes appear smaller than those of the old ones, but, as age advances, they become sparkling, and have a more convex appearance. The beak of the old bird is long, strong, and hard; with the young ones, on the contrary, it is weaker and softer, while its extremity is sharper and less worn by the gathering of its food. An old pigeon has darker, harder, and stronger feet, with longer spurs than the younger ones, whose feet are red, soft, and tender. The feet become stronger with age, the outer skin becomes horny and scaly, and the pretty redness is changed into a blackish red or dark blue. The brilliancy of the feathers on the neck is another test of the age of a pigeon: on a young pigeon the brightness of the colour is scarcely perceptible from the plumage of the body; but as the bird becomes older, the feathers become, as it were, more matted, and a beautiful diversity of colour is exhibited. Frauds are practised by dealers, in painting pigeons; but this may be easily detected by the sickly appearance of the birds. The purchaser should also pay particular attention to the number of feathers in the wings and tail. Every wing has at the end three long feathers, called the flight feathers; the six immediately following gradually diminishing in length; then eight smaller feathers, which gradually increase in length, three of which are more prominent than the others, the middle one being particularly so. The tail consists of twelve feathers, six on the right, six on the left, the latter one being rather circular. A fanciful pigeon ought to have thirty-six feathers in its tail, and no pigeon possessing a less number is considered a well-bred or a valuable bird.

A TRADESMAN writes to us on the crime of embezzlement, and particularly by a class of men who do business on what is called commission. The police reports inform us that this offence is alarmingly on the increase; that all classes of tradesmen, coal dealers, spirit dealers, clothiers, and drapers, are being victimised to an alarming extent. The characters of some of the men employed is a sufficient explanation of the frequency of the offence; but we think tradesmen are much to blame themselves. In wishing to extend their business in a hurry, they are not over cautious as to the means, or the kind of agent they trust. Excess always brings its punishment, and in nothing sooner than trade. Still, honest men should be protected; and we think the law which snaps up a defaulting clerk, ought to trip up a swindling agent, although he has only a commission for his salary. Tradesmen, however, are beginning to understand how they can be "penny-wise and pound-foolish," for small salaries, in addition to a commission, are extensively given. Our correspondent should submit his statement to the Trade Protection Society.

C. C. B.—You say you deceived the young lady to whom you are attached by understating your age by a year: ought you now to inform her of the actual fact? Certainly; better make a clean breast of it before than after marriage. Love will plead with you for pardon. But be warned by this fault as to your future conduct. Neither the most disinterested affection nor the best of motives will justify or palliate a lie.

C. E. BIRK has been in love with a young lady, who, in turn, has reciprocated such love—but no promise of marriage has been given, nor, indeed, thought of—for a very good reason, viz.: that neither her circumstances nor for her own good, in a pecuniary point of view, be sufficient at present to maintain a married couple. What he wishes to know is, how he can honourably, and with the feelings of a gentleman, break up the attachment; for he feels confident that it would be several years before he should be in sufficiently good circumstances to bear the expense of a wife. Our correspondent cannot with any honour retire from the engagement. He should have thought of his circumstances before he had gained, or attempted to gain, the affection of the young lady. He must be candid, lay aside all reserve and deception, and inform her of everything. If she loves truly, she will be faithful and true any number of years.

A. Z. To give a fresh colour to Morocco leather, grind three ounces and a quarter of lake, and three ounces and a quarter of carmine, in spirits of turpentine, add to it half a pint of turpentine, and a quart of copal varnish. Wash the leather with spirits of turpentine, and, when dry, colour it slightly with the paint. Repeat this two or three times, the last two coats the same day. The paint must not be too thick.

TOM PINCH.—The salutation, "good morning," used after noon, is sanctioned by custom. When an employer thus salutes a servant, he should reply in the same words, with the addition of "sir." In the fashionable world, "morning" is all the time from sunrise to the dinner hour. Many of our customs are ridiculous when closely examined, but they must be followed until better are adopted.

ZANGA.—We think that the prosperity of commerce and manufactures, and the physical happiness of a people, depend on the accumulation of wealth and the acquisition of fortunes by private individuals; for the accumulation of wealth in civilised communities is not only the safeguard and protection against famine and scarcity, but it is also the means by which the country's resources are developed. The disparity of fortune which exists is not only inseparable from human nature, but also a wise provision for the happiness of mankind. This disparity certainly benefits individuals at the expense of the many, but at the same time it adds to the happiness of all, in providing and storing up something beyond our immediate wants—in stimulating enterprise, and affording room for healthful emulation. The masses in the present state of society are prodigal and disposed to consume or expend all they can obtain. The wants of mankind, though naturally very small, are capable of infinite expansion by habit or example. The luxuries and enjoyments in which the rich can indulge, increase a desire for similar things in the many, and stimulate wants and enterprise. A nation, therefore, owes its greatness and commercial prosperity to those few who are more prudent, who possess more self-denial, who have a greater desire to accumulate, and who are also gifted with more intelligence in knowing how to avail themselves of opportunities, than the people at large. These are the causes of commercial prosperity, and the danger attendant on them consists wholly in their being carried to extremities.

ROBERT AND EMILIA.—Conversation is essential to civilisation, for it is man's gregarious nature which is the cause of his superiority over all other animals. Sydney Smith contended, that "Every man's understanding and acquirements how extensive soever they might appear, was made up from the contributions of his friends and companions." This is partly true, and shows how important a part conversation plays in society. It is therefore necessary that it should be regulated by rules, or at least have its special etiquette. Even in good society, this etiquette is grossly violated, but as it is difficult to define à la non scripta, we will merely mention one or two generalities which must be observed. 1. Conversation should never degenerate into discussion. It requires so much tact and good breeding to sustain an argument, however logical and correct the argument may be, that an avoidance of it will give him more popularity than a triumph over his antagonist would accomplish. 2. Never lose your temper, nor take offence at any supposed slight. If a vulgar person is disagreeable, never resent it at the time. 3. Never defend friends unless the conversation be pointedly addressed to yourself. 4. Never "talk at people" or use expletives, and particularly avoid repeating the name of the person to whom you are speaking. How ridiculous it sounds when you hear a voluble person say: "Really, Mrs. Jenkins, I quite agree with you Mrs. Jenkins." 5. When referring to your children, never add anything to their names. "Master John," or "Master James," or "Miss Katharine," is extremely little, because none but intimate friends will take the liberty of calling them by their Christian names. 6. Of all things avoid a loud tone of voice in conversation. "Horse laughs" are suggestive of familiarity with tavern or omnibus society. 7. Never show off in strange company—for unless you are au fait with your subject, you may meet with a Tartar, and be distinguished in a moment. Among the bores in society are those who are perpetually holding forth on music, the drama, and the fine arts. As a rule, never attempt to rise above the mental level of the company you are in, for the mere introduction of such topics will be sure to be resented as an assumption on your part. 8. Never whisper in company, or take a person aside—this is a great rudeness. 9. Never lounge on sofas, or recline in chairs; it is indecorous, and, in the presence of ladies, offensive. 10. "Keep out of the shop." Never "spin long yarns," or indulge in slang or musty professional jargon. 11. Mothers should never repeat nursery anecdotes or bon-mots. 12. Never address a person by the initial of his or her name. Nothing is more abominable than to hear a woman speak of her husband, as "Mr. B."

MORNINGTON was much charmed by perusing "Ernestine's" sprightly communication. He believes he would be exactly the kind of individual to suit her; being considered very affectionate, well-educated, agreeable-looking, and accustomed to some of the best society in the metropolis. He is also in good circumstances, his income amounting to fully the sum specified. He is twenty-seven years of age.

J. G. cannot be very sagacious; at all events his organ of self-esteem must be remarkably small. He says that he is intimately acquainted with a young girl for whom he feels a sentiment warmer than friendship, but is positively at a loss to understand her. At a party lately he saw that she studiously avoided him, actually refusing to dance with him; but sometimes he detected her looking at him; however, on their eyes meeting, she instantly withdrew her gaze. At other times, when she was apparently listening to the person next her, she would occasionally make a remark—a sarcastic one—upon what J. G. might say. She is frank and cordial with other young men, but towards him she is all reserve and coldness; when speaking she will never look him straight in the face, and when alone with him she seems anxious to get rid of him. J. G. is blind. The girl dotes on him; and let him for assurance-sake be informed, that a true affection ever delights in coyness, mystery, and something that may be called coquetry, but is not really that pernicious quality. She loves, and now he must learn how to woo.

ADA, a respectable girl, twenty-three years of age, nice-looking, very amiable and cheerful in disposition, would be most happy to correspond with "Valerius."

FITZ GLENNIE thus announces his, we are sorry to say, not uncommon want:

Dear sir, I'm in want of a wife,
Who is amiable, pretty, and young;
But don't think, though I send you these lines,
That I've quite lost the use of my tongue.

To tell you the truth, I scarce see,
From one end of the year to the other,
A young lady, fair, droll, tall, or short,
But the fair one engaged to my brother.

For money I care not a straw,
For I've more than sufficient for two.
I should like her to play, sing, and draw,
And a few things (domestic) to do.

I'm affectionate, steady, and kind,
In years I'm more than one score
Dear ladies take pity on me,
And you'll never regret it, I'm sure.

A SCOTCH LASSIE, the only daughter of respectable parents, wants a good-looking, accomplished, and pious husband—the latter quality must not be wanting, as she feels nothing in this world can give pleasure or happiness without piety. She is twenty-two years of age, and considered very good-looking; but, deeming beauty nothing without true worth, would like her husband to be about thirty or forty years of age, with a comfortable home to bestow, and an income of from two to three hundred a-year.

THE BLUE VIOLET AND THE YELLOW LILY, two young ladies, milliners' apprentices, would be happy to correspond with two gentlemen, holding respectable situations, in their own rank of life. The Blue Violet is eighteen, with large, blue eyes, a tall, graceful figure, and, as her friends say, very distinguished in appearance. The Yellow Lily is seventeen, with beautiful black hair and eyes, and a tall, slight figure. Although both milliners' apprentices, they are descended from two families almost noble, but suddenly reduced from affluence to comparative poverty.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Charles Gould (The verses have merit)—Difficulty (Your period of servitude will not expire until the 30th of April, 1854)—M. D. (Mr. Henry Russell, the vocalist, was born at Sheerness, in 1814)—Grace and Isabel (Apply to some music publisher)—E. M. T. (Well written, but too grandiloquent for the subject)—J. Delmont (You are at liberty to better your condition)—H. Langton (Persevere. We may use the poem, but cannot promise)—F. R. (Take the book to a dealer in rare literary works)—J. W. (Soyer's is considered the best "Cookery Book" which has been published)—L. S. H. (The allowance to witnesses attending assizes in criminal cases, is regulated by their position in society. The lowest is 2s. 6d. per day, and the highest 7s. 6d.).

—C. Wigam (It would depend upon the kind of situation you could procure. All government clerks must have a knowledge of book-keeping and accounts)—W. B. W. (A very good style of handwriting)—Ada Byron (A mere penny-a-line concoction. No marriage was ever contemplated between the late Duke of Wellington and Miss Burdett Coutts)—Charles Winderst (Read the Reports of the Registrar General, the Sanitary Commissioners, and the various committees of the Ragged Schools in the Metropolis)—W. M. (We do not know the private address of Lady Franklin, but the general one, "London," would be sufficient)—Mary Bell (The old "Gentleman" is a very old knave. He means to make you his victim. His trumpery offer of a worthless bit of paper ought to have let you see the cloven-foot of the arch-sinner)—J. M. A. (The "Will and the Way" commenced in No. 338 of this Journal)—Orison (Procure a draft upon some responsible American bank)—Augustus Howard (Follow our instructions implicitly)—Topsy (Napoleon II. was sixteen at his death)—* * (Mr. Hume may be seen in the lobby of the House of Commons almost every night Parliament is sitting)—Defyddap Jevan (All in print)—Alfred James (The advantages of a freedom of the City of London are, having a vote for members of Parliament and some privileges as a trader)—Adela (Apply to Mr. Grove, at the offices, Adelaide Buildings, London Bridge)—W. T. O. (Very good. Try again)—W. H. Miller (Procure the book from Heywood's, Manchester)—D. M. R. (We do not approve of emigration)—Vindex (We must refer you to a recruiting sergeant)—Un Voyageur (Postage-stamps are used in Australia, but we cannot say to what extent)—Thos. York (Peruse the book advertisements in the daily papers)—C. Ebsworth (Send your "Essay" to the Rector of Whitechapel Church, London. It has offered a prize for the best, "On the Means of Improving the Condition of the Working Classes")—* * (The French Lessons commenced in No. 312 of this Journal)—John Oakes (Marriage licences may be obtained from a surrogate. With the fees, the costs vary from £2 10s. to £3)—Frank (Pretty, but not suitable for the press)

M. H. (We do not quite understand the question)—Questure (Write to the editor of a Coventry newspaper)—A Novice (A number of valuable recipes for making ink will be found in the first volume of this Journal)—R. B. (A feeling, but still a dreary monody)—Hector, Orkney (Pursue the path you have chosen. The drawings are brimful of promise. Study hard, and you will be a great painter. But take our advice: begin at the beginning—master all the elementary rules)—W. H. Parke (Apply at the district church)—Marie (Too long for insertion in our pages)—Jno. Dalton (Too defective in construction)—William Drake (Several of the numbers are out of print)—David Hunter—W. B.—R. B.—Ada M.—George Chapman—Rusticia Henry Harrison—Marie A.—John Warnock—J. C. D. L.—E. B. Reekes—W. H. Millman, jun.—L. B. T.—C. W. J.—J. M. C.—J. Allen—J. Carne—Sophia—White Rose Bud—Annie—Thos. Vernon—T. V.—Myrtle and Daisy—G. T. A.—James Crowley—Wallace—James S.—The Inquisitive Maid—Florence—Agnes—E. L. S.—J. Lively—Josephus—A Sailor—Reeves—W. Ewing—John Ritely—C. Walter—Frederick A.—M. A. D.—Derry Down—G. H. F.—Lavinia—Adeline B.—Jane Emma Wilson—Harriet—Laura—W. T.—Maude—F. J. L.—F. R. C.—Norma—Thos. C. K.—A. Z.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 423.—Vol. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 2, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[JOE BEANS IN THE HALL AT COLONEL MOWBRAY'S.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXIX.

Friendship hath angel eyes, and watcheth o'er
The safety of the absent and the loved.
Friendship is proved the truest shield of life;
Blunting its darts, turning its ills aside.

ISABEL.

THE morning after the scene in the library of Carrow Abbey, Joe Beans and the lawyer started for London; but not without giving repeated directions to Chettleborough to keep a sharp look out touching the safety of his harmless charge; not that the old sexton needed any additional caution, for he had become so attached to the poor fanatic, that the care he bestowed upon him was rather the result of affection than the service of a hireling. The old groom was the constant companion of his labours in the churchyard, of his solitary hours at night, in the lone cottage—where Martin would sit, patiently watching his guardian, as he played upon the bells.

Joe's first step on reaching the metropolis was to call at the house of Colonel Mowbray, in St. James's, to inquire after his sweetheart Susan. The tall, powdered footman who opened the door, eyed his rustic garb with that supercilious air of contempt which characterises funkiness in its intercourse with the humble, even more fully than its cringing servility marks its contact with the great.

"Su-u-san!" deliberately drawled out the fellow, as he counted the large pearl buttons on Joe's shooting-jacket; "I think we had such a young person in our establishment, but she's gone."

"Gone!" repeated her lover.

"Yes—with her young lady, Miss De Vere."

"Where?" demanded Joe, impatiently.

"Can't say."

The powdered rascal had received his instructions from her ladyship—whose own gentleman he considered himself—and was about to close the door in the face of the honest rustic, when the latter unceremoniously pushed it back, and entered the hall: he was not to be put off so easily.

"What do you mean?" demanded the astonished lackey.

By way of illustrating his intentions, the unwelcome visitor seated himself in the porter's great chair, which happened to be unoccupied at the moment. Deliberately stretching out his legs, and imitating the affected, drawling tone of the speaker, he made answer:

"Re-e-main here till I see the young person whom I came to see!"

"But you can't—she's gone!"

"Where?"

"Don't know."

"Don't believe a word of it!" replied the rustic.

"What!" exclaimed the indignant funk, astonished that his veracity should be doubted; "do you suppose me capable of—"

"Anything," interrupted Joe; "lying, I am certain, comes more easily to you than your prayers; true, you have greater practice: like most of your tribe, you have caught the vices of your betters—their manners you only imitate!"

"Impertinence!" drawled the footman.

"That's the London name for truth, I suppose?" drily observed the lover of the pretty Susan.

"Go!"

"When I have seen the person I came to see!"

The pampered menial at last began to lose all patience, and, calling two or three of his fellow-servants into the hall, they threatened to eject the intruder by force.

At the word "force" Joe sprang from his seat, and, grasping the tough ash stick—his constant companion, and which he facetiously called his "persuader"—firmly in his hand, dared them to attempt it.

The liveried herd drew back irresolute: they did not like the expression in the eyes of their visitor; still, less did they admire the stout eudgel in his grasp.

"Send for an officer!" said the coachman.

"It's my opinion," observed the butler, "that the fellow only wants to steal the plate!"

The words had scarcely escaped his lips, when the stick of the insulted youth descended with fearful rapidity upon the skull of the speaker, which it must have broken, had not nature, with a mother's prudent foresight, made it of more than ordinary thickness. It is wonderfully beautiful to observe how she adapts her works to the ends for which they are created.

The confusion and noise brought Lady Mowbray from the library into the hall. At the first glance she recognised the countenance of honest Joe and guessed all that had occurred. Her plans were laid in an instant—for she was a woman of tact.

"What is the meaning of this disturbance?" she inquired.

Each party was eager to explain: the servants pleaded their mistress's orders—Joe, his determination not to quit the house without seeing Susan, and how the butler had more than insinuated—had asserted—that he came with the design to rob the house.

"Ridiculous!" said her ladyship, with a good-humoured smile, "to suppose for an instant that one whom my esteemed friend Dr. Orme places so much confidence in could entertain such an intention! Susan has accompanied her young lady on a visit to a relative a few miles from town, or of course you should be permitted to see her. Go into the servants' hall," she added, "and take some refreshment, whilst I write a note to my niece, of which you shall be the bearer."

All this was so naturally uttered, that the poor fellow could not suspect the least treachery was concealed under such apparent kindness. Thanking Lady Mowbray for her great condescension, the faithful fellow followed his conductor to the servants' hall: the butler, who was the least satisfied of the party, lingered behind.

"James," said his mistress.

"Yes, my lady," sullenly answered the man, who felt little inclined to do the honours of the servants' hall to his assailant.

"Go instantly," said the artful woman, "to the police-office, and, whilst this insolent ruffian is settling below, procure a warrant for the assault, and return as quickly as possible with the proper persons to execute it."

"I will, my lady," exclaimed the fellow, with alacrity.

"And if you really think, James," continued Lady Mowbray—"of course not otherwise—that this rude young man really had the intention of robbing the house, you had better state it before the magistrate."

"I'll swear to it, my lady," replied the fellow, with a grin of satisfaction; then, with sudden recollection, he added: "suppose he should call upon your ladyship for a character?"

"On me!" replied his mistress, with a bitter look; "neither the colonel nor myself know anything about him. Stay," she continued, as the butler was leaving the hall; "you may have some fees to pay for the warrant, and it would be hardly just for the expense to all upon you."

"No more it would, my lady."

She dropped her purse into the extended hand of the ready instrument of her scheme for ridding herself of the embarrassing presence of poor Joe.

"Thank you, my lady!"

"You need not mind the change," she added.

These last words were whispered in a tone which conveyed to the wretch—who was quick of apprehension where his interests were concerned—the nature of the service expected from him. The touch of the gold, joined to the smart of the blow he had received, made him ready to swear to anything that might compromise his assailant.

Before leaving the house for the police-office, he called for the footman, whose dignity had been so offended by the manner in which Joe Beans had mimicked him, and whispered something in his ear.

"I'll do it!" said the dunkey, with a knowing wink—and he immediately returned to the servants' hall, where the unsuspecting youth was waiting for the letter from Lady Mowbray.

Fortunately for him, his good looks and merry humour made a favourable impression upon the susceptible heart of the cook, who admired his curly hair, width of shoulders, and manly frame. For the last four years she had indulged in dreams of settling in the country—she began to tire of service; and, having saved a matter of three hundred pounds, thought it was high time to abdicate her empire over the boiled and the roast.

Joe had not been introduced to her more than a quarter of an hour before she felt convinced that he would make an admirable landlord for some village inn: as for a landlady, she had never seen any one, in her own opinion, more calculated for such an important position than herself.

Joe, although a rustic, possessed great natural tact: he knew, if not by experience, at least by instinct, that in warfare there is nothing like having a friend in the enemies' camp. He ogled, sighed, and returned the coquettish glances of the fat and fair cordon bleu with interest, to the dreadful annoyance of the tall, aristocratic footman, who fancied that he had long since secured an interest in that quarter.

His rage, however, did not prevent his remembering and executing the directions of the butler—which he accomplished by quietly slipping a silver spoon, with the Mowbray crest, into the pocket of his rival's shooting-jacket, as he passed behind his chair.

The moment after he had accomplished this dexterous coup de main, there was a loud knocking at the street-door: it was the butler, returned with the officers. With a smile of malice at the anticipated humiliation of his presumed rival, the fellow left the room.

"Feel in your pocket," said the cook—who had noticed the action of her fellow-servant.

The young fellow did so, and drew forth the spoon. He was about to protest, in indignant terms, his ignorance how it came there, when the woman interrupted him with a good-humoured smile.

"Not a word!" she said. "I know it! Quick, give it to me!"

He passed it to her, and squeezed her fat hand as she received it from him, in token of his gratitude; he would even have ventured upon a kiss—but she quietly repulsed him.

"No time to lose!" she whispered—for the approaching footsteps warned her that the butler and footman were returning; and, with a presence of mind worthy of a soubrette of Molière, she dropped the piece of plate into the pocket of a livery coat which was hanging in the room.

The next instant the servants, accompanied by the officers, made their appearance. The latter arrested Joe upon a charge of assault only—nothing as yet had been said about the robbery.

Great was the indignation of the cook—she had serious thoughts of attempting a rescue; but, judging that her efforts would be useless, she did, woman-like, what she considered the next best thing—began to scold. She felt confident that he was an honest youth—his enemies were cowardly wretches—he had been invited by her ladyship into the house, and it was a burning shame, &c. &c.

These severe observations were followed by a string of expletives still more expressive; but, as the blow could not be denied, the object for whom she felt such sudden and tender interest was marched off to give an account of himself at the police-office.

The butler and footman remained: the former began to count the plate in the basket and on the table.

"The rascal!" he exclaimed, with well-affected indignation; "as I suspected—a spoon missing!"

"We-e had better folter to the pelise office!" affectedly drawled his fellow servant, at the same time taking down his livery coat from the peg.

It now became the cook's turn to smile.

"Sorry for your di sappointment!" continued the scamp darting a reproachful look at the too susceptible maiden as he left the room.

"More than I am for yours!" muttered the indignant girl. "There is one consolation—the rascal will be disappointed in his design! Mercy on us!" she added, "if it wasn't his own coat that I put the spoon into! I neither like him nor his mistress, and wish I was out of the family: it is time that I had a home of my own!"

Whether the sigh—something between the puffing of a seal and the wheeze of a pair of bellows—which followed, had reference to Joe or to the longing she experienced for a home, I must leave our readers to surmise: certain, the cook's ideas of a home were not confined to a house alone—there was a husband in the perspective; and that very day she resolved on the purchase of a cap, with bright, cherry-coloured ribbons, which had attracted her attention the previous week; but which, strong as had been the temptation, from motives of economy she had declined.

After such an instance of strength of mind, we may conclude that she was no ordinary woman: cherry-coloured ribbons became her—for, as the tall footman used to observe:

"They contasted beauty-fully with the colour in her chweek!"

CHAPTER LXX.

Between the two she stands: as life

Were loth to lose her—death to win her,

Most impatient.

OLD PLAY.

WHEN Meeran Hafaz, accompanied by Colonel Mowbray and Dr. Guyot, arrived at Mortlake, they found poor Ellen a prey to a delirious fever. The ayah was seated at a short distance from the bed, watching with intense anxiety the countenance of her victim. Several times she had approached, with endearing words, to raise her heavy head, or hold the cup to her burning lips; but on each occasion had been driven back by the loud shrieks of her foster-child—who, clinging to Susan with frantic terror, begged of her, in piteous accents, to protect her from the cruel Zara.

"She will murder me!" she exclaimed, "as she has murdered my dear, kind uncle and poor Henry! Well, well!" she added; better to die than suffer as I suffer! We may be happy in the grave—Meeran cannot reach us there!"

Then she would extend her hand, and offer, in piteous accents, to drink the poison which she was fully persuaded the ayah had mixed for her.

The Indian woman turned aside, more deeply wounded by the abhorrence which Ellen expressed than she would acknowledge even to herself. On one occasion Susan thought she saw her wipe aside a tear: if so, it was but a momentary weakness—one of those sudden ebullitions of feeling which, despite our resolution and the case-hardening lessons of the world, will at times remind us we are human. The next instant her countenance resumed its usual immoveable expression, as she seated herself, as we have described, at a distance from the bed, counting the heavy moments till the return of Meeran Hafaz with assistance.

For some minutes Dr. Guyot stood at the threshold of the apartment, silently making himself master of the situation, as he termed it. Before he approached the couch of his patient, he motioned to his companions to retire.

"But you do not know—" whispered the young Indian.

"I know everything," interrupted the man of science, in the same under-tone; "the young lady has received a shock, the repetition of which must prove fatal; and that shock," he added, "was caused by the sight of you! Her life hangs upon a thread so fine and delicate, that a breath, a sigh, would almost sunder it!"

Without a word of remonstrance, Meeran and the colonel descended to the drawing-room. The mind of the former resembled a volcano after an eruption—it was exhausted by the overflow of its ungovernable passions. With a deep sigh, he threw himself upon the sofa, and something like a prayer trembled on his scornful lips, when he recalled Ellen—the companion of his childhood, the object of his boyhood's love—suffering—mad—perhaps dying. He felt for the moment that there was something even more terrible than losing her—the reproach of having destroyed her.

All was not earth in his fierce nature yet.

"You are sad!" calmly observed the colonel.

"Sad!" repeated the young man, starting to his feet, and beginning to pace the apartment; "by heavens, man, it requires the presence of a heartless thing like thee to reconcile me to myself—to convince me that there is an abyss of degradation into which I have not yet fallen!"

"And who led me to its brink?" demanded his confederate, stung by the tone of bitter contempt in which the reproof was uttered; "who, when, like some giddy traveller, I stood tottering upon its verge, hurled me down? I may deserve reproach," he added, "but not from your lips!"

"You are right!" replied Meeran, mournfully; "I have lost the right even of despising you!"

As he spoke, the warrenner entered the room, with a bold, swaggering air. His partnership in crime made him, in his own imagination, the equal of the man who had employed him. The heart and brain of the young Indian resembled those heavy, solitary clouds which sometimes disfigure the summer sky, charged with electric thunder—black as the veil of night with the impending storm—requiring only a conductor to discharge their fury. The appearance of the warrenner proved that conductor. As the ruffian was confidently advancing towards the spot where Meeran was standing, the concentrated rage in the heart of the young man broke forth with fearful violence.

"Wretch!" he exclaimed; "brutal, vile, senseless, and loathsome as the thing made in man's image, in scorn of his humanity—to mock his pride, by showing him how fine the link between him and the beast, when reason abdicates her throne, and passion grasps the empire of the mind!"

"What have I done," demanded the wretch, in a sulky tone, "more than yourself?"—for community in evil made him bold. "I like the girl, and only wanted to terrify her into better humour!"

With a laugh which might have rivalled the hyena's savage cry, as it darts from its secret ambush on its victim, Meeran sprang upon him; the nerves and muscles of his slender limbs seemed formed of tempered steel.

Without any apparent effort, he raised the huge frame of the warrenner from the ground, till it was on a level with his head, then hurled him to the extreme end of the room.

Will Sidelers, as we have shown, had always been of a revengeful nature. He rose in an instant, and, shaking himself like a shaggy hound, rushed upon his assailant.

Twice the attack was repeated, and with the same result; the third time the brutal ruffian lay, his strength exhausted, bruised, bleeding, and subdued, at the extreme end of the room.

Meeran stood calmly regarding him—not a pulse beat quicker: the contest had dispersed the gathered tempest of his soul, but left his nerves unshaken.

"Is the fellow dead?" demanded the colonel.

A low groan from the warrenner assured him that he was not.

"Humph!" continued the heartless man of the world, "only bruised and maimed! You have acted unwisely," he added, lowering his tone; "it is far better to destroy the instrument for which we have no further use than to abuse it!"

"What should I fear?" demanded the young man, scornfully.

"Nothing—of course, nothing!" replied his friend; "you know best! I merely expressed an opinion; but I have known a discarded dog to bite its former master!"

"Then, as if the fate of the wretch was no affair of his, he opened one of the windows of the drawing-room, stepped out, and strolled to a distance on the lawn.

A prudent man—a very prudent man—was Colonel Mowbray: he neither wished to hear nor see anything which might ultimately compromise either his friend or himself.

"Rise!" said Meeran to the warrenner, as soon as they were alone.

Twice did the bruised and half-stunned wretch endeavour to raise himself upon his feet, but without success: at each effort he staggered and fell, and remained crouching, like a maimed beast of prey, gazing with bloodshot, terror-stricken eyes upon the hunter.

"I can't!" he murmured.

Although the young Indian shuddered at the contact, he extended his hand to assist him to a chair. As soon as the wounded man was seated, he groaned heavily.

"Your insolence has merited death," observed Meeran, mildly; "for it has nearly caused the death of one, to spare whose heart one sigh, whose eyes one tear, I would have sacrificed a thousand lives like thine!"

"Anything but your own passions!" mentally thought the warrenner; but prudence kept him silent.

"Few," continued the speaker, "have ever escaped my hand when it has been raised to strike: thou art one of those few; but beware how you offend again—I spare not twice! This girl—this attendant upon Miss De Vere—he could not bring himself to profane the name of Ellen by pronouncing it to such a being—'offend her but with one word—insult her only by a look—and I will trample thy hideous soul from thy yet more hideous carcass. You know me," he added, "and are warned!"

The cold, passionless tone in which the menace was uttered made it far more terrible than if pronounced in the ebullition of passion.

Will Sidelers shuddered as he listened to it: for once he had found his master.

Meeran needed not his assurance of obedience—the subdued look of the ruffian convinced him that the lesson he had given him would not be thrown away; added to which, experience taught him that no animal is more submissive than a cur thoroughly broken by the lash.

Dr. Guyot made his appearance in the drawing-room. At the sight of the withered old Frenchman, the young Indian forgot everything but Ellen, and the danger which threatened to remove her from his power.

"What hope?" he demanded, grasping the hand of the man of science with such nervous eagerness that he winced beneath the pressure.

"But slight," replied the doctor; "three conditions are necessary to save her."

"Name them?"

"The first is silence the most profound."

"Not a breath shall ruffle the rose-leaf at her casement window!" exclaimed Meeran; "the tomb pyramids of Egypt shall not be more silent! I will watch over the mansion: all shall be still as if the wing of the angel of death rested over it!"

"It does rest over it!" observed the Frenchman, seriously. "The next condition is, that neither yourself, Colonel Mowbray, nor the dark woman who calls her her foster-child, pass the threshold of her chamber."

Meeran looked at him doubtfully.

"The fever is of the nerves and brain," continued the speaker, in the same cold, professional tone; "a second shock must prove fatal to her. But do not let my words influence you," he added; "I have no interest in her recovery, since my fees will be the same whether she lives or dies!"

The young man turned away from him with disgust, and impatiently muttered:

"The last condition, sir—the last?"

"Light must be carefully excluded from her chamber: the eye is the window of the brain—it must be closed; all impression from external objects carefully excluded from the overladen mind."

"And how long is this to last?" inquired the young man.

"About ten days," replied the physician.

"And in that time—"

"The patient will be either past all danger, or ready for the grave!"

A cold shudder ran through the veins of Meeran.

Hafaz as he listened to the response, which was pronounced with the heartless tone of an oracle—in fact, coming from such lips, it might almost be deemed as the response of fate—for Dr. Guyot was one of those remarkable men to whom science had as few secrets as humanity had claims; and yet, with all his wisdom, he was the slave of earth's most debasing passion—avarice: that canker of the heart which in youth chills its most generous impulses—in age becomes the engrossing passion of the soul.

Of all idols, gold most debases its worshippers.

There was a violent struggle in the heart of the young Indian before he could induce himself to promise compliance with the directions of the speaker. Resign for ten days—which appeared to him as many ages—the happiness of seeing Ellen—of pouring his prayers in her ear, offering the burning homage of his headstrong passion at her feet; but the thought, the dread of losing her prevailed, and he reluctantly yielded his assent.

A smile—so faint that it escaped the glance of Meeran—played for an instant on the lips of Dr. Guyot—then disappeared.

"She must hear no voice save that of her young attendant," observed the latter, "or mine."

"Be it so," said his employer; "but till the crisis is past, I shall not leave the place."

The old man merely shrugged his shoulders, to denote how indifferent the arrangement appeared to him.

"I shall at once prepare my draught," he said, as he quitted the room; "I will remain to watch its effect, and then return to London."

To all Meeran's entreaties to remain at Mortlake till the danger was past, the doctor turned a deaf ear. He proffered gold—an enormous sum—but the man of science remained unmoved: he had other patients to attend to, he said, whose safety required his presence as much as Ellen's.

"You shall not leave here!" interrupted the young man, passionately; "what are the lives of a thousand of earth's daughters compared to hers?"

"And what shall detain me?" demanded the Frenchman, coolly.

"Force."

"My person, possibly," answered the doctor; "but not my mind, my skill, my knowledge! You rave, young man! no violence can compel me to employ the only qualities for which you desire my presence. The slightest hindrance to my free action would only be the warrant for the death of her you would preserve!"

The argument was unanswerable; even the strong will of Meeran bent to the iron law of necessity—and he reluctantly consented to the departure of the doctor, who seemed to hold in his hands the balance of life and death. After requesting the physician, at his leisure, to attend to the hurts of the warreners—who, all the time of their conversation had been suffering in silence, in the chair where the young Indian had placed him—he stepped upon the lawn to rejoin Colonel Mowbray.

"Well," said the latter, "what have you done with him?"

"With whom?"

"Will Sidelers."

"Left him to the care of Dr. Guyot."

"His friend received the intelligence with a dissatisfied air: he remembered how the ruffian for years had cherished a vindictive feeling against his brother. True, the late baronet had not been bound to him by the bond of mutual guilt, and the colonel was supposed to ignore the tie which existed between him and Meeran Hafaz.

"Tell me," said the young man, whose suspicions of the Frenchman were only partially allayed; "this Guyot—"

"Is possessed of more skill than half the College of Physicians put together. I have known him succeed a hundred times when every other hope had failed."

"It is not his skill I doubt."

"What, then?"

"His fidelity," replied Meeran—who proceeded to relate the conversation which had just taken place, and the conditions which the old man had exacted.

"And you assented?" demanded the colonel.

"What could I do?"

"You acted wisely," continued the querist. "As for his fidelity, as long as you gratify his avarice, I will answer for it he will not betray you; besides," he added, "none know of Ellen's illness—at least none who are likely to feel an interest in the result; the few servants who are aware of her being here are devoted, body and soul, to your will: there is no fear."

Meeran endeavoured to persuade himself that such was really the case: but, like most natives of the East, he was naturally of a suspicious nature, and more than once he regretted the promise which the fear of Ellen's illness had extorted from him.

The ayah was even more impatient at being driven from the chamber of her charge. With the inconsistency of all violent and passionate dispositions, she refused for a long time to be separated from the poor girl whose happiness she had so successfully laboured to destroy: her heart yearned to watch over her; it was torture to her proud spirit to see her attended by another—to be made to feel that her presence was abhorrent to her foster-child—whom she still loved with the wayward, capricious affection of a nurse.

That same evening, Susan, who had descended to the servants' hall to prepare a cooling drink from some herbs which Dr. Guyot had given her, was startled by a tapping at the lofty window which looked upon the lawn at the back of the house.

"Are you alone?" demanded a childish voice.

"Yes."

"Then 'tis you down," continued the speaker.

"The doors are locked," replied the poor girl, trembling with apprehension lest Zara or the warreners should make their appearance—for as yet she knew not of the injuries which the latter had received.

"I've got a key," was the response.

In a few seconds it was heard to turn in the rusty wards of the long-disused lock, and the red-haired urchin who had been so unceremoniously treated by Sidelers, crept cautiously into the room. With a broad grin upon his features, he stood for some time staring at Susan—who thought, as she recognised him by the light of the solitary lamp suspended from the ceiling, that she had never seen a being more hideous.

"I like thee," said the boy; "else I wouldn't have come back. What beest thee here for?"

The prisoner answered only by a sigh.

"I could let 'ee out, if I loiked!"

Susan's first impulse was to accept the offer thus unexpectedly made; but the recollection of Ellen's unfriended state prevented her.

"I cannot leave," she said.

"Why not?" demanded the lad, with an air of surprise; "does 'ee loike the old man who wor tuzzling wi' thee yesterday?"

"Like him!" she replied, with a shudder; oh, no! I fear his presence more than anything on earth!"

"If I wor thee, I'd catch him!"

"What do you mean?"

"Trap him," continued the strange visitor, "as I do the birds. Cromwell House be a rare old cage! I don't mind if I show 'ee how, for speaking kindly to me, and telling the old un not to beat me: they generally laugh in the village," he added, bitterly, "when any one beats or mocks me—that's why I hate un so."

Feeling that any chance, however desperate, in her present position was not to be neglected, she entreated the unearthly-looking urchin to explain himself.

"Come with me," he cried; "I'll show 'ee!"

Passing before her, he led to the passage running parallel with the great hall—which passage it was necessary to traverse in order to pass from the servants' rooms to the great staircase; originally there were two staircases—but the one leading from the offices having fallen into decay and become dangerous, had been removed. As soon as they reached the spot, her conductor, with a grin which rendered his features yet more hideous, pointed to the floor.

"What mean you?" demanded Susan, who suspected that he was trifling with her.

"There it be!"

"What?"

"My trap—and yours, if you loike to catch un: if the old man begins to court 'ee again, and thee don't loike it, look here!"

Kneeling on the ground, as near as possible to the door, the boy pushed back a part of the moulding at the bottom of the panel-work, and discovered an iron ring—by pulling which he caused the floor to open for the space of ten or twelve feet, discovering a sort of pit or cellar, of considerable depth. Delighted with what he had done, he remained staring at Susan, grinning and nodding all the while.

The sharp-witted girl saw in an instant the advantage to be derived from the discovery: it enabled her to place a barrier between the apartments of Ellen and the lower part of the house, where the warreners and the ayah were banished. She thanked the poor grateful little fellow, and, drawing forth her purse, proffered him a piece of gold. The boy looked disappointed, and refused it somewhat sullenly; Susan repeatedly urged him to accept it.

"I want!" he muttered.

"But why not?"

"Because it wor not for money that I showed it."

"For what, then?" demanded the girl, with an air of surprise.

"For the koind word and look you gave me, when the old man wor so hard upon I," replied the lad. "I thought I could be of use to 'ee, and so I comed back; and I'll come agin," he added, "if you want me."

Susan gave him her hand, which he shook heartily, at the same time observing that it wor better nor money.

A step was heard in the hall: he hastily closed the trap, and motioned to her to fly.

"And you?" she whispered.

"I know a dozen ways to be off without their catching me; for the matter of that, twenty or more. This be a queer old place: I can come in and go out as I loike, and nobody the wiser."

So saying, he crept along the passage, and disappeared under a small recess beneath the great staircase. Susan retraced her steps rapidly to the servants' room. When she reached it, the ayah was already there: the woman regarded her suspiciously.

"Where have you been?" she demanded.

Susan hesitated.

"You need not answer me," she continued; "I will spare you the trouble of hatching a lie, which could not deceive me: you have been trying to escape!"

"And what if I have?" replied the poor girl, secretly rejoiced that her suspicions extended no further; "the treatment I have received here has not been such that I feel very anxious to remain."

So saying, she removed the herbs which had been simmering on the fire, and returned to the chamber of her young mistress.

Zara's suspicions were not so easily allayed as Susan imagined. After looking carefully round her, she left the apartment, determined to make a personal inspection of the house—to leave no room unexplored except the chamber of Ellen.

With a light step, she glided along the corridors; visited alternately the long deserted drawing-rooms, the sleeping-chamber and the oaken gallery—called the council-chamber of Cromwell: not a sound fell upon her attentive ear. Just as she was on the point of returning, a slight rustling near one of the windows which opened on the roof startled her; as she gently drew aside the casement, and peered forth, a countenance encountered hers so closely, that they almost met: it was that of the cow-boy, who was so terrified by the oriental style of head-dress and swarthy features of the ayah, that he mistook her for one of the ghosts he had so often heard of.

With a yell of terror, he rolled along the roof, and, but for the parapet, must have fallen over, screaming:

"The ghost! the ghost!"

Zara descended to invoke the aid of Meeran: when they returned, the boy had disappeared; it was some days before he ventured to approach the house again.

CHAPTER LXXI.

Justice is lame as well as blind amongst us.

OTWAY.

WHEN Joe found himself at the police-office, his first care was to dispatch a messenger to Lawyer Elworthy, confident that the clear-headed old man would be much better able to deal with any charge which his enemies might bring against him than he himself could hope to be. It was the first time in his life he had ever been taken before a magistrate, and he naturally betrayed that dread which the uncharitable take as an indication of guilt—the more fair as a proof of innocence.

"Humph!" muttered an old officer, as poor Joe, after an hour's detention, was conducted before his worship; "an old offender!"

The speaker had been drinking at a neighbouring public-house with the butler and the footman.

"Did you ever see me before?" demanded Joe, who perceived that the magistrate had noticed the expression, and that the effect was unfavourable.

The man shook his head: he did not venture to assert positively that he had, although he felt an inclination to do so; but the shake of that grey head conveyed to his worship more even than a response in the affirmative would have done.

The prisoner naturally felt indignant, and repeated his question, with the same result.

"Speak, Simmonds!" said the magistrate.

"Vy," your worship," deliberately answered the officer, "perhaps I should not exactly like to swear to it—these gentry do disguise themselves so very cleverly: sometimes they dress as parsons, sometimes as countrymen; it was a feller in a welweten jacket like that, who robbed Lady Dacre of her diamonds, in the Green Park—not that I mean positively to say it was the same."

"You had better not!" muttered Joe, significantly.

"Proceed with the charge," said the magistrate, gravely.

The footman mounted into the witness-box, and, being duly sworn, stated—that the prisoner called at the house of Colonel Mowbray, under pretence of seeing a young woman who had lately resided there; that, suspecting his intentions, he had tried to dismiss him—but the feller refused to leave; that, despite his remonstrances, he had forced his way into the hall, and committed the assault complained of upon the butler.

The butler next displayed his broken head, and added that, since the departure of the prisoner, he had examined the plate-basket, and missed a spoon.

"Ah! ah!" said the magistrate; "robbery as well assault! Let him be searched!"

Poor Joe's person was immediately turned inside out by the officers: nothing, however, was found upon him, except a well-filled purse and the letter he had received from Susan: it was read by the clerk. It ran thus:

"Now is the time to come—ask for me—say you come from the country; the servants are very stupid and conceited, especially the footman; they will not suspect anything; her ladyship, I fear, begins to look coolly upon me. Your affectionate SUSAN."

"A regular plant!" muttered the old officer.

"Evidently an accomplice!" observed the justice; "has his cell been searched?"

One of the attendants replied in the affirmative, and added, that nothing had been found.

"The butler glanced reproachfully at the tall footman, who began to look excessively puzzled at the result.

At this state of the proceedings, fortunately for Joe, Mr. Elworthy made his appearance. The worthy lawyer proceeded at once to the bench, shook hands with the magistrate, and then nodded familiarly to the prisoner. At the sight of the man of law, the butler was observed to turn very pale.

"Bless me!" exclaimed the justice; "are you acquainted with the prisoner?"

"Perfectly well," replied Mr. Elworthy; "he is a friend of mine."

"A friend!"

Such a declaration from a person of the lawyer's well-known respectability produced an evident impression in favour of the accused; even the old officer began to think that he had judged a little too hastily.

"He is charged with an assault!"

"Possibly!"

"And suspected," continued the magistrate, "of a design to rob the house of Colonel Mowbray."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Mr. Elworthy, emphatically; "it is not more than four-and-twenty hours since he left Norfolk, by my advice and request; we travel fast here. I was perfectly aware of his intended visit to your house, Mowbray's, and can answer that his intentions were only honest but misapprehended."

most preposterous, unless," he added, smilingly, "you suspect me of being an accomplice!"

Such an idea of course was not to be entertained for an instant. The charge of intended robbery was therefore at once dismissed, and nothing then remained to be disposed of but the assault, to establish which the butler was called into the witness-box: he mounted most reluctantly—all his effrontery seemed suddenly to have deserted him, and he studied as much as possible to turn his face from the bench.

The lawyer eyed him for a few moments, with an air which betrayed a confused recollection. Suddenly he turned to the magistrate, and whispered a few words in his ear.

"Are you certain?" said he.

"Most certain," continued Joe's friend; "question him."

The justice remained silent, however, till he had made his deposition. He then asked of Joe what he had to say in answer to the charge.

"I cannot deny it," replied the young man, modestly, but firmly. "I called to see a good and virtuous girl, to whom—" Here he hesitated, but an encouraging smile from Mr. Elworthy urged him to proceed.

"Speak out!" exclaimed the clerk.

"To whom," continued Joe, "I am engaged to be married: there be no harm in that. I was accused of an intention of robbing the house—ordered to quit it like a dog—and so I—I did give him a tap, just to remind the fellow that civility was due to every one. If he bears any malice," he added, "and your worship will see fair play, I'll have it out with him Norfolk fashion. I bear no malice."

We need not inform our readers that Joe's offer was not entertained for an instant: it was contrary to the practice of the court.

"Mr. Beans," said the magistrate, suppressing a smile, with some difficulty; "you are fined forty shillings to our Lord, the King, and discharged."

The money was handed to the clerk, and the prisoner told by one of the officers that he might leave the dock. The instant he was released, he advanced to the table, and begged to know if he might speak a few words.

"Certainly!" was the reply.

"It is only to inform that pale-faced rascal, who stands as if he could not look an honest man in the face, where he may find the spoon whose loss he complained of."

"Dear me!" said the magistrate, "do you know anything about it?"

"Yes, your worship!"

"Where is it?"

"In the footman's pocket," replied Joe, who recognised the livery coat, and proceeded to relate how the kind-hearted cook had witnessed the rascally attempt to criminate him, and the manner in which it had been transferred from his possession to that of the crest-fallen servant, who looked as if he meditated an escape. The butler was already skulking out of the witness-box.

The footman was searched, and, to his confusion, the spoon produced from his pocket.

"I have acted more honestly to you," said Joe, "than you would have done to me. I have explained to his worship how it came there!"

"And I can prove it!" exclaimed a female voice from the crowd.

"Silence in court, there!" exclaimed the red-nosed officer.

"I won't!" replied the same voice; "I am a witness—justice is justice! The young man is nothing to me—of course not—but I'll speak the truth. It's not often that I make up my mind to anything, but when I do, I'd like to see any one that could stop me!"

The cook, her countenance flushed with anger, bustled her way to the table through the crowd, and, without waiting to be sworn, began, with that amiable volubility so peculiar to her sex and profession, to relate everything that had taken place in the servants'-hall; adding, "that she was ready to take her oath to Joe's honesty." In confirmation of which, she seized the book, which the clerk had been vainly tendering, and kissed it with a smack which proved the heartiness of her testimony, if not its truth.

"Your worship," said the tall footman, in a mincing tone, "she is hamorous on the young fellow, and will swear anything!"

"Will I!" replied the woman, with spirit. "At any rate, I am not such a fool as be hamorous on a pitiful, cowardly, sneaking, lickspittle cur as you are! Please sir," she said, turning towards the bench, "I never seed him till this morning, and ten to one," she added, with a sigh—for she had heard Joe's declaration respecting Susan—"after to-day, if ever I see him again."

Who would have thought that mountain of flesh concealed so much true womanly nature? but we should never judge by appearances. On the demand of Mr. Elworthy, her evidence was regularly taken down, and he declared his intention to prosecute the two servants for conspiracy and forgery.

The men saw that their scheme was defeated. The opinion of every one in court was unfavourable to them. Even the red-nosed officer, who had so condescendingly shared their drink at the public-house, began to look indignantly at them. He felt that his respectability had been compromised.

"Officers!" said the magistrate, sharply, "see that neither of those men leave the court!" Then, addressing the butler, who had been forced back into the witness-box, he asked him how long he had lived in the service of Colonel and Lady Mowbray.

The fellow replied with great volubility, and endeavoured to shirk the question, by assuring his worship that he had lived only in the most distinguished families, and that, if he would send for the colonel or her ladyship, they would give him the best of characters.

"Doubtless!" drily muttered the lawyer.

The experienced man of justice was not to be so baffled: he repeated the question, and demanded a straightforward answer.

It came at last—"reluctantly as birdlime comes from furze"—but it did come at last.

"About three months."

"And who recommended you to the colonel?" continued the justice.

There was no reply.

"Shall I tell you?" added the speaker. "Perhaps it was your late master, Captain Elton?"

At the name of Captain Elton, several of the officers began to rummage amongst the papers and handbills offering rewards for goods stolen or lost, and the apprehension of various offenders. They soon came to one giving a description of the valet of the late son-in-law of Sir Jasper Pepper, charged with absconding from the hotel, on the night of his death, with a dressing-case, containing a considerable amount of cash and jewellery. The thief had been accurately described, and the reward was one hundred pounds.

The red nose of the old police officer became of a yet darker hue as he perused the document.

"Curse the fellow!" he muttered: "he has robbed me of a cool hundred! To think that I should have been drinking with him, too! There is one consolation," he thought: "he is sure to hang for his impudence!"

In the days of George III., the punishment for the crime the valet of the late Captain Elton had committed was nothing less than death. No wonder, then, that he turned pale when he first recognised Lawyer Elworthy upon the bench: something whispered him that he was betrayed.

"This is a mistake!" replied the terrified wretch.

"That you must prove upon your trial," blandly observed the magistrate; "the laws are very humane, and afford every facility to a criminal to clear himself—if he can!"

"Send for my master!"

"He can speak to your character, if you wish it, on your trial, my good man."

"I am sure he will bail me!"

His worship, in the same mild tone, gently reminded him that it was out of his power to accept bail for a capital offence; but added, that he would remand him, if he particularly wished it.

It is curious to observe, that the instant a man is charged with any crime affecting his life, with what extreme courtesy the magistrates, judges, and even the gaolers, treat him; he becomes an object of personal interest; is surrounded by the most delicate attentions; sheriffs, chaplains, and turnkeys address him in the blindest tones. When Claude du Val, the dashing highwayman, was sentenced to execution, he declared that he had lost all hope of life, from the politeness of those around him.

Despite his intreaties the justice decided on remanding him, in order to give time to complete the evidence against him; and the tall footman shared his fate, on a charge of conspiracy, Joe being bound over to appear against him on a future day.

As the honest fellow left the office, accompanied by Mr. Elworthy, they encountered the cook, who looked rather reproachfully at the hero of the day: it was not his fault that her dreams of the road-side inn and handsome landlord had been so suddenly dissipated.

Joe pressed her fat red hand in his, and warmly thanked her.

"I have only acted like an honest girl," she said; "and you owe me no gratitude. I shall lose my place through it," she added, "no doubt, but that is no great matter: I can live without serving any one."

"Should that prove the case," observed the lawyer, "you have only to apply to me—I will provide you with a home."

Her heart was too full to thank him. True, she had only seen Joe for an hour; but that hour had melted her susceptible heart—although a cook, she had both feelings and a conscience.

"Have you learnt anything?" inquired Mr. Elworthy of his companion.

"Alas, nothing!"

"I," replied the woman, "can tell you what, perhaps, you will be glad to know: if, as I suppose, your inquiries are for the colonel's niece."

"They are!"

"You must seek her, then, at Mortlake!"

So saying, she turned aside, and disappeared from their gaze.

(To be continued in our next.)

A GHOST STORY.

A GENTLEMAN, to all appearance of large fortune, took furnished lodgings at a house in Soho Square. After he had resided some weeks at this establishment, he lost his brother, who had lived at Hampstead, and who, on his death-bed, particularly desired to be interred in the family vault at Westminster Abbey. The gentleman requested his landlord to permit him to bring the corpse of his brother to his lodgings, and to make arrangements there for his funeral. The landlord, without hesitation, signified his compliance. The body, dressed in a white shroud, was accordingly brought in a very handsome coffin, and placed in the great dining-room. The funeral was to take place the next day, and the lodger and his servants went out to make the necessary preparations for the solemnity. He stayed out late, but this was no uncon-mon thing. The landlord and his family, conceiving that they had no occasion to wait for him, retired to bed as usual, about twelve o'clock. One maid-servant was left up to let him in, and to boil some water, which he had desired might be prepared for making tea on his return. The girl was accordingly sitting alone in the kitchen, when a spectre-looking figure entered, and clapped itself down in a chair opposite to her. The maid was by no means one of the most timid of her sex; but she was terrified beyond expression—lonely as she was—at the unexpected apparition. Uttering a loud scream, she flew out like an arrow at a side-door, and hurried to the chamber of her master and mistress. Scarcely had she awakened them, and communicated to the whole family some portion of the fright with which she was herself overwhelmed, when the spectre, enveloped in a shroud and with a death-like paleness, made its appearance, and sat down in a chair in the bed-room, without their having observed how it entered. The worst of all was, that the creature could get away without passing close to the apparition, which rolled its glaring eyes so frightfully, and so hideously distorted its features, that they could not bear to look at it.

The master and mistress crept under the bed-clothes, covered with profuse perspiration, while the maid-servant sank nearly insensible by the side of the bed. At the same time the whole house seemed to be in an uproar; for, though they had covered themselves over head and ears, they could still hear an incessant noise and clatter, which served to increase their terror. At length all became perfectly still in the house. The landlord ventured to raise his head, and to steal a glance at the chair by the door; but behold the ghost was gone!

Sober reason began to resume its power. The poor girl was brought to herself after a deal of shaking. In a short time they plucked up sufficient courage to quit the bed-room, and to commence an examination of the house, which they expected to find in great disorder. Nor were their anticipations unfounded. The whole house had been stripped by artful thieves, and the gentleman had decamped without paying for his lodgings. It turned out that it was no other than an accomplice of the notorious Arthur Chambers—who was executed at Tyburn, in 1706—who had whitened his face and hands with chalk, and merely counterfeited death. About midnight he quitted the coffin, and appeared to the maid in the kitchen. When she flew up stairs, he softly followed her; and, seated at the door of the chamber, he acted as sentinel, so that his industrious accomplices were enabled to plunder the house without the least molestation.

PERSONS generally, both men and women, love because they think themselves loved; and it is folly to suppose, under ordinary circumstances, one can arouse a feeling of affection in another whom he treats with coldness or indifference. Pride is at the bottom of la grande passion, and that being flattered by what it believes to be appreciation, gives place to a softer sentiment, which is its fellow. Of a hundred wedded couples you meet, ask ninety of them why they married, and they will each answer, in the spirit of Benedick and Beatrice: "I was so loved, it were ungrateful in me not to return such absorbing affection."

A SILVER MINE IN INVERNESS-SHIRE.—There is a tradition in this part of this country, handed down from sire to son, that there lived in Easter Moy, on the Seaforth property, some two or three generations back, a blacksmith of the name of Ferguson, who was never known to run short of a supply of silver. It is said that he found the metal in abundance below and above the rocks of Moy, and, to escape detection, always went in search of it in the dusk, or through the night-time; on account of which some of his more superstitious neighbours had him convicted of holding communion with the banshee. On one occasion, some of his newly-coined shillings fell into the hands of his superior, Mackenzie, of Fairburn, at a market held in Contin (this part of the Seaforth property was possessed by the lairds of Fairburn till the late Lord Seaforth's time), who soon traced out the maker, and he, it is said, threatened him with the simple but sure punishment of hanging, if he should see any more of his new shillings in circulation. In these good old times it was customary to hang at the bidding of the laird, and to escape this, Ferguson discontinued his diggings. Subsequent to the time in which Ferguson lived, a number of his coins were found in a pit at the foot of the rocks, by people employed in planting. It was supposed that they were hidden by him when he was threatened by the laird. Immediately below these rocks, in the pools of the Cairn, are found pearls of considerable value, which are of two kind, brown and white. These pools are visited annually by a blind man and his better half, whose occupation is that of fishing for pearls, by which means they manage to earn a livelihood. This blind pearl-fisher says that, without doubt, there is a silver and a gold mine below these pearl beds; and, strange to relate, he will know the smell that contains the pearl without opening it, which saves him the trouble of opening all the shells he takes out of the river: this so far corroborates the tradition regarding Ferguson's silver mine. There is no doubt, if a practical geologist were to explore these rocks, that silver would be found in sufficient quantities to remunerate more than the labour, when Ferguson, in his night rambles, managed to find it, without great labour, as much as kept him in a comfortable way. It is also said that Ferguson was employed by the laird to dig a sufficient quantity of the metal, which was at that time converted into plate for the family of Fairburn. It is worthy of remark, that Ferguson's great-grandson is a successful game, living in this vicinity.—Lancaster Advertiser.

[THE BIRMINGHAM CENTRAL RAILWAY STATION.]

THE GREAT CENTRAL STATION, NEW STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

RAILWAYS themselves are unquestionably the greatest facts of the age, but there are many things equally substantive in character in the various points in their construction, and line of progress. The tunnels, bridges, viaducts, and tubes on these mighty modern highways, are wonderful feats in architectural and mechanical science. When they can be inspected at leisure, they excite our liveliest admiration; but as the majority of railway travellers can only contemplate them in a flash of lightning kind of manner, the enthusiasm of the public seems to have been concentrated on the stations, where at least opportunities for a brief, but studious lounge is afforded.

The English are enamoured of comfort and convenience, therefore it is not surprising that after railways had been accepted as legitimate enterprises, the approaches to them should have occupied much of the anxious consideration of directors and engineers. The booking of passengers—afterwards superseded by the present admirable system of issuing tickets, the marshalling and starting of trains, the housing of carriages, and punctuality in departure, all required extensive accommodation: accordingly, shed-like erections, fringed by sentry-box offices, and barn-like refreshment-rooms, sprang up in the neighbourhood of the various termini, with mushroom like rapidity. Utility entirely ignored ornament in these erections—which, by the way, were always understood to have been merely temporary in their purpose—and it was not until the Liverpool and Manchester Company placed their passenger station in the very heart of Liverpool, at the end of a tunnel under the town, more than a mile in length, and the great station at Euston Square had been erected, that any attempts were made to render these edifices more worthy of the period which had introduced, and to a certain extent perfected, the railway system in less than twenty years. The great stations at Birmingham, Derby, Manchester, Sheffield, York, Paddington, and London Bridge, at length arose, to show what might be done in the way of embellishment, with a due attention to the main want and leading feature—capacity; and we have frequently since had occasion to give our readers some interesting details, artistic as well as literary, of some of the principal of these, in every mechanical respect, colossal undertakings.

The last large railway station we described in this Journal, was the Great Northern, at King's Cross, in the metropolis; and on this occasion it gives us some pleasure to announce that there is a station in rapid course of construction at Birmingham, which will emphatically not only be the grand one of Birmingham, but of Great Britain. This immense erection, which has been in course of construction for many months past, is fast approaching completion, and, it is expected, will be finished in July.

The old station in Birmingham—one of the most extensive in England, notwithstanding the enormous diversion of traffic from that town, consequent on the opening of the shorter route between the metropolis and the manufacturing districts afforded by the Trent Valley route—was found utterly inadequate for the accumulating traffic of the many railways that converged on such a central point as Birmingham; and accordingly the great convenience of a grand central station, into which several before disconnected lines of railway should enter, was so obvious, that it was determined to erect the building at present in progress, which we will describe as succinctly as our readers would desire.

Turning out of New Street, down a rather steeply-descending, but wide opening, called Stephenson's Place, the principal front of this grand central station comes into view. It consists of two wings, with a central mass supported upon a Tuscan arcade, projecting twenty feet from the faces of the wings. The style of the whole is Italian, and, from this level, four storeys in height, with a bold but chaste cornice and balustrade. The arcade, up to the first-floor level, is executed in Darley Dale stone; above this, the building is white brick, with Portland cement dressings.

Passing under the arcade, we come to the various booking offices for passengers going to the north or south, including also the offices of the Stour Valley, Midland, South Staffordshire, and other lines of great local importance; from thence to a gallery leading to a stone staircase, from which we emerge on to the platform, and then stand under the magnificent roof represented in our engraving. This is another of our splendid iron victories, and is, we believe, of the greatest span in the world. It varies from 188 to 211 feet clear width, and is therefore equal to the two roofs of the Great Northern Station, King's Cross put together, though it differs in being a segment instead of a semicircle. Each truss is supported on the one side by Doric pilasters forming the wall of the station, and on the other by iron columns of the same order. It is thirty feet from the platform to the springing of the roof.

It is difficult to form a correct conception, while standing below, of the immense space thus covered in without a single intermediate support; but when we state that ten lines of rail, four wide platforms, and a roadway of ample space for cabs, omnibuses, &c., is under it, it may give a better idea of its extent than a mere statement of figures. We may, however, mention, that it will be 1080 feet long, with a span varying from 188 to 211 feet, unsupported by a single pillar except at either side.

Notwithstanding the necessarily great size of the members used in the construction of the ribs, the struts, tie-rods, &c., they appear, when up, of a cobweb lightness, the whole being constructed with a view to economy of material, combined with the necessary strength and endurance.

The bridge running right across, shown in the engraving, is a convenient arrangement to admit of passengers passing from the booking-offices, on the higher level, to the opposite platforms, without descending the staircase in the building, and then crossing the rails; and also to enable persons to pass from one platform to another, thus putting any chance of accident from that fruitful source beyond almost the possibility of occurrence. This is the more to be admired, from the number of lines running into the station, and the fine spectacle of activity and grandeur of action it will afford to the beholder from this novel gallery of observation.

An hotel adjoins the station, and forms part of the whole composition, so that the traveller may book himself, without passing from under cover, to almost any part of the kingdom: thus effecting an immense saving in the way of cabs, transfer of luggage, time, &c. The procrastinating traveller, who takes up his abode in this hotel, may thus with impunity delay till the last moment, having but a few yards between his tea or coffee and his train.

The view shown in our engraving is supposed to be taken by a spectator standing at the end of the platform towards Wolverhampton, and would in reality continue overhead, but is here made sectional, in order to give the reader a better idea of the manner in which the ribs are joined together. The rib arches, erected under the direction of Mr. Phillips, superintendent of works for Messrs. Fox, Henderson and Co., are each composed of three sections, and the weight of each rib is 25 tons. There are 45 of these in the roof, at distances of 24 feet apart, and at a height of 75 feet from the rails; nevertheless, their appearance is exceedingly light and fragile to the eye.

The difficulties attendant upon this portion of this latest triumph in mechanical daring, were much enhanced by the circumstance, that no interference with the traffic on the Stour Valley Line could take place. Consequently, a gigantic traversing scaffold had to be constructed, reaching from one side of the station to the other, and of the most ponderous description, by which the work was carried on without blocking up the rails at any point. The roof will be fitted with fluted glass, of which a vast quantity will be used; and we are confident that, when finally completed, "The Grand Central Railway Station at Birmingham"—in Shakspearian phraseology, the very "bowels of the land"—will be the most magnificent structure of the kind in the world. We cannot anticipate that it will in the first instance show much sympathy on the part of railway directors for the fine arts; but after what that Colossus of railway companies, the London and North Western, has done in that department at their beautiful metropolitan station, we dare hope that this mighty feat in iron will not be long found destitute of some of the more delicate attractions of art and science.

SAD AND SIGNIFICANT.—A Georgiana correspondent of the Janus, a German paper in New York, says that he was at Cedartown lately, when a negress was hanged, and thus relates the case: The master of the negress told her that he had sold her four children to a man to whom they were to be delivered next day. The purchaser was known through the neighbourhood as a tyrant and miser, who not only half starved his slaves, but beat them brutally at every opportunity. The mother, who tenderly loved her children, was overcome with grief at the thought of having them sold to such a monster. She begged her master on her knees to keep the children, or, if they must be sold, to let them go to a more humane master. But, after all her efforts proving vain, and being driven to desperation, she, on the following night, murdered the children. This was the crime for which she was hanged.

OUR DINNERS.—It is a vulgar notion that a dinner to be good must be expensive—a fatal mistake, preventive of much social enjoyment. To say nothing of those Who think less of good eating than the whisper,

When seated near them of some pretty lisper, nine-tenths of the recipients of a grand state dinner, formal and costly, would infinitely prefer a fish, a joint, and a bird, with freedom and a good talk.

Boys, 'tis little I care to dine
Where the host is vain, and the guests are fine,
Where the wines are warm and the dishes cold,
And the mutton is young, and the spinsters old.

Some of the most delightful dinners in memory have been the simplest—all wit, fun, and good sense, with merely "flashes of silence." "Cheerful looks make every dish a feast." The very essence of a dinner is the absence of ceremony. Half the dinners that one goes to offer but dry leaves instead of flowers; they are but mockeries of enjoyments, waste of hours, through fear of tyrant custom, and desire to be thought genteel. "Anybody can dine, but very few know how to dine so as to insure the greatest amount of health and enjoyment."

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XVI.

SCENE.—A mountainous pass; the path rugged and dangerous; a huge trunk of pine thrown, as a bridge, over a torrent.

Enter FALKNER.

FALKNER.

ARE we by both deceived, Virtue and Vice?
Doth Virtue cheat and crush us? Vice deceive
And curse? In different modes betrayers of our hope?
Dark is the world, and drear, and difficult!
Nature's doom'd children are baptised with tears,
And Misery is their sponsor!

Love and Friendship are

But other names for life's anxieties!
This little round of time, this petty sphere,
Revolves amidst perpetual woe and care—
Disease and suffering, poverty and sin!
What's life to care for? and for that honour,
Which I have idolised as next to heaven,
What is't?—a dream, a passing dream; and yet
Great minds love lofty action not for fame!
'Tis the spontaneous product of the soul,
Springs from itself, and is its own reward:
Long be it so.

Two acts I must perform,

Which, if I now may judge from what I feel,
In honour and in justice are demanded!
Yet these two acts, born of my brotherly love,
My deep, o'erflowing, never-ebbing love,
May brand me but with infamy; and her,
Whose name I dare not speak and think upon
The deed I am about—what unto her
May be the issue?

Enter JURUS, hastily, whose interruption seems to ruffle FALKNER.

JURUS.

Leave him unscathed to an offended God!
His death could nothing grace thy sister's grave;
Her griefs are wept away! Think better on't;
The Lady Bertha loves thee, fame reports;
Think less of him, more of thine interest.
If all the wicked must be hurled to death,
The world would lack inhabitants ere long;
I'd have thee to thine interest more alert
Than cast thy life upon a ruffian's sword!

FALKNER, contemptuously.

Interest! Self-interest! 'Tis the common cant,
The mean in mind call wisdom of the world;
'Tis that which leads the shallow stream of life,
Arrays the hypocrite in virtue's guise,
Calls over-reaching, knowledge of mankind!
Dull Honesty the workhouse slave, whose rags
Lend jests to those whose finer cunning thrives.
Self-interest! 'Tis a thing whose heart is coin!
And yet the higher virtues of the soul
Find in its mouth an hourly currency;
None speak of reputation, honour, worth,
Frank liberality, and generous faith,
None, like self-interest; so expert the cheat,
It half deceives itself with its own vanities!
Self-interest! 'tis the dastard's ready shield,
The tyrant's plea, the swindler's crafty creed,
Who, honouring law, stops short of legal crime;
'Tis—mark me, sir! a booster in success;
A mean and abject driveller in that hour
Adversity's sharp whip cracks at its heels!
Self-interest! name it not! there is no sound
So sickening, so perfidious to mine ears:
If e'er my stay offend thee, there's the word
Shall rid thee of my presence! Interest!
Self-interest!

JURUS.

Too hot, and over nice!

But 'tis thy humour to behold things thus,
With a most jaundiced and distemper'd view;
If each man studied his true interest
His fellow-men were better'd by that study.
Exaggeration is not argument,
Nor hard words facts. But be that as thou wilt,
Another's happiness is in thy keeping!
Thou hast no right to peril her young life
In perilling thine own: avoid this man!
His sins, like bloodhounds, hunt him to a death
More sure, more keen, than stab of any steel!
When broken, friendless, old before his time,
Revenge could seek no fiercer punishment.
Less abject, less debased, might claim thy sword.
Oh, I implore thee give this venture pause!
Instead of the corrosion of thy conscience,
Reap the enjoyment of a godlike act,
And learn forgiveness!

FALKNER.

JURUS!
Thou'st heard of one, a pilgrim to some shrine,
Who travelled weeks and months, nor food, nor sleep,
For the dry crust could scarce deserve that name,
And the few snatches of outworn nature
Might scarcely claim the title of repose.
What wouldst thou think, after all toil and fasting,
All conquering of the rough impediments
Mountain, flood, rock, might cast upon his way,
To count not elemental harassings—
If, when his eye beheld the shrine he sought,
His foot pressed—ay, within few steps of all
For which he'd welcomed pain, fatigue, and fasting, Thou crossedst his path, and saidst, "Proceed no further,
'Tis Superstition, and not Sanctity,
Which mocks thee here! Get to thy vineyard back!"

Thinkst thou he'd turn his staff from east to west,
And easily, as the blown thistle-down,
Go, at thy breath, the way thou marshall'st him?
No! Feelings time hath rooted change not thus:
Granting his theme Devotion, mine Revenge!
His Love, mine Hate! Why human hate is fixed
As Herculean rock when love's a reed!
Thus 'tis with me, each hour that intervenes
Between Resolve and my assured Revenge
Is cursed as barren! Let me hence!

JURUS.

A moment and I quit thee; yet beware
Lest Passion urge thee down a gulf so deep
That Honour ne'er again may snatch thee back;
Stain not thy sword but in accepted challenge,
And Heaven shield well the right!

[FALKNER impatient.]

Be calm!

FALKNER.

Thou seest I'm calm!

JURUS.

Calm? Yes, that calm which follows when we hurl
A rock from some high cliff that fronts the sea;
That calm which intervenes between its fall
And its hoarse thunder in the deep below!
Thus calm art thou! For now is thy descent;
The thunder is to come!

[FALKNER still more impatient.]

Soon, thou shalt go soon!

FALKNER.

Shall? Nay, I will!

JURUS.

Thou shalt!

FALKNER.

'Tis shaming time to linger; but hereafter,
Lest thou might'st think hadst thou resisted more
I had been turned away from this intent,
I'll tell thee, Jurus, of my dream last night.
My sleep is but a torture of foul dreams,
And not repose. 'Twas a dull, vapoury night,
The stars came few, and in their misty hoods
Looked cold and comfortless; straight in my dream
Steps numberless I saw, as to a throne,
The throne itself invisible; yet something
Vast and imperial through the hovering clouds
Mine eye could trace, heaving its shadowy front
Midway amidst the heavens. On the steps
Forms of all times, all ages, and all nations—
The young, the old, the brave, and the beautiful,
The proud and poor, the beggar and the prince,
The maiden, with a presence like the rose,
The babe, as from the mother's breast withdrawn,
Lay dead upon the steps of that huge pile.
Far as the sight could range nothing was there
But death! nothing but death!—some lay with heads
All gashed and bleeding—others with bare breast
Stabbed—and the clotted current purple-dried:
Others—'twas horrible—

When, suddenly,

Broad as a comet streaming upper air,
Appear'd a mighty sceptre—on engraved
Was Destiny. The shadows heaved convulsive,
In cloudy billows tost the sea-like sky,
And, as though palsy shook their marble veins,
The throne-steps lost their dead! I woke,
Yet did the vision long enwrap my soul,
Still blazed that mystic scripture, Destiny!
It haunts me still; so blinds with blood mine eyes,
That all I see is crimson to my sight—
All earth incarnadine, the very air,
Is gory! Let me on; thou'rt mad to hold!

[Breaks from him.]

I follow Destiny!

[Exit FALKNER.]

JURUS.

Counsel unloved is vain: alas, for Man,
Who lifts his evil Passions on a throne,
Crowns it with curses, swears allegiance to it,
Bends, like a slave, to minister its wish,
And steep'd in sin, cries out, "Thy Destiny!"
Call it by any name, 'tis Passion still:
Whereon—
If there's, indeed, that thing called "Destiny,"
It rides as with a whirlwind to destruction:
I follow; but to what? Oh, dreadful thought!
May Pity hide the page that tells the deed,
Or blot it out for ever!

(To be continued.)

[Exit JURUS.]

THE IMPROMPTU COAT.

M. DE LOUVOIS had been very wild in his youth, and had spent his money with marvellous facility. His father, irritated by his extravagance, refused to supply him with the means of continuing his disorderly career; and, his credit being quite exhausted, he was forced to return, like the Prodigal Son, to the paternal chateau. He arrived unincumbered by a second coat. A large party had been invited to dinner; but, as our hero expected the company to be rather stupid, he wished not to appear, giving his toilet as an excuse.

"Monsieur," said his father, "I will expect you to join this dinner party."

"I should feel much pleasure, but it is impossible!—this coat—"

"Wear another!"

"I have not got it!"

"You have not one! after spending sixty thousand livres with tailors and embroiderers?"

"That would have been a very good reason formerly, but it is no longer so. They are all worn out!"

"Get one!"

"Monsieur, that is easily said, but to get a coat one must have money: and at this moment—"

"What! after borrowing two hundred thousand livres from usurers?"

"Mon Dieu! monsieur, I do not mean to contradict you, but the crowns have followed the coats!"

M. de Louvois raised his eyes and arms to heaven, uttered an exclamation of anger, and left the room. He turned when he got to the door, and said:

"I will not enter into a discussion on your extravagance, monsieur; but I will say that I desire to see you at my table on the appointed day, and that I forbid you to appear there in the coat you now wear!"

The chevalier was stunned—embarrassed; he knew not what to do. The parental mandate was positive, and he had no hope of future assistance from his father, if he did not obey him now. He called his valet, a second Scapin, and they put all their wits to work to find some means of getting out of this dilemma, but all in vain—human invention seemed unequal to the task. The chevalier was distracted, he paced his chamber in dismay, when, casting his eyes upon the hangings (which represented the marriage procession of Alexander and Statira), a sudden thought struck him.

"Ah!" said he, "I know what I will do. Go into the village, and bring me the tailor, with all his implements, immediately; and tell him to prepare to spend the night here."

"But, M. le Chevalier—"

"Go immediately, and do not reply."

When the valet had left the room, he proceeded, with great coolness, to take down the curtains of his bed, and laying them on the table, marked out the figures he admired most. The tailor was brought.

"Come, my man," said he, "you must make a coat, vest and culotte out of this; be sure to choose the handsomest ladies for the front, and this high priest with his long beard will do very well for the back."

The valet and the tailor thought, and with very good reason, that their young master was losing his senses, but he was so determined that they were obliged to obey. The suit was finished in time, and fitted extremely well; the chevalier was very well pleased, and, having completed his toilet, descended to the dining-room, which he entered with an imperturbable countenance. He was received with shouts of laughter. His father was very angry; but the public disgrace obliged him to open his purse for his extravagant heir, who, with fresh funds, returned to Paris.

THE WIZARD AND HIS BOTTLE.

THE following article in relation to Professor Anderson, the Wizard of the North, and the Maine liquor law, as enforced in Massachusetts, is furnished us (Charleston Republican) by one of our citizens, who has lately been sojourning in the east.

On Friday evening, as Professor Anderson was concluding his performances in the Melodene, in Boston, which he did with his "bottle," the audience were somewhat alarmed by seeing a large body of police rush into the hall, and, without ceremony, walk into the professor's "Magic Temple." A warrant was produced, not only for the immediate apprehension of the professor, but of his "bottle." The professor having read the warrant, assured the audience that it was bona fide, and that he must obey the law.

Here a scene, which it is impossible to describe, ensued, shouts of—"Don't go, Anderson—we'll protect you!" "Never mind the liquor law!" "Don't give up your bottle!"

Mr. Anderson begged to be heard. When silence was gained, the professor stated, "that in all countries he had visited he obeyed their laws, and hoped the citizens would not wish him, for the first time in his life, to disobey them." He further said, "that he was not aware that he was breaking any law, when he supplied the citizens of Boston from his bottle." (Cries of "No, no!")

Mr. Anderson asked the officer if the "bottle" had to be taken to the police office? Yes, was the reply of the official. The professor handed him the "bottle," and no sooner was it in his hands than the "bottle" commenced to emit streams of liquid fire. As soon as he dropped it, the fire became extinguished. Another officer lifted it up, when the fire again made its appearance: of course he was also glad to drop it. The audience screamed, roared, and never was such a scene witnessed. At last the professor lifted up the "bottle," and giving the audience thanks, and bidding them good night, he walked off with his "bottle" to the police office, followed by two or three thousand persons, whose shouts, going to Washington Street, soon augmented the crowd to many thousands, all calling out "Shame on the liquor law!" "Down with fanatics, compulsory and coercive policy!" "Eat and drink what you please, when you please, and in what place you please!" "No legislation for the stomach!"

The professor was bound over in one thousand dollars to appear and answer the charge of selling without a licence; the "bottle" was locked up as the principal witness against him; the whole of the officers having had a taste of its contents before it was locked up, and bound to appear as witnesses to prosecute, as they swore this was the bottle from which Mr. Anderson had supplied his audience with brandy, rum, gin, and whisky, according to choice. The professor then left for his hotel, followed by an immense crowd. In the morning, every available inch of the police court was crowded long before the usual hour of opening. The magistrate arrived, and took his seat on the bench.

"Anderson's case" was first called, when a long indictment was read, setting forth that Professor Anderson, better known as the "Wizard of the North," had been in the habit of nightly supplying the citizens of Boston, during the last five weeks, with all kinds of spirituous liquor without a licence, and against the laws of the commonwealth of Massachusetts; and was therefore liable, for the first offence, in the penalty of ten dollars fine, and securities for one thousand dollars; the second offence double the fine and forfeiture of bonds; the third offence, imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Various witnesses were then called, who stated that they had been frequently supplied by the professor from his "bottle." One, a native of the sod, declared that, "by Saint Patrick," he had never tasted better "potheen" in his life.

Here the magistrate asked "if that was the bottle Professor Anderson was using when he was apprehended?"

"Yes."

"Did you drink from it?"

"Yes."

"When?"

"Last night, before it was locked up in the marshal's safe."

"What did you drink?"

"Rum," said one; "brandy," said a second; "I had gin," answered a third; while a fourth said "he was satisfied with that bottle, for it had blistered his hands," which he showed the court was the case.

"And is this the identical bottle?"

"Yes."

The magistrate here asked the marshal if the "bottle" had been out of his possession since. The marshal said the safe had not been opened until the "bottle" was wanted in court.

This was the evidence for the prosecution. Professor Anderson, who was undefended, here stated that he was not aware he had acted in opposition to the statute, inasmuch as he had presented a petition to the aldermen of the city for a licence to give his performances in the Melodeon, which they granted on payment of ten dollars per week for the said licence. Here the professor handed in a receipt for the payment of the above; and he said further, the "bottle" is a part of this entertainment, duly licensed and paid for. If any clause had been inserted by the aldermen at the time they granted the licence, prohibiting the performance of the "bottle" feat, of course he would not have done it; but, as he received the licence without qualification, he considered the performance of the "bottle" as duly licensed with the other part of his entertainment.

The magistrate, after a little consideration, decided that the professor was duly licensed, and could use his "bottle" as he thought proper. He then asked if the "bottle" was still full?

"Oh, yes," replied the professor; "you can help yourself."

No sooner did the magistrate touch the "bottle," than he dropped it again, stating that it was red hot.

The "wizard" asked if his honour was satisfied? He answered in the affirmative, and told the professor that he did not care how soon he left the court. The wizard asked the magistrate to hand him the bottle. The magistrate, taking his handkerchief from his pocket, for the purpose of taking the bottle by the neck, was about to lift it, when lo, it vanished! to the utter astonishment of his honour and all present.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

GOLD FOUND IN ARRAN.—We learn that a course of prospecting has been going on of late on the Island of Arran, under the instruction of the Duke of Hamilton, the proprietor, and that gold has actually been found near the north end; to what extent, however, we are not yet able to say.

WHITE'S HYDRO-CARBON CANNEL GAS.—The Belfast Chronicle, says: "For several weeks the extensive bleaching premises of Messrs. James and Thomas Kennedy, at Woodburn, near Carrickfergus, have been lighted up with this beautiful gas, to the entire satisfaction of these gentlemen; and who have thus set an example to the mill-owners of this country, which, we have no doubt, will be extensively followed, as the following experiment places the value of this gas beyond any doubt. The experiment was conducted by Mr. Barlow, so long the respected manager of the Belfast Gas Works, in the presence of Dr. Andrews, Vice-President of the Queen's College; Dr. Ritchie, of the Chemical Works, Ballymacarrett; and James Kennedy, Esq., Vice-President of the Chamber of Commerce in this town. The coal retort was charged with 56 lbs. of Boghead cannel, and the hydrogen retort being filled quite full with peat charcoal, a supply of water was introduced at the rate of about eighty drops per minute. The hydrogen gas made from this small supply of water passed into a coal retort, exercising its valuable influence of conserving the illuminating properties of the cannel gas, and, at the same time, largely increasing its volume. From the retort the gas thus made passed through the usual process of condensation and purification, to the gas-holder. The results of this experiment were: 1st. As to quantity—755 feet was registered on the station meter, being 1510 feet per cwt. or 30,200 feet per ton of cannel: the average registration by the old process, from caking coal, being about 8000 feet per ton. 2nd. As to illuminating power—Dr. Fox's shadow meter was used, when a flat flame burner, consuming four feet of gas per hour, gave a light equal to eighteen mould candles. 3rd. As to purity—The presence of sulphur or ammonia could not be detected by the usual tests, and in appearance we never observed more brilliant, pure, or beautiful gas. As to cost, Mr. Kennedy made an accurate calculation of its cost to him, and reports that 1s. 4d. per 1000 feet will amply cover all. The economy of this will, we are satisfied, attract immediate attention, for an article so essential as gas is becoming in every department of manufacturing and commercial industry, as well as in social comfort, should be produced at the lowest cost.

ERICSSON'S CALORIC ENGINE.

MR. GEORGE CRISPE is at present daily delivering, at the Polytechnic Institution, a popularised lecture upon the subject of Ericsson's new motive-power. In consideration of the interest attaching to the topic, we give his lecture as he delivered it:

This new motive-power may be properly classed under the head of thermodynamic engines, or those in which power is obtained through the agency of heat. The word caloric was introduced by the celebrated French chemist, Lavoisier, for the purpose of designating what he termed "the principle or matter of heat, or the simple element of heat;" regarding heat as an effect merely, and caloric as the cause of it. It is not at all necessary, however, that this abstract view of the matter should be considered in order to fully understand either the action or theory of the new engine. For all practical purposes caloric and heat may be regarded as synonyms, and, in the present instance, we prefer employing the latter, as it is more generally understood.

Heat, the effects of which are so truly wonderful in connection with the organic creation, exhibits surprising changes also in the inorganic world, modifying matter in a variety of ways, and rendering it subservient to the uses of man; not the least remarkable fact being, that all bodies, whether solid, liquid, or gaseous, expand under its influence. It is this all but universal law (there being one partial exception) which is taken advantage of in the caloric engine. It has been found that atmospheric air expands for every degree of heat imparted to it about 1-480th part, so that if we raise its temperature 480 degrees, we double its bulk. If it can be imagined, therefore, that we take a closed vessel of iron or other suitable material filled with atmospheric air, the temperature of which we then proceed to raise, the air, in its endeavour to expand, will exert a force tending to burst the sides of the vessel, and, as it is with steam when confined, the force it exerts to get free, if properly applied, may be turned to a useful account.

Sir George Cayley, the president of this institution, was the first person to arrange an air-engine in anything like a suitable form for practice; and so great a similarity is there between his and Ericsson's contrivances, that, if we understand the one, the other will be evident; so that whilst we are taking the readiest means for the elucidation of our subject, we shall at the same time be awarding a suitable tribute to those who have paved the way to this important invention.

A stove was divided into two compartments, so that atmospheric air, upon being forced into one, made its way through the fire into the other. In its passage it of course became heated, and consequently expanded—say, to twice its original bulk. This heated air was then permitted to make its way into a cylinder similar to that of a steam-engine, when, by the usual mechanism of the side valve, &c., the piston having been driven to the top of the cylinder, was then driven down again, and a reciprocating motion kept up so long as air was applied to the stoves—the hot air, which had done its work, being allowed to escape into the atmosphere. Now, in order to furnish the stove with air, a supply cylinder, or air-pump, of about half the capacity of the working cylinder, was placed in an inverted position under it, the two pistons being connected by the intervention of a rod merely; so that every time a large cylinder full of air was used, a small cylinder full was pumped into the stove, where, being at once increased in bulk by the fire, it became capable not only of filling the working cylinder but exerting a useful mechanical effect at the same time. This engine was tested by Mr. Babbage, Mr. G. Rennie, and other scientific gentlemen, and found to be equal to five-horse power, with a consumption of about 21 or 22 lbs. of coke per hour.

In 1817, Mr. Stirling, of Edinburgh, contrived an engine in which air was heated and cooled at the opposite ends of a vessel; so that whilst he obtained a force by the expansion of the air, a reaction was produced by its contraction. He introduced at the same time what has since been termed, in Ericsson's engine, the "regenerator," a contrivance the beauty of action and importance of which it is impossible to overrate. In it we have a remarkable illustration of the power which man possesses over even those elements of the very nature of which he is in absolute ignorance. In this instance, operating upon one which is impendable, he may in simple language be said to apply a suitable sieve, and to sift out heat from atmospheric air. In the new engine, this is a sine qua non—take it away, and the thing is useless; retain it, and there is no telling where the economy in fuel may end. In order to explain it, imagine the heated air which has already done its work passing from the hot to the cold end of the vessel, where, under ordinary circumstances, all the heat which has been imparted to it is taken away by the refrigerating surface, and for all practical purposes lost. Upon the return of the air, therefore, from the cold to the heated end of the chamber, as much heat must be imparted to it as will elevate its temperature from (say) 60 deg. to 500 deg.; but, under such circumstances, the engine would not be economical. Now, imagine, instead of this condition of things, that the hot air in its passage is made to pass through hundreds of parallel pieces of wire gauze, and, as it wends its way through the multitude of meshes, gradually yielding up its heat to the iron wire, which in its turn becomes hot as the air becomes cold. This having been effected, the cold air, in its passage to the hot end of the vessel, is made to traverse this labyrinth of wire in the opposite direction, take up from it the heat which had been previously imparted, and thus reach its destination at a temperature of about 400 deg. or more, rendering it necessary for us to impart not more than 80 deg. or 100 deg. of heat, instead of 440 deg., or 460 deg. Probably the best illustration of the action is to be found in Jeffry's metallic respirator, where the hot breath in passing out warms the wires, and the cold air in passing in is warmed by contact with them. So in the regenerator, the fiery breath of the air-engine in exhalation heats the wires, which in their turn heat the cold air during inhalation.

A paper was read upon this interesting subject before the Institution of Civil Engineers, in 1845, and an engine was described of the kind referred to, and of about 45-horse power, which had then been at work at the Dundee Foundry for about two years, with a consumption of little more than 11 lbs. of coals per horse-power per hour.

John Ericsson is a native of the province of Vermeland, in Sweden. At a very early age, his great talent attracted the attention of the celebrated Count Platen, through whose agency he was appointed a cadet in the corps of Engineers; and, at the age of twelve years, a nivelleur, at the grand ship canal, under the count. Several works of a meritorious character emanated from him at this time—amongst others, an engine to work by the application of flame. The hope of propagating this contrivance brought him to England in 1826, but success did not attend him: he found that the clear and vivid flame of pine wood could not be obtained by mineral coals, and this proved fatal to his scheme. He afterwards became connected with Messrs. Braithwaite, the eminent engineers, and invented the "Novelty," one of the locomotives which competed for the prize upon the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, in 1829. This was followed by the steam fire-engine, which created at the time so great a sensation in London. He was also one of the earliest advocates and inventors of the screw propeller.

The caloric engine, his last work, has been, it may be said, his hobby for many years, and an immense amount of both labour and capital has been expended in bringing it to its present form, which, after what has been said, will doubtless be at once understood. A working cylinder, with its piston, side valve, &c., is fixed in a vertical position, and a fire made beneath it, so as to elevate its temperature to about 500 deg. At the side of the cylinder, and communicating with it by a passage, a reservoir is placed of about three or four times its capacity. Inverted above the working cylinder is a supply cylinder or air pump (the capacity of which is to that of the cylinder as 14 to 22-5), for the purpose of supplying the reservoir with air; and between the reservoir and working cylinder the regenerator is placed. The action is this—atmospheric air is first pumped into the reservoir by hand, until it has reached a pressure of 8 or 10 lbs. upon the square inch; the side valve being then opened by the usual hand gear, this compressed air makes its way under the piston and forces it to the top of the cylinder; the piston of the air-pump also being attached to that of the cylinder, is forced up by it, and the contents of the pump are, in consequence, driven into the reservoir; but now by the ordinary mechanism the side-valve is reversed, and the air, which in the cylinder has become heated to about 500 deg., makes its escape through the regenerator into the atmosphere, leaving its heat behind in the manner already described; the piston having no longer anything to maintain it in its elevated position, sinks of its own weight, pulling down with it the piston of the air-pump, which consequently receives a fresh supply of air; and, upon the piston once more reaching the bottom of the cylinder, the slide-valve is again reversed, cold air passes through the now hot regenerator, and reaches the working cylinder almost at the temperature required to repeat the operation; and so it goes on as long as sufficient fuel is supplied to the furnace, which, for the reasons given, amounts to scarcely 1 lb. of coals per horse-power per hour.

But while we can but admire the beautiful principles which are involved in this engine, and the admirable arrangement of parts for the production of the required effect, yet certain difficulties which present themselves lead us to pause, and ask, can this in its present form succeed? The difficulties are certainly of a mechanical nature merely, and we may therefore hope to see them removed. The most prominent are these: First, the high temperature of the cylinder renders lubrication very difficult, in consequence of the fatty matters employed becoming viscid. Then the fire being applied directly under the metal, has been found by others to be fatal to its durability, and a kind of oven has been substituted; but this is not done in Ericsson's engine. The low pressure also which can be obtained under the circumstances, added to the fact of the cylinders being single-acting, renders it necessary, in obtaining the requisite power, to increase the piston surface enormously. In the best Ericsson, for example, there are four cylinders, each 14 feet in diameter, and also their attendant supply cylinders, each between 11 and 12 feet in diameter; whereas, in a steam-engine of equal power, two cylinders, of 7 or 8 feet in diameter, would do the same work. This enormous extent of piston surface is attended with several evils, such as great friction, increased chances of breakage, &c.; and since in the caloric engine leakage is of much more importance than in the steam-engine, this becomes a matter for serious consideration. There is also some difficulty in starting, &c., in consequence of the necessity for keeping up a supply of air in the reservoir; but whether these practical difficulties will be found of too formidable a character, practice alone can tell. We sincerely hope not; for the advantages held out by the extension of the principles involved are of no ordinary character.

[THE CHOIROPOTAMUS, OR RIVER PIG.]

THE CHOIROPOTAMUS.

THE Zoological Society must be an exceedingly industrious body, for they are continually making additions to the extraordinary collection they have gathered together in Regent's Park, at an enormous outlay. Like the late Earl of Derby, they seem to be actuated by quite a passion for the science committed to their charge, and to consider, as he did, that the theory of the living tribes by which the earth and the water are peopled, form one of the departments of that course of mental culture to which every man, in every condition of life, should be subjected. Because it is argued, and we willingly subscribe to the conclusion, that such study supplies pleasant and profitable companions, amid the solitude of the shore, the dell, or the mountain—brings an abundance of cheerful thoughts and healthful occupations—and, above all, it teaches lessons of appreciation of the beneficence of the First Great Cause, even in the humblest of created creatures.

The Zoological societies established throughout the country, particularly that in the metropolis, have done wonders towards the formation of these habits of investigation; and we are always gratified when it falls to our lot to have to chronicle and illustrate some fresh specimen of their indefatigable labours in the vast territories of animated nature. The engraving above given represents their latest acquisition among the rarer animals that are to be found in the least explored parts of the earth.

It is the Choitopotamus, or River Pig, an animal whose haunts seem to be confined to the banks of the rivers of Western Africa. This interesting member of the family of the Pachydermata, was brought from the banks of Senegambia, amongst the swamps on whose borders his kindred delight to dwell. His appearance is not unlike that of a common pig, but he is larger limbed, and more squarely as well as strongly built. His hair is longer and less coarse than that of the common pig, and in colour is of a sandy hue. The ears are very long, and quite black. The face, like that of the wild hog, is rugged and picturesque, but has decidedly more character in it than is to be found in our domesticated swine. And it must be said, in addition, that in his habits he is decidedly the cleanest and most gentlemanly of the hog tribe. In this respect he is quite a model pig.

He is not, as his name would imply, a rival to the Hippopotamus—for neither in size nor appearance is he any match for the famous river horse of Egypt. Nor are his aquatic tendencies very extraordinary. He is simply a wild pig, and in all respects a very valuable addition to our zoological knowledge.

But, while giving the Royal Zoological Society every credit for the introduction of this species of the pig tribe, let us be allowed to indulge in the hope; that, if at all found capable of improving our native breeds, it will not be allowed to live in luxurious ease in its very commodious sty in the Regent's Park Gardens. Pork is not only a favourite but a proper description of animal food for the inhabitants of Britain; and if it can be improved either in quality or quantity, the economic value of that article of diet is, of course, proportionably raised, and the supply of that variety of the substantial food of the nation rendered less casual, and—what is of vast importance to the consumer—cheaper.

Of all descriptions of live-stock prized by the farmer or the cottager, the pig has been for ages the easiest to rear, and most profitable to send to market. In Ireland, the pig for a long time was supposed to be the only responsible tenant of the cottager's cabin, for out of its fat sides the rent was to be extracted. In England, a flitch of bacon, flanked by a couple of hams, has always hung in the cottage of the thrifty labourer; and when it is well known that it is from the wild boar that all our European varieties have sprung, it is not asking too much to request that at least the African River Pig should, if found desirable, be adopted as a stock animal, with a view to the still further improvement of our famous Berkshire, Hampshire, Suffolk, and Yorkshire varieties of the swinish multitude.

COURTSHIP AMONG THE BRETON PEASANTRY.

THE village tailor performs in Brittany a most important part; and as he is generally the poet, so is he frequently selected as the negotiator of the rustic marriages of the district. When the preliminaries have been arranged, the tailor, then called the "baz valan," or "messenger of love," from the young man to his fiancée, proceeds to the residence of the parents of the latter, bearing with him a branch of broom in his hand, as a symbol characteristic of his mission. Here he is introduced to the brentaer, or advocate or defender on the part of the young girl, whose duty it is to baffle the importunity of the lover's missionary as long as possible. The baz valan, after the usual courtesies of greeting, replies to the brentaer respecting the purpose of his visit, and informs him that "a certain pigeon and a beautiful white dove were wont to consort together, but that the latter, having been scared away by a sparrow-hawk, he is now seeking for her in every direction." The brentaer replies, "That he has seen neither dove nor pigeon."

"Young man, you lie," responds the baz valan, rather unceremoniously; "our people beheld the white dove, in her flight, descend into your very orchard."

The brentaer still denies all knowledge of the lost one; upon which the messenger of the young man declares "that his pigeon will surely die, and that he must depart to seek the dove elsewhere."

"Stop, friend," the other replies, "I will go and search the house; perhaps I may find your white dove."

He retires, and shortly returns with a little girl.

"No, no, that is not my dove; yet, charming little flower, if my pigeon were a drop of dew, he would descend upon thee!" then, after a pause, he adds, "I shall ascend to your granary—perhaps she has entered it in her flight."

"Wait awhile, friend," says the brentaer; and retiring, he again returns with the mistress of the house. "I have been into the granary," he cries; "I could not find your dove, only this ear of corn, abandoned by the harvesters."

"As many grains as have the ear of corn," replies the young man's advocate, "so should my white dove, when seated in her nest, have of little ones under her wings."

Again the brentaer departs; he returns with the grandmother.

"I cannot find your dove," he says, "but I have found an over-ripe apple; an apple wrinkled by the sun and the wind, that has hung a long time on the tree among the leaves; put it into your pocket and give it to your pigeon. to eat, and he will mourn no more."

"I want not your ear of corn, nor your wrinkled apple, but my little dove; and seek her I will."

"Good heavens!" have patience, friend," replies the young lady's advocate; "your little dove is not lost; she is well taken care of in my chamber, in cage of ivory, with bars of gold and silver; so gay, so sweet, so beautiful, my little dove!"

At length after this awful delay the fair betrothed is produced. The father of the family also makes his appearance, and brings a horse's girth; while he fastens this rude appendage, the brentaer sings an appropriate but by no means delicate song.

Other ceremonies and songs follow, and it is long after the marriage is concluded before the exactions on the wedded pair cease. In parts of Brittany, in Leon, for example, the bride and the bridegroom are the subjects of the "fete of the cupboard," a piece of furniture of that description being presented to them as a bridal gift. It is commonly made of walnut-tree, highly polished and ornamented. Decorated with garlands, it is conveyed to the house of the newly-married pair, in a car drawn by horses, whose manes and tails are adorned with glittering ribbons. The mistress of the house covers the cupboard with a linen cloth, upon which she places two piles of pancakes, a jug of wine, and a drinking cup. The oldest member of the family of the husband fills the cup and presents it to the eldest of the parents of his bride. After still further ceremonies, all present partake of the wine and eatables, and the cupboard, amid the cheers of the assembled guests, is placed in the most conspicuous situation in the mansion. The day after the marriage the poor of the parish, or rather the mendicants, wait upon the bride and bridegroom, and divide the remnants of the marriage feast. The young wife, with her petticoats tucked up, attends upon the females, and her husband upon the male portion of their guests. At the conclusion of the repast the husband offers his arm to the most respectable of the women, and his wife, following his example, gives her hand to the best dressed beggar, and the entertainment ends with a dance and a song. The latter, "Le Chant des Pauvres," is addressed for the most part in praise of the newly constituted mistress of the house, who is extolled as the most beautiful creature in the parish; "as amiable as pretty, with feet light as those of the fawn, and eyes bright as two drops of dew."—Tait's Magazine.

FEELING IN A SOLDIER.—A soldier in the war was one day told by his officer to take aim when he fired, and make sure of his man. "I cannot do it, sir," he replied: "I fire into their ranks, and that does as well; but, to single one out among them, and mark him for death, would lie upon my mind afterwards."

AN EXPENSIVE PLEASURE TRIP.—A report has been circulating several days to the effect, that a wealthy gentleman of New York intends to embark for London next spring in a beautiful steamer yacht, and visit all the principal cities of Europe, at an expense of about two hundred thousand dollars. Of course everybody is anxious to ascertain the name of this princely merchant. Some persons say that Colonel Stevens is the hero of the scheme, but we are informed that Cornelius Vanderbilt, Esq., is the gentleman who intends to visit Europe in the spring.

A DESERTER FROM THE BRITISH ARMY IN LOVE.—In the Baltimore county court, State of Maryland, Joseph Sinott was sentenced to six years and six months' imprisonment in the penitentiary, for enticing a slave-girl of a Mr. Marsh to run away. His reason for the crime was, that he was devotedly attached to her, and desired to take her to one of the free states and make her his wife. He is an Englishman by birth, and a deserter from the British army in Canada.

AN AGED FRENCHWOMAN.—The Pays de Caux relates the following: "An old woman at Frosville, nearly 101 years of age, twice married, and having the full enjoyment of all her faculties, states, that she has never been out of mourning for the last seventy years. She has lost her father, mother, two husbands, a number of uncles and aunts, eight brothers and sisters, as many brothers and sisters-in-law, six children, and thirty-two grandchildren and great-grandchildren. There now remains to her only one granddaughter, seventy-two years of age, whom she calls her petite, and makes her pet. They live in comfort, but with great economy. A person lately asked the old woman why she attempted to save money, instead of affording herself more comforts? 'Oh, dame!' replied she, 'it is necessary to put by something for a rainy day; one may get old!'"

[THE LANDING STAIRS AT ROTHERHITHE.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER VII.

And now, O God, is this our doom?
Must thus man's fairest hopes decay?
And shall the surly winter come,
Ere spring and autumn fade away?

No sooner had the breath departed from the body of the royal sufferer, whose many virtues had given promise of a reign so beneficial to England, than the Duke of Northumberland rose from his knees by the couch, and, lifting his plumed hat, exclaimed, in a loud voice:

"God save Queen Jane!"

A ready "Amen" burst from the lips of all present, who, one and all, were implicated in the act which was to transfer the crown from the sister of the dead king to the brow of her cousin, Lady Jane Grey, in whose name her ambitious father-in-law imagined it possible he could reign.

Cecil and Throgmorton exchanged uneasy glances: the former was too astute a personage to suppose for an instant that the claims of the Lady Mary could be set aside—for, despite the religious differences which divided the kingdom into separate parties, the people generally were favourable to the settlement made by Henry VIII.

"Come, my lords," added the speaker, "let us in to council—the best way of testifying our sorrow for the loss of our late monarch, is to provide for the fulfilment of his last wishes. My lord primate," he continued, "addressing Cranmer, 'a dark cloud has suddenly fallen; we must entreat your presence and wisdom to direct us.'"

"Alas, my good lord," replied the prelate, "your wisdom and experience need but little aid from me—duty to the dead claims me here!"

The wily duke was too calculating a man to permit so important a member of the council to absent himself from the meeting in which the claims of Lady Jane were to be formally acknowledged: it was his policy that every one of his colleagues should be implicated in the treason as deeply as himself. Cranmer, who never possessed much stability of purpose, yielded to solicitations which gradually assumed the character of threats.

Cecil, too—the prudent Cecil—was compelled to assist: for the first time he repented his ungenerous conduct in not having forewarned the Princess Mary as well as her sister Elizabeth. Like most men who play a double game, he incurred a double danger.

A thought suddenly struck him, and he hastily approached the duke, and whispered a few words in his ear, touching Ward, the boatman of the Earl of Arundel, and the token which his master was to send him, at the same time secretly trusting that the old man had left the palace.

"Fear not, good Cecil!" replied Northumberland; "we have taken our precautions wisely and timely. In a few hours both the sisters of the late king will be the prisoners of the council."

With a bitter feeling of disappointment, which he could scarcely conceal, the future minister of Elizabeth was retiring to his former place, near the window, when the duke called him back. The zeal he had displayed in his service had given him a favourable opinion of his trustworthiness—added to which, he knew Cecil to be devoted to the Protestant cause.

"Stay, Mr. Secretary!" he said; "although I have no fears touching the escape of the two pretenders to the crown—seeing that I dispatched messengers with letters from the king, summoning them to London, which summons neither will venture to disobey—still this fellow may do much mischief by spreading idle rumours amongst the people. He must be arrested!"

Cecil instantly proffered his services to go in search of him.

"You forget," said the duke, "that your presence will be required at the council. Stay—there is Mr. Throgmorton," he added; "I have long noted his zeal as well as yours. The day is not far distant, I trust, when I shall be able to reward ye both, by advancing your interests in the state."

The secretary bowed, and professed the warmest wishes for the accession of the Lady Jane, and devotion to her cause. He was one of those who knew that words could not condemn him. He would have been a clever man who induced him to write as much.

Northumberland drew from his bosom a paper, signed by his own hand, and sealed by his seal. He had prepared several such, to be used as occasion served. Placing it in the hands of Cecil, he said:

"Give Throgmorton your instructions; on producing that paper, he will be permitted to quit the palace. Let him follow the fellow, if necessary, to London, and arrest him wherever he can lay hands upon him."

"Saved!" thought the politic Cecil, as, with a low bow, he received the important document, and hastened to rejoin his companion, who had been watching their conversation from one of the recesses formed by the deep bay-windows in the apartment.

"You have the token?" he whispered.

His friend nodded in the affirmative.

"To horse, and to Hatfield, instantly! Ride as you would a race against death or time, or as if the headsman were on your track! If you see the boatman Ward, tell him the king is dead, and his master a prisoner in the Tower! He will know how to act. Another word: you are supposed to be sent to arrest him. This paper smoothes all difficulties. Away, and God speed you! I am a prisoner here!"

"A prisoner!"

"And every member of the council!"

These directions, so hurriedly whispered, were sufficient for Throgmorton, who perfectly understood the game he had to play. Without losing an instant's time, he left the palace. Calling two of the guard to attend him, in order to seek for the servitor of the Earl of Arundel, he produced the order of the Duke of Northumberland.

The old man was seated disconsolately on the bank, waiting the return of his master, who had been conveyed to the Tower, according to Northumberland's orders, by land, without being permitted to communicate with any of his retainers or friends.

"You are our prisoner!" said Throgmorton, touching him on the shoulder, and at the same time pointing to the paper in his hand.

In vain the faithful fellow would have expostulated: the two soldiers seized him rudely by the throat, and began to drag him towards the barge.

"Use no unnecessary violence," said Throgmorton, mildly; "he is old, and incapable of resistance. I and my men here," he added, "are sufficient to convey him to the Tower. Should your uniforms and badges be seen upon the river, it might excite idle rumours and suspicions amongst the people."

The men looked doubtfully at each other.

"Still, as a precaution," continued the speaker, "perhaps you had better bind him; not that I think," he added, with a smile, "there is much chance of his escape!"

At the last word the countenance of Ward brightened. The two soldiers, perfectly disarmed of their suspicions, did as Throgmorton directed them: cutting a rope from the barge of Lord Arundel, which they suffered to drift up the river, they bound the old man by the arms and feet, then tossed him, like a bale of merchandise, into the bottom of the boat in which Cecil and his companion had arrived.

"Now, my men," said Throgmorton, "row for your lives! A golden piece for each of you, if you reach Rotherhithe within the hour!"

Fortunately the tide was running up. The men pulled stoutly, and in a few minutes the royal towers of Greenwich began to disappear. But it was not till they were quite of sight that the captor approached his prisoner, who had remained all the while, without the least expression of impatience or anger, at the bottom of the boat—and yet the cords with which his limbs were bound must have galled him sorely.

"You bear it bravely, old man!" he observed.

"Show me the use of bearing it otherwise," replied Ward, "and I will begin to murmur. I can but die, and death to a man of my years has few terrors; especially," he added, "when it overtakes us in the exercise of our duty."

"Right!" said Throgmorton, approvingly. "Had others the same courage as yourself—"

"The Duke of Northumberland would be in my place," added the boatman, finishing the sentence for him. "Patience, sir! patience! He has not long to wait!"

"You think so?"

"I am sure so!"

"Are you aware that your master is a prisoner in the Tower, whither I am conveying you?"

"Where you are supposed to be conveying me!" replied Ward, in a confident tone; "but where you and your friend, the Secretary Cecil, have too much wit to send me!"

"Why so?" demanded Throgmorton, with a smile.

"Because you have too much respect for your heads. Poor as I am at this moment, there is not a man who has better surety for his life than I have."

"You have a token for the Lady Mary?"

"For the queen's highness, you mean," replied the boatman, bluntly. "You forget yourself, young sir, to speak thus of your sovereign! Bah!" he added, "how these cords cut into my flesh!"

Throgmorton drew his dagger, and carefully severed them, to the no little surprise of Cecil's men, who were too well trained to make any observation—for they knew that he who did so was deep in the confidence of their master.

"Thanks!" whispered Ward.

"Where will you land?" demanded his liberator.

"At Rotherhithe," replied the boatman. "And now, young sir, although I owe you but little gratitude—for I suspect that, had your interests required it, you and your time-serving friend with equal readiness would have consigned me to the mercies of the hangman—I will give you one piece of advice: keep aloof from London! The queen is better informed than you imagine of all that is taking place. You and your friend are not the only time-serving partisans of Northumberland and his treasonous faction!"

Throgmorton looked—as he felt—surprised and intrigued: the language and manners of the speaker had undergone a sudden change: he spoke like one versed in the affairs of state.

"You are no boatman?" he said.

"I am, for the moment," replied Ward, "that which I appear to be. Most of us are compelled to wear a mask in these troubled times, and he is the best guarded who veils his features the closest. Shall I read you a riddle, Master Throgmorton?" he added, with a half-mocking smile; "you and Cecil serve Queen Mary because you fear her; I, perchance, because I love her: no matter, so that she is served! If Elizabeth were dead, I question if the Lady Jane Grey would have more devoted partisans than yourselves!"

"I'll question thee no more!" said the gentleman; "keep thy secret as thou best can—it would do me little good to learn it!"

"That might depend upon the use you made of it!"

replied his prisoner—for so we must still designate him. "But see—we are near Rotherhithe; am I to understand that your purpose still holds good to release me? or must I accompany you to the Tower?"

"Now," said Throgmorton, "you are free for me! Yet permit me to ask you one question?"

"Freely."

"Are you provided with funds for any journey you may wish to undertake?"

The pretended boatman struck his doublet: from the metallic clink which followed, it was evident that it was quilted with gold.

By this time they had reached the landing-place, and stepped on shore.

"Return to Greenwich," said Throgmorton to the barge-men, "and wait for your master. You need not hurry yourselves too quickly!"

The men nodded, as much as to say they perfectly understood him: they had long been in the employment of Cecil, and were devoted to his service. In the double game which the aspiring secretary was playing, it became necessary to have persons about him of whose fidelity he was assured.

"And should any one ask you," added the speaker, "where I landed, you can easily fancy these stairs lead to the Tower!"

Tossing his purse to them, in order, if necessary, to aid their imagination, he advanced hastily up the stairs, followed by his late prisoner, whose bounty, to the great astonishment of the rowers, exceeded that of their master's friend.

"Here, then, we part," said the strange boatman; "yet I will not leave without some token of my gratitude. If I rightly interpret your thoughts, the thing you most desire at the present moment is a horse?"

"Right!" said Throgmorton, in a tone of surprise; "though how you should have discovered it—"

"Pshaw!" interrupted Ward; "the times are the key to men's wishes as well as principles; even the blind may read them: in half an hour make your way to the hostel at the outskirts of the town, known by the name of the Lion; ask for the host, and tell him that Dick Lutton sent you for the steed he left there."

"In half an hour!" repeated the gentleman, suspiciously—for the thought struck him that it was perhaps a ruse to detain him.

"Not a minute sooner. I must have that start of you: your road lies towards Hatfield—mine to Framlingham."

The tone of noble frankness in which the reply was given at once dissipated his doubts, and Throgmorton frankly accepted the proffered service. The two men thus singularly thrown together touched each other's hands, in token of amity, and said "Farewell."

Till the half-hour elapsed, Cecil's messenger walked about the straggling village of Rotherhithe, which was far from presenting the busy scene it does at present. At last he ventured to make his approach to the hostel of the Lion: as he drew near the house, he saw his late companion, mounted on a powerful horse, ride off—he waved his hand to him, in token of adieu. The landlord was standing with one ready saddled in front of the dwelling.

"A cup of wine," said the Boniface, "before you start, young sir—for I presume you are the gentleman Dick Lutton spoke of?"

The wine was drunk; but, unlike the landlords of the present day, the host refused the piece of money which Throgmorton extended to him: the man had a conscience—his late guest had paid for both.

"Everything is paid for," he said.

"For your civility."

"That is included, sir," added the landlord; "Master Lutton is no niggardly paymaster!"

As he rode off, Throgmorton could not help secretly wondering who Master Lutton really was: time, perhaps, may solve the question.

CHAPTER VIII.

When Providence designs great ends,
It finds the means to work them.

CREON.

On the morning on which the events related in the foregoing chapter took place in Greenwich, the Princess Elizabeth was walking, attended by Lady Tyrwhit and two of her maids of honour, when a couple of horsemen dismounted at the entrance of Hatfield Manor, and demanded an audience of her grace. They were Sir Thomas Marshall and a cadet of the Howard family—bearers, as they announced themselves, of letters from the king, commanding the attendance of his sister.

Sir Thomas Tyrwhit, who had been placed at first as a spy over his royal charge, had gradually become so devoted to her interests, that he felt uneasy at the summons: his position was a painful as well as dangerous one—he knew not whether to advise Elizabeth to refuse or to obey.

"And how fares the king's highness?" he demanded.

"Badly, Sir Thomas—badly!" replied the elder of the messengers; "his physician give poor hopes of him; he breaks daily."

This reply tallied so well with the private information which Sir Thomas Tyrwhit had lately received from court, and was to all appearance so honestly given, that his suspicions were partly dissipated.

"It is whispered," observed young Howard, "that our royal master contemplates making a fresh settlement of the crown: probably in my Lady Elizabeth's favour—for her name is popular amongst the people."

His companion, who was better informed of the secret views of Northumberland and his party, appeared annoyed at the observation, for he answered him sharply, by observing:

"That such matters were fit only for the discussion of the council, and might be safely left to their wisdom and that of the king, who, although so young, had shown great solicitude for the welfare of the nation, and the future stability of the Reformed Church. Whatever be their intentions," he added, "it is for all loyal subjects to obey them."

This was an extent to which Sir Thomas's principles did not go. As far as the Princess Mary was concerned, he would willingly have witnessed her exclusion from the crown, but would have risked life and lands to maintain the rights of his young charge, her sister.

Leading the way to the garden—for the messengers had declined his proffers of refreshment, pleading the urgency of their mission—he conducted the knight and his companion to the spot where Elizabeth and her ladies were walking.

Although so young, the princess could, when necessary, assume the dignified bearing of her rank. The instant she perceived the approach of the strangers, she stopped short in some observation she was making to Lady Tyrwhit, who involuntarily fell back into her proper place.

"Know you these gentlemen?" she demanded of her companion. "They appear to have ridden hard. Their business must be pressing," she added, "that they venture in our presence in such unseemly guise!"

"Even at that early period of life, whilst puritanically affecting a simplicity of dress and manner which was far from being in accordance with her real taste, Elizabeth displayed her extreme sensitiveness at the least want of fitting respect in the attire of those who approached her person."

"Probably, your grace," replied Lady Tyrwhit, "they are from the court, and their errand may be of haste, for my husband is with them."

Instead of continuing her walk along the smooth, sanded path, bordered on either side with quaintly-clipped trees and shrubs, the princess paused till the strangers approached within fitting distance, when both of them respectfully doffed their caps, and bent the knee before her.

"Sir Thomas Marshall and Master Howard, please your grace," said Sir Thomas Tyrwhit, "charged with letters from his highness the king."

The personage first designated took from his bosom a packet tied curiously round with yellow silk, and sealed with the royal seal, and proffered it to Elizabeth, who directed her cofferer to receive it—for she felt an involuntary repugnance at taking it with her own hand from the sinister-looking personage who presented it.

Carefully examining the seal, to assure herself that it had not been tampered with, she read it twice: it contained an affectionate invitation, as well as command, from her brother, to visit him in London on the instant. The signature was undoubtedly Edward's—but the writing of the letter a stranger's.

Twice she perused it before she replied.

"And how fares our royal brother?" she demanded.

"Badly, your grace—badly; his highness's physicians seem to be baffled by his disease!"

Elizabeth smiled bitterly: perhaps she thought that she could name it—for she believed the ambitious Northumberland capable of any act of villany, even to the poisoning of his sovereign.

"And where is the king at present?"

"At Greenwich, your grace," replied young Howard, who had been joined by the crafty duke with his creature Marshall, in order to avoid exciting the suspicions of the princess, who turned an inquiring eye upon his companion, as she observed that the letter was dated from St. James's, London.

Sir Thomas Marshall appeared embarrassed, yet there was nothing very unusual in the circumstance: royal letters, charters, and missives, even at the present day, are frequently dated from places far from the spot where they are written and executed.

"I know," continued young Howard, respectfully, "that it is the intention of his highness to remove this very day to the metropolis. I heard the orders given for the royal barge to be in readiness at mid-day. The council, too, are summoned to attend him."

"Rise, gentlemen!" said Elizabeth—for hitherto both the messengers had remained kneeling before her; "our royal brother summons us to his presence, and the proof of his affection is too precious to be neglected. Sir Thomas Tyrwhit," she added, "see to the entertainment of these gentlemen. I will send word by my cofferer, Parry, when I shall be ready to depart."

"I trust, your grace, it will be soon!" observed Sir Thomas Marshall, who felt anything but satisfied with her manner and speech.

"And why so, sir?" demanded the princess, turning suddenly round, and eyeing him sharply—for her suspicions were anything but dissipated by his manner and words.

"I know how impatient the king's highness is to see your grace," he replied; "since he charged me with his own lips to use all diligence in my journey to Hatfield."

The countenance of young Howard became suffused: he knew that his companion was uttering a falsehood, for he had seen the Duke of Northumberland give the letters into Marshall's hand himself: his confusion did not escape the keen-sighted Elizabeth.

"And did you see our dear brother?" she somewhat sarcastically inquired.

"I had not that honour, your grace," he answered, bowing deeply to hide his embarrassment—for he began to suspect that his fellow-messenger was making a tool of him, and his pride and sense of honour revolted at the thought.

"Sir Thomas," said the princess, "you will attend to our directions. Treat these gentlemen with all the courtesy fitting our brother's messengers—we will send to them anon!"

So saying, she took the arm of Lady Tyrwhit, and, followed by her bevy of ladies, retired towards the house. As soon as she reached her closet, she called her favourite waiting-woman, the beautiful Isabella Markham, to her, and whispered something in her ear. The fair girl replied with a look of intelligence, and left the room. In about an hour she returned, followed by young Howard, whom Elizabeth had resolved to question privately, and, upon his answers, decide either to obey her brother's letter, or remain at Hatfield.

"God help me!" she murmured; "I have few friends whom I can trust—still fewer to counsel me! Had Cecil but kept his promise, I should have known how to act; as it is, I have nought but my own untaught wit to aid me!"

Little as she deemed it, in the hour of her doubt and distress it proved more than sufficient to guide her in her decision: she had resolved to question the messenger, and judge from his replies.

"If he has a heart or sense of honour," she thought, "I shall not fail to learn all that I wish to know!"

NEGLECTING A FEE.

PART I.

THE evening was cold and clear. The stars sparkled dazlingly above, the frost sparkled white and chillingly below. Young Mordaunt wrapped his cloak closely around him, and walked on with a rapid step. Mordaunt was very poor. He had but one guinea in his pocket, and he knew not what the morrow would bring forth. He was a young physician, just commencing practice. He was now treading the margin of his profession, watching the great rushing sea of life that roared around him, ready to seize hold of some sinking mariner, and save him from destruction. But the poor wretches were sure to stretch out their trembling arms to some older, more experienced swimmer on the human tide, and the young man was obliged to work off his superfluous energy and skill in acts of gratuitous service. This evening he had been unusually fortunate: he had received one guinea as a fee; and, having a passionate love of the drama, he was about to indulge himself in a visit to the theatre, whose doors poverty had long closed against him. A distinguished actor was starring on the boards, and Mordaunt was hastening to secure a favourable seat. At the corner of the street, he met a young man of the name of Irvin, who, turning round, walked in the same direction with him. Mordaunt always felt as if he came in contact with a counter-stream of thought when he met this young man; and now it seemed as if a dash of cold, quenching water was thrown over the glow of his anticipations. There was no sympathy, no congeniality: it was the contrast of fire and ice.

"Whither so fast, Mordaunt?"

"To the theatre. Are you disposed for the same amusement?"

"No, I cannot afford it!"

"Afford!" repeated Mordaunt, in an accent of surprise.

Irvin was reputedly wealthy, and thousands taken from his pockets would scarcely leave as deep a void as Mordaunt's solitary guinea.

"I cannot afford the time," repeated Irvin; "life is too short for the great purposes of utility, and too precious to be wasted in search of amusement. I find no leisure for such things myself; but every one has a right to put his own estimate on the gifts of God, and improve them as he thinks best."

There was something cold and cutting in the tone of his voice, something assimilated to the frosty atmosphere, that penetrated the ear of Mordaunt and chilled him.

"I know there are some," he replied, "who can keep on, day after day, and year after year, in the same mode of existence, unconscious of weariness as of progress; but I cannot: I must have occasional excitement. The principle of vitality burns too intensely in my bosom. It must have fuel. If not of the kind I most desire, the light combustibles which a random breeze may throw in its way—"

"For God's sake!" exclaimed a broken voice, so suddenly that it made them both start; "for God's sake, gentlemen, show me the way to a doctor! My wife is dying! Where can I find a doctor?"

The blaze of a gas-lamp fell full upon the face of the speaker. It was a man, miserably poor, to judge by his patched and threadbare garments. He had no outer covering to protect him from the cold night-air, and his old, napless hat—that beacon-sign of decaying gentility—looked as if it had been Fortune's foot-ball. In the weak, trembling under-lip, the worn, bloodshot eye, the ravages of intemperance were written in delecting characters. At this moment, however, he was in the sober possession of all his faculties. Despair and remorse lent urgency and eloquence to his accents.

"For the love of heaven," he again repeated, "direct me to a doctor! Though," he added, with bitterness, "I have not a cent in the world to pay him!"

"I am a physician," cried Mordaunt, his warm, impulsive heart glowing within him at the prospect of being able to administer relief to suffering humanity. "Show me where you live. I will see what I can do for your wife."

"The Almighty bless you!" exclaimed the suppliant, the tears, which are ever ready to flow from the eyes of the imberbe, washing his bloated cheeks.

"I wish you joy of your patient!" said Irvin.

Just as Mordaunt was turning to follow the steps of his miserable conductor, without answering the sneering remark of Irvin, another man came rushing along, as if the avenger of blood was behind him.

"What is the matter?" cried Irvin, moving instinctively from the path.

"The horses have run away with my master," answered the man, panting for breath; "he has been thrown upon the pavement; his leg is broken; I want a doctor. For the love of mercy, direct me to the nearest!"

"Well, Dr. Mordaunt," said Irvin, "your star seems to be in the ascendant to-night. I know this man's master. It is Mr. Goldman, the modern Cæsus. Your fortune is made!"

"I have promised this poor creature to go with him," answered Mordaunt, struggling with the strong temptation that beset him. The glow of compassion faded. Turning suddenly to the wretched being who had been calling down blessings on his head, he said:

"Tell me where you live, and as soon as I have attended to the gentleman who requires my assistance, I will call and see your wife."

"O, sir, she is dying—I left her in spasms! She will die if you delay! You promised me—you know you did! God gave her life as well as the rich man: if you let her perish, God will judge you for it, and man, too!"

The pale eye of the drunkard kindled fiercely as he spoke. He forgot that he had been draining, drop by drop, the heart's blood of her whose life he was requiring so vehemently of another.

"He is right," said Mordaunt, heaving off the temptation, with a long, deep inspiration; then directing the servant of Mr. Goldman to the office of Dr. Lewis, an eminent surgeon as well as physician, he immediately followed the rapid but unsteady steps of his guide.

"Yes," repeated he to himself, as he walked along, glad that he had girded himself for his task of mercy; "yes, he is right! Though waves of gold should roll over my path, they could not drown the faintest whisper of accusing conscience. Yet what a glorious opportunity I have lost! Rich! Irvin says he is rich, and riches always give influence."

By a sudden transition of thought, Mordaunt recalled the scene when the Chaldean shepherds beheld the star of the east, beaming above the manger which was made the cradle of the infant Saviour. Should one be ashamed of lowliness, when the Deity had wrapped himself in it, as a mantle? Mordaunt felt a sublime contempt for all the gauds of this world. And this sudden lifting of the soul was caused by that one bright, ascendant star, on which his wandering gaze had fixed. That star was his—the whole heavens, with their resplendent host, were his. A soul capable of taking in this amplitude of glory was his; a heart large enough to embrace all the suffering children of humanity was his. How could he call himself poor? All the dark past was forgotten.

He was obliged to bend his head while passing into the low dwelling occupied by the patient. The light was so dim, he did not at once see with distinctness the interior of the apartment into which he was ushered. But gradually every object came out as through the gloom of a morning twilight. A low bed, whose snow-white covering spoke of neatness and lingering refinement in the midst of penury and domestic misery, stood opposite the door; and above that snowy covering rose a pale and ghastly face, with closed eyelids and parted lips, through which the breath came slowly and gaspingly. By the side of the bed sat a figure, wrapped in a large, grey shawl, which nearly enveloped the whole person. The face belonging to this figure turned slowly towards him, as he approached the bed, and it shone upon him in that dim apartment like one of those evening stars he had just been contemplating, beaming through a dull, grey cloud. It was a face of youth and beauty, but pale, sad, and holy as a nun's; a countenance which had been bending over the couch of the dying till the shadow of mortality had passed over its brightness. No conscious start disturbed the quietude of her attitude—no sudden blush coloured the fair cheek, as she met the wondering glance of Mordaunt, who bowed his head in acknowledgment of her presence. A groan from the apparently dying woman recalled his attention to her, and taking her thin, sawn hand in his, he counted the low and flickering pulse; then, lifting the candle from a little table not far from the bed, he held it so that the light might fall upon her faded and sunken features. Her eyelids moved not, as the rays flashed over them. He spoke to her in a clear, deep voice, but the sound did not penetrate her deafened ear.

"She is not dying, doctor?" cried the man, fixing his faded and rueful eyes on Mordaunt's serious and earnest countenance. "You don't think that she is dying, doctor?"

"She is very low—very low, indeed!" replied Mordaunt.

"How long has she been in this exhausted state?"

"About half an hour; ever since the spasm subsided," said the young lady with the grey shawl.

The voice was so sweet, and had such a subdued and holy tone, that Mordaunt held his breath to listen.

"Oh, it was terrible!" she continued, "to witness that awful paroxysm!"

"Surely you were not alone with her?" exclaimed the young doctor, involuntarily.

"No," she replied, with a slight shudder; "a servant was with me, whom, a short time since, I sent for wine, thinking it might possibly revive her."

"Her nervous system seems completely destroyed," said Mordaunt; "worn out by long struggles, I should think."

Here he riveted his gaze on the drunken husband, with a look that spoke volumes.

"I haven't killed her!" he cried, weeping and sobbing aloud. "I know I have not always treated her as I ought—I have sometimes been rough to her, when I didn't well know what I was doing! I never struck her but once—as I remember—never—I didn't mean to hurt her—I haven't killed her, doctor!"

"But once!" exclaimed Mordaunt, indignantly. "It was enough!"

Mordaunt took up the vials clustered on the table: after having examined them, he poured some ether in a glass, and having diluted it with water, put it to the passive lips of the patient. The odour of the ethereal fluid seemed to revive her. She breathed more easily, and the eyeballs began to move under the closed lids.

"She needs stimulants," said Mordaunt; "wine will not be strong enough. She must have brandy. Here," added he, to the husband, taking from his purse the solitary guinea—that which was to have been the open-sesame to the magic caverns of fancy—and placing it in his hand, "here, go to the nearest apothecary's, and get a bottle of the best French brandy, such as they keep for the sick. Make haste!"

The bloodshot eyes of the drunkard flashed up with a sudden and fierce delight: the very sound of the word brandy tingled his blunted senses—the sight of the money was fuel to his feverish and brutish desires. Mordaunt felt a gentle touch on his arm, and, looking round, he saw the gleam of a white hand on his dark coat. The folds of the grey shawl swept momentarily against him.

"He is gone!" said the young lady, in a tone of disappointment; "alas, he cannot be trusted!"

"Surely, at a moment like this, he must be faithful!" cried Mordaunt; yet the recollection of the insane gleam of his eye made him shudder.

"Strange, that Hannah does not return!" said the young lady, looking anxiously towards the door. Her countenance brightened even as she spoke; for a woman came to the threshold, and beckoned her to approach. Mordaunt heard a startling exclamation from the grey-shawled damsel, in answer to something the woman said, in a quick, low voice.

"Good heavens! My uncle! How could it happen? His arm and leg—both broken! Oh, what a dreadful night!"

She leaned against the frame of the door, as if overcome with the shock she had received. Mordaunt saw that she was deadly pale, and handed her a glass of water.

"You will not leave this poor creature," said she, folding her shawl closely around her, and making a motion to Hannah to follow her. "My poor uncle! how much he must suffer!"

She stepped upon the threshold, unbonneted and unveiled.

"Surely you are not going abroad without a protector, at this hour?" cried Mordaunt, feeling the impossibility of leaving his poor patient alone, to offer his services as an escort.

"I have only to pass through the gate," she replied; "this cottage is at the back of my uncle's yard. God bless you, sir, for your kindness to this poor woman! she is worthy of it."

Yes! this must be the niece of Mr. Goldman, whom he might have had for a patient, and who might have opened to him the golden portals of success. He fed the waning lamp of life with the oil of kindness, and continued to watch by the bed of the sufferer, bathing her temples with water, and moistening her lips with wine. He listened for the footsteps of the drunken husband, but the wretch came not: he was doubtless steeping his soul deeper still in the burning fluid. Mordaunt remembered the soft pressure of the white hand on his arm, and wished he had sooner felt its warning touch.

About midnight, the poor, weak pulse his fingers pressed suddenly stopped, and Mordaunt found himself alone with the dead. As the inexpressible calm and placidity of death stole over the features, restoring something of youthfulness and beauty, and the charm of a great and solemn mystery rested upon them, he looked upon her with a strange interest. The human frame was to him a wondrous and curious machine—a God-constructed, glorious instrument. He looked upon it with the eyes of science, and, whether clothed in rags or fine linen, he recognised the hand of the Divine Architect.

But what must he do? Whom could he summon to that death-tenanted chamber? The evening star was now shedding its soft, pitying rays over another couch of suffering—that couch which his ministrations might also have soothed. Just as he was rising, resolved to rouse the inmates of the next cottage, and induce them to attend to the last duties of humanity, the door opened, and Hannah quietly entered. She was a grave, respectable-looking woman, and seemed to understand at one glance the office that devolved upon her. Mordaunt felt as if his mission was now ended.

"How is the gentleman? How is Mr. Goldman?" asked he. "Is he very badly hurt?"

"Dreadfully, sir! His leg and arm are broken, and he is shockingly bruised besides; you can hear him groan all over the house!"

"And the young lady?"

"Miss Constance? She is with her uncle. She will not leave him, though the doctors all urge her to go, and she looks ready to drop."

"Has he many doctors with him?"

"There are three below—enough to kill him, I am sure."

"I might have been one of that favoured trio," thought Mordaunt; "and now the weight of my last crime is added to the millstone of sin that is dragging a wretch to the abyss of perdition! But I meant to do good. God forgive me for repining!"

Days and weeks passed away. Mordaunt continued to struggle on—to struggle on the very verge of penury—just able, with the strictest economy, to pay his daily expenses. His practice was extending, but chiefly among the poor, whose scanty purse he felt unwilling to diminish.

He was gaining experience, but losing hope. His youthful appearance was a bar to his success. He had a strong desire to cut off his bright, brown locks, which had a most obstinate and provoking wave, and assume a venerable-looking wig; to cover his sunny, hazel eyes with a pair of green spectacles, and wear an expression of supernatural gravity and intense wisdom. Everything short of this he did to make himself older, but in vain. The fire of youth was burning in the temple of life, and it illuminated all surrounding objects.

Once, when he was walking with Irvin (for, uncongenial as they were, they were frequent companions), a carriage stopped at the door of a splendid mansion just before them. A lady descended, whom he immediately recognised as the Evening Star. The grey cloud no longer enveloped her graceful figure, which was robed in all the elegance of fashion. The face was less pale and sad than when he saw her last, but still wore that celestial fairness which is seldom warmed with the colouring of earth. Mordaunt bowed low to the recognising glance, while Irvin stepped forward with the freedom of an old acquaintance, and offered his assistance in leading her up the flight of marble steps which led to the door.

Mordaunt felt a sudden swelling of the heart against Irvin. He could not help it, though he despised himself for it. He knew that Constance would speak to him. He felt that he was not forgotten. Though her cheek, like the pure asbestos, kindled not at his approach, her eye had beamed with a modest but joyous welcome.

We will leave Mordaunt for awhile, and follow Irvin into the dwelling of the modern Cæsus.

PART II.

MR. GOLDMAN, who was still suffering from his broken limbs, reclined upon a couch, near the fire. Irvin sat by his side—Constance at a little distance. Irvin, when he wished to please, had the most insinuating manners, and he had a strong desire to please the uncle of Constance. He felt confident of success with him, but there was something about Constance he could not fathom. A holy serenity, a passionless calm, over which the breath of admiration flowed like a cloud over-crystal, leaving no impression on its pure, smooth surface. As she now sat, looking into the fire, with a soft languor diffused over her features, he was flattering himself that he might be the subject of her waking dream, when she startled him with the question, in her peculiarly sweet, low tone of voice:

"Who is the young gentleman who was your companion this evening?"

"It was young Dr. Mordaunt," answered Irvin, vexed at finding that another than himself was the subject of her reverie. "But surely he could not have had the presumption to bow as an entire stranger?"

"He is not an entire stranger; nor do I believe that he would be guilty of presumption, under any circumstances," replied Constance, with a slight shade of haughtiness.

"Who is that you are speaking of?" asked Mr. Goldman, whose ear caught the sound of "doctor." "Dr. Mordaunt? I never heard of him. Is he a distinguished physician?"

"He is a young tyro," answered Irvin; "a true Don Quixote in his profession. To show you what chance he has of arriving at distinction, I will mention an incident connected with him, in which you, sir, have a personal interest. The night when you were thrown from the carriage, and your footman came rushing through the street in frantic haste for a doctor, ready to seize the first he could grasp—would you believe it, sir, he refused to follow your servant—refused to administer to your relief!"

"Refused!" exclaimed Mr. Goldman, with an air of surprise and displeasure. "That was very unaccountable behaviour. Did he imagine I was some poor wretch, who could not pay him for his services?"

"I told him who you were, sir, and that it was a life of no common value that was endangered. But because he had promised a few moments before to prescribe for the wife of a vile drunkard, who, with reeling step, arrested us in our path—a creature too low to be considered within the pale of humanity—he turned a deaf ear to the tale of your sufferings, and allowed her life to outweigh yours, in the scale of his judgment!"

"Fool!" exclaimed Mr. Goldman.

"Perhaps he put his promise in the scale to balance the temptation?" said Constance. "Of course he is wealthy, or he would not slight a golden opportunity."

"Not worth a penny in the world," answered Irvin.

"Uncle," said Constance, with a sudden lighting up of her fair, calm face, "when I tell you what I know of this young Dr. Mordaunt, you will withdraw the opprobrious epithet you have given him. The night of your dreadful accident, I was with poor Kate O'Brien, when he visited her, and I was struck with the kindness of his manner and the heartiness of his sympathy. It seemed to me that he was skilful, and that he felt as much interest in her recovery as if a great reward were to be his. Kate O'Brien, sir," added she, looking towards Irvin with a glance he could not understand, "was a favourite servant of my mother's. My mother had her from childhood in her household, and loved her almost as her child. She was faithful, gentle, and affectionate. Ever since her unfortunate marriage she has lived near us, an object of interest and compassion. She was worthy of the profoundest pity, whatever may be said of her miserable husband. That Dr. Mordaunt should conscientiously adhere to his promise of visiting the poor and lowly, in the face of a strong temptation, is, I think, a noble instance of generosity and self-sacrifice. I esteemed him before—I honour him now."

"And what is this young doctor to you, that you defend him so warmly, Constance?" cried her uncle, looking suspiciously on her shining countenance—for it literally shone with moral admiration.

"To me, nothing, uncle; but the cause is everything."

"What cause?"

"The cause of truth, justice, and humanity. I thought if you and Mr. Irvin understood the circumstances which I have related, they would vindicate Dr. Mordaunt from the charges of Quixotism and folly. Uncle, you were attached to poor Kate—I was summoned to your bed of agony—her brutal husband forsook her—this young man remained with her till she died. Even then, he watched by her lonely corse. Hannah found him guarding it, as a sacred trust—"

Constance paused. She had spoken with more energy than she was aware of, and a faint colour dawned perceptibly on her alabaster cheek.

Irvin, exasperated to find that, instead of lowering Mordaunt, he had only exalted him in her estimation, rose to depart. Constance drew a sigh of relief as the door closed on his departing figure. Mr. Goldman looked anxious and irritated.

"You have displeased him, Constance."

"I care not, uncle. His displeasure or approbation are alike to me."

"He loves you. He has wealth, talents, and a rising reputation. I do not like to see you blind to his merits, and infatuated by those of a poor stranger. I wish to speak to you openly, Constance. I do not think I shall ever recover from the shock my constitution has received. It is time that I should transfer my guardianship to another. Irvin is rich himself, and cannot be allured by your fortune. His attachment is disinterested and sincere, yet he has sufficient worldly wisdom to watch over your property; and his sobriety, prudence, and good sense will secure your domestic happiness. I like Irvin. I wish you to marry him."

"I do not like him, uncle. I do not wish to marry him, or any one else. His worldly wisdom chills the very atmosphere I breathe. If I ever do marry, it shall not be a man without one warm and generous affection—one noble, magnanimous feeling. Kate O'Brien, the drunkard's wife, was not more worthy of pity than I should be. Her heart was crushed—mine would be frozen."

"Constance," said her uncle, suddenly raising himself on one elbow, then falling back with a groan of pain, "if you have conceived a sudden passion for this young doctor, I will never countenance it; I warn you against this folly. It shall be blasted in the very bud."

"Oh, uncle, have you so poor an opinion of me as to believe me incapable of an unselfish, generous sentiment? I am not one to be governed by the impulse of passion. You know I am not. I am called the snow-maiden, because I am deemed so cold and unimpassioned. I do feel interested in this young physician, for he has shown himself magnanimous and strong to resist temptation. A noble spirit struggling with destiny is worthy of admiration. I would give worlds to hold out to him a helping hand. I would give anything that I were a man, that I could offer him a brother's aid, a friend's assistance. I feel guilty in the possession of wealth, so far beyond my want, when it might serve as a golden ladder, on which a great soul could mount to the heights of honour and distinction."

"You are a strange girl, Constance. I do not understand you," cried her uncle, feeling through the icy coldness of his nature, in spite of his own will, the penetrative sun-rays of her philanthropy. He said he could not understand her—but he did in some measure. He understood her enough to know that she was misled by no girlish fancy, no unmaidenly passion—but actuated by a high and holy benevolence. He listened to her with more patience, on that couch of suffering, to which she had been a waiting, ministering angel, than he would have done in his days of health and ease.

"Uncle," she added, fixing her clear, serene eyes on his face, and taking his thin hand in the soft palm of hers, "you are a man, and can do what I cannot. You are rich—one of the stewards of God's gold. You can take this young man, by the hand, and lift him above the influences of poverty, so chilling and depressing to the young and ambitious mind. You said this morning that you did not like Dr. Lewis—that he was careless and indifferent—that he would not listen to your complaints, and seemed to think you had no right to make them?"

"Yes, I did say so," interrupted Mr. Goldman; "and I say so again. He never stays with me longer than three minutes, and treats me like a common patient."

"He has too many patients, uncle. You are of no consequence to him. Your money is no more to him than any other man's. If you should employ this young doctor, he would be grateful and attentive; you would have the satisfaction of feeling that you were doing him a favour—perhaps laying the foundation of his future eminence; you would be the honoured patron of youthful talent and now unknown worth; you would exult in your own works. Oh, uncle! it is not what we do for ourselves, but for others, that is written in the Book of Life!"

"You say he was very kind to poor Kate?"

"Oh, so kind and compassionate! no brother could have been kinder!"

"What would Dr. Lewis say?"

"I think he would rejoice, for the sake of the young man: he is too eminent in his profession to indulge in the meanness of jealousy."

"What will Irvin say?"

"Irvin! Let him say what he pleases. He is envious, and I despise him. He is malicious, and I dislike him. He is cold-hearted, and I shun him. He is avaricious, and cares not for me, but my wealth. Believe me, uncle, he is unworthy of your confidence. The lips that, cold and sarcastic, can breathe the venom of slander on an absent brother, never shall address the words of love to me!"

"Brother?"

"All mankind are brothers, uncle. Oh, I feel the chain that binds me to my race. I cannot bear to think that mine should be made of links of gold, and others of galling iron. There will come a day of great equality, uncle. Blessed are those who labour in this world to establish the equilibrium here, which will settle at last on the meeting waves of the great human mind."

Mr. Goldman cast a look of perplexity and admiration on his niece. He could not follow the divine aspirations of her spirit; he even felt awe in her presence: she seemed scarcely of the earth, earthy. How came this young girl by these holy sentiments, surrounded by such worldly influences? Cast in the furnace of temptation, with the dangerous gifts of beauty, wealth, and genius, how is it that she walked unscathed 'mid the scorching flames, serene and unmoved? Was it that one in the likeness of the Son of God walked with her, as he did with the children of Israel, and disarmed the elements of the world of their destroying power?

"How shall I send for this young doctor?" suddenly asked Mr. Goldman. "Do you know where he resides?"

"We have a Directory. I will get it."

Constance sought the book, and immediately ascertained the location of the young physician.

"I will try him, Constance. If I do not like him, I shall dismiss him. Remember, it is only an experiment."

"Certainly, dear uncle. I ask no more. Thank you a thousand times for this kind concession! It is good it is noble of you! If you find him unskilful, it will be your duty to withdraw your influence—for life is too precious to be lightly dealt with, and yours most of all. Good night!"

She bent and kissed the forehead of her uncle with unusual tenderness. He drew her gently nearer and nearer, till she was rested against his heart. He folded his uninjured arm around her, and laid his hand on her smooth, soft hair.

"Constance!" said he, "you are a good girl—too good for this world! I wish there were more like you. It is very strange, when talking with Irvin, I feel as hard and worldly as he seems to be. When listening to you, I seem a different being: the monitor within responds to your sweet accents. When I mingled with the gay world, everything around me wore a bright, metallic glare: I found myself valued for my wealth, and I took a pride in its possession. Why should I not glory in what gave me power and influence? Since I have been confined to this couch, and when I am alone with you, my better nature rises, and sometimes triumphs. Good night! God bless you, Constance!"

"And you too, dear uncle!"

A tear, which glittered on the fringed curtain of her eyes, fell on the cheek of the invalid, as she turned from the couch. It was only deep emotion that could draw tears from the eyes of Constance: her feelings were not upon the surface; they were far down in the "sunless retreats of the ocean" of thought.

The next day, when Dr. Lewis called, Constance perceived a shade of embarrassment on her uncle's countenance, and she hastened to relieve him.

"Dr. Lewis," said she, as he turned hastily to the door, "I will not detain you long. It will give you neither disappointment nor displeasure if uncle should free you from your attendance on him? Thanks to your skill, he is no longer in danger. There is a promising young physician whom he wishes to patronise. His name is Mordaunt. Has he your permission to do so?"

"Certainly," he replied, with a look of mingled pleasure and surprise. "I like your frankness. I have heard of this young man. He is promising. I am glad to hear of his good fortune."

His countenance expressed more than his words; but Constance did not blush or cast down her eyes. She related in a few words all that she knew of Mordaunt, and that it was owing to her persuasions that her uncle had been induced to employ him.

The simplicity and frankness of her manner convinced the doctor of the purity and elevation of her motives. He was not a cold, unfeeling man. He had not time to express his feelings. The burden of a great responsibility rested upon him, and it made him grave and thoughtful. If he made hurried calls at the rich man's bed-side, where his attentions were needed least of all, he often staid hours in the hovels of the poor.

"When I was a young man," said he, holding the door in his hand, "I had many a hard struggle with the world. I know how to sympathise with these young wrestlers. Tell Dr. Mordaunt so, and tell him to call and see me. I shall be glad to know him better."

And he did know him better, and became his firm friend and disinterested counsellor. And Mr. Goldman was charmed with the young physician, and sounded his praises in every ear.

Mordaunt had indeed cast his bread upon the waters, when he visited the dying wife of the drunkard, and gave away his only guinea, in the hope of stimulating her exhausted energies. He did not know, when he entered that wretched abode, that there sat the angel who was to stir the stagnant waters of his life. But it was even so.

Now, he knew that he was indebted to Constance for the sudden flow of prosperity that came rolling in the dry and sandy channel of poverty.

Mordaunt had an exalted estimate of woman. He adored his mother, and dearly loved his gentle sister (for he had a mother and sister who dwelt far away, in a sweet country village), and in every lovely young female he recognised a sister's form. For Constance he felt an admiration so chastened by reverence, it was less like the feeling that youth and beauty inspires than what the worshipper feels for his guardian saint. It was not love—for she indeed seemed the snow-maiden—too pure and too cold to be warmed by the breath of human passion. He experienced in her presence a feeling of divine repose, a kind of moonlight quietude; for such was her exquisite purity, her holy spirituality, that she diffused around her a kind of silvery brightness, that threw a soft, illusive charm on all within the sphere of her influence.

Mordaunt's practice was now rapidly extending among the rich and influential, among those who could appreciate his merits, as well as reward his services. He no longer looked with anxious eye on the sleeve of his coat, or the rim of his hat. He could afford to buy new ones. He was no longer poor—no longer unknown. His mind, liberated from the iron fetters of poverty, and unchilled by the vapours of obscurity, was conscious of an expansion, a warmth, an elevation unknown before. He became strongly attached to Dr. Lewis, who, in his now familiar intercourse with the young man, displayed a geniality of feeling, more winning from the contrast with the prevailing reserve and dignity of his character.

Mordaunt occasionally met Irvin, in whose breast the gall of jealousy was added to the venom of envy. Himself the now rejected lover of Constance, he hated the man who, he believed, had rivalled him in her affections. He did not discontinue his visits at Mr. Goldman's. He asked to retain the privileges of a friend, though denied far dearer rights. He wanted to watch the progress of Mordaunt, and, if possible, undermine the stately fabric of his growing fame.

"Every man," said he, "has some weak, vulnerable point—some spot that the Styx of stoicism has not bathed. Mordaunt is proud. Let the barbed arrow pierce him through his pride, and the wound will prey upon his life." The soul of Mordaunt had a vulnerable spot, but it was one of which Irvin never dreamed—a spot where the arrow would indeed penetrate, deep as the core of life. But time had folded its layers thickly over it, and the man at times forgot what had well-nigh maddened the boy.

The age of a tree is known by the consecutive circles that are formed round the heart of the trunk, and it takes many a stroke of the sharpest axe to reach that guarded spot.

PART III.

ONE evening Mordaunt was met by Irvin at the house of Mr. Goldman, who was still an invalid. Irvin excited himself more than usual to shine in the conversation that evening, and his apparent warmth of feeling nearly surprised Mordaunt into an inward acknowledgment that he had wronged this man's nature; that it might possess some of the finer traits hitherto lying beneath or beyond the observation of the world. By imperceptible degrees and with consummate art he led the conversation through many tributary streams into the channel that suited his purpose.

Pride of birth and station had been touched upon lightly, and Irvin had maintained that the aristocracy of intellect was the only true aristocracy—the one that would, sooner or later, be universally acknowledged and respected. There was something noble, he said, in the efforts of a young man to rise above the misfortunes of his early life. But no honest man should be ashamed of his parentage.

To his propositions, deferentially stated and skilfully reasoned, he gained the assent of even the aristocratic Mr. Goldman.

"But," said Irvin, glancing at Mordaunt, "suppose, in addition to his poverty, a stain rested on the family of a young man, and, concealing all knowledge of the circumstances of his early history, he should strive to ingratiate himself into the favour of his superiors, and attain their skirts with the blackness that clung to his own. I know such an one," he continued, "who even aspires to the hand of a young lady far above him. He has partially succeeded in impressing her with the belief that he is a man of noble sentiments and qualities—that his impulses and aspirations are like her own—that his genius, talents, and acquisitions are a fair offset to her possessions and proud name—and that an alliance with him would secure to her happiness and peace. He hides from her his history, which he would fain bury in the oblivion of the past; he hides from her the truth that his name would bring dishonour upon her, and those connected with her by the dearest ties; he hides from her that he is seeking this marriage to gild over that name that has been stained with a dreadful crime; in short, he hides from her the fact that his own father perished ignominiously upon the scaffold! Is this honourable?"

It was not till after the words died away that the spirit felt their reptile influence.

Constance had answered—"No, it is not honourable," before this influence was perceptible on herself. She observed the eye of Irvin fixed steadily on Mordaunt, who was seated at her side, and an impulse which she could not resist urged her to turn and look upon him.

As she did so, she met his glance, and her own was riveted, as by fascination. Never had she seen the face of man of such marble pallor. Never had she witnessed such an expression of sternness and despair on any human countenance. And yet, flashing through this sternness and despair, there was a suddenly kindled, burning ray, quick, bright, and fierce as the meteor of a dark night. In that momentary communion of glances, a history was revealed which volumes might not contain.

You have seen the lightning instantaneously opening the gates of midnight, while stretching beyond seemed interminable fiery streets, glimpses of the eternal land. So oftentimes the lightning of strong emotion discloses the mysterious depths of the soul—"that city of our God," whose length and breadth no guager's wand has ever measured.

Mr Goldman, whose easy chair was placed a little back from the group, and who beheld not the emotions we have described, repeated, with emphasis, the words of Constance—

"No, it is not honorable. It is not pardonable. I could pity, nay, esteem the young man who, making no secret of his misfortune, endeavoured to make himself an unblemished fame. But I never could forgive the one who deceived my confidence, and tried to introduce into my family a dishonoured name. Who is the young man of whom you are speaking?"

"I, sir, am that unfortunate man!" exclaimed Mordaunt, to the astonishment of Irvin, rising from his seat, and turning towards Mr. Goldman; "but I have never sought to deceive the confidence of my friends. I have merely been silent on a misfortune for which sympathy has no balm, and friendship no relief. I acknowledge that in scenes far from my native home I have endeavoured to forget that I bore a dishonoured name, and to make for myself an irreproachable reputation. But it was for no foul, deliberate crime that my unhappy parent was doomed to a death of shame. The victim of a dark and inscrutable destiny, he left on the minds of all who knew him a conviction of his innocence as clear and ineffaceable as if the testimony were written with a diamond pen on a tablet of crystal! This gentleman, with a penetration which does more honour to his head than his heart, has discovered the secret, which I have guarded from no mean or unworthy motives. Why he has taken this opportunity to disclose it, in a manner the tortures of the Inquisition could not have surpassed, he alone knows."

"I mentioned no names," cried Irvin, evidently disconcerted by the undaunted frankness of Mordaunt; "if conscience has directed the application, I neither claim the merit nor assume the blame."

"Really, gentlemen, this is a most extraordinary disclosure!" said Mr. Goldman, turning pale from the excitement of his feelings; "I know not when my nerves have received so sudden and severe a shock. Dr. Mordaunt, I have never met with a young gentleman whom I have esteemed more, but these unfortunate circumstances—you should have made them known to me sooner. I am placed in a very distressing position."

"Let me relieve you of the distress which my presence occasions you, sir!" cried Mordaunt. "But before I withdraw, I would thank you for all past kindness and confidence. I rejoice in the conviction, that I have not forfeited either by any conduct of my own. Should you consider me responsible for an event which occurred in my early childhood, and which no acts of my manhood could change, and exclude me hereafter from your friendship and esteem, I must bow to a decision whose justice, nevertheless, reason and religion could never admit. Farewell, sir. I wish you to reflect calmly on this question, and, whatever be the result, gratitude for the past will be permanent as my life!"

With a respectful bow to Mr. Goldman, who did not attempt to reply, and another still lower to Constance, Mordaunt passed from the room, without directing a glance at Irvin.

With slow steps he traversed the long passage, walking over prostrate pillars of moonshine, white and gleaming as marble—thinking that of materials as ghostly and unsubstantial, his life-temple must be built.

As he opened the door, a silver scaffold was plainly defined upon the floor. He shuddered to see his thoughts thus shaping themselves in the night-glory, when he was arrested by a touch so light as to be almost impalpable. At first he imagined that the moonbeams were gleaming on his arm, in the form of a fair and delicate hand—for there it was on the dark sleeve of his coat, just as he had seen it months before in Kate O'Brien's cottage. He turned, and beheld the celestial countenance of Constance so near, that her breath sighed upon his cheek.

"Constance!" he exclaimed.

It was the first time he had ever addressed her thus. It was strange that while the revelation just made seemed to divorce him from mankind, it drew him irresistibly closer towards her. At any other moment he would have thought it presumption to have called her by her own noble and appropriate Christian name.

"Come into the conservatory a few moments," said she, "unless you are willing to throw aside a friend as lightly as the flower your foot is now crushing."

A flower had fallen from the bosom of Constance, under the feet of Mordaunt.

"I hope this is not prophetic!" cried Constance in a very low voice, looking on the defaced and mangled blossom.

Mordaunt followed the steps of Constance.

Imagination could not conceive a more enchanting spot than this "Fairy's Grotto," as Constance named it.

Mordaunt had been admitted before to this lovely retreat, and he was familiar with all its beauties; but now it burst upon him with a loveliness that seemed more than earthly. The rich aroma of the flowers pressed with languishing sweetness on his senses, and the soft, monotonous murmur of the falling fountain mingled with the sad, minor tones of his own spirit, making a mournful but divine harmony.

Constance had thrown around her a light scarf, very airy in texture, but its colour was silver-grey, and Mordaunt thought once more of the Evening Star. But now its rays seemed setting instead of rising on the horizon of his destiny.

"I thank you for this last act of kindness and confidence," said Mordaunt, regretting the next moment that he had spoken at all—for it seemed sacrilege to break the silence, or rather the music of the hour; "but is it not cruel to bring me here, that I may feel the more fully and deeply what I fear I have for ever lost?"

"Why should any blessing, yours either by possession or in reversion, be lost to you now?" asked Constance.

"You know the curse that clings to me, and yet ask why?"

"I have learned your misfortunes, and, though nobly sustained as they have hitherto been, they will turn to blessings at last. I rejoice that you had the moral courage to avow yourself the object of Irvin's dark insinuations. He is already baffled, and his malice will recoil on himself. And do you know me so little as to believe that the revelations of this night can affect my esteem for you—that I could be so unjust, so cowardly and unkind—that I could visit on the innocent the crime of the guilty, even if the guilt exist? But I have faith in your father's innocence, because you are his son. I have faith that it will yet be made known to the world, dark as is the cloud which now rests upon it!"

"Ten thousand blessings for this sublime faith!" exclaimed Mordaunt, his countenance kindling with inspiration; "and ten thousand blessings for the confidence which has not been shaken by this sudden blow! I feel myself worthy of it, and yet I would not take advantage of it, and expose you to the malicious observations of the world. Irvin will blazon abroad the stigma which brands my name. By association, your own will become contaminated. Your uncle will sacrifice me to the god of public opinion. He has not the moral strength to resist its influence. I should expose you to his displeasure, and bring dissension into a now harmonious household."

"I should be unworthy of the blessings you have just breathed upon me, if I were not willing to brave the evils you are bringing in such dread array before me! Oh, if you knew how little I care for the opinion of the world, when conscious of right in my own heart, you would feel how inefficient were your arguments—how sophistical your reasoning. The world, as it is called, one true friend would outweigh a hundred-fold in my estimation."

Mordaunt related all his past history, including the awful tragedy of his father's death. He was then a mere boy, but he remembered well his mother's agony and his sister's despair. He remembered well the last prison-scene, when his father, almost crushing him in his arms, baptised him with tears of blood, as it were, declaring his innocence in the name of that God in whose presence he was about to appear. Years of darkness followed, but light dawned at last. His mother was a brave, Christian woman, and grief did not crush her. She lived for her children. In him the jubilant spirit of youth at last rose above the gloomy past—that past which began to appear as a frightful dream. Amid new scenes, surrounded with new associations, he ceased to dwell upon it, and if the shadow intruded, he resolutely dispelled it.

"I have explained everything to Dr. Lewis," said Mordaunt, "and he is more than ever my friend. He has even offered me a partnership in his practice, and given me the most earnest advice to remain!"

"Remain!" repeated Constance. "Surely you have not thought of leaving us?"

Constance Goldman did not feel as if she had made any sacrifice in pledging her faith to Mordaunt. She believed herself the winner of a noble prize in a heart like his. Never perhaps had a young and inexperienced girl a truer estimate of life. A brotherless, sisterless orphan, nature had opened few channels in which her affections could flow. There was nothing in her uncle's character to inspire the love and reverence she longed to bestow on some legitimate object. She had met no one in the circles of wealth and fashion in whom she felt the slightest interest. Of a deeply religious temperament, her heart lifted itself towards God with a fervour and devotion unchecked by any earthly idol. In every son and daughter of sorrow she saw a brother and sister to whom God had appointed her a ministering spirit. So she went about doing good, surrounded by a halo of vestal purity, which made her inapproachable as she was lovely. From the first moment she beheld Mordaunt in the cottage of poor Kate O'Brien, she felt his superiority to his kind; on every succeeding interview she more and more esteemed and honoured him; but it was not till this evening, when, with the quickness of woman's perception, she read that he was the object of Irvin's malice, and at the same time had a vivid insight into his heart, that her own was awakened; and its awakening was like the sun-burst of a summer's day, after a morning of clouds. What if his father's name was a heritage of ignominy? She cared not, since he was pure, and of spotless fame. Was he not more noble, more glorious, in his own undervived excellence?

When Mordaunt left the grotto, the moon had set, and the silver had faded from the willow's watery boughs. But clear, serene, and resplendent shone the Evening Star above his head.

Constance and Mordaunt both had too lofty a sense of propriety to think of clandestine meetings. She resolved to wait till the time of her majority, and then, being in possession of her fortune, and freed from the legal authority of a guardian, she could openly avow and glory in her choice.

In the meantime, the malicious tongue of Irvin was not silent. The history of Mordaunt became the topic of the day.

The young physician had, however, one pillar to lean upon, in the firm friendship of Dr. Lewis—firm as the granite, and imperishable as gold. While his proud spirit writhed in secret at the undeserved obloquy darkening his young renown, he thought of the love of Constance, the esteem of Dr. Lewis, and felt himself rich beyond the common hopes of man.

"Be strong, be patient," said this excellent friend; "be self-reliant and hopeful. It is hardly within the bounds of possibility that your father's memory will ever be cleared of the stain that rests upon it. But the cloud will in time roll away from yourself. It is only what is inherent that is permanent."

"I have always had a hope, so strong as to assume the character of certainty," replied Mordaunt, "that God would bring about a revelation which would surround my father's memory with the halo of martyrdom. I tremble when I hear of the confessions of dying criminals—tremble with a vague expectation of discovering the actual murderer, in whose stead the innocent and righteous was doomed to suffer."

One night, as Mordaunt was returning with Dr. Lewis from a professional visit, and passing through a cross street, peopled by poverty and vice, he was arrested by a tumult on the side-walk. Lights were gleaming near the door of a low building, and several figures were rushing out in different directions. One came in violent contact with Mordaunt, at the imminent risk of prostrating him on the pavement.

"What is the matter?" he exclaimed. "What is the cause of this violent tumult?"

"A man is bleeding to death!" cried several voices, clamorously. "Can any one tell us where to find a doctor—a surgeon? He can't live ten minutes, at this rate!"

"Show us the way," said Dr. Lewis. "Here are two doctors at once."

The next moment, forcing their way through the crowd, they stood in the presence of the bleeding man.

"What is the meaning of this?" said Dr. Lewis—even his iron nerves vibrating painfully as he gazed upon him.

"Nothing but a fight," answered a ruffian-looking bystander. "The man that cut him, ran off when he saw him bleed so dreadfully."

"Nothing but a fight!" repeated Dr. Lewis, sternly; "why, he must have cut an artery! 'Tis a life-stroke!"

Dr. Lewis thrust off his coat—he stooped down and gashed open the sleeve of the wounded man. To tie up a severed artery is a difficult and dangerous operation, but with a firm yet gentle touch, he drew together the issues of life, till the living fibres turned, the valves of the fountain closed, and the victim was saved from immediate death.

"You are not used to such work," said Dr. Lewis, looking at his own and Mordaunt's ensanguined hands, after they had laid their patient on a bed in the adjoining room, and administered the customary restoratives.

Mordaunt turned deadly pale. He remembered his father, and the evidence that stained a spotless life.

"He cannot live," said Dr. Lewis. "And why should we wish him to live, only to expend the wonderful muscular strength which God has given him, in scenes of violence and strife?"

At length the man opened his eyes, and, rolling them round the apartment, they rested on the figures that were seated by the bed-side with wonder and terror. He looked upon their grave countenances, and had they been agents of vengeance instead of ministers of mercy, he could not have expressed more wildness of horror in his dim and glassy glance. Mordaunt stood nearest him, his arms folded across his breast, and a dark shade resting upon the sunlight of his eyes. The restless glance of the patient became fixed on his face, and it suddenly flashed, as it from an inward blaze. A hoarse shriek burst from his lips.

"Who are you?" he cried. "How came you here? I'm not dead yet! I'll not be tormented before my time! Away, I say! How came that blood on your hands? You didn't do it! Hah!"

"Come this side, Mordaunt," said Dr. Lewis, in a low voice. "He seems delirious, and there is something about you that agitates him. I want him to be very quiet."

"Mordaunt—Mordaunt!" groaned the man; "who told you his name?"

Then, pausing, he added, in a whisper:

"Fool! he died upon the scaffold!"

Mordaunt grasped the doctor's arm with spasmodic force. The blood rushed in torrents to his brain, to make room for the wild hope that leaped into his heart.

"Be quiet," said the doctor, laying his hand on Mordaunt's shoulder, and fixing upon him his commanding eyes. "Be quiet! He may die without confessing!"

The last words were audible only to the ear of Mordaunt; but, low as they were, they rang through him like a trumpet's blast. He remained silent, while every fibre of his frame quivered with suppressed emotion.

Dr. Lewis bent over the wounded man, and addressed him calmly and deliberately.

"You have but a few hours to live, at the utmost. You are going into the presence of God—guilty, trembling soul! Your only hope of mercy is in making a full confession of the crimes you have committed. You cannot conceal them! I know them! God knows them!"

The dying man uttered the most horrible groans; while, as if under the influence of fascination, he kept his lurid, sunken eye fixed upon the pale and agitated face of Mordaunt.

"I can't die!" he murmured: "I haven't time to repent. He had. Everybody that dies upon the scaffold goes to heaven—don't they? A few hours—how many? Tell me?"

"You cannot live more than three—perhaps not one!" replied the doctor, with imperturbable composure. "Waste not your breath in idle curses. There was pardon for the dying thief—there may be for you! You cannot bring back the dead: you may justify their memory. For your crimes this young man's father perished on the scaffold. Confess it—for, as sure as you die without clearing the innocent, your departing spirit will weave itself a winding-sheet of flames!"

"I will confess!" he gasped; "but, God of mercy! it is too late—too late!"

The doctor moistened the parched lips of the patient; then, having forced him to swallow a reviving mixture, he drew from his pocket paper and pencil, and seated himself, with the gravity of a magistrate, by the side of the bed. It was not without many interruptions, incoherent ejaculations, groans of despair, and cries for mercy, that the wretched being, who called himself Leftridge, related what we will endeavour to condense in fewer words.

More than sixteen years previous, Leftridge and Mordaunt (the father of the young physician) met, as travellers, in a crowded inn. There was another stranger there, who boasted of the immense quantity of gold in his possession. He looked upon the red wine-cup, and prudence evaporated with its fumes. Leftridge and Mordaunt shared the same room—the same bed. The stranger, with his boasted gold, occupied the next apartment.

Leftridge could not sleep—a demon was at work in his heart—his temptation. He stole from the side of his sleeping companion, on whose placid face the moonbeams were shining. (Strange that man can meditate deeds of guilt in such a holy light!) Mordaunt's dagger, his travelling weapon of defence, lay gleaming on the table, conspicuous for its gilded sheath. Leftridge drew forth the blade, and touched the edge with his cold fingers. The steel seemed to burn into his flesh, chill as it was. A linen handkerchief lay by its side, bearing initials not his own. He seized it, also, and stole with stealthy steps into the adjoining room. So sure was the blow, that but one groan broke on the silence of the night, and that groan echoed not beyond the walls of the death-chamber!

The murderer filled his pockets with gold, and fled. Mordaunt was arrested as the criminal: his own knife, found in the gaping wound; his own handkerchief, bathed in blood; some of the gold, discovered in his pocket—were circumstantial evidences which no counter-testimony outweighed. The absence of Leftridge, who was supposed to have left at early dawn, as travellers often did, excited but little remark. Mordaunt was a stranger. So great was the public indignation, it came near setting at defiance the majesty of the law, and condemning him without judge or jury.

Leftridge wandered from place to place, far from the scene of the two-fold tragedy, spending his ill-gotten gold, and trying to drown in intemperance the unquenchable fires of remorse. Providence had brought him, at his last hour, face to face with the son of his victim; thus proving its own retributive justice.

Mordaunt listened to this vindication of his father's memory in breathless emotion, but no vindictive feelings swelled his bosom. That miserable being! could he look upon him with any emotions save of the deepest compassion? His father had died, sustained by faith and animated by Christian hope. His memory, though stamped with public ignominy, was embalmed with the tears of widowed and filial love. His misfortunes had canonised him. But Leftridge: alas, for the poor wretch! what was left for him but a fearful looking forward to future judgment, and a name steeped in infamy?

Exhausted by the efforts he had made, he lay panting, gasping, a cold and clammy moisture oozing from his cadaverous skin. And so he died.

Dr. Lewis took immediate measures to publish to the world the circumstances which removed the shadow that envy and malice had rolled over Mordaunt's name. They became the topic of the day, and the young physician was exalted into a hero—the hero-son of a martyr-sire. That very night he wrote to his mother; the next, he sought the dwelling of Constance.

"My father's memory is justified," said he, addressing Mr. Goldman; and, notwithstanding the respect he wished to manifest to the uncle of Constance, his manner was cold and haughty; "is the social ban removed from his son?"

"I regret exceedingly, Dr. Mordaunt," answered Mr. Goldman, in much embarrassment, "that circumstances have compelled me to put an unnatural restraint upon my feelings. For myself, I could rise above the prejudices of the world; but, as the guardian of a young lady of rank and fortune, I have been compelled to be circum-spect. We live in a cold and censorious world."

"I am fully aware of that truth, sir," answered Mordaunt, with a slight dash of bitterness in his tone; but the entrance of Constance—now the Morning Star of his destiny—dispersed the lingering clouds of haughtiness from his brow, and he remembered nothing but that her faith and trust had been the same.

Through joy and through sorrow, through glory and shame.

And once again Mordaunt sat with Constance in the "Faith's Grotto." The fountain threw up its silvery spray into the moonlight, falling with the same lulling music in the marble reservoir. The beautiful daughter of Danaus still held her empty vase beneath the waters, the lovely Bacchante caught the same resplendent crown upon her leafy brow, and the graceful Flora twined her fadeless garlands in the shade.

Constance, fair and pure as these marble graces reposing in the moonlight, and ten thousand times as lovely, sat beside her husband, her eyes raised to the night-arch bending radiantly above them.

"Do you see that solitary star?" said Mordaunt, taking her hand in his, and raising it towards one whose rays were almost lost in the full glory of the moon. "The first night I ever met you, I fixed my gaze upon that planet, and thoughts holy and inspiring rushed into my soul. The dream of poverty, the fear of shame, melted away in its divine effulgence. I saw you in the cottage. From that moment you became the Evening Star of my destiny, shining on with steadily increasing brightness unto the perfect day."

FACETIÆ.

YOUNG ladies are like jellies—as they are moulded, so they will turn out.

CHARACTERISTICS OF A SLOVEN.—His coat collar always shone—but his boots never.

THE first expense is the least in everything, with the exception of law and matrimony.

A loquacious tailor asked a Quaker in what fashion he would be measured. "In silence," was the solemn reply.

In whatever shape evil comes, we are apt to exclaim, with Hamlet, "Take any shape but that."

MODESTY is a handsome dish-cover, that makes us fancy there must be something very good underneath it.

A NEW SIGN OF INEBRIETY.—A man trying to put his night-cap on with his boot-hooks.

LOGIC.—Cicero said that nobody dances while sober. If Cicero was right, every dance is a reel.

WHY is a spendthrift's purse like a thunder-cloud? Because it keeps continually lightning.

A DINNER IN CHINA.—Two cups of strong tea and a Mandarin servant with small feet.

"JACK SHAW," Mayor of Liverpool in the olden time, once told a Jew witness he would throw an inkstand at his head if he did not tell him his Christian name.

WHEN the Princess Helena was born, it was told the Princess Royal that she had a young sister. "Oh, that is delightful!" cried the little innocent royalist; "Do let me go and tell mamma!"

The following advertisement appeared in an Irish paper: "Whereas John Hall has fraudulently taken away several articles of wearing apparel without my knowledge: this is therefore to inform him that if he does not forthwith return the same, his name shall be made public."

THE Chinese do everything different from other people. We have a "jack" for pulling the boot from the foot; the "Flowery Land" people, on the contrary, have an instrument for pulling the man from the boot.

A friend of ours wrote us that he has taken to the stage, and plays the "heavy business." He digs the grave in Hamlet.

A SUBSTITUTE FOR WILD DUCK.—A black-legged chicken stuffed with mackerel.

A LEADER OF FASHION.—The lady who sets the time for the proper introduction of mantillas and perfumery. To preserve this position requires the nicest care and attention. Horace Walpole makes mention of "a leader" who once fell from her high estate because she tolerated pomatum an hour longer than she should have done.

A lawyer was once pleading a case that brought tears into the jurors' eyes, and every one gave up the case as gone for the plaintiff. But the opposing counsel arose and said: "May it please the court—I do not propose in this case to bore for water, but —" Here the tears were suddenly dried, laughter ensued, the ridiculousness of the case was exposed, and the defendant got clear.

MR. B—, a well-known metropolitan printer, once told us that on one occasion an old woman from the country came into his printing office, with an old Bible in her hand. "I want," said she, "that you should print it over ag'in. It's gettin' a little blurred, sort of, and my eyes isn't wot they wos. How much do you ax?" "Fifty cents." "Can you have it done in half an hour?"—wish you would; want to be gettin' home: live good ways out o' town." "Certainly." When the old lady went out, he sent round to the American Bible Society, and purchased a copy for fifty cents. "Lor' sakes a-massy!" exclaimed the old lady, when she came to look at it, "how good you've 'fixed' it!—it's e'en a'most as good as new! I never see nothin' so curious as what printin' is!"

A military officer, one day, while reviewing his company, happened to be thrown from his horse—and, as he lay sprawling on the ground, said to a friend, who ran to his assistance: "I thought I had improved in horsemanship, but I find I have fallen off!"

WOMEN'S RIGHTS IN PARAGUAY.—In a series of "Sketches of Paraguay," written by Geo. S. Raymond, we find the following attractive description of female habits: "Everybody smokes in Paraguay, and nearly every female above thirteen years of age chews. I am wrong. They do not chew, but put tobacco in their mouths, keep it there constantly, except when eating, and, instead of chewing, roll it about with the tongue, and suck it. Only imagine yourself about to salute the rich, red lips of a magnificent little Hebe, arrayed in satin, and flashing with diamonds: she puts you back with one delicate hand, while with the fair, taper fingers of the other she draws forth from her mouth a brownish-black roll of tobacco, quite two inches long, looking like a monstrous grub, and, depositing the savoury lozenge on the rim of your sombrero, puts up her face and is ready for your salute. I have sometimes seen an over-delicate foreigner turn away with a shudder of loathing under such circumstances, and get the epithet of el salvaje (the savage) applied to him by the offended beauty, for his sensitive squeamishness. However, one soon gets used to these things in Paraguay, where you are, per force of custom, obliged to kiss every lady you are introduced to; and one half you meet are really tempting enough to render you reckless of consequences, and you would sip the dew of the perfumed lip in the face of a tobacco battery, even were it the double-distilled 'honey-dew' of Old Virginia."

DISCRETION THE BETTER PART OF VALOUR.—We read in a Paris journal: "There is much talk of a dispute which took place a short time since in a café of the Boulevards, between an elderly gentleman and a young lion with large moustaches. It ended in a challenge, which has happily caused no death, and of which the poor of the quarter will reap the benefit. The parties arrived on the ground, and the seconds measured the distance, and loaded the pistols. During these preparations the young man strutted about, humming a tune and twisting his moustaches. The elderly gentleman said nothing until the preparations were completed, when he talked of explanations. At this word, the young man thought himself six inches taller, and said he would listen to no propositions. His adversary then cocked his pistol, and, seeing a bird flying by rapidly, said, 'Look!' then fired at the bird, which fell dead. The lion turned pale, and his adversary said: 'I am the person insulted; you have had a proof of my skill, and you will now receive my fire, or take to-day 1000 francs to the Bureau de Bien-faisance of the second arrondissement. Decide; but reflect that the larger the bird is, the more certain am I of hitting, and you are much larger than the bird I have just shot.' The proposition was accepted, and we are assured that the money has been paid."

SUNDAY VERSUS MONDAY.

The Whip and Spur thus concisely sets forth the relative merits of the daily and weekly press, in a moral point of view. The whole argument is wittily set forth in a few sentences:

SUNDAY PAPERS.

Are the types set up for a Sunday paper on that day? No!

Do the editors concoct and write their leaders on that day? No!

Are the clerks and packers, pasters, &c., engaged on that day? No!

Is the steam-press in operation on that day? No!

Can the editor add his workmen go to church on that day? Yes!

Is the devil busy on that day in a Sunday paper office? No!

MONDAY PAPERS.

Are the types set up on Sunday for a Monday paper? Yes!

Do the editors, and persons employed, work on Sunday? Yes!

Are the porters, folders, packers, &c., engaged on Sunday? Yes!

Is the steam-press in operation on that day? Yes!

Can the editor, his workmen and apprentices, attend church on Sunday? No!

Is the devil busy in such offices on Sunday? Yes!

Is not this a great country? Yes!

"FRENCH WITHOUT A MASTER."—A simple-minded correspondent asks us who is the author of the above work. He thinks the title a misnomer, as undoubtedly the French have found a master at last.—Diogenes.

THE REAL SUFFERERS FROM RECENT LEGISLATION.—However beneficial Free Trade may be to the country, the fair sex complain that they cannot do without "Protection."—Ibid.

CHICORY AND TRICKERY.—There is an old story of a man who, on ordering currant pie at a cook-shop, requested that the pastry might be placed on one plate, and the flies on another. Our grocers seem to have borrowed a hint from this original, for, since the prohibition of coffee adulteration, they sell their chicory in separate packets, with desperate oncomiums upon its delightful flavour and valuable properties. Having gone so far, we think they ought to apply the same principle to other articles. "A pound of genuine tea and a birch broom for 6s." would afford the purchaser the opportunity of either using the domestic implement in its complete state, or of cutting it into his evening beverage at his discretion; while a pint of sand and a pound of sugar for 6d. would be a decided improvement upon the present system of mixing both together and selling at an increased price. Other trades might then take a lesson from the grocers, and we might at length hear our street piemen hawling out: "Here you are! A lump of pastry and a kitten for a penny!"—Ibid.

SWEETS VERSUS GESE.—When the agitation was first started against climbing-boys going up the chimneys, some wiseacre proposed that a goose should be pulled down the chimney, by a string tied to its legs, that its fluttering might have the desired effect of bringing down the soot. The betting-office fraternity have acted on the hint; for, instead of the "sweeps doing the work of paying on a race, the rule is to make the geese who fall into them come down with the dust."—Ibid.

VARIETY IS CHARMING.—A theatre, the other day, advertised the "Last Week of 'Gold.'" That meant, we suppose, that they intended to give the public change.—Punch.

NEWTON AT SEA.—The French have in their navy a steam sloop of war named Le Newton. The French certainly beat us in their acknowledgment of the claims of art, literature, and science. We have no Newton in our navy. As soon would the Lords of the Admiralty christen a ship after the astronomer, as after the astronomer's apple that aroused him to ponder gravitation. Yes, when we have Newton as a seventy-four, then may apples swim; then, and not till then, may we have The Golden Pippin gun-brig.—Ibid.

ANYTHING BUT A BILLOT-DOUX.—We have just read M. Billot's Lettres Françaises, in which he proves clearly that it is as much the duty as the desire of France to "walk into" England, first in the literal, and afterwards in the figurative sense of the word. Our hair stands on end, and our hand trembles as we lay down the explosive volume! A sulphurous odour exhales from its pages, which must have been manufactured of "gun cotton." "Every bullet has its billet," says the olden proverb. If the converse hold true, and "Every Billet has his bullet," what a bombardment France will give us! As it is, luckily, the pellets are of paper instead of lead, though from their heaviness this might not be suspected.—Ibid.

THE FORCE OF HABIT.—A business man of our acquaintance is so scrupulously exact in all his doings, that whenever he pays a visit he always will insist upon taking a receipt.—Ibid.

LOVE IN THE MOON.—We see a little work advertised, called "Love in the Moon." We cannot speak of its contents, for we have not yet looked into it; but we confess we think the title is a decidedly well-chosen one. Love in the moon seems to us quite in its proper sphere, seeing what decided lunatics it makes of all who come within its influence.—Ibid.

THE LARGEST COAL-SACK IN THE WORLD.—The penny a ton sacked by the City corporation upon all coals within twenty miles round London!—Ibid.

PROGRESS OF POULTRY.—Should poultry breeders continue increasing the size of their stock at the present rate, the housekeeper will have occasionally to choose between a leg of fowl and a leg of mutton; we shall have chicken outlets and capon steaks; and, as to the merrythought, it will become so heavy as to be no joke.—Ibid.

REASONABLE ENOUGH.—The Rev. Mr. Stowell announces that he will engage no curate who is guilty of the unpardonable crime of smoking a cigar. The reverend gentleman fairly says, that he does all his own puffing; and that if the curate wants a narcotic, he has only to read one of his rector's sermons. This seems all right enough.—Ibid.

THE DEAR LITTLE CHERUBS.—A lady who writes to us under the signature of "Materfamilias," declares that the Box-keepers at all the English Theatres must be "dear little Cherubs" in their way, for ask them when you will they "never have a seat."—Ibid.

THE PRESS AND THE EMPRESS.—Several of our contemporaries appear to question the felicity of the Emperor's marriage. For ourselves, however, we confess we cannot regard them otherwise than as quite a Nappy couple.—Ibid.

PRIZE (FIGHTING) JOKE.—A distinguished Pugilist hearing that there had been some fighting at Milan, said he didn't see how there could be millin' without.—Ibid.

HINT TO MISCHIEF-MAKERS.—Every medal has its reverse—and every meddler deserves to meet with one.—Ibid.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

If I study, it is for no other science than what treats of the knowledge of myself, and instructs me how to live and die well.

ALONZO of Arragon was wont to say of himself, "That he was a great necromancer, for that he used to ask counsel of the dead!"—meaning books.

We anticipate, in the seedling oak and the pine, the future ornaments of the wood; and estimate the germ of any plant, not by the seed-leaf alone, but by the form it is destined to gain in the maturity of its species.

"HOBBS attributed his superiority to the moderation of his reading, affirming, that if he had read as much as the philosophers, he should have been as ignorant. The fact is, he read less than he meditated. This, the great secret of all vigorous creative thought, is a prime requisite in constructing the durable monuments of genius."—William Benton Chulow.

BRIGHT HOURS AND GLOOMY.—Ah! this beautiful world. Indeed, I know not what to think of it. Sometimes it is all gladness and sunshine, and heaven itself lies not far off. And then it changes suddenly, and is dark and sorrowful, and the clouds shut out the sky. In the lives of the saddest of us there are bright days like this, when we feel as if we could take the great world in our arms. Then come the gloomy hours, when the fire will neither burn in our hearts nor in our hearths; and all without and within is dismal, cold, and dark. Believe me every heart has its secret sorrows, which the world knows not; and oftentimes we call a man cold when he is only sad.—Richter.

HAVE A PLAN LAID BEFOREHAND FOR EVERY DAY.—"These plans ought to be maturely formed the evening previous, and, on rising in the morning, again looked at, and immediately entered upon. It is astonishing how much more we accomplish in a single day (and of what else is life made up?) by having the plan previously marked out. It is so in everything. This morning a man was digging a path through a deep snow bank. It was almost insupportably cold, and he seemed to make but little headway, though he worked as if upon a wager. At length, getting out of breath, he paused, and marked out the width of the path with his shovel, then marked out the width of each shovelfull, and consequently the amount of snow at each throw of the shovel; in fifteen minutes he had done more, and it was done neater and easier, than in thirty minutes previous when working without a plan. It is of little consequence by what we illustrate, if we make a thing clear, and impress it upon the mind. I have found, in my own experience, as much difference in the labours of two days, when working with, or without a plan, as at least one half, without the satisfaction, in the latter case, of knowing what I have done. Experience will tell any man, that he is most successful in his own pursuit, when he is most careful as to method. A man of my acquaintance has a small slate which hangs at his study-table. On that he generally finds, in the morning, his work for the day written down; and in the evening he reviews it, sees if he has omitted anything, and if so, chides himself that all is not done.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE COAST DEFENCES.—Magazines are ordered to be constructed on the Gosport lines, as also on the Hilsa lines; and a strong gateway is forming on the latter, on one of the old sites. Some earthworks will be speedily thrown up at Gomerpond, Browdown, preparatory to the erection of a permanent fort. The martello towers on the Sussex coast are to receive an armament forthwith.

THE WELLINGTON FUNERAL CAR.—We understand Viscount Combermere, as Constable of the Tower, has received her Majesty's commands to prepare a suitable place for the reception of the funeral car upon which the remains of the late lamented Duke of Wellington were conveyed to their last resting-place. It is intended that the car shall be exhibited to the public without any unnecessary restriction.

ONE Sunday, having attended Divine Service at a country church, Handel asked the organist to allow him to play the people out; and, sitting down to the organ, began to play in such a masterly manner, that he instantly attracted the attention of the whole congregation, who, instead of vacating their seats, remained for a considerable period in silent admiration. The organist began to be impatient—perhaps his wife was waiting dinner—and at length told the performer that he was convinced that he could not play the people out; and, Handel having resigned the seat, a few strains in the accustomed manner operated like the reading of the Riot Act.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITIONS.—The Admiralty have decided on sending the Phoenix, screw-steamer, with the Lady Franklin, tender store-ship, to Beechy Island, this summer, with a supply of provisions and stores for Sir E. Belcher's squadron. The command will be entrusted to Commander Inglefield: who after having communicated with the North Star, at Beechy Island, will, it is understood, have discretionary power to proceed to the head of Baffin's Bay, in the view of following up the discoveries which he made last autumn. Should Smith's Sound at the head of the bay turn out to be closed, Jones's Sound will then be examined. Lady Franklin contemplates offering the Prince Albert to the Admiralty as an additional store-ship.

WHAT THE LADIES OWE TO TEA.—That ladies owe to tea much of their present high social position in England, very little reflection will show. How was it with them some century and a half since, when the squire, shortly after their departure from table, locked the door, and pushed the bottle round until his guests had not only their baser, but their entire members under his mahogany? There is no possibility of long and strong bibing now. Like tobacco to the Ottomans, tea has beneficially weaned us from those heavy potations in which our forefathers glorified, and by which we, their sons, after the sentence of the old curse, are stingingly twitched in the extremities at warning intervals. Nothing has ever wrought such marvellous social transformations. It is no exaggeration to assert that the existence of society in its present form would not be possible without it in this country. On the continent, where light, cheap, and harmless wines are to be had, the want that tea supplies is not felt; nor have foreigners the art of making tea. French tea tastes like a chemical dilution that has passed through the hands of the perfumer; and to be condemned to drink German tea, would be a torture our gossips would never forget.

CHEAP MUSIC AND CHEAP LITERATURE, CAUSES OF THE DECLINE OF THE THEATRE.—In a notice of a late number of the "Westminster Review," in the Scotsman, we find the following remarks on the decline of the theatre: "We have a searching and extremely readable statement of the present condition of the English stage. The writer is minutely conversant with the theatrical history of England for something like a generation; yet, though he knows his subject closely and personally, he does not take the narrow and party views of it common with members of the craft, and generally, also, with those who are known and knowing about the 'slips' and the green-room. In his estimate, however, of the causes of the comparative decline of the theatre from being the place of frequent and general resort that it was some two or three generations ago, he scarcely, we think, gives sufficient prominence to that which is unquestionably the most powerfully and widely operative—namely, the great increase of the other intellectual amusements open to the people at large. Of these the two chief are cheap music, and cheap literature. When admission to a respectable concert of any kind was invariably—as it was scarcely a dozen years ago in Edinburgh, a town never very far behind hand in such matters—at the rate of five shillings per head, the theatre boxes competed with, and the pit underbid, the seats in the concert-room. But concerts, thanks to Musard, Jullien, and other musical reformers, have immensely improved, multiplied, and cheapened; and the popular taste for music—one of the purest and most delightful and elevating of human enjoyments—has increased, and is increasing. Still the competition of the concert with the theatre is as nothing compared with the competition of the fire-side book-shelf. The public appetite for literary amusement in all its shapes is insatiable, and publishers being at length fully aware of the fact, are indefatigable in their efforts to supply abundantly literary food for every taste."

THE ART OF ARRANGING THE HAIR.—How often do we see a really good face made quite ugly by a total inattention to lines. Sometimes the hair is so pushed into the cheeks, and squared at the forehead, as to give a most extraordinary, pinched shape to the face. Let the oval, where it exists, be always preserved; where it does not, let the hair be so humoured, that the deficiency shall not be perceived. Nothing is more common than to see a face which is somewhat too large below, made to look grossly large and coarse by contracting the hair on the forehead and cheeks, and there bringing it to an abrupt check; whereas, such a face should enlarge the forehead and the cheek, and let the hair fall partially over, so as to shade and soften the lower exuberance. A good treatise, with examples in outline of the defects, would be of some value upon a lady's toilet, who would wish to preserve her great privilege—the supremacy of beauty. Some press the hair down close to the face, which is to lose the very characteristics of hair—ease and freedom. Let her locks, said Anacreon, lie as they like; the Greek gives them life and a will. Some ladies wear the hair like blinkers; you will always suspect they will shy if you approach them. A lady's head-dress, whether in a portrait or for her daily wear, should, as in old portraits by Rembrandt and Titian, go off into shade, not to be seen too clearly, and hard all round; should not, in fact, be isolated, as if out of sympathy with all surrounding nature. The wigs of men of Charles II.'s time had at least that one merit of floating into the back-ground, and in their fall softening the sharpness of the lines of their dress.

THE TYRANTS OF THE HOUSEHOLD.—And so it is, and for his rule over his family, and for his conduct to wife and children—subjects over whom his power is monarchical—any one who watches the world must think with trembling sometimes at the account which many a man will have to render. For in our society there's no law to control the King of the Fireside. He is master of property, happiness—life itself. He is free to punish, make happy or unhappy, to ruin or to torture. He may kill a wife gradually, and be no more questioned than the Grand Seigneur who drowns a slave at midnight. He may make slaves and hypocrites of his children, or friends and freemen; or drive them into revolt and enmity against the natural law of love. I have heard politicians and coffee-house wiseacres talking over the newspaper, and railing at the tyranny of the French King, and the Emperor, and wondered how these—who are monarchs, too, in their way—govern their dominions at home, where each man rules absolute? When the annals of each little reign are shown to the Supreme Master, under whom we hold sovereignty, histories will be laid bare of household tyrants as cruel as Amurath, and as savage as Nero, and as reckless and dissolute as Charles.—Esmond.

A WORD TO YOUNG MEN.—"Wishing and sighing, imagining and dreaming of greatness," said William Wirt, "will not make you great." But cannot a young man command his energies? Read Foster on "Decision of Character." That book will tell you what it is in your power to accomplish; you must gird up your loins, and go to work with all the indomitable energy of Hannibal scaling the Alps. It is your duty to make the most of time, talents, and opportunities. Alfred, King of England, though he performed more business than any one of his subjects, found time to study. Frederick the Great, with an empire at his direction, in the midst of war, and on the eve of battle, found time to revel in the charms of philosophy, and feast on the luxuries of science. Napoleon, with Europe at his disposal, with kings in his antechamber, and at the head of thousands of men, whose destinies were suspended on his arbitrary pleasure, found time to converse with books. And young men who are confined to business, even for twelve hours a day, may take an hour and a half of what is left for study, and which will amount to many months in the course of a year.

THE AGAPEMONE.

It would seem that matters are not proceeding very smoothly at this notorious establishment, near Bridgewater, and it is not improbable that some of its mysteries may shortly be exposed. An affair has recently occurred which has caused much gossip in the neighbourhood. It appears that about five years ago Mr. James Rouse, an attorney, became an inmate, with his wife, of the "Abode of Love," conforming, of course, to one of its paramount conditions, by conveying all his property in favour of that institution. Weary, at last, of the usage he experienced, and disgusted with the conduct of those around him, he contemplated his escape; but, aware of such intention, he was vigilantly kept in surveillance, and no opportunity of effecting his object presented itself until Saturday, the 16th of January, when he managed to make his way over the walls of the building, and, leaving his wife therein, he succeeded in reaching the house of his brother, a respectable farmer of North Curry. The retention of Mrs. Rouse soon attracted the attention of the family, and her rescue was undertaken by Mr. Rouse's brother. Accordingly, with a companion, he left North Curry in a carriage, and they were proceeding towards Charlton, when, at a four-cross way on the road, they encountered one of the vehicles belonging to the Agapemone, driven by a servant on the box, and Mrs. Rouse in the rumble, who was delighted at the prospect of her release from captivity. A few words sufficed to announce Mr. Rouse's intention, but it was vehemently resisted by the Agapemone charioteer, who resolutely refused to admit of her leaving the carriage. Mr. Rouse, however, was not to be deterred, and, brandishing a stout oaken cudgel, contested the matter too strenuously to render his victory doubtful. The struggle, however, continued for some time, and it was not until she was dragged out from the hind part of the carriage, that Mr. Rouse ultimately succeeded in placing her in his own vehicle, in which he rapidly drove off.

TO OUR READERS.

PERMANENT ENLARGEMENT OF THE "LONDON JOURNAL."

THE PROPRIETOR OF THE LONDON JOURNAL, anxious to convey to his numerous subscribers and readers the expression of his gratitude for the unprecedented patronage he has received, begs leave to offer it in the form which he believes will prove most acceptable to them—namely, the Permanent Enlargement of the work to ONE-FOURTH more than its original size.

The LONDON JOURNAL is not only the cheapest and largest, but by far the most extensively circulated of the serials devoted to the amusement and instruction of the people. It is the welcome guest alike of the drawing-room and the cottage. Fathers place it with confidence in the hands of their children—assured that not a line which can sully the purity of the youthful mind will be found to disgrace its pages.

In conclusion, the Proprietor begs leave to assure his patrons, that, whilst every exertion will be made to advance with the spirit of the times, in the progress of science, literature, and art, the same moral tone which has hitherto prevailed will be strictly preserved. No expense or effort will be spared to maintain the Journal in its present honourable position, as the head of not only the serial publications of England, but of the world.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TRUTH.—Your acquaintance has deceived you. The article came from a very different source.

A. M. K.—A deed of apprenticeship to which the boy's father is not a consenting party, is void.

VENA CRUZ.—The date of a legal instrument is only material as being evidence of the time and the fact of its execution. A deed of apprenticeship dated on a Sunday, would not be invalidated on that account.

C. C.—Special marriage licences may be obtained from Doctors' Commons, or from a bishop or archbishop. The latter authorises marriages anywhere in the primacy; the former anywhere within the diocese. A special licence, obtained through a surrogate, obviates the necessity for a preliminary residence of fifteen days in a place where the marriage is intended to be solemnised.

GEORGE R.—It is easy work enough to string together lists of names and call them lists of heirs-at-law, but it is quite another matter to prove their identity. Lists of unclaimed dividends are kept in the Bank of England, and may be searched without a fee.

LOREAN.—In this country a man may dispose of his property by will just as he pleases, and we should be sorry to see the law altered, for as it stands at present, it holds out incentives to industry, keeps a check on viciously-disposed children, and contributes largely to the maintenance of that beautiful freedom of action which is so characteristic of England.

PAUL LÉDOR, a Frenchman settled in North Wales, says, that what he daily reads and hears about his native country, and the probability of a war between it and England, makes him very uneasy. Therefore he asks whether naturalisation in England is easy and inexpensive, and in case of his not being admitted a citizen, in the event of a war, what would be his fate? Nothing very dreadful, for the English government, in war time, was proverbial for its hospitality to strangers. But, under the Alien Act generally passed in war time, all aliens suspected of mal-practices may be arrested or sent out of the country. Complete naturalisation can only be obtained through an Act of Parliament, which would cost about £400.

J. L. W.—1. Farrington's edition of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is a faithful copy of the original work. 2. The best life of the Duke of Wellington has not yet been published. His "Despatches," edited by Colonel Gurwood, afford the best ideas of what that illustrious man really was. 3. Lady Hamilton was the mother of Nelson's daughter. 4. It is not advantageous for ship-owners to register their ships at a greater tonnage than they really are, for in that case they would have to carry a greater number of guns than was actually required. The register is generally correct, but in the advertisements of the qualities, capacities, and sizes of merchant vessels and steamers there is much exaggeration. Puffing is not confined to tradesmen. We have known an American liner rated at 1800 and 2000 tons burthen, when it really was only half the size. The shippers of New York and Liverpool are adepts in "drawing the long bow."

MR. AGO.—What is termed the Sinking Fund was established by Pitt, for the gradual liquidation of the national debt. It is a slow process, and not a very just appropriation of the national revenue. If you desire to make a provision for your children after your death, why not insure your life in some respectable office. It is the safest, cheapest, and in every certain mode of accumulation during life, for a pious purpose, that we are acquainted with.

J. DUNCAN.—The origin of the custom of sending love epistles on St. Valentine's Day, has not been ascertained; but it is supposed that in the early ages of Christianity lovers selected him to be the patron saint of their vows, because he was "a man of admirable parts, and famous for his love and charity." St. Valentine suffered martyrdom in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, on the 14th of February, and that circumstance, coupled with some incident in his early life, very likely originated the custom which has now, we repeat to say, so fallen off from its ancient sincerity, that it is more honoured in the breach than the observance.

ALABASTER.—In murder, to escape the imputation of malice, the prisoner must prove the provocation, the accident, or any other circumstance which goes to preclude the malice—otherwise it is argued from the fact itself. No provocation of words, however opprobrious, will mitigate the motive for a mortal blow, or one intended to produce death, where there is an intent to kill. If there is a sufficient provocation, it is manslaughter; but words are not a sufficient provocation. Malice is implied from any deliberate, cruel act against another, however sudden. When there is a blow of a deadly weapon, with intent to do some great bodily harm, and death ensues, malice is presumed. That is the law—but the crown, of late years, has admitted extenuating circumstances, and capital punishments have been frequently commuted on very slight grounds. The French are superior to us in jurisprudence—for among them the jury determine whether there are any extenuating circumstances in capital cases. In England it is left to the Home Secretary for the time being—and thus everything depending on the temper of one man, there is no consistency, and consequently the worst criminals escape the gallows, while less guilty ones are sentenced to a painful execution.

AGUSTUS.—The affairs of the world are not much influenced by the dreams of poets or the theories of philosophers; for, partaking largely of the nature of the chameleon, they receive their colour from surrounding objects, but do not bestow any. The gold discoveries in California and Australia will immediately exercise more influence on the destinies of the human race than has been done by all the poetry concocted from the days when Homer sang divinely, down to these, when jingling rhymists tattle abominably. And as to the philosophers, they only appear when demanded, and at the same time created, by a condition which has sprung from a succession of previous ones.

AMOR VERAX has been desperately in love with a young lady for three years past, but has hitherto always fancied that she hated and abhorred him. He, in return, has tried in vain to show her that he does not care about her, even sometimes feeling as though he could insult her. However, he is diffident, for whenever he meets her in company he cannot speak to her or pay her any attention, yet she is always the first in his thoughts. She has always treated him much in the same way, sometimes showing a disposition to be friendly, and at other times scarcely noticing him. In such a predicament, would it be advisable for him at once to make her an offer? Decidedly so. It is a clear case of mutual love. The old saying, that a man is never so ridiculous as when he is in love, seems to have been amply verified in this instance. Our correspondent has been courting a very stupid martyrdom, instead of paying his devoirs to a fine girl. Love requires a little common sense, for even a romance would be insipid without a few grains of it.

ADAM JACKSON.—We subjoin the total amount of the Census for Great Britain and Ireland in 1851, as contrasted with 1841.

GREAT BRITAIN.
	1841.	1851.	Rate per cent. of increase.
Males . . .	9,077,004	10,192,721	12
Females . . .	9,581,368	10,743,747	12
Total . . .	18,658,372	20,936,468	12

IRELAND.
	1841.	1851.	Rate per cent. of decrease.
Males . . .	4,019,576	3,176,727	20
Females . . .	4,155,548	3,339,067	20
Total . . .	8,175,124	6,515,794	20

As a contrast, we subjoin the Census of the United States of America for 1851 and 1841.

	1841.	1851.	Rate per cent. of increase.
Free population . . .	17,064,688	23,347,884	36.8
Slaves ditto . . .	2,468,138	3,178,055	29.4

J. HAMMOND.—There are various descriptions of love, just as there are varieties of other passions. One man will love for beauty, another for money, another for worth. The same with the other sex. Lydia will love Reginald because he is tall, with a good face and figure; Emma will love Oswald, although he is old and ugly, because he can keep her company; and Alice will love Robert, because, although he is pithy in the small-pox, there is something in his manner which harmonises with her own conception of manly worth. Still, all of them have some of the illuminating power of the grand passion, in its grand design and grand integrity. The really sordid lover is the exception—the base exception—for if he or she were not, the majority of marriages would be cruises, and the whole country one wide region of domestic strife, and thus domestic strife, of unheard calamities and sins. Now, as some of this kind occurs, it is only just to assume that whatever the total amount or character of the individual motives may be that prompts marriage, the institution refines and ennobles them into a peaceful and harmonious adaptation to the great end of society—general, undisturbed happiness.

STEPHANUS.—Your translation of "Margaret's Song," in "Faust," is in good taste, and embodies the spirit of the great original. As exercises in this grand dramatic poem are now very popular, we subjoin the two first of your renderings:

Ah! never shall I find the peace I've known;
My heart is heavy now, my peace for ever flown.
My head on sad things ponders,
My sense distracted wanders,
And changing thoughts of him my mind employ;
Where he is not, a gloom,
Dark as the close-shut tomb,
Embitters all the whole world hath of joy.
My heart is weary ever—ever!
Oh! heavy, weary heart! my peace returneth never.

Ne'er from the lattice look I, lest it be;
With many hopes that of his form might see;
Ne'er from the house stir I,
Unless he be to fly
To him, and hear his words, which, like strong charms,
Draw me to him—ah! bliss,
What rapture in his kiss,
Should he enfold me in his loving arms!
And yet my heart is weary ever,
Oh! heavy, weary heart! my peace returneth never.

CATHERINE SINCLAIR.—As you earnestly request the favour, we give insertion to your riddle: My 1 6 11 2 is a number; 2 6 7 8 9 is the same; 3 6 1 2 is an exhilarating beverage; 4 2 2 is an insect; 5 6 1 7 is a circle; 6 1 11 is a public-house; 7 6 1 7 2 5 is an Indian root; 8 2 5 10 6 1 2 is a female; 9 8 5 10 11 2 is a chair of state; 10 5 4 is a sphere; 11 10 5 9 8 is a point of the compass. My whole is the name of a fashionable watering-place.

M. H. about a year ago became acquainted with a very handsome girl, and of course fell in love with her. At first he was treated very well, and he thought he would succeed in winning her affections, but now he suspects he was only used as a foil, in order to make another young man more attentive. Nothing more likely, for it is an old trick with young girls who really have a penchant for young men. Our correspondent had better digest his spleen at leisure, and dismiss all his bilious thoughts. A quarrel would be ridiculous; besides, the stratagem was natural.

MATILDA.—A gentleman greatly admires a lady, whom he has known some time by sight, but never had an opportunity of obtaining an introduction to her, and fears the lady does not like him. On the other hand, just to show how a true affection may be created, the lady has heard of the gentleman's partiality for her, and also of his good qualities, but she only knows him by name, not personally, and there is no friend on either side to introduce the one to the other. In such a case how are the parties to act, so as to become acquainted. The gentleman in such a dilemma would be justified in giving his passion a little fair play. In love, the principal points of etiquette to be observed are all comprised under the terms modesty, frankness, honour, and courage. A lover is exempted from the restrictions of ordinary etiquette—they do not apply, or how would a considerable proportion of the marriages in this country be brought about? The gentleman, in this instance, must address the lady's friends without hesitation. Frankness and decision, coupled with a delicate tone and gentlemanly demeanour, are capable of any success in an honourable undertaking.

KATHLEEN.—Christianity, though not a religion of forms, is not a religion without forms. The reverential kneeling at prayers was formerly practised throughout the whole Church, and the exception made to it between Easter and Pentecost, in token of their joy at Christ's resurrection, is traced back even to apostolic times. The earlier councils—as, for instance, that of Nice—make particular mention of it; and so strongly do writers even of the second century reprehend the practice of sitting at prayer, as to condemn it as savouring of Paganism. The 18th Canon of the Church of England enjoins "Kneeling on the knees when the General Confession, Litany, and other prayers are read, and standing up at the saying of the Belief." Forms of some kind are essential, for if the ordinary occurrences of life demand them, surely the most sacred should have their particular and revered ones.

TELEMACHUS is the eldest son of a peer, he bears a title, is highly connected, and descended from a very old family. He is under thirty years of age, considered good-looking, and is domesticated in his habits. He wishes to marry a young lady under twenty-five years of age, of good education, polished manners, good-looking, and amiable in disposition. But she must possess at the least £200,000, as his own circumstances will not permit him to marry any lady with less. He is too high-minded to sacrifice himself for money, or he might have obtained a larger sum than this already. An intimate friend, who is anxious for his happiness, unknown to him, gives this as a hint, believing that wealth and a coronet, where the parties happen to suit each other in other respects, may prove mutually attractive. We wish poor Telemachus out of his difficulties, but we fancy the time has gone by when the broken fortunes of even a noble house can be repaired by a sordid marriage. The daughters of millionaires have not now such a dash of the parvenu in them as their predecessors had in less polished days. Half a century creates a wonderful change in public opinion.

ADELINE fancies that "X. Y. Z." would just suit her for a husband, and would like to hear more about him. She is rather tall, with dark hair and dark eyes, and is between eighteen and twenty years of age. She has no fortune at present, but expects a small income in a few months. She is generally considered amiable and thoroughly domesticated. She is of good family, being the daughter of a clergyman. As the fortune may be of consideration, it is as well to state that it will amount to £500 a year.

CLARA AND FANNY, two young friends, are desirous of forming an eligible acquaintance with two well-educated young gentlemen, with a view to a courtship that shall be approved of by their respective parents. They are of good family, wealthy parents, and both highly accomplished. Clara is rather tall and dark, with large black eyes and hair, regular features, and very small hands and feet. Fanny is petite, with laughing blue eyes and dazzling complexion.

SOPHIA would like to correspond with "Alfred Traversers." She is forty-four years of age, but rather juvenile-looking. She is accomplished, domesticated, and very lady-like in her appearance.

CHARLES, longing for something more congenial to his feelings than a bachelor's home, offers himself to "Adeline." Charles has lost his charms—his table wants a pretty head to it, and its owner a companion to sing to and be with him in his hours of relaxation. If, therefore, a young, professional man, whose prospects, if not golden, are at least bright enough to cheer his path—musical, and, he flatters himself, not usually in bad luck with the ladies with whom he has the pleasure of being acquainted—would be likely to suit her, he would be happy to hear more of her.

VALENTINE TO ROSEBUD.

It is not love I but it must be
Some witching and mysterious spell,
That leads my wandering thoughts to thee.
It is not love, I know full well!

It is a whisper in the air,
A voice of hope and joy for thee;
Revealing pleasures bright and fair,
In words of sweetest prophecy.

Friendship will twine her wreaths for thee,
And love shall weave a flowery chain.
Thy heart, though wounded, yet shall be
Replete with joy and life again!

A hopeful song I breathe for thee,
And yet I scarce can call it mine—
I do but echo: it must be
The song of old Saint Valentine

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Perplexed (You cannot have overlooked the reply.) J. F. G. (Pretty, but too lengthy)—Semper Idem (Lord "Derby," not "Darcy")—John Grant (The work was subsequently published in a separate form)—The Khan (The penny savings bank system was established all over the metropolis, but we fear it is now in a languishing and hopeless condition). Augustus (I referred to the Indexes to Vols. XV. and XVI.—Smith (Your Robin is ingenious, but we do not admire such pastimes)—Harry Bluff (Apply on board an emigrant ship)—J. B. (Purchase one of the numerous Treatises which have been published on the "Art of Brewing")—Aragus (The nearest rival rendezvous to Bristol)—G. H. Marilyn (By respectable publishers it is not customary to accept payment for the insertion of articles in the correspondence)—Ellen Trimm (Your name is a contraction of the word "prince," and consequently, of pure English origin).—(The publication of the stanza would be a slender one for the living).—A. F. (The government training-schools for teachers, have, we believe, been removed to Marlborough House)—George Martin ("Loose" and "Gloose" are anagrams, but "unloose," according to Dr. Johnson, means unaccomplished)—Traveler (The style in Robin's edition of "Humboldt" is not so diffused, but quite as faithful and vigorous as any specimen of that writer in our language).—V. H. (Purchase the "Guide to Gas Consumers")—Hugh Wilson (A deed of apprenticeship, to be legal, must be properly stamped before being executed).—Chet (We are sorry we cannot oblige you. We are inundated by flattery poetry).—Geo. Rogers (We should be glad to serve you by sending your invitation known—but until we are assured of its value, we could only admit your statement as an advertisement).—Cesar—J. C. Maria—J. S. A. B. C. Esculapian—Y. Z. J. H. B.—Eva—Hughland Mary—W. J. C. Tempus Fugit—Jacques—Annie Sophia—L. S. D.—M. N. J. M. Hendon—Robertus—L. E. O.—Rondolphus—Spero—W. Y. Z.—John Henry Lockwood—Young England—J. F. R.—George—Tom Rowland—Walter Raleigh—James Thompson—Alpine—Co mo—F. B. Heriot—G. A. G. P.—Con Amore—T. Measure—A. Z. D. Llewellyn—J. C. Burgess—H. G. B. L.—W. R.—Henry—An Actor—Emily Jane—Harriet P.—H. C. Richter—Flower—Lucas Taylor—Maxwell Hope—Vivian—J. L.—Blue Bell—William Rose—Japce de Vere—Frank Taylor—Walter Ashby—S. C. M.—Hcl ne—Ernam—W. Walters—R. T.—Kate—T. D. Sanderson—An Orphan—Clara Howard—Candidus—W. Brown—James—Mira—Louisa and Emily—A True Heart—A Cantab—W. O.—W. Johnson—Walter—Joseph Burtbury.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 424.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 9, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[THE SANCTUARY.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXX

Never is vice so hideous as when decked
In virtue's borrowed plumes—the virgin's blush
Upon the wanton's cheek: the words of truth
On falsehood's lips are less abhorrent. OLD PLAY.

ALTHOUGH still weak as an infant, thanks to the skill of Doctor Kisson and the untiring watchfulness of his friends, Walter Mowbray was slowly progressing towards convalescence—all immediate danger was passed: youth and a naturally good constitution had triumphed over the blow of the assassin.

The care of nursing him had been shared by Martingale, who, in order to divert all suspicion from himself, manifested an interest in the recovery of the invalid second only to that which Henry felt. In this the unprincipled man of the world had a double object in view: the first was to induce his intended victim to mingle in society, and so give occasion for the accomplishment of his design; the second, by being continually with him, to act as a spy upon his conduct, and discover the fitting moment for the next attempt, which he trusted would prove more successful than the last.

With all his cunning, however, he could not make out the cause of our hero's early departure from the Palazzo Borghese, the night of the attempted assassination, or where he had passed the intervening hours till his return to the hotel. At first he imagined he was engaged in some intrigue; closer observation induced him to dismiss the thought; for, if Henry appeared unhappy, it was only when he expected letters from England, and was disappointed by their non-arrival; or if some unfavourable symptom manifested itself in the progress of his friend.

Every morning a page in the livery of the beautiful Pauline came to the hotel to inquire after the health of the wounded Englishman. Henry invariably left the room to receive the boy, and answered his inquiries himself; and as invariably returned with a rose, similar to the one which the beautiful Therese had taken from her hair and left upon the pillow of her lover, on the occasion of her visit. We have already stated how the message was answered—by sending a flower in return.

A smile of mutual intelligence would pass between the two friends, as the bearer of the token placed it in the small vase which stood by the side of the bed, and sometimes a silent pressure of the hand. Martingale had frequently noticed this, and felt annoyed by their silence upon the subject; his curiosity was piqued: it was evident there was a confidence between them which he did not share in.

"They suspect me!" he thought.

He was in error. Delicately-organised natures conceal their love with the same jealous care with which the parent bird contrives to hide its nest. They deem it profaned, if vulgar eyes once gaze upon it: secrecy adds an additional charm to the tender passion.

"Still that same pale, scentless rose!" said the unprincipled agent of Meeran, as Henry Ashton entered the chamber of Walter Mowbray, which he had only quitted a few minutes previously, to receive the daily visitor; "I positively must steal an hour to go to the library of the Vatican, and study the Persian poet, Hafaz."

"And why Hafaz?" demanded our hero.

"Because he is learned in the language of flowers," was the reply.

Although the hint was delicately enough expressed, both the young men felt annoyed by the implied desire of being admitted to a confidence which, even between themselves, existed in sympathy rather than words.

"I will spare you the trouble," observed Henry, who was the first to break the silence, which was becoming embarrassing; "the whiteness of the rose implies purity; and the absence of perfume, which may be considered as the voice of the flower, silence, or discretion."

It was Martingale's turn to feel vexed; for it was impossible for him not to perceive the reproof thus allegorically conveyed.

"But come," continued the speaker; "enough of flowers; you see the excellent effect they produce upon our patient; how his eye brightens, and the colour returns to his pale cheek, when he receives them. The spell which works such wonders would lose its power, were the mystery explained. Even I," he added, only guess the means by which it acts."

And so the subject dropped: the false friend had sufficient tact not to renew his indiscretion.

During the morning, our hero received a note from Sir Thomas Lawrence, requesting to meet him the same evening at the palace of the Duchess of Devonshire.

"I fear, Walter," he said, "that I must leave you for a few hours to the care of our mutual friend: I have received an invitation, or rather a command, which I cannot disobey."

"For the morning?" inquired Walter.

"No, unfortunately for the evening."

This was the very opportunity which Martingale wished: he professed the utmost willingness to undertake the charge—and added, that he would only step to his hotel to arrange some correspondence, and then return.

"I fear I am a sad burthen on your patience and friendship?" gratefully replied the wounded youth.

Of course the arch-deceiver assured him of the contrary, and took his leave, promising to return an hour before the time Henry Ashton was to make his visit to the duchess.

There have been few visitors to the Eternal City who do not remember the Café Grecco—the rendezvous of the artists, idlers, and picturesque vagabonds of Europe—who treat the world like an oyster, which, instead of opening, as the poet hath it, with their swords, they delude into relaxing its shells by their wits. In the rooms, beards of every cut, colour, and proportion may be seen: from the oriental to the Henri Quatre, from the timidly cultivated, exotic-looking moustache of the Englishman, aping the foreigner, to the hirsute German student.

But it must not be supposed that all the habitués of this well-known place of resort are of the nondescript character we have described: artists and sculptors frequently visit it in search of types or models. In the author's rather frequent visits there, he has encountered his talented countryman, Gibson, whose studio, since the death of Canova, has become one of the most celebrated in Rome; and the illustrious Thorwaldsen, whose statue of Byron was, to the disgrace of the artistic feeling of England, permitted to remain buried in the vaults of the Custom House, till the master and fellows of Trinity gave it that asylum in the library of their college, which the bigotry of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster so obstinately denied.

Whatever might have been the opinions of the noble poet, there is no heresy in marble—at least that we ever heard of.

At a small table near the window were seated two young men: one was a tall, well-made fellow, whose blue eyes, fair complexion, and light hair, indicated his Saxon origin; his companion was one of those cosmopolitan looking personages whose nationality it is much more difficult to decide. The shortness of his stature, at the first glance would have led the observer to pronounce him French; but there was a stolidity of expression in his fish-like eyes and canary-coloured beard, so decidedly Saxon, that opinion was divided.

Both were painters—both Englishmen: the first was named Wayland—the second rejoiced in the equally poetic cognomen of Flambert. In a fit of enthusiasm they had decided on spending a month in Rome, in order to study perfectly the great masters. Wayland, at the end of a week, decided they were humbugs—he preferred his own style, as infinitely more true to nature—his friend pronounced them gods.

"Rely upon it," said the former, pursuing his favourite theme, "that this enthusiasm for the ancients is all a delusion—our own Reynolds beats your Titian into fits; Gainsborough is more natural than Claude, and the Madonnas of Raphael insipid and passionless."

"Heresy!" exclaimed the little artist, rolling his eyes with enthusiasm, real or affected; "rank heresy in art!"

"I own my opinions are scarcely Catholic," replied Wayland with a smile; "but tell me," he added, "what is it you find so unapproachable in Raphael except his reputation?"

The hit caused his friend to wince, for he prided himself upon his fidelity to the school of the painter of Urbino.

"His intellectuality," exclaimed Flambert; "the ideal which we can neither rival nor imitate; his exquisite grace. Raphael painted with the mind—he must be judged by the mind: that creative faculty which proves that the Deity did more for man than form him in His own image—that He endowed him with a particle of His divinity."

"Ideal!" repeated Wayland, with an air of reflection; "and pray what may you designate by the ideal?"

"Something we can all feel, but which language cannot express; a creation of mind—a corruscation of genius—a —"

"Basta—basta!" exclaimed his friend; "I am about as well informed as before I asked the question. The ideal must be ponderous indeed if your words cannot define it. By Jupiter!" he added, as a tall, handsome peasant, attired in the picturesque costume of the Transtaverini entered the café, "there is a reality which beats your ideal! What limbs—what muscle! who ever saw a head more gracefully placed upon a pair of shoulders? Rely upon it, the choicest statues of Italy are her breathing ones!"

After looking for an instant carefully round the room, the new comer seated himself at one of the little marble tables by the door, so as to command a view of every one who entered or left. Calling for a glass of ice water, he lit a cigar, and to all appearance soon became deeply interested in the columns of the Roman Gazette. We say to all appearance, for the two Englishmen noticed that, at every opening or closing of the door, he cast a furtive glance at each person who entered or left.

"Watching for some one!" observed Flambert.

"You may think yourself fortunate," replied his friend, "that it is not you he is watching for!"

"Why so?"

"Because he is one of the Transtaverini," answered Wayland, who was better versed in costume than the speaker; "he is one of the fiercest race of Rome: it provides the church with partisans, pilgrims, and fanatics—private revenge with the ready instruments of its crimes—in short, their days are passed between devotion to the Madonna and drinking in the osteria—their nights in assassination and crime. It is seldom they enter a café frequented by strangers," he added, "unless in pursuit of their prey. I'll sketch him!"

The recess in which the two artists were seated, was at the extreme end of the café. The speaker, by holding the journal which he pretended to read in his left hand, completely concealed from observation the sketch he was making with his right. He had nearly finished, when Martingale made his appearance. Rapid as was the glance which passed between the agent of Meeran Hafaz and the peasant, Wayland noticed it.

"An Englishman!" he muttered.

"What said you?" inquired Flambert.

"You see that gentleman who has just retired?"

"Yes."

"I'll bet a dinner at the Luna, that the peasant follows him. I saw the sign of mutual intelligence as he entered."

He was right. Martingale, after taking a glass of liqueur, looked round the room with an air of disappointment, as if he had expected to meet some one, and left the place. In less than five minutes the Italian followed.

"I told you!" said Wayland.

"Shall we follow?"

"What good would it do? We have no proof—nothing beyond suspicion. Hang the fellow! I wish he had remained long enough for me to finish my drawing. I have got the head," he added, "correctly enough. The rest I must fill up from memory, or one of Prinelli's prints."

When Martingale left the café, he walked slowly up the Via Condotti, crossed the Piazza d'Espagna, till he reached that narrow, unfrequented part which runs between the Propaganda and the Gregorio Palace, when he began to slacken his pace, and give time for the Italian to overtake him. He had not long to wait—faithful as a bloodhound on the scent, the fellow was upon his track.

"Good morning, signor!" he said, touching the party-coloured net, in which his long black hair was drawn. "I have waited for you three days—you are come at last! What news?"

"Good—the occasion I have waited for so long and patiently, at last presents itself. The Englishman will quit his hotel this evening, at the hour of seven."

"Where for?" demanded the Transtaverini.

"I know not," replied his employer. "You must send one who will dog his steps!"

"Nothing is more easy. Mateo is the very man, signor. He once followed a Genoese merchant from Naples to Venice, from Venice to Milan, before he found a fit occasion to strike—but he found it at last."

"See that you find it!" replied Martingale. "Your last failure nearly ruined my plans."

"By the saints and my honour, signor," exclaimed the ruffian, "the fault was none of mine! During the years I have been honoured with the confidence of my patrons in Rome, I never made such an error before. It was that cloak with the white lining," he added, with an air of vexation, "that misled me; to think that I should have been so deceived! I, that never fail to pay my devotions at the shrine of the Blessed Virgin, and make my Easter offering; it's enough to make one turn heretic!"

Let not our readers imagine that the language we have placed in the mouth of the assassin is overdrawn. During a residence of many years in Italy, we have frequently seen murderers who have taken sanctuary under the portico or in the interior of some church, whence civil justice did not dare to withdraw them. No wonder they are superstitious, and devoted to the faith from which they find, if not immunity, at least protection.

The privilege of sanctuary, so long enjoyed by the Catholic Church, had its origin in those dark and barbarous ages when every noble claimed the right of life and death over his vassals; when bishops and abbots appointed their seneschals or justiciaries, who held feudal courts in their name; when the mailed hand was stronger than the arm of justice. In such a state of society, the sanctuary was too frequently the last refuge of outraged humanity. Violence paused before the barrier which superstition had consecrated. Like all earthly institutions, the sanctuary had its abuses; and these, unfortunately, have survived its once legitimate benefits. In England, we have seen the queen of Edward IV. reduced to take refuge, more than once, at Westminster—so long considered as the most sacred of these asylums—where she gave life to the unhappy Edward V., whose younger brother, the Duke of York, was weakly given up by his terrified mother, from the same place, to his crafty uncle, Gloucester, who sent him to the Tower, which, we need not add, he never left with life.

On separating from the Italian, Martingale retired to his hotel: his confederate—the clerk at the post-office—had given him another letter which he had suppressed from our hero, and he sat down to forge the reply. It was from the worthy rector of Carrow, who announced his intention—inconvenient as it would be—to start at once for Italy, unless he heard from him. The presence of such a friend in Rome, directly after the meditated assassination, was likely to be anything but favourable to his views.

"Oh, poverty—poverty!" he exclaimed, as he seated himself at his desk; "what terrible expedients dost thou not drive men to! Had I been born rich, I should have been honest! Honesty is a gem," he added, "too rich for a poor man's keeping!"

Having finished his letter, he returned once more to the hotel of his two friends. Evil as was his nature, it was not without a pang that he saw our hero, as the clock struck seven, depart on his promised visit. He never expected to see him again in life.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

Treacherous villains stab men in the dark.

SHAKESPEARE.

WHEN Henry Ashton arrived at the Duchess of Devonshire's, he was informed that her grace would see him in her boudoir, but that for the present she was engaged with a visitor in her cabinet. Not wishing to encounter any of her fashionable friends—who were evidently expected, for the saloons were lighted—he made his way to the former apartment, where he had passed many a happy hour, listening to her animated, brilliant conversation, and her anecdotes of the society and court of Rome.

To his secret annoyance, he found the beautiful Pauline already there. For some time past the conduct of the princess had been so marked, that he must have been blind indeed not to have perceived the impression he had made upon her ardent and susceptible heart. Apologising for his intrusion, he would have withdrawn, but, with an impatient movement of her little hand, she detained him.

"Am I so hateful to you, then?" she said.

"Hateful!" repeated the young man. "Heavens, princess! what an accusation! It is to suppose me at once senseless and ingrate. Be assured, that of all who have been honoured and distinguished by your courtesy, none entertain a more profound respect and admiration than myself."

Pauline fixed her eyes upon him with an expression which, with all his philosophy, caused his young heart to beat, and the warm blood to run with swifter impulse through his veins.

"Respect!" she said, with a deep-drawn sigh. "True—true! that is the word with which men veil indifference or heartlessness. All respect the Princess Borghese, the sister of an emperor, the wife of Rome's proudest noble; but there are none to love her!"

Henry murmured something about her husband and his friends.

"Husband!" she exclaimed; he "never loved me! I was sacrificed by my brother, to his ambition and my husband's vanity. He thought no concession too great to obtain my hand—he cared not for my heart. Hearts, she added, bitterly, "are seldom consulted in such marriages. His indifference is equalled only by my hate."

The young barbarian, as her highness had named him, was inexpressibly shocked by an avowal, which never falls from the lips of a woman without degrading her. And yet he pitied her, for he had seen quite enough of the prince to know how little sympathy existed between the ill-assorted pair.

"You condemn me," she continued; "your cold nature cannot judge of mine. It has been the dream of my existence to find some being to love me—to share my thoughts and feelings; one who could sympathise with my pursuits and sentiments—whose heart would beat responsively to mine! Fate," she added, "has shown me such an one, to make my destiny more wretched! I have neither hope nor consolation!"

"You have," said our hero, in a tone of deep feeling, "that which ought to and must sustain you—self-respect—a name which belongs to history!"

"History!" repeated Pauline; "ashes! Well has its pen been said to be of iron, since its inscriptions are graved upon the tomb! I would not sacrifice one smile from those I loved, to see my name written upon the page from which happiness is excluded! Ask of your experience and your studies, how many of my sex, whom history has enshrined, have been wretched? Truth answers, 'All;' misery has been the price of their immortality!"

"True!" replied our hero; "like the laurel, it is watered by tears—watched by sorrow and suffering!"

"And, like the laurel," added the princess, "it is barren. Give me the immortality which an instant of love confers: it outweighs an eternity of fame!"

So saying, she laid her hand, which trembled with passion, upon his arm, and, fixing her eyes upon his, as if they would peer into his very soul; she added, in a voice broken by sighs:

"Henry, I love you!"

"Recall those words, I entreat—I implore you!" exclaimed the young man, deeply moved. Make me not so wretched as to feel that I have caused a shade of sorrow to pass between you and the joyous sun of your existence! Forget a weakness of which I am unworthy: my heart is devoted to another!"

At the word "another," the beautiful Pauline became deadly pale: she had imagined that timidity and respect hitherto had made our hero blind to her advances—that she had but to declare the favourable sentiments with which she regarded him, to see him—as she had seen others—at her feet.

"Ingrate!" she murmured.

"No, not ingrate!" replied Henry, "since the avowal has made me wretched: had you demanded my life, I would have risked it freely in your service; not a danger that I would not have braved at your behest. Long ere I beheld this land of beauty and enchantment, my heart was devoted to another: it has not a pulse which does not throb for her. It was my boyhood's love—it is my manhood's hope—and will remain unbroken to the grave!"

"Forget the hasty word," answered Pauline, dashing aside a tear; "you are right—it was a foolish dream to think that I could touch a heart like yours!" Forget it—forget it! Love on," she added, "with the truth and fervour of your ingenuous nature! Discard all thought of me! In the flattery of the world—its hollow, heartless mockeries, its whirlpool of folly and dissipation—I shall find oblivion; and, if in some lone hour, the thought which corrodes, the pang which rends the strings of life, should press upon me, I'll fly to that society of which fools make an idol, and deck my lips with smiles again! With smiles!" she slowly repeated; "in Italy we deck the dead with flowers: why not the living corpse with smiles?"

A light step was heard approaching the boudoir, and the next instant they heard the voice of the Duchess of Devonshire desiring her page to conduct Sir Thomas Lawrence to the boudoir.

Pauline started, with an effort, from the couch upon which she had sunk, overpowered by her feelings, and extended her hand to our hero.

"Farewell!" she said; "I will not say for ever; for while you remain in Rome, we shall be sure to meet again. But avoid me as much as possible. I cannot meet our lively friend—I am not in spirits to endure her raileries now. To-morrow," she added, "I shall be once more the gay and brilliant, and, as men judge me, the heartless Pauline Borghese!"

Henry Ashton raised the hand she frankly extended to his lips. As the door of the apartment opened, to give entrance to her grace, the princess disappeared through an opposite one leading to the conservatory.

"Well, caro mio!" exclaimed the duchess, seating herself upon the sofa which her friend had just quitted. "Have you lost all patience? I have been detained by stupid visitors from England. But I see that I need not apologise," she continued, archly; "you have not been alone!"

Her visitor remained silent.

"You need not blush—I shall not betray your secret!"

"I have no secret to betray, your grace," replied her visitor.

The lady raised from the sofa a handkerchief which Pauline had left.

"Hem!" she exclaimed; "no secret! Well, perhaps it is scarcely a secret now!"

As she spoke, she archly unfolded the delicate batista, and displayed a princely coronet, surmounting the imperial eagle, worked in gold in one corner of it.

"I know but one lady entitled to bear these arms," she added, "in Rome."

"Give it me—pray give it me!" replied Henry Ashton

"the name of the person you allude to might be compromised."

"Not by me," said her grace, throwing it to him; "with all her follies, I love Pauline too well. If I judge you aright, her weakness has already proved her punishment."

Our hero could only bow his acknowledgment, as he concealed the handkerchief in his bosom. He was too manly to confirm, either by look or word, the suspicion that her love had been repulsed.

"And Sir Thomas Lawrence?" he said.

"Is here to answer for himself," replied her grace, as the door of the boudoir opened, and the handsome painter made his appearance.

After paying his homage to the fair speaker, he informed Henry that he had received a summons to attend for a last sitting at the Vatican on the following morning; on which occasion, if he would hold himself in readiness to accompany him, he would present him to the Sovereign Pontiff: "your own eloquence must do the rest," he added.

"And I will present him with a powerful ally," observed the Duchess of Devonshire.

Both the gentlemen looked at her inquiringly.

"I am vain enough," she continued, "to imagine that I know the character of Pius VII. better than most persons. Although timid to a fault, he is naturally impressionable, and capable of exercising, whilst under the influence of enthusiasm of feeling, an independence which the camarilla cannot control. Could he behold my unhappy friend, Lady Mowbray—hear from her own lips the story of her wrongs and sufferings, I doubt not he would at once pronounce the sentence which no earthly power could either cancel or recall!"

"But how," demanded Sir Thomas—who knew that ladies, unless of royal rank, were never presented to his Holiness within the precincts of the palace—"can such a presentation be accomplished?"

The duchess smiled, and bade him be satisfied with the result, without being too curious as to the means.

The courtly artist was silent: he had been long enough a visitor in the Eternal City to have heard the various gossiping reports touching her grace and Cardinal Gonzalvi; the latter, although powerful as a minister, never interfered in ecclesiastical affairs. The jealousy of the apostolic chamber was opposed to it. If ever he did venture, it was, as in the present instance, without appearing in the transaction.

The position of the Pope is an anomalous one: infallible and despotic in theory, his power is so limited in practice by the various congregations of cardinals and ecclesiastics, to whom all matters are referred before they are laid before him, that he has little left to do but confirm their decisions.

"I have been twice to the convent of St. Therese," said Henry, doubtfully, "but have been refused to see her."

"The gate," replied his hostess, "will open to me! And now farewell! I know it would be merely the mockery of a compliment to ask you to remain—your heart is with your wounded friend!"

"All," replied our hero, gallantly, "which remains not here!"

So saying, he quitted the apartment of the kind-hearted duchess, and, shortly after, the palace.

It was a glorious evening; the sunset brilliant and gorgeous, such as Claude loved to revel in; heavy masses of golden light flooded the hundred domes and spires of the Eternal City, fell on the Pincian Hill, and the monolith at its base. Henry had so long been a prisoner in the sick chamber of poor Walter, that he could not resist the temptation to ascend the terraced walks, from which one of the loveliest views in Rome is seen. Unsuspecting of danger, he did not perceive that his steps were followed by two men, dressed in the picturesque costume of the Transtaverini.

For some minutes he remained seated on the edge of the marble fountain, in front of the Villa d'Este—better known as the French Academy, the nursery of sculptors and painters for our Gallic neighbours—an establishment which, with all its wealth, England has neither the taste nor spirit to imitate.

Whilst watching the last rays of the sun, he was startled by a loud cry, uttered in his native tongue, of "Beware!—your life is in danger!"

The cry saved his life: it caused him to spring on one side, and the long blade of the ruffian's stiletto glanced along his arm, instead of penetrating his heart.

"Cospetto!" muttered the assassin, between his teeth, preparing to rush upon him. "Baptista, remain on the other side."

Few persons were more active or endowed with greater strength than Henry Ashton. Although unarmed, he rushed upon the ruffian, and a fearful struggle ensued. They fell upon the sward, their limbs entwined together like knotted serpents. Vainly the man essayed to use his weapon—our hero held him firmly by the wrist, whilst with his disengaged hand he rained a shower of blows upon his head and face. Whilst this was going on, he expected every instant to be assailed by the companion of his antagonist; but the person whose friendly voice had given the first alarm hastened to his assistance, and the worthy Baptista, seeing that they were two to one, sprang over the parapet which guards the summit of the hill, and rapidly disappeared.

The two Englishmen hastened to the succour of their countryman, by this time almost exhausted by his struggles. Taking a most unpoetical advantage of his prostrate state, Wayland—for it was the painter and his friend—dealt the assassin a blow under the ear which rendered him senseless.

"Take his knife!" exclaimed Flamert, who had prudently remained at a distance, ready to take shelter under the portico of the academy, should danger approach his person.

"How shall I thank you?" exclaimed our hero, rising from the ground, and shaking his preservers warmly by the hand; "you have saved my life!"

"By saying no more about it," replied the young artist, frankly. "I am sure you would have done as much for me, or any one in a similar position. But let us see," he added, raising the head of the still senseless Transtaverini, till he brought it to the light; "if I am not mistaken, it is not the first time I have seen this face!"

"You know him?" said Henry.

"I think I ought. I sketched his head this very morning in the Café Greco."

"Wretched man!" continued our hero; "had he asked me for charity, I would have given it freely; had he succeeded in taking my life, the plunder would have availed him little. I have scarcely a ducat upon my person."

"It is not the plunder that would have rewarded him!" significantly observed his preserver.

"What mean you?"

"His employer."

"Employer!" repeated the young man, "you do not mean that? No—the thought is too terrible! I never injured or offended any human being. I am comparatively a stranger in Rome—who, then, should seek my life?"

"I cannot name him," replied Wayland; "but ten to one I can give you the clue to find him out."

He then related the scene of the morning at the café—the arrival of Martingale, whom of course he did not know by name, and his evident appointment with the assassin.

"And would you know this person again?" demanded our hero, after a few moments' reflection.

"From a thousand!" said the painter, "he had one of those faces which, once seen, we do not rarely forget!"

"His age?"

"About five or six-and-twenty."

"And his country?"

"England."

Henry Ashton wiped the drops of perspiration from his brow. He recollected Martingale's confusion and terror at his appearance at the hotel, the morning after the attack upon Walter Mowbray—and a vague suspicion crossed his mind. Vainly he endeavoured to chase the impression—it would return; when he remembered the devotion he had shown to his wounded friend, he accused himself of injustice in yielding to such thoughts.

"I am ungrateful," he mentally uttered; "such kindness and feeling as Martingale has shown! The suspicion was monstrous! Forgive me, friendship, that for an instant I doubted of his worth!"

"But what are we to do with this fellow?" inquired Wayland, pointing to the ruffian, who already began to recover from the effect of the blow, and was gazing with savage fury towards them; "we can't suffer him to escape."

It was finally arranged that they should take him with them, and deposit him at the guard-house in the Corso. Binding his arms behind him with their handkerchiefs, they began to descend the hill, Flamert leading the way to give an alarm, if any of the companions of their prisoner should be on the look-out to rescue him.

It required their united strength to force their captive along. As the painter observed, it was hard walking to the galleries—an observation at which the Italian scowled, and then smiled bitterly. He knew what Roman justice was, and how it might be bribed or baffled, better than his captors.

On reaching the Piazza del Popolo, they directed their steps to the centre of three streets, so well known to travellers as the Corso. The one to the right led to the Repetta, with its motley population; the left to the Piazza d'Espagna, with its hotels, religious establishments, and the Propaganda Fidei.

At each side of the entrance to the Corso is a small church, with a graceful portico, which produces that fine effect so much admired by architects and painters, when seen from the great monolith in the centre of the piazza.

In their progress across the square, several loungers, attracted by the sight of the captive, followed them—but not so closely as to give the least clue to their intentions. As they approached the churches in question, they made a rush upon the two Englishmen, which enabled the prisoner to spring from their grasp and reach the columns of the portico.

A wild shout, and cry of "Sanctuary!" announced that he had succeeded.

Henry's first impulse was to follow him; but the threatening looks and mingled shouts of "heretic!" and "sacrilège!" from the crowd, which by this time had increased, deterred him. Still he resolved not to lose sight of the assassin.

"Run to the guard-house," he whispered to his new friend; "tell them that the life of an attaché of the English ambassador at Naples has been attempted."

"And you?"

"Will remain here."

"I shall not stir a step!" replied the honest painter.

"Once without a witness, they would think as little of murdering you for the honour of the Madonna, or because you are an Englishman, as I should of shooting a wild cat! No; Flamert may go, if he likes."

The little man, who began to feel uncomfortable at the menacing attitude of the mob, eagerly availed himself of the hint, and disappeared.

Henry and Wayland mounted the steps, not to lose sight of their late prisoner, who began to harangue the crowd, who urged them by menaces to descend.

"Stir not, for your life!" said the painter; "even though you should see their knives within an inch of your throat!"

"Why not?"

"Because it is our only chance of safety. The Church is privileged: the same sanctity which affords impunity to the murderer is our protection. To shed the blood even of a criminal who has claimed sanctuary, would, to their superstitious thinking, be worse than taking the life of the mother who bore them, or the child who calls them father."

At this stage of the proceedings, a procession of monks was observed slowly crossing the Piazza del Popolo, on their return from the burial-ground. They were Capucins. At their head Henry recognised the well-known features of the general of the order, the eloquent Micara: a man whose influence over the rude population of the suburbs of Rome was unbounded. No sooner did he perceive the menacing group collected round the portico of the church, than he advanced into the midst, and demanded, in an authoritative tone, the cause of their assembling.

A dozen voices replied to him. Some said it was only a poor assassin, who had escaped from some heretic Englishman. Others accused them of profaning the church, by attempting to force him from its protecting walls.

The monk looked up, and recognised our hero.

"Imprudent!" he said; "what have you done?"

A few words explained to him the real state of the affair.

"Stir not!" he said; "you are safe, were a hundred knives raised against you, whilst I remain by your side." Then, raising his voice, he called some of his attendant monks about him, and prepared to address the crowd.

It was a scene worthy of a painter: the Capucin, with his long white beard, which descended almost to his knees, waving back the people from the steps of the church—the assassin in the back-ground, clinging to the gates—Henry Ashton and Wayland standing over him, ready at every risk to seize him, if once he quitted his hold—the whole portal lit by the torches which the monks carried in their hands, and which cast a lurid light upon the picture.

Thrice did Micara sternly warn them back, and the ruffians, whose numbers had considerably augmented, retired from the steps like some sullen wave, slowly and hoarsely murmuring. At last the distant tramp of the guard was heard advancing along the Corso.

"We are saved!" whispered Wayland, "thanks to the good father's courage! I'll never speak ill of a monk again, as long as I draw breath in Rome!"

An officer, with a detachment of about twenty men, who were accompanied by the curate of the church, now made their appearance.

The assassin looked wildly round; he knew that if he attempted to fly, the military would fire upon him; the mob, too, already began to desert him: few of them but had certain difficulties—as the Italians call their affairs with justice—which they were not eager to unravel.

"Spare me!" he said, addressing our hero, "and I will inform you of everything."

The monk looked at him sternly.

"Point out my employer!" added the wretch.

Henry would gladly have acceded to the prayer of the man, whose manner had suddenly become as abject as it had previously been insolent and menacing. It was not the military he feared: they, he knew, would not venture to drag him from his sanctuary; in all Rome there was but one man besides the Pope who could give such an order, and that man was Micara. For years he had been supreme judge of the sacred office, and the ruffian knew it.

"Save me from him!" he shrieked, pointing to the Capucin; "I will reform my life, confess all, and—"

"Too late!" exclaimed Micara, in a calm, passionless voice. "Thou hast been warned—and warning has been thrown away upon thee! The hour of forbearance is past!"

The captain of the guard and the curate alone mounted the steps of the portico. The latter no sooner saw the general of Capucini, than he inclined respectfully before him—his power to save the man was gone.

"Captain," said the monk, "you will take this man, and lodge him in the Holy Office!"

"No, no—not there!" exclaimed the prisoner, with a shudder. "Anywhere but there!"

"And remember," continued Micara, "that you are responsible to me for the execution of my order, and the appearance of your prisoner."

The officer bowed, and said that from his hands only could he receive him.

"True!" replied the Capucin, "take him!"

The Transtaverini, although a powerful, muscular man, shrank like a child at the grasp of the speaker; his arms and limbs seemed paralysed—his hands relaxed their hold, and he fell into the arms of the soldiers like a being suddenly deprived of strength.

"Away with him!" he added.

The rest of the men stood round him, and he was carried off to the prison most dreaded in Rome—that of the Holy Office, or Inquisition.

Turning towards our hero, Micara offered to conduct him to his hotel. The offer was too valuable to be declined, for dark, menacing groups were gathered at distances in the piazza: the presence of the monk was the guarantee of his safety.

"Farewell," he said, as he left them; "you will be wise not to quit the shelter of the casa to-night—to-morrow I will issue orders that shall insure your safety!"

With a benevolent smile, he left him, and Henry mounted to the apartment of his friend.

"Curse him!" muttered Martingale, as soon as he beheld our hero; "again he has escaped them!" and added, aloud: "so soon back, dear Henry?"

"My life has been attempted!"

"Heavens! by whom?"
 "I know not; but in the morning I shall be prepared to ask the question of my enemy: the wretch he employed to assail me is in the hands of the Holy Office; but good-night," he added, "I will not detain you—in the morning we shall meet again!"
 Martingale, with difficulty masking his confusion, left the room.

"I am so glad you are returned!" exclaimed the invalid, extending his hand, as Henry entered his chamber; "I began to have such strange misgivings."

"Misgivings!" repeated his friend.
 "Yes; and poor Martingale more than shared them. I am certain that he takes a deep interest in you, Harry!"

"Indeed! Why so?"
 "Oh, I am sure of it! when the hour advanced and you did not return, he became quite uneasy, hoped you would not leave the Casa Borghese alone—spoke of the danger of traversing the streets of Rome at night—related so many anecdotes of the different assassinations which had taken place, that his cheek grew pale, and my heart beat to hear him."

"How cruelly I have wronged him!" thought our hero. At an early hour the following morning, the assassin was brought before the Sacred Tribunal. Micara, who took an interest in the safety of the young Englishman, was determined to leave no means untried to discover his enemy.

"Your name?" he said to the prisoner.
 "Pietro Alessandro!"
 "How often have you been accused before the Holy Office?" demanded his judge.

"Twice, illustrissimo!"
 "And each time of murder, or at least an attempt at murder!" observed Micara, drily.

The prisoner hung his head.
 "Now then, Pietro, hear me! the mercy even of this patient and long-enduring tribunal is at last exhausted. The last time you were dismissed, you were told the result, if ever you fell beneath its censure again!"

"Mercy!"
 "It is my duty —"
 "Mercy, padre mio, this time: it was only an Inglese!"
 "To pronounce," continued the priest —
 "A heretic!"

"A sentence, which ample confession may perhaps induce me to use my influence with the council to mitigate; but remember it must be ample."

"It shall—most ample."

"The name of your employer?"
 "I do not know it, father!"

"Trifle with me," exclaimed the priest, sternly, "and thy fate is sealed! Was it not that disgrace to his nobility and the name of Rome—the Prince Colonna?"

"The Prince Colonna!" repeated the ruffian—"no! I swear to you, holy father, that I have never seen the prince; at least not for years."

"Who, then?"
 "An Inglese!"
 "An Inglese?" repeated the priest, thoughtfully; "may this be true? And he resides?" he added.

"At the hotel in the Corso."

Without further question, the priest waved to the attendants to remove their prisoner, and, calling for an apparitor, placed a blank order in his hand.

It was to be filled with the name of Robert Martingale.

From the position which the general of the Capucini held, as one of the supreme judges of the Holy Office, there were few circumstances occurring in the Eternal City which were not made known to him. At first he had suspected that the Prince Colonna—a proud, passionate, dissipated man, whom public rumour had long designated as the lover of the beautiful Pauline—was the instigator of the murderous attempt upon our hero. The confession of the assassin, however, had undeceived him: he did not doubt the sincerity of that confession an instant—for he well knew that the hold he possessed upon his terrors was greater than the dread of violating any oath he might have taken to his employer.

"Such," he said, "are the sad results of human passion, human pride. In the path of crime, our earlier steps are slow, and marked by doubt and hesitation; but as the wretch proceeds, the declivity becomes more steep—he cannot pause, but plunges headlong in the dread abyss, which sooner or later must engulf him. This young Englishman interests me," he added; "there is a freshness and simplicity in his character which proves him to be unsullied by the world. I will probe this matter to its depths, and strike a blow to appal his enemies!"

Seating himself at the table, he wrote a few lines to our hero, requesting his attendance on the following day: when he had sealed it with the broad signet of his office, he summoned one of the officials of the Holy Office.

"This," he said, "to the English Signor Ashton in the morning."

With a mute sign of obedience, the man retired, and the excellent Micara almost directly after withdrew to the solitude of his convent.

At a later hour, that same evening, after most of her guests had left the gilded saloons of the Duchess of Devonshire, Cardinal Gonzalvi entered the boudoir of her grace: he found her engaged in an animated conversation with several of her fair countrywomen, who appeared deeply interested in the subject.

"I am sure we shall succeed!" he heard her say. "The heart of Pius VII. has known suffering, and suffering has taught him mercy; and see," she added, turning towards his eminence, "here comes the good genius of our project!"

The churchman bowed, with a gallantry and grace which many a layman might have envied. George IV., who was no bad judge of manners, pronounced him one of the most elegant men he had ever met.

It is a fact perhaps not generally known, that, upon the downfall of Napoleon, the Cardinal Gonzalvi was secretly accredited to the cabinet of St. James's, and received in a semi-official manner by the Tory ministers of the day. He was even present at one of the levees, on which occasion, despite the hints and indirect advice he received, his eminence maintained the dignity of the Roman purple—by appearing in his scarlet soutan and pelerine. In the list of presentations he was announced merely as Monsignor Gonzalvi: so little was known of foreign titles at the time, that it passed unnoticed.

Exeter Hall was not in existence at the time.

"Have you succeeded?" exclaimed the duchess.
 "Not without some difficulty," replied her visitor; "for you know that I never interfere in ecclesiastical matters; fortunately, however, the vicar of his holiness had occasion to require my services, and I —"

"Proffered service for service?" interrupted her grace.
 "Even so!"

He placed, as he spoke, a small slip of parchment in the hands of the lady, on which something was written in Latin—it was sealed with the Pontifical seal.

"What is this?" she demanded.
 "The order you seek," replied his eminence.

"And there can be no hesitation—no excuse?" inquired the kind-hearted woman, who felt deeply interested in the success of Henry Ashton's attempt to release Lady Mowbray from her ill-considered vows. "The superior of the Theresians has twice refused me admission to my unhappy friend. Should this fail," she added, "the opportunity we have so long sought for will be thrown away."

"Fear not!" replied his eminence, with a quiet smile; "I know whom I have to deal with: no form has been neglected. Were Lady Mowbray on her death-bed, receiving the last solemn rites of the church, at the sight of that parchment every barrier would fall, and you would be admitted to her presence!"

"But can she leave her prison?"
 "As freely as if no vow had passed her lips! For four-and-twenty hours she is a free agent."

"Enough!" said the duchess, turning towards her friends; "I answer for the rest!"

(To be continued in our next.)

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XVII.

SCENE—The Forest.

Enter Robbers, quarrelling.

BROLSON.

EITHER be for me or against me, then!
 Have with the deed, or leave the deed to me,
 And keep not lurking thus from rock to bush,
 Ever resolving, never resolute!
 Make men of mice! Call rabbits valiant
 I'd rather be a hare for human hounds
 To hunt and bark at than be such as thou:
 Oh, I've no patience—none, with tender thieves

RIVDELL.

If Midgley quits him, then his fate is sealed;
 But not till then: one word's as good as fifty!
 Old Midgley tended me when I was sick,
 Dying of fever, and so might have died,
 For any else but her. Thou'dst think it brave
 To cut the throat of her who saved thy life?
 I'm bad enough, and reckless of my road,
 But there's one step too savage for me yet,
 And that is—murdering Midgley!

BROLSON, sneeringly.

Scruples of conscience! What is conscience worth?
 Will it provide thee drink, or purchase bread!
 Or canst thou market with it for a crust?
 I'll rather to hell-common go at once,
 And daisies pick at half a groat an acre!
 Put up thy conscience now, and I'll be sworn
 I buy thee fifty better consciences
 For half the gold this short and easy deed
 Will gild thy palm with! And the time, the place,
 Never was such a spot for secret murder—
 So dim and dreary, silent, wild, and lone!
 As Nature meant it for such purposes.
 Curses upon it to be hampered thus . . .
 Why, thou agreedst . . .

RIVDELL.

To slay the lad, but not to injure her:
 There is no sum set down for slaughtering her;
 And if there were, I am not to be bought:
 Nor harm, nor see harm done: so, have a care.

BROLSON.

Go threaten girls! The time, the place, the chance,
 And all gone by! all lost! 'Twould vex a saint
 To be thus bound and mated with a fool.

RIVDELL.

A fool!
 Perchance the dismal grave beyond the firs
 Thou pick'dst for Midgley soon may prove thine own!

[Exit hastily.]

SCENE—Edge of the forest; a level tract of country; village seen in the distance.

Enter MIDGLEY and ADOLPHUS.

MIDGLEY.

Come, cheer thee boy! the weary forest passed,
 The way is smooth and easy; that we seek

Lies near; within the green and quiet dell,
 Some less than half a roof from you castle-gate:
 Few moments' walk the churchyard will be seen.
 And so thou sayst thy nurse was kind to thee?

ADOLPHUS.

A second mother, tender to a fault,
 And often chid old Dorothy, that she Would rarely let my stool come nigh the fire:
 Poor Nurse: more than two days from out her sight!
 She's half distracted at my absence now.
 Well! I'll tell her soon how kind and good thou wert,
 And what a faithful friend I found in thee.
 Thou't come and see us, Midgley: wilt thou not?

MIDGLEY.

Thou wouldst not shut the door to in my face?

ADOLPHUS.

What I?

MIDGLEY.

Nor set some brutal dog to wound my heels?

ADOLPHUS.

What I?

MIDGLEY.

Nor shriek out witch? nor set thy comrades on
 With stones to clear the village of my rags?

ADOLPHUS.

Midgley! this to me?

I would not hurt the wing of a foul crow.
 Nor harm a toad though it should cross my path;
 God gave it life, and it should live, for me,
 Unscared, unscathed; and thou, who'st been so kind—
 Thou saidst it but to try me?

MIDGLEY.

I did!

My heart, boy, is a coffin, wherein hope,
 Home, union, friendship—what should yield to us
 Respect, regard, affection, 'mongst our kind—
 All, all, lie dead! and, in their stead, I've what?
 Contempt and curses, spurns and hateful gibes,
 And language beggar'd for opprobrious terms,
 As witch, hag, fury, viper, and the like!
 Witch? hag? I am a woman!
 Viper? I am human!
 I have been tried, yet ne'er did being wrong;
 Whipp'd—who'd have wept to see a dog so bruised!
 Branded for crimes I never did commit!
 And wouldst thou learn the reason for all this?
 Go howl it in the public market-place,
 'Twas poverty!

The witch was poor, could nothing pay the law;
 Deformed, could bribe no counsel with fair looks;
 Friendless, so fitter for scourge, jail, and brand!
 The good have friends, the friendless must be bad.
 Thou wilt have gold, my boy, remember me!
 Give me sufficient for the world's respect;
 'Twill be a trifle from thy coming wealth:
 Wilt thou? I would be loved!

I thirst for woman's sympathy, and cry;
 But in this human desert is no water,
 No spring for lips that mate with poverty;
 No pity, none, for those that need it most!
 Boy, not all their stones have beaten from my breast
 God's feeling out, and still I love, love thee!
 Thou hast not turned thy noble face away,
 Though I am seared and frightful to thine eyes;
 Thou hast not mocked me, jeered, nor flouted me,
 Though well I know my voice a raven's croak,
 My habits strange and foul; yet thou refrain'd'st,
 Nor spurned the human reptile from thy path;
 But stead of scoffing, tears! Deny it not,
 I say thou wept when I laid bare my woes,
 Wept! tears! and 'twas for me! God bless thee for it!
 Bless thee! God bless thee for it!

Answer not, but follow me;

It does me good, it soothes my wearied brain;
 'Twas something still to find one human eye
 Could drop a tear for Midgley.

[Exit, ADOLPHUS following.]

(To be continued.)

OTHER SCIENTIFIC DISCOVERIES MAY SUPERSEDE STEAM.—In speculations like these, the probable, if not certain progress of improvement and discovery ought not to be overlooked; and we may safely pronounce that, long before such a period of time shall have rolled away, other and more powerful mechanical agents will supersede the use of coal. Philosophy already directs her finger at sources of inexhaustible power in the phenomena of electricity and magnetism. The alternate decomposition and recombination of water, by electric action, has too close an analogy to the alternate processes of vaporisation and condensation not to occur at once to every mind; the development of the gases from solid matter by the operation of the chemical affinities, and their subsequent condensation into the liquid form, has already been essayed as a source of power. In a word, the general state of physical science at the present moment, the vigour, activity, and sagacity with which researches in it are prosecuted in every civilised country, the increasing consideration in which scientific men are held, and the personal honours and rewards which begin to be conferred upon them, all justify the expectation that we are on the eve of mechanical discoveries still greater than any which have yet appeared; that the steam-engine itself, with its gigantic powers, will dwindle into insignificance in comparison with the energies of nature which are still to be revealed; and that the day will come when that machine, which is now extending the blessings of civilisation to the most remote skirts of the globe, will cease to have existence, except in the page of history.—Lardner on the Steam Engine.

THE SUSPENSION BRIDGE NEAR THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.]

GREAT AMERICAN SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

ALL our readers have heard of, and no doubt many of them seen, the famous falls of Niagara, those greatest natural curiosities in the known world. But as we are about to refer to a remarkable construction in connection with them, it should be borne before the mind's eye, that this amazing waterfall is made by the river St. Lawrence, in its passage from the Lake Erie into the Lake Ontario. The St. Lawrence is one of the largest rivers in the world, and yet the whole of its waters are here poured down by a fall of 150 feet perpendicular. It is not easy to bring the imagination to correspond with the greatness of the scene: a river extremely deep and rapid, and that serves to drain almost all the waters of North America into the Atlantic Ocean, rushes precipitately down a ledge of rocks, that rises like a wall across the whole bed of its stream. At this season of the year, the scene is very magnificent. From between banks whose dazzling white ground is relieved by dark-green pines, the cataract comes thundering down, bearing on its bosom immense masses of ice, which, suddenly transferred from the broad stream to the comparatively narrow passage at the commencement of the rapids, meet with a thundering crash, and grind one another into myriads of fragments. Through the foam—which, being little heavier than the atmosphere, descends slowly, and gives the whole mass a sluggish appearance—the dark water may be seen flashing like lightning, as it rushes headlong into the abyss below, and sends up a column of vapour which rises straight up to an immense height. When the morning sun appears, it gradually changes the colour of this column of vapour, from the top downwards, till at length the whole mass becomes of the most beautiful rose-colour imaginable.

The most stupendous fall is on the British side of the Niagara River, commonly called the "Great Horse Shoe Fall." The height of this is only 142 feet, whereas the two others, formed by islands dividing the river, are each 160 feet high; but to its inferior height it is principally indebted for its grandeur: the precipice, and of course the bed of the river above it, being so much lower at one side than the other, by far the greater part of the water of the river finds its way to the low side, and rushes down with greater velocity at that side than it does at the other. The extent of this fall, ascertained by the eye, is estimated at no less than 600 yards in circumference. The whole extent of the precipice is said to be at least 1400 yards. The quantity of water carried down the falls is prodigious, being found, by a moderate calculation, to be 670,255 tons per minute.

Below these falls the whirlpools and commotions of the waters are so tremendous as to render navigation impracticable for six miles, and immediately above them the river is much narrower than it is higher up. It however runs evenly, and is navigable for bateauz as far as Fort Chippeway, which is about three miles above the falls; but upon a nearer access, the waters are so much agitated, that unless a boat keeps in the middle of the river, and is dexterously managed, it must be dashed to pieces.

Since the Falls of Niagara were first discovered, they have very much receded, on account of the disruption of the rocks which form the precipice. Within the memory of many of the present inhabitants of the country, the falls have receded several yards. It is not an improbable conjecture that they were originally situated at Queenstown. Tradition reports that the Great Fall, instead of having been in the form of a horse-shoe, once projected in the middle; but for a century past it has remained nearly in its present form. However, what its ultimate destiny may be, no one can tell; but most certain it is a great hindrance to the navigation of a splendid river, and, judged economically, a very ugly interruption to the friendly communications which should subsist between the United States and Canada. But science, in this, as in many other instances, has triumphed over the obstacles of nature, and enabled the British and Americans to exchange cordial salutations over the very bed of the river, and with ease and safety pass from one side to the other.

We have said that the river was not navigable for six miles below the falls; but, from Queenstown to Lewiston, steamers ply; and in 1848 the traffic had so much increased, that additional facilities were required, and an engineer was found daring enough to suggest a suspension bridge. The unquestioned security and comparative facility of erection afforded by that description of bridge had been so admirably tested in this country, that the idea was at once promptly seized, and a company organised to carry it into execution. And the labour began, and the undertaking was carried on with unexampled rapidity. Our engraving represents this bridge as it is now completed and open to the public. It crosses the Niagara River from Queenstown to Lewiston, about six miles below the falls; and the following, as might be expected, are its truly formidable dimensions:

Total length of cable	1245 feet.
Distance between the towers	1040 "
Clear width of roadway	20 "
10 Cables, 5 each side.
Strength of bridge "	835 tons.

Although narrower by sixteen feet than the iron suspension bridge at Chelsea, of which we gave an illustration in No. 416, it is nearly twice the length; and, between the piers, almost three times the length; Chelsea bridge having a sweep of 352 feet of road between the centre piers, and this, from tower to tower, 1040 feet.

Only fancy such a mass of iron, suspended over a river boiling with the fury of waters that have only just leaped over a dreadful precipice! One thousand and forty feet of iron cable—we should say 10,400 feet of iron cables, for there are ten—swing in the air at a dizzy altitude, and within hearing of the awful, incessant thunder of the fall, some fifty yards headlong, of millions upon millions of tons of water! Nature is grand and terrible, as well as beautiful; but the genius of man occasionally rivals it in audacity and daring—sometimes, as in the Britannia Tube and this marvellous suspension bridge, transcends it; for, while Nature takes untold ages to perform a colossal work, man accomplishes the most stupendous tasks in a few years.

It probably took a hundred thousand years to bring the Falls of Niagara up to their present point; yet man has bridged and set them at defiance in less than three years! Altogether the bridge is a marvellous specimen of the mechanical skill, economical enterprise, and industry of the present age. In appearance it is strikingly handsome, and, as will be perceived in our illustration, extends from the Canada to the American side without the slightest interruption. It is suspended from towers erected on the solid rocky pedestals—which on this portion of the river are almost on a level with each other—on each side, to prevent excessive oscillation. The roadway is stayed by iron cables, extending from the under surface of the roadway to the solid rock below. And on each side tier monster iron cables run from under the centre of the roadway to the shore below; and, at some distance from the natural rocky towers above-mentioned, are wedged deep in the hard sand-stone. These stays not only give additional strength to the bridge, but enable it to resist the action of the wind, by pulling against it, and also check the vibration, which it is impossible altogether to prevent in these novel and wonderful structures. But this great suspension bridge is as safe and perfect as any erection of the kind can be made; and when it is considered that it is the largest in the world, and has been thrown across a river that has only just tumbled out of the sky, as it were, some commensurate idea may be formed of its grandeur and eminent utility. Filled with admiration of this mighty achievement, an Englishman, on crossing it, might cast a glance over the splendid scenery on each side of the river; and, on the English territory, fix his eye on General Brock's monument, standing on the edge of a bloody battle-ground; and then turn to the stupendous work of art which bears him safely high above the deep, foam-crested waters which have travelled from an inland sea, and, in silent eloquence, thank the destiny that had cast his lot in a time when other engagements call into requisition, and the most god-like aims inspire and animate, the bodily and mental faculties of the Anglo-Saxon family on both sides of the Atlantic.

If it were possible to erect a bridge on this principle between Dover and Calais, it would be a perpetual guarantee for the peace of the world; and we look upon this one as an additional bond of union between this country and the United States of America.

FEELINGS AND FORTUNE.

CHAPTER I.

"AND the marriage-day is actually fixed, Cranston?"

"Fixed, Frank—fixed! irrevocably and sacrificially! Yes, here am I, Charley Cranston, aged twenty-eight, late of her Majesty's Heavies—the point de mire and pet of half a dozen seasons, and, I flatter myself, a decent-looking fellow to boot—going, sir—actually going for a mere song; that is, considering the very respectable person who is to accompany it—a kind of burthen to the song—not bad that, eh? considering the awful position in which I am supposed to stand!"

"I congratulate you, Charley! But you remember, at Eton, you know, multa cadunt, &c., &c.: an old saw that, about the cup and the lip!"

"If you quote Latin, or congratulate me again, Frank, I'll—I'll—well, I'll ask you to the wedding—and I wish you no worse, thou most innocent and campestal or country cousins! You're too good a fellow I know to be sardonic, but you really might as well wish a man joy who is about to stand in the pillory. No! it's a settled affair: I'm as good as noosed, rivetted to my calamity for life, in less than a month; definitely pinned down like a broken-down butterfly to the cork of respectability, and—wedlock! Weep for me, Frank, for I am 'gone from among you,' come to an untimely and unmerited end—perished—defunct—done for—married, sir! Utterly married!"

"Pardon me, Cranston, if I can neither appreciate, nor, indeed, understand the tone you have adopted, as regards your approaching connection with Miss Sandford. She is not beautiful, perhaps, but she is most interesting; she is not very young I admit, but she cannot be called in the least 'old.' I can hardly believe it, though you tell me so, that she is thirty-one: she possesses a vast fortune, while you, on the other hand, are utterly ruined: why your play debts had ruined you when you sold out!"

"Sold out, and sold up, Frank! Sold in every way! Never mince matters: and, now —"

"Excuse the interruption, Cranston, but money is absolutely and immediately necessary to rescue you from the imminence of your position. You were good enough to test my friendship in borrowing from me, among others; so I suppose I may presume you have disposed of the price of your troop? What now remains for you but an exposé—disgrace, obscurity, and future wretchedness, perhaps—except for the generous, noble-hearted woman whom you have pursued so unremittingly for the last year; and who, I confess to you, I admire as much for her frank, charming, and remarkably lady-like manners, as I do for the charity, amiability, and kindness that made her beloved by rich and poor, to my certain knowledge, throughout half our county —"

"St. Francis! Oh, St. Francis! Silence!"

"Cranston, I must finish, and, now that you have won her, a woman you might well be proud of under any circumstances, and whom you have literally persecuted for your own worldly salvation into the alliance, in utter trustfulness and good feeling upon her part, and in disregard of your—your character —"

"Or, rather my want of it, Frank. Why, in the name of all that's particularly prosy and superlatively a bore—why are you stringing me this charming little rosary of cheerful truisms, when —"

"No, Charley; I don't say your want of character, because at heart I don't think you any worse than the usual ruck of men of the world (a comprehensive phrase truly), that one meets in every club and drawing-room in this same little London of ours, pleasant, moral Paris, and elsewhere; but you were intended for better than this. We were brought up differently, Charley, from the generality of these said vulgar, gentlemanly things of fashion's copper currency; and frankly, my dear cousin, I would wish to have seen my old playmate other than a mere heartless thing of expediency, of ways and means; indeed —"

"St. Francis! St. Francis! I could quarrel with you, if only to change the conversation, but that you have grown so uncommonly pathetic. And now let us see what our reverend cousin would have made of his abandoned kinsman. Hem! Sunday schools, vestry meetings, and general utility; useful member of society, eh, Frank? Universal progress, and all that sort of thing, with a white neckerchief and a cotton umbrella; while for the amenities of life—let me see—ah! of course, select and intellectual society, worthy and scientific men of the broad-brim genus; women—all your adorable "Miss Sandfords," estimable, cerulean passées, and overwhelmingly respectable; charming réunions, early hours, useful conversation, weak tea, Berlin wool, buttered toast, and benevolence, twice a week! Why, Frank, you'd transmogrify a captain of dragoons into a churchwarden, if you had your way, I believe!"

"You mistake me, Cranston—our views and habits are opposite as the poles; and I should be as much astonished to see you adopt mine (even did you not ridicule them so needlessly), as you would be to see me attempt to adapt myself to yours: we should be each out of our element—false and artificial—and consequently wrong; but you are indeed to blame here. Look into your 'heart of hearts'—for you are not half so bad as you would seem—and you will find I am right. You have voluntarily sought your fiancée—publicly sought and determinedly pursued her—till her generous acceptance of your proposals has given you a new lease of existence, fortune, and reputation; and I ask you again, in sober sadness, is it well, knowing all this, to speak of her, and the sacred engagement into which you are about to enter, with a lightness—a levity, almost approaching to bitterness—which, I assure you, my dear Cranston, is in anything but good taste or proper feeling?"

"You will make me fancy, you conscientious dog! that you would as soon stand in my shoes as not! Faith, I wish you were! (By-the-bye, what do you think of those cigars? you won't smoke? well, pass the box). However, the lady has found a champion worthy of the days of old romance; but, of a verity, Frank, thy chivalry smacketh woefully of la Mancha! Why, what the deuce, man! do you think I shall kidnap the young lady to the Spanish main (young!—I beg pardon of her experience for the slip)? or am I to starve her in a dungeon, like him of Front-de-Bœuf? Can't your immaculate purity imagine that I—even I—could simmer down into that harmless and respectable joint-stool of private life—a husband—like any other poor devil who sells his birthright of life and liberty for the mess of pottage of savoury Mammon? Why, I declare to you —"

"There it is, Cranston! I repeat, that it is not with such sentiments that you should marry Miss Sandford. It is her you would make the joint-stool—a mere stalking-horse to your pleasures, and a convenience. She loves you generously and confidingly; and, unless you can renounce your vices and follies—nay, put aside expediency and the world, and question yourself with stern moral honesty and rectitude—which I know hide in some cryptical corner of your heart, warped though it may be (believe me, our excellent guardian's care was not thrown away, Cranston)—if you cannot do this, and make up your mind to marry Miss Sandford as a husband, I say again, it is your duty, as a man of honour, to break off the connection."

"Bravo, Frank! and, in that event, most noble Cato, shall I turn private trooper in the Heavies? Does Lycurgus recommend the role of valet? (the world and Stultz say I dress well; I should be a fortune to a young, sugar-baking parvenu); or will St. Francis, when he gets a living, exalt me to the snuffing pinnacle of a parish clerkship?"

"Anything, sooner than do this bad thing. But this is like you, with your old innate spoiledness—ever in extremes. But you still have resources—small, perhaps—and your profession, interest, youth, hope, and strength: why not enter the Austrian service?"

"Yes, and starve on corned beef, Schnapps, and sour-kraut, in Wallachia, or spend my life in playing dominoes for coppers in provincial cafés, in hopes of a colonelcy when utterly us'd up, grey, and semi-imbecile! Now, hark ye, Frank Harland, don't let us quarrel; for I don't want you to thrash me as you did at Eton. Moreover, you mean well, and I believe, frankly, you are the only creature that really takes an interest in my fate, except the Jews and duns; but, badinage apart, we don't understand each other—we never did, and never shall. Your ideas are pastoral and primitive as your worthy and clerical papa's glebe—your world, mind, Frank!—mine is another sphere of action: I am of this naughty world, and must act up to its behests and customs! This has gone far enough! Change the conversation, I pray you again! Don't bore me; and, at any rate, pass the claret!"

"Yet one word, Cranston; I would not willingly offend you; but I speak from duty—(you smile)—I will even own I called here to-night for that purpose. Now, don't look angry, but hear me. You have still ties of an equivocal, if not a disreputable nature; and within a week, to my knowledge, you played and lost a larger sum than you possess in the world. Surely, dear Cranston—surely, when you are married —"

"Enough, Mr. Harland! Cousin, or no cousin, I allow no man to interfere with me beyond a certain point! This is too much! And hitherto, at least, Charles Cranston has been the faithful guardian of his own honour!"

"At least be just, Cranston! Before I leave you to-night, I would wish you to believe —"

"Good night, sir! I am sick of this! Good night!"

"Farewell, then! Still, let me hope —"

"Good night, Harland!"

"Good night, then! Farewell—perhaps, Cranston, for ever! Should we meet again, you will understand me better!"

"I fear not—Miss Sandford or her relatives may: it may assist you to a living. No more, sir. Once more, good night!"

Poor single-hearted Frank Harland stammered forth his indignant refutation of so wanton an imputation, but without extorting a word from his wayward and self-willed kinsman, who stood smoking with his back to the fire—his handsome features crimsoned with passion, and staring him coldly, almost vacantly, in the face, till he quitted the room.

Frank left the Albany with a heavy heart. For some time after his footfall became inaudible, that proud and headstrong man remained in the same attitude—his face had become paler. Was it the reaction, or a misgiving? He threw himself heavily and abstractedly into a huge easy-chair, and after a time he drew from the pocket of his dressing-gown a delicately-shaped, though crumpled billet, in a lady's hand. He read it through attentively: a sneering smile imperceptibly stole over his face, and he threw himself back again, twirling the ends of his moustaches, in utter reverie, till his eyes lit upon his own portrait, suspended upon the opposite wall: it resembled him, indeed, in full uniform, and pre-eminent in patrician air and manly beauty.

"Bah!" he suddenly exclaimed; "she loves me!" and, whistling the last new polka, he sprang up gaily, and rang the bell violently for his valet and his cab.

Some gentlemen of the Guards gave a supper that night at Dubourg's, to the principal male and female artistes of the St. James's Company: all was joyous, sparkling, and very French—and who so brilliant and so admired as handsome Charley Cranston?

But the crushed and delicately traced billet, in a lady's hand, remained unheeded and forgotten on his drawing-room floor, through the dark and weary watches of the night. It amused the servants exceedingly in the morning—and, to avoid questions, it served, with others, to light the fire; but then she loved him!

CHAPTER II.

AND was Miss Sandford really deceived as to the habits and sentiments of the man who was so soon to lead her to the altar? With regard to his sincerity, she fairly believed that he was attached to her, though certainly not to the extent to which he sought to tax her credulity; but she had, on the other hand, a firm belief in the warm esteem he so cordially professed. The lady herself loved him with a pure and lofty womanly affection—she was determined to save him from the impending ruin that awaited him, even at the expense, if need be, of her own fortunes; and it was but natural that, conscious of her own worth and moral superiority, she conceived herself capable of awakening in the future, feelings of a warmer and more genial description in his wayward breast, from his gratitude, if not from his better nature. She had heard much, though vaguely and generally, of his errors and failings; and while she accredited these rumours, with their due quota of malice and exaggeration, she generously made more than a just allowance for his youth, habits, and the many temptations of his position.

In short, she loved him: and where love truly and positively exists, there is all trustfulness, all charity and confidence.

As the period, however, of her intended marriage approached, there were not wanting a host of "good-natured friends," who warned her, now that it was too late, of the many dangers of a closer connection with one so wild and dissipated as Charles Cranston; and multitudinous proofs of his vices and follies were now daily and hourly anonymously or openly adduced, till the unhappy lady, divided between prudence and resentment, pity and regard, became at last seriously indisposed—so much so, indeed, that all visitors, Cranston himself included, were rigidly denied admittance to her drawing-room.

The wedding was of course tacitly postponed till her convalescence; and it was during this particular time that a circumstance took place, which it is necessary to the thread of our narrative should be here related.

To be brief: Cranston, with his usual infatuation and recklessness, had spoken of her and his proposed union with the grossest ridicule, and something even more than levity, in a public place. It was after the unfortunate supper we have mentioned in the former chapter; he was flushed, fevered, and excited, and considerably under the influence of wine at the moment. Under no other circumstances could so gross a dereliction from propriety have taken place; for, with all his faults, Cranston was essentially a gentleman, and no man better than himself knew what was due to the delicacies and convenances of society (at least in public); still he had fearfully committed himself. It occurred at a well-known military club, of which he was a member; but it chanced—and most fatally—that among his auditors was a young subaltern of the line, but two days returned on leave from India—the nephew of the oldest friend, late guardian, and principal trustee of his affianced bride—to whom in the morning this unfortunate conversation was duly retailed, and perhaps with some little exaggeration. Certainly the story lost nothing of its point from the charitable feeling of this gentleman, who was naturally antagonistic to Miss Sandford's engagement, and to whom he recounted the facts at the earliest occasion.

From so respectable a source, the statement, painful as it was, could not in any way be doubted; and from that moment Miss Sandford was a broken-hearted woman. Sternly and fixedly her resolution was taken, and we shall see that it was faithfully carried out indeed.

Though recovered from her illness, by the suddenness and severity of this cruel shock she still kept her chamber. Cranston was unremitting in his attention, but he was not admitted to the house, nor did she answer his numerous letters. Still a communication, when he called—which was sometimes twice a day—was kept up through her confidential maid, as if nothing had occurred to mar the previous harmony that had existed between them. He soon discovered, however, that she had lately received the visits of several of her intimate friends, and he immediately wrote—this time, at least, with the most genuine anxiety—for an early explanation. His letter was unheeded, and still, though treated as heretofore when he called, he was, upon some ever-varying excuse, continually denied the interview he now so sincerely coveted. A week only was wanting of the period appointed for their nuptials, and vague rumours had become everywhere current, as to the probable failure of his matrimonial project of extrication from his overwhelming embarrassments; and for some days he had been persecuted almost to madness by Jews and Gentiles, friends and foes, creditors of all denominations—when, stimulated almost to desperation, he again addressed Miss Sandford, at once insisting upon, and entreating for, an explanation. This time his appeal was responded to, and he received the following answer, in less an hour after the advent of his own communication.

"— Square.

"You sought me, and you obtained my promise. I will keep it devoutly—fear nothing. What you have so perseveringly striven for, you shall obtain.

"I will meet you at the church—but not till then. Calm your impatience and affectionate solicitude till that hour, when, I pledge you my word, you shall receive every explanation from — CLARA SANDFORD."

It were needless to dilate on the chaos of surprise, doubt, hope, and fear, into which the wretched Cranston was thrown by this extraordinary epistle; and the period that elapsed from its advent till the morning of the marriage, was passed by him in a state of the most unmitigated mental torment.

It was a bright May morning—and a merry crowd was congregated round the massive porch of St. George's, to admire the gay carriages, whose train reached half round Hanover Square; the position of "the high contracting parties" was liberally discussed, and the handsome and distinguished bridegroom was universally envied. Could those thoughtless spectators have guessed but a title of the utter wretchedness of the two beings in whose honour that brilliant cortège had assembled, they would have shuddered, and hurried on their way.

Miss Sandford was punctual, also, to the very minute, but, though attired almost entirely in white, hers was not the costume of a bride; it was, indeed, a species of half mourning—rigidly simple, and devoid of ornament, though in the most exquisite taste. She was accompanied, too, simply by her friend and late guardian, Mr. — and one or two valued and intimate female friends and relatives. The lady, and indeed her whole party, scrupulously avoided as much as possible all conversation with Cranston and his friends: she saluted him with a calm and frigid coldness, and reciprocated his hurried and excited greeting with a few stereotyped phrases, delivered with the most withering politeness.

The ceremony took place, and during the formula she studiously avoided the wild and troubled eyes of Cranston; she stood like a statue of despair—stern, pale, inscrutable, and calm—her own gaze fixed, in vacancy, straight before her; she seemed scarcely conscious of her own existence—far less of that of the man to whom she was uniting herself for life. It was only when their hands were joined that she turned full upon him; and he at the same time perceived that hers contained a small parcel or book—which, by her feverish pressure, seemed to be actually “thrust” upon his keeping. While she gazed full upon him, with a mingled expression of tenderness, pity, and contempt, he saw, with astonishment and pain, the change that a few weeks had wrought in her appearance, and looked alternately from the strange packet in his hand to the fixed and earnest glance still bent upon him. He half murmured something, in the extremity of his surprise, when she distinctly exclaimed:

“Cranston, take care of it!”

The officiating clergyman paused for a moment at this strange interruption, and Cranston, in his confusion, thrust the little parcel in his pocket. She still fixed her eyes upon him with the same continuity of gaze till the conclusion of the ceremony, when, with a long-drawn sigh, as though her soul was even at that moment quitting her feeble frame, she turned from him, and hurried down the aisle. He followed close upon her steps, but could not get near her for her friends, who appeared purposely to bar his approach. A travelling carriage stood at the church-door, into which, with two female friends, she was assisted by Mr. —, who immediately closed the door, and confronted Cranston, who, pale as ashes, and with eyes glaring and nostrils dilated, stared upon his wife. In another instant the old man was hurled from his place, and Cranston, quivering with rage, stuttered forth, incoherently:

“Madam! madam! what am I to —?”

She answered coldly, almost abstractedly:

“Pray, sir, do not molest me! I must not be detained! What can you want with me?”

“Are you mad?” he answered, “Miss Sand—Mrs. Cranston? What do I want? A wife!”

“You have her, Captain Cranston,” she replied, “in your pocket!”

The postilions at that instant dashed off, at a signal from the lady, leaving Cranston on the kerb-stone, stupefied—almost petrified with astonishment. He was immediately surrounded by his friends, who would have hurried him away from the gaze of the surrounding crowd into a carriage; but he neither heard nor saw them: he put his hand into his pocket, mechanically, for his handkerchief, and the mysterious packet fell at his feet. He picked it up, and perceived it was a small but elaborately-bound pocket-book. He hastily wrenched it open, in hopes of finding a solution to the enigma of the past month, and the inexplicable scene of the morning; and, to his horror, and the astonishment of his friends, he found that it contained his own letters during the last few weeks, and bank-notes to the amount of five-and-thirty thousand pounds: not a line—not a word—from the donor, in explanation—except that on the cover was a small gold plate, engraved simply thus: “Your wife.” It was the half of her fortune; he had fairly married it at the foot of the altar; and the unhappy lady said truly, when she left him so strangely, and for ever, that his bride was in his pocket.

The sequel is soon told: he pursued her throughout England and the continent, to no avail; and when at last, and after some years, he had discovered her sojourn in England, she refused to see him, or indeed to hold any communication with him directly or indirectly, as heretofore. In the meanwhile, the desperation of his position, and the long and expensive pursuit of his wife, had trenchanted materially upon the money she had so generously, though eccentrically, bestowed upon him—a sum which, in honour and delicacy, he should never have touched, till a full and perfect understanding had taken place between himself and the donatrix. The extraordinary scene at St. George's had made a great sensation throughout society. The facts had got abroad, with a thousand cruel and slanderous additions and exaggerations; and Cranston was universally “cut,” or received with the most marked slight and coldness. The rest is painful, indeed, to relate. Cranston plunged from that moment into a career of the most reckless extravagance and dissipation. This career was fatal as it was short; for, about seven years afterwards, an Englishman committed suicide, by shooting himself, in the prison of the Rue de Clichy, at Paris. None but the British Consul, and one or two other English residents, guessed that the shattered and prematurely old person of the suicide, “Henry Smith,” was in reality all that remained of the once proud and brilliant “Charley Cranston.” Yet it was so: sickness, wretchedness, and pauperism had driven him, at the early age of thirty-five, to the last refuge of the fool and the unbeliever.

There was but one mourner at the humble obsequies—it was Frank Harland, at the expense of whose slender purse they took place, and who happened to be then in Paris, on a wedding tour, with the lovely girl of his early affections. He was informed of the terrible catastrophe of “Henry Smith” by the consul, and hurried to the prison to see all that now remained of his proud and wayward cousin. He took the cold, marble hand in his, and wept long and silently, as he gazed upon that upturned, helpless, and rigid face—beautiful even in death.

They had not met since the scene at the Albany, detailed in the foregoing chapter.

Did they understand each other then?

There resided, for some few years before and after this melancholy circumstance, in a beautiful district of South Wales, a lady of a certain age, as remarkable for her unostentatious charities and general benevolence, as for her many eccentricities. She was idolised by the poor in her immediate vicinity, and talked of for her peculiarities over the entire county. She lived exclusively alone, and, though occupying a large mansion, employed but one female servant—apparently an old and confidential one. No other human being was ever permitted to enter the house, although a numerous establishment was kept up in the out-buildings. But it chanced that a remarkable change took place in her habits about the period of the catastrophe of Henry Smith, in Paris. She was not seen for many months, and when she came forth again among her numerous protégés, it was remarked, to their surprise, that her hair was white as snow. Still more painful to relate, her singularity of manner had changed to something more closely approaching to a positive aberration—her mind was shaken, irrevocably. In a little time she ceased to appear in public at all, except in a carriage with the same faithful old attendant, and a respectable-looking man—it was said it was her keeper. Within three years she died; and it is but necessary to add, that her maiden name was Clara Sandford.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

DIAMONDS IN CALIFORNIA.—The Columbia Casette mentions having been shown a large brilliant stone, which had been properly tested by several jewellers, and pronounced to be a pure and genuine diamond. It was found in a gulch two miles from Columbia, and weighed 17 carats: Its value will be immense.

The inventors of gun-cotton, Professor Schonbein, of Basle, and Professor Bottger, of Frankfort, have made over their process of preparation to the Austrian government, for 30,000 florins, two-thirds of which fall to the share of the former, as having the priority of invention. The money has already been paid in Frankfort. It is believed that the Austrian government has communicated to the government of the various States of the German Bund its willingness to admit them to a knowledge of the secret.

TAX ON COALS.—In 1851, the duty on coals brought by land into the port of London, as appears from a parliamentary paper, amounted, after deducting the expenses of collection, to £12,071 5s. 5³/₄d., and on sea-borne coals to £165,461 1s. 3d. There are other duties besides the 1s. 1d. per ton levied in the port of London, which will be ascertained by the commission granted on the subject.

TO RESTORE FROZEN PLANTS TO LIFE.—Ten chances to one, ladies, you will be tempted some of these fine days to put out the flower-pots in the sun; and by the same token, you will be tempted “out to tea,” and of course to spend the evening, trusting that some one will take in the flower-pots out of the freezing evening air. Vain hope! You return home and find a dozen of the choicest and most tender frozen to a crisp. Now don't get into a passion hot enough to thaw them—if you do you will kill them; and that is not all that is killed by passion, either, in many a family. Order a tub of water deep enough to immerse the whole plant; bring the pots out of the cold, one at a time, and put them in the water about five minutes. Take them out and drain off the water, dry them in a dark room, and keep the temperature at fifty or sixty degrees for a few days, and your sick patients will recover.

PATENT FLOUR MILL.—A new invention, by a Mr. Westrup, for grinding corn, has just been tried at Wapping. Mr. Westrup's invention accomplishes the pulverisation, not on the horizontal, but on the conical principle. He reduces the grinding surface of his stones to about seven inches, and, instead of retaining the flour until it is liberated by actual pressure, he allows it to fall on a second set of stones by its own gravity, and thence it is delivered by one instead of a hundred revolutions. The stones, which are about one-fifth the weight, do not wear out like the old ones, and the mill accomplishes more than double the amount of work with the same motive power. Mr. Westrup's and the old mills both being driven at the same speed, the result was, that the former ground 38³/₄ lbs. in five minutes, or 462 lbs. an hour, and the latter 15 lbs. in five minutes, or 180 lbs. an hour. The loss in grinding is less, and the produce of the more valuable portions of the wheat is increased; that is, the husk of the cavel is more thoroughly deprived of the flour.

BAILIE'S SMOKE GUARDS.—“Smoking chimneys” have been the object of remedies since the farther recollections of the oldest inhabitants of all places. It is impossible to recall the number of different cures which have been proposed and tried. They have generally proceeded upon the principle of contracting or narrowing the top of the chimney. The Patent Smoke Guards belonging to Messrs. Bailie, are formed upon the reverse of this principle. They expand at the top, but are so protected, that a current of air cannot enter the chimney. The patentees claim for them the power of increasing the draught of the chimney, in proportion to the strength of the wind, by the current passing between the chimney-top and the guard ring. The claim has been, we understand, so successfully established, as to relieve many families from the difficulty of smoking chimneys, while the guards are cheaply and easily constructed, and may be widely varied in form.

PATENT LIGHT REFLECTORS.—An article calculated to reflect light and lead it into quarters where, according to the common law, it would not come, has been patented by a French gentleman, and introduced advantageously into several offices in this city. The plan does not increase actual light existing, while yet it is brought into rooms which it would not otherwise visit. The reflectors are formed of copper, overlaid or watered with silver. They can be made of any form or size calculated to suit the locality where they are to be employed. They may be placed in costly frames and rendered ornamental. Some of them have a plain and others a grooved or undulating surface. The latter scatters the rays of light around an apartment, instead of conveying them upon one object. The efficiency of the reflectors depends naturally on their position, only that can be readily changed until the proper spot has been obtained, which a person accustomed to their use can readily fix. Their utility in the lower flats of houses, on stairs, and in vessels, is very great. Light by them can be guided round several dark corners into places out of which, by their construction, it had been previously closed. The utility of the invention cannot be doubted, and the cost brings it within general use, for it does not involve a large outlay. It will not create, and in one sense it will not increase light, but during its existence out of doors it brings it to places within doors, where it would not otherwise be found. In ground or sunk flats, on staircases, and in numerous, other positions, the diurnal reflectors must prove a great source of comfort and economy, rather increased by the circumstance that they will not get out of order readily, and will not come rapidly to an end.

MANUFACTURE OF COTTON.—Mr. Frederick Warren, of Manchester, has been delivering a course of lectures at the Society of Arts, on the history, trade, and manufacture of cotton. The lectures were devoted to a consideration of the natural history of the cotton-plant, and of the countries in which it flourished, the different varieties of long and short staple, and their peculiar uses being carefully described. Mr. Warren referred to the condition of the people in cotton-growing countries, and showed by well-arranged statistics how the increase of our trade with America in this article had been the direct cause of a gradual extension of slavery, and had tended to raise the money value of the slave. There were but two ways, he said, in which England could put a stop to that abominable system—and looking at it simply in a commercial spirit, he believed it was her interest to do so. The first was to purchase the whole of the slaves, and give them their liberty, as we had done in the case of our own colonies; and the other was to encourage the growth of cotton in British India, which had been shown to be capable of producing as good qualities and as great varieties of cotton as any other country. In India, too, British subjects would be employed as free labourers in its cultivation, and the cost of whom would not exceed, if indeed it came up to, one-sixth of the cost of slave labour. There were many reasons obvious to any one who thought on the subject, why it was advisable that we should not depend so completely on America for our increasing requirements: there was never much more than two months' supply on hand, and already, on several occasions, this supply had been jeopardised: sometimes by natural causes—as the failure of the crop; at others, by the attempt at monopoly on the part of American speculators, which had obliged us to pay a higher price, amounting, in one instance, to between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 in the year. When it was considered that 2,000,000 of our people were dependent for their daily bread on this trade, it became of the utmost importance that we should take every means in our power to prevent anything like an impediment arising to the regular and uninterrupted supply of so important a commodity.

A LOCKET AND CHAIN.

BY W. S. SHIPLEY.

THROUGH many a slow revolving day,
Which brought nor hope nor rest,
This simple little locket lay
On my deserted breast:
Like to an imprisoned tear,
The bright but hidden minister
Of thoughts, by sorrow made more sear.

A spell that may not be forgot,
A link which will not break,
The bitterness of that lone thought—
Oh that my heart could speak!
A flower rich dew-drops used to fill,
Which, though rude blasts combined to kill,
In withering is odorous still.

Oh! that the light of love's sweet dream
Were mine as 'twas of yore;
As a stray sunbeam lights the forest stream,
When the winter frost is hoar.
Tho' my summer hopes all faded lie,
My heart would pour with never a sigh,
A deep tho' plaintive melody.

Wear this for me—when life is fled,
And I am in the tomb—
Haply 'twill call again the dead
Back to their living bloom.
Time-cherished memories will spring
Fresh to my heart, encompassing Affection's pensive offering.

[PIGEONS FROM INDIA.]

INDIAN PIGEONS.

THE ornithology of India—the native country of the peacock—presents a numerous and splendid variety. Pigeons assume the most beautiful colours.

The domestic pigeon of Europe, in endless varieties, is common all over the continent, and in the time of the Emperor Akbar, the utmost attention was paid to their breed. That emperor was the greatest pigeon fancier of his day, and kept prodigious numbers, as well as an aviary of all sorts of birds. The Hindoos worship the peacock, the goose, and the owl, and it has been imagined that at one period the pigeon was held in veneration as an incarnation of some Hindoo deity. Gurovia, the carrier, is supposed to be a representative of Vishnu, who, in this form, is shown with the head and wings of a bird and the body of a man. It is most certain that the carrier pigeon originally came from India; therefore it is not likely a bird of such remarkable habits should have escaped the observation of the ancient Hindoos, worshipping, as they did, every kind of incarnation, and so prompt as they were to thrust every living form in their pantheon. However the fact may be, the pigeon is an immense favourite all over India.

In continuation of our illustrations of the latest additions to our native stocks of pigeons, we this week present our readers with an engraving of a pair of remarkably beautiful birds, brought from thence, and exhibited at the late Great Poultry Show in the metropolis, by the Messrs. Baker, of Chelsea. These pigeons have the glossy and brilliant plumage which distinguishes the feathered creation in the burning climate of India, and, like the more ferocious denizens of the dense forests and impenetrable jungles of that vast territory, are rather intractable. They have not yet been domesticated in England, but as almost everything is possible to care and perseverance, it is extremely probable that, in the course of a few years, our native tumbler, fantails, turbits, &c., will have become introduced to companions of their own pretty columbine class from every quarter of the globe—from Australia, the South Sea Islands, Guinea, the Cape of Good Hope, and North and South America. The possession of pigeons being the fashion—we might add, a passion—in this country, the supply of foreign varieties will no doubt keep pace with the demand, and the journalist may shortly have to announce that every known specimen of the rather numerous pigeon family has found a home and a habitation in the sturdy climate of the untamed, and likely to continue the untameable, wild pigeon and ringdove.

Could the breeding of such a delicate-eating bird be turned to economical purposes, so much the better; for rearing poultry of all descriptions is far more profitable and infinitely less troublesome than rearing cattle and sheep; but as the rage at present is for pets—and of all winged pets the pigeon is the prettiest and most amiable—such a suggestion is not likely to be much regarded. It is natural that old and young should have avourites among the lower orders of creation, and we do not see any good reason why the predilection should be disturbed. A partiality for the beautiful or docile softens the heart and humanises the feelings; indeed, we should not care much for that man who could be insensible to the honest welcome of a dog or the affectionate purring of a cat. Therefore we can more than tolerate what has been termed the pigeon mania; for, of all the birds of the air, the pigeon is the most cleanly, and the most susceptible of attachments. It is a good husband and a fond parent; and therein it teaches all of the genus homo who are not so, the beauty and value of conjugal love, as well as the folly of introducing discord into a dwelling. It teaches another lesson also: it is fond of home; its fidelity to its abode is extraordinary. How many truant husbands and negligent fathers can lay this flattering unction to their souls? Not many, we are afraid; for we never, during our rambles through our large towns on a Saturday night, saw a man stagger in his gait, be it ever so slightly, but we thought that with every oscillation he was planting a sly dagger-thrust into the heart of his domestic peace.

But we must not give the pigeon credit for every virtue. Occasionally he is very quarrelsome and pugnacious; and then, as in other places we could mention, the rest of the community lead a very miserable existence until he is expelled, or reformed by suitable correction. Various contrivances for the latter purpose have been resorted to. One good method we have seen successfully tried is, to tie the hinder claw to the back of the leg: the consequence is, that, in battle, this combatant is soon overthrown; because, having only one claw to support himself, he cannot stand firm enough to continue the contest. Some keepers fasten the wings together, which at once deprives the bird of its most powerful weapon; others tie a thread round the beak, which prevents it from doing much on the offensive: and the result of these various proceedings appears to be generally the same—to satisfy the pigeon of his inability to tyrannise over his companions—when he is glad to sneak away, and behave with more propriety in future.

But, with all our penchant for pets, we do think that pigeons might be bred at a handsome profit for the market, and make their appearance in certain savoury pies well known to the palates of children of a larger growth.

ORIGIN OF CERTAIN WORDS.

AND the words of dignity, state, honour, and pre-eminence, with one remarkable exception (to be adduced presently), descend to us from the Normans—sovereign, sceptre, throne, realm, royalty, homage, prince, duke, count (“earl, indeed, is Scandinavian, though he must borrow his “countess” from the Norman), chancellor, treasurer, palace, castle, hall, dome, and a multitude more. At the same time, the one remarkable exception of “king,” would make us, even did we know nothing of the actual facts, suspect that the chieftain of this ruling race came in, not upon a new title, not as overthrowing a former dynasty, but claiming to be in the rightful line of its succession; that the true continuity of the nation had not, in fact, any more than in word, been entirely broken, but survived in due time to assert itself anew. And yet, while the statelier superstructure of the language—almost all articles of luxury, all that has to do with the chase, with chivalry, with personal adornment—is Norman throughout, with the broad basis of the language, and therefore of the life, it is otherwise. The great features of nature—the sun, the moon, the stars, the earth, the water, the fire, all the prime social relations, father, mother, husband, wife, son, daughter—these are Saxon. The palace and the castle may have come to us from the Norman, but to the Saxon we own far dearer names—the home, the hearth, the house, the roof. His “board,” and often probably it was no more, has a more hospitable sound than the other’s “table.” His sturdy arms turn the soil; he is the boor, the hind, the churl; or if his Norman master has a name for him, it is one which on his lips becomes more and more a title of opprobrium and contempt—the villain. The instruments used in cultivating the earth, the flail, plough, sickle, spade, are expressed in his language; so, too, the main products of the earth, as wheat, rye, oats, bere, i. e., barley; and no less the names of domestic animals. Concerning these last it is not a little characteristic to observe—and Walter Scott has put the observation into the mouth of the Saxon swineherd in Ivanhoe—that the names of almost all, so long as they are alive, are thus Saxon, but when dressed and prepared for food become Norman—a fact, indeed, which we might have expected beforehand, for the Saxon hind had the charge and labour of tending and feeding them, but only that they might lie on the table of his Norman lord. Thus, ox, steer, cow, are Saxon, but beef Norman; calf is Saxon, but veal Norman; sheep is Saxon, but mutton Norman; so it is severally with swine and pork, deer and venison, fowl and pullet. Bacon, the only flesh which may ever have come within his reach, is the single exception. Putting all these together, with much more of the same kind which might be produced, but has only been indicated here, we should certainly gather, that while there are manifest tokens, as preserved in our language, of the Saxon having been for a season an inferior and even an oppressed race, the stable elements of Saxon life, however overlaid for awhile, have still made good their claim to be the solid groundwork of the after nation as of the after language; and to the justice of this conclusion all other historic records, and the present social condition of England, consent in bearing testimony.

GOLD FISH.—This beautiful little fish, called in this country “gold and silver fish,” are originally natives of China and Japan, where they are held in great estimation, and are called Kinyu. From China the English carried some of them to the island of St. Helena; and from thence the captain of one of our East India ships brought some of them to England, in the year 1788.

THE CHEAPNESS OF GOODNESS.—“Give me health of body, soundness of heart, as far as the heart of man can be sound, with the freshness of nature around me and I may deem the pomp of an emperor ridiculous.”

Earth gets its price for what it gives us:
The beggar is taxed for a corner to die in;
We bargain for the graves we lie in;
For a cap and bells our lives we pay;
Bubbles we earn with the whole soul’s tasking
’Tis heaven alone that is given away;
’Tis only good may be had for the asking.
There is no price set on the lavish summer,
And June may be had by the poorest comer.

WHITE NEGROES.—The existence of white negroes is a fact of very considerable interest in relation to the science of ethnology. We have authority for stating that the Africans brought from the Gold Coast to the islands of Martinique, Guadeloupe, and Dominica, gave birth to white negroes in the proportion of one to every six or seven children. A great naturalist has given a minute description of one of them, a negress, born in the island of Dominica, of black parents who were natives of Africa. She was not quite five feet high, was well proportioned in her body, but not exactly so with respect to her head, which was too large in comparison with the trunk. All the features of the face, although white, were in form exactly similar to those of the black negroes, except that the ears were placed too high. The lips and the mouth, although shaped like those of the black negroes, had a singular appearance. They were as white as the rest of the skin, and without the slightest appearance of colour. Generally the hue of the skin of this white negress, as well of her face as of the rest of her body, resembled that of tallow before it had been purified, although a slight tinge of red was observable on her cheeks when she approached the fire, or when a blush was awakened. Her head was well covered with wool, extremely bushy and curly, naturally white at the roots, and reddish at the extremities. Her eyes were remarkable for a very singular motion. The eyelids were no larger than the ordinary size. She could shut them, but had no power to open them, so as to show the part above the pupil. Thus the eye-lids were always half closed. The white of the eye was sufficiently pure, and the pupil of ordinary size. The iris was composed of an inner circle round the pupil, of an indistinct yellow; this was surrounded by another circle of yellow mingled with blue; and this again by an outer circle of a deep blue colour, so that seen at a little distance the eyes appeared of a dark blue.

THROGMORTON ATTACKED ON HIS ROAD TO HATFIELD.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW, ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER IX.

Honour, a sacred tie—the law of kings,
The noble mind's distinguishing perfection—
Which aids and strengthens virtue when it needs it.
It ought not to be sported with.

ELIZABETH commenced her interview with the young gentleman who knelt before her with a long and somewhat tedious exordium upon honour, and the qualities which ought to distinguish a true and perfect gentleman: such as sincerity, fair dealing, and loyalty, both in thought and action; then concluded, by assuring the astonished youth—who could not comprehend either her purpose, or why he had been summoned to her presence—that she had the most unbounded confidence in his character and devotion to her interests.

"Your grace does me but justice," was the reply; "and yet it would appear presumption were I to speak of either, since I am not only young but without ability to serve you, otherwise than by my wishes—and they must ever be for your highness's happiness and welfare!"

"At least," observed the princess, "you can answer my questions truly."

"As truly as I would to heaven!" exclaimed the young man. "I would not deceive the meanest creature of God's earth, much less the sister of my sovereign—the future hope of England!"

"It is well!" answered the royal maiden. "Tell me, did your companion speak truly, when he said that he received his orders from the lips of the king himself?"

"I cannot speak positively," replied the young man "but I believe not; though why he should deceive your grace would puzzle me to tell. I saw the Duke of Northumberland give him the letters with his own hand, but heard not his instructions."

"I thought so!" muttered Elizabeth; "the disloyal traitor!"

"And Edward," she continued, lowering her voice to an earnest whisper; "does he still live?"

"There," replied the youthful scion of the noble house of Howard, "I can reassure your highness, since I heard my Lord of Canterbury tell the Earl of Arundel, who arrived at Greenwich scarce an hour before my departure, that the king had passed a better night, and was anxious to receive him."

"Arundel, too!" she murmured; "the fast friend of my sister! Oh, tis a deep-laid scheme!"

"Madam!"

"And beyond this you know nothing?"

"Nothing, your grace—positively nothing! If there be any plot," continued the young man, "believe me, I am guiltless of it! I would die to serve you, if the sacrifice of so poor a life could procure you one moment's happiness, or advance the welfare of my country!"

"I do believe you, sir!" said Elizabeth, slightly blushing at the warmth of his words and the ardent expression of his eyes—not that she was offended with either; "and whatever may be the designs or machinations of our enemies, we promise to acquit you in our judgment. Perhaps," she added, with an affectation of security, which she was far from feeling, "we have been too hasty, and suspected my good Lord of Northumberland of thoughts and purposes foreign to his heart—but experience has taught us caution; we will give orders for our departure."

Cequetitiously ungloving her hand, which was remarkable for its beauty, the princess gave it him to kiss—a most unusual mark of favour, and accorded rather to his good looks than as a recompense for any positive intelligence she had gleaned from him. The fact was, he had nothing to communicate—his companion was the person intrusted with the real intentions of her enemy. Howard had been selected merely as a blind to accompany him, on account of his name and youth.

Lady Tyrrel, who was standing behind the chair of the royal maiden, leant forward and whispered something in her ear.

"Forget this interview," said Elizabeth, bowing to him in token that their conversation was ended, "until happier times—if," she added, with a deep-drawn sigh, "heaven should have such times in store for me."

"Forget it!" exclaimed the youth; "impossible!"

"At least," added the lady, "do not speak of it."

Howard promised, and was conducted by the beautiful Isabella Markham from the closet of her mistress back to the great hall of Hatfield, where Sir Thomas Tyrrel was entertaining his companion with a collation and a flask of Gascony wine—both of which the tired messenger was doing full justice to.

"Where has been?" he demanded, suspiciously, as the young man made his appearance.

Howard took his seat at the table in silence.

"Where has been?" rudely repeated Sir Thomas Marshall, his suspicions more and more aroused by the manner of the young man.

The youth eyed him with a half-serious, half-satirical expression of countenance, as he made answer:

"Sir Thomas Marshall—the favour of my Lord of Northumberland has made you a knight, but it has failed, I perceive, to give you the discretion of a gentleman, else you had avoided such familiar questioning, which, to say truth, is not customary between men of gentle birth."

Stung more by the manner than the words of the young patrician, the knight started from his seat, and half drew his sword, calling upon Howard to stand on the defence—a request which the latter was no way loth to comply with.

Although Sir Thomas Tyrrel professed to be extremely indignant at the insult offered to the dignity of the Lady Elizabeth, in making her residence a scene of broil, he was secretly delighted with the contretemps, as it offered a fair excuse for delaying the departure of his charge.

"Sir Thomas! Mr. Howard!" he exclaimed, as they exchanged one or two rapid passes; "does this unseemly contest befit the residence of your sovereign's sister? Nay, and ye persist, it is time I called those who will teach you reason!"

A few rapid strokes of the bell brought about a dozen servitors into the hall—for Elizabeth kept considerable state in her retirement, and her retainers were picked men, upon whose fidelity she could rely—and with their staves they quickly separated the combatants. No sooner had they done so, than the doors at the dais end of the hall were thrown open, and the princess herself appeared, followed by her bevy of ladies. The eyes of the young lioness of the Plantagenet and Tudor line flashed proudly as she looked around her. Howard sank upon his knees his opponent stood sullenly still, gazing as if in defiance upon her.

"What broil is this?" she demanded.

Sir Thomas Tyrrel was silent: he felt that he might securely leave the vindication of her outraged dignity in the hands of his mistress.

"What broil is this?" she repeated. "God's death!" she added, with increased vehemence—for we are sorry to record that the maiden queen had inherited her father's habit of swearing—"must we speak twice?"

"Answer me, Sir Thomas! Who has dared to make the hall of Hatfield the scene of their rude quarrel?"

Thus called upon, the worthy knight related the affair as favourably as possible for Mr. Howard, upon whom he shrewdly guessed the princess did not wish her anger to fall.

"Sir Thomas Marshall," said the princess, as soon as he had finished; "we regret that your unseemly violence has rendered it impossible for us to accept your escort and guidance to London. Fortunately," she added, "our own poor train is sufficient for the protection of our person. We will do no dishonour to our brother's messenger—but pardon and dismiss him."

"Stay, madam!" exclaimed the messenger, as the speaker was hurrying to leave the hall; "you forget my errand and my orders!"

The serving-men and gentlemen of the household, who by this time thronged the apartment in considerable numbers, began to murmur, at hearing their mistress thus familiarly addressed; but Elizabeth, who, under her mask of passion was calm and prudent, restrained them with a look.

"Your errand, I presume, was accomplished, when you delivered the letter of your master. I have yet to learn," she added, calmly, "what orders I am to receive from so courteous a messenger!"

"My orders are to accompany your grace to London," replied the knight, who began to feel that he was baffled.

"We do discharge you of them, and will answer to our brother for our actions."

The ruffian muttered something about the duke, and his determination to enforce the orders he had been charged with. In an instant her previous suspicions were confirmed, and Elizabeth decided how to act.

Perfectly aware that whilst in Hatfield she was safe, she resolved at once to brave the messenger of her enemy. The only danger in doing so, was in the possibility that he was really the messenger of her dying brother.

"Sir Thomas Tyrrel," she said, "you will remove that person from our house. Use no more violence than is necessary to maintain my just authority in my own residence; but remember that it must be maintained at any risk. And then give orders," she added, from an afterthought that possibly she might be deceived in her suspicions, "for my departure for London."

At this moment, the door at the entrance of the hall was unceremoniously opened, and Throgmorton, covered with dust and wounded, staggered forward, holding in his hand the small golden-bound volume of prayers he had received from Cecil.

Elizabeth recognised the token in an instant, and knew that her brother had passed to his account. The messenger had been overtaken and waylaid by a party of Northumberland's men, from whom he escaped with the greatest difficulty, and not without being severely wounded in the attempt.

"Princess," he exclaimed, "you are deceived! The invitation from your royal brother is an artful scheme to draw you from your retreat into the power of your enemies. The sovereign of England is now Queen Mary!"

There was a pause; every eye was turned with a loathing or menacing expression upon Sir Thomas Marshall, who, now aghast, threw up his cap in the hall and shouted, in a tone of defiance:

"God save Queen Jane!"

Elizabeth sank upon her knees, and replied, in a clear, loud voice:

"God save Queen Mary!"

A cry which was instantly echoed by her attendants. Having thus made her public profession of loyalty, she turned to Sir Thomas Tyrrel, and directed him to dismiss the messenger of the Duke of Northumberland, on the instant, from Hatfield.

"Go, baffled traitor!" she added; "dishonoured gentleman! your treason is defeated: a hand more powerful than mine shall avenge the outrage paid to the royal dignity in my poor person! And, if he resists," she continued, addressing the retainers and gentlemen present, "cut him down as you would a wolf in your path; but treat his companion with all courtesy, since Master Howard is guileless in this matter."

With these directions the princess left the hall, but not till she had whispered to Lady Tyrwhit, to lead Throgmorton to her closet, in order that she might question him touching the death of her brother and the position of the two parties in London: that is to say, the adherents of Lady Jane, and the supporters of the legitimate queen, her sister.

Sir Thomas Marshall was too prudent to brave the danger which threatened: he well knew that in the event of the Princess Mary succeeding, his life would be forfeited, even if it was not already compromised by his overt act of treason, in publicly acknowledging her rival. Casting a sullen look of defiance around him, he slowly left the hall of Hatfield—not an arm being raised against him—such being its mistress's express commands.

CHAPTER X.

Think you I am of Esau's blood, to barter
Mine inheritance? OLD PLAY.

ALTHOUGH the death of Edward placed the Princess Elizabeth a step nearer to the throne, it rather augmented than diminished the perils of her position. Between the gloomy daughter of Catherine of Arragon and herself there had never been much sisterly affection: religious differences and political rivalries had still further widened the breach between them. Perhaps, too, the future queen had acted impolitically in refusing her sister's invitation to reside with her, on the marriage of their step-mother, Catherine Parr, with the Lord Admiral Seymour.

"God help me!" murmured the royal maiden, as she sank upon her knees in the apartment to which she had retired; "my heart is heavy with these tidings! My once kind brother hath left the world, his ear poisoned against his favourite sister! Heaven pardon those who breathe discord between us!"

A flood of tears came to her relief. There is little doubt that Elizabeth entertained, at one period of her life, a very sincere affection for her youthful brother. They had been children together, shared the same studies and pleasures, in the life-time of their father. So strong and mutual was the attachment between them, that it required years of intrigue and misrepresentation on the part of the Seymours and the Dudley faction to shake it; and even then they only partially succeeded—for there is every reason to suppose that if Elizabeth's place in the order of succession had been next to Edward, the youthful monarch would never have consented to pass her over in favour of his cousin, the Lady Jane.

"Your grace," said Lady Tyrwhit, "the gentleman who brought the mournful intelligence of your royal brother's decease is in the antechamber, waiting your pleasure to question him."

"Anon, anon!" replied Elizabeth, wiping her eyes with her kerchief; "it is not often that I indulge in the luxury of tears. 'Tis past!" she added; "the weakness is past!—admit the gentleman."

During the brief space of time which had elapsed between the princess quitting the hall and her reception of Throgmorton, the latter had removed some of the stains of blood and dust from his person. Master Howard, with whom he was personally acquainted, had bound his wounded arm with his silken scarf: so that when Lady Tyrwhit introduced him into the royal closet, he appeared, as he really was, a proper gentleman, whom a woman's eye might find pleasure to look upon. The gracious manner in which the mistress of Hatfield received him, was due, perhaps, as much to his good looks as to the service he had so lately rendered her; for, to the close of her long life, Elizabeth was fond of having tall and stalwart men about her. Comeliness of person was always a passport to the favour of the maiden queen.

At her command, Throgmorton related everything which had passed the preceding day at Greenwich. The death of the king, whose last moments he had witnessed, and the precautions taken by the Duke of Northumberland to secure the person of Queen Mary, as well as her own.

The latter part of his intelligence seemed to interest the princess deeply. With many ejaculations and prayers for the safety of her dear sister, and most gracious sovereign—as she repeatedly styled the daughter of Catherine of Arragon—she inquired if any means had been taken to forewarn the queen of the intended treachery.

"There has," replied the confidant of Cecil; "there is every hope that a friend or follower of my Lord of Arundel has put her majesty upon her guard."

"Heaven speed him!" exclaimed her grace.

"Amen!" answered Throgmorton.

But the words of neither of the speakers were as hearty as before—there is a tone in truth and sincerity which hypocrisy, with all its maskings, cannot imitate.

After a brief consultation with her friends, it was decided that the princess should remain at present at Hatfield, but prepared to quit it, in event of danger, at a moment's notice. For this purpose, her cofferer, Parry, received orders to pack her jewels and money, and have her train in readiness: not that his mistress had much to fear—the possession of her person would only become necessary for the success of the conspirators, in the event of her sister Mary falling into their hands. Perhaps, too, the clear-sighted Elizabeth saw that the attempt to place the Lady Jane upon the throne would only end in the ruin of her partisans and abettors.

The next day it was given out that the princess was sick, and unable to leave her chamber. Hatfield was closed to all visitors; and yet, during the night, many gentlemen of the neighbourhood, who were known to be well affected to the Protestant cause, were secretly admitted. Elizabeth was not a person to be taken unprepared.

For several days all remained tranquil in the neighbourhood of Hatfield. The Duke of Northumberland, who had succeeded in vanquishing the scruples, but not the reason of his daughter-in-law, the unfortunate lady Jane, to accept the crown, was too much busied with proclaiming her queen, and the councils which were daily held at the Tower, to bestow much thought upon Elizabeth, who was permitted to remain undisturbed at her manor. But when he found that Mary had escaped his toils, and, at the head of the gentry of Norfolk and Suffolk, was advancing towards London, he sent commissioners to treat with the princess—for he was perfectly aware that many of the partisans of the Catholic queen only advocated her rights, as a means of securing those of her Protestant sister.

At an early hour on the sixth day after the demise of Edward, the two gentlemen trusted with the delicate negotiation arrived at Hatfield, attended by a train sufficient to keep the menials on the alert, but not to occasion any serious alarm for the safety of the princess.

No sooner was Elizabeth informed of their arrival, than she prepared to give them audience in the great hall, where she had previously received Sir Thomas Marshall and Master Howard.

The royal maiden was attired in deep mourning, as were all the ladies and officers of her household. Curiosity and anxiety were depicted on every countenance, to hear the message of Northumberland, whose mad ambition had led him to so many crimes, that it was thought there was scarcely one at which he would pause to complete the work of treason. Howard and Throgmorton were both upon their guard.

Although the two commissioners must have been aware that the royal maiden was well acquainted with the loss of her brother, they began in a set speech to inform her of the death of the king, employing as much circumlocution as if the news were imparted for the first time; and concluded with formal proffers of condolence, in the name of the Duke of Northumberland, Edward's friend and minister.

"Thank the duke," replied Elizabeth, with modest dignity, "for his loyal duty. Heaven will doubtless support us in our private loss, and watch over the nation in its public one."

A general "Amen!" responded to the first wish of the princess.

There was a momentary pause: the messengers of the duke were embarrassed how to proceed. After a whispered consultation, the elder of the two requested for himself and colleague a private audience of her grace.

"Private!" repeated the princess; "and wherefore so?"

He muttered something about affairs of state.

Sir Thomas Tyrwhit, who was standing with Parry, the cofferer, at the back of her highness's chair, whispered a few words in her ear, to which Elizabeth replied by an approving nod. The advice tallied with her judgment.

"I can listen," she made answer, in a clear, loud voice, "to no communication in private, lest my actions be misrepresented, and my loyalty called in doubt."

"Your grace—"

"Hear me," she continued, interrupting the speaker; "if you are charged by your master or the council with message or token to me, speak it publicly; otherwise, accept my thanks for your courtesy; and so God speed you, and hold you in his holy keeping."

Finding that no hope remained of a private interview, the messengers resolved to speak out rather than leave their errand unaccomplished. This was the very thing the princess wished, as it would give her an opportunity of replying openly—placing her loyalty to her sister beyond a doubt.

They began by declaring that the late king, moved by the wish of the nation and the advice of his council, had left the crown to his cousin, the Lady Jane; and concluded by proffering, in the name of the duke, a large sum of money, and the grant of various crown lands, provided Elizabeth would acknowledge the new order of things, and renounce her claim to the succession.

A smile of bitter scorn lit the handsome features of the royal girl—for she was little more—at the audacious proposal.

"You ask of me an impossibility," she said.

"How so, your grace?"

"And a crime!" she continued. Whilst my sister, the queen, lives, I have neither rights nor claims to barter. Mary is your lawful queen as well as mine, and God forbid that any act of mine should tend to dispute her rights!"

A general shout of "God save Queen Mary!" broke from all present, except the envoys of Northumberland.

"Take at once my answer," continued the princess; "I do hold your master and all who abet him, forsworn and perfidious traitors—I scorn and defy them—reject all dealings with them; and command ye to depart from Hatfield with all speed. Had I sufficient force," she added, "I would send ye bound to the sovereign whom you have betrayed; as it is, I can only scorn and dismiss you."

With these high-spirited and loyal words, Elizabeth left the hall, followed by her ladies.

The baffled commissioners of the duke sadly returned to London: the words of Elizabeth had shaken their faith in the fortunes of Lady Jane, and the star of her father-in-law, Northumberland.

ORDERS have been issued to place Tilbury Fort in a state of defence. A full company of Artillery is to be quartered there. The fort mounts ninety guns of heavy ordnance.

THE ESTRANGEMENT.

CHAPTER I.

"COME, Alice, it is cool and pleasant now that the sun has hidden itself behind the hills, and we have just time for one more quiet walk in the garden. We must contrive to bring more colour to those cheeks before Elliot comes, or he will think that his bride gives him but a sorry welcome!" and, twining her arm about her young sister's waist, Edith Templeton drew her gently towards the door. "There, now that you are blushing so prettily, you look rather more like yourself! I need have no anxiety about your roses—if Elliot's name is so efficacious, what will not his presence be?"

Alice made no reply to her sister's raillery, but her lip trembled, and, laying her head upon Edith's shoulder, she wept violently.

"Why, Alice, my darling, what is it? Such bitter tears, when I thought you would be so very happy! Do not sob so, sister, but speak to me—what is it?"

"Oh, nothing—nothing, Edith," replied Alice. "I shall feel better if you let me weep awhile. I have been thinking more of you than of Elliot, to-day; more of the love I am leaving than of that to which I am going—that is all, Edith. Edith, can any one ever be to me all you have been?"

"Yes, Alice, Elliot Dana can be to you all and more than I have been, if you will allow him to be. But, if you desire it, you must be willing to confide in him, wholly and unreservedly—you must trust him with a perfect trust. He is proud—very proud—and anything like reserve and distance on your part will surely meet with an answering reserve on his. Will you try and remember this, Alice?"

"I will try, Edith; but I am afraid I shall not prove a very apt pupil. I am a Templeton, you know, and I have my full share of the Templeton pride."

"I do know it right well, Alice. If I did not, I should not speak to you thus. You will not need these cautions at first. While you are journeying here and there through these bright summer months, beneath the first clear radiance of the honeymoon, Elliot will have nothing to do but to play the lover—little to think of save his fair wife. But when you are fairly settled in your new home, and business cares again engross his attention, there will necessarily be a change, and you will be very apt to fancy that he is growing cold—that he does not love you as he did, and all that. Then, Ally, dear, if you listen to the whisperings of your 'Templeton pride,' as you call it, you will think that you are yourself in duty bound to be a little more dignified and reserved than usual, and before either of you are aware of it, there will be a veil drawn between your hearts; and when there is a veil once drawn, even though it be a very slight one, between the heart of husband and wife, believe me it is a difficult matter for either party to lift it again. Do not forget this, Alice; and do not forget, either, that woman can bend far more easily and gracefully than man. See—this slender, fragile filly bends as the wind sweeps over it, until its pure white cup nearly touches the ground; and now that the breeze is still, it lifts itself again, and is as erect and graceful as ever. Do not be too proud to whisper that little word forgive, if it should ever be right for you to do so, Alice."

"Bless me! what a sermon, Edith!" said Alice, with a bright smile—for the April shower was over, and the sky clear again. "And your doctrines are rather unpalatable, too; but I will do the best I can, dear sister, and I really do not believe there is danger that any difficulty or misunderstanding will ever arise between Elliot and I, for I love him so very dearly, and I think he loves me as well."

"God grant it, my sweet sister!" replied Edith, as she kissed her fondly. "But you will need Principle as well as Love to guide you—mutual trust and mutual forbearance in this, as in every other relation of life. But I won't lecture you any more now: I want you to come down to the arbour with me, and see what a beautiful cluster of rose-buds I have saved for your hair. Here they are, hidden away among these leaves. Are they not beauties?"

"Oh, they are perfectly lovely! And this myrtle—how fresh and green it is! Must the wreath for the day be made to-night?"

"No, there will be time enough in the morning. They will be all the prettier. But I told Mary I would help her arrange the fruit this evening, and it is time we were about it. Will you stay here? You will get an earlier glimpse of Elliot as he comes up the hill here, than from the house, and I presume that will be quite an inducement."

"Yes, I will stay here or awhile. I want to go round and look at all the vines and flowers once more. But, Edith, wait one moment, will you? I want to talk to you a little longer."

"Certainly, my love. What have you to say to me?"

For the second time that evening the tears gathered in Alice's eyes, and she again buried her face in her sister's bosom.

"Perhaps we shall not be alone again, Edith, and I want to thank you now for all the kind care you have taken of me ever since our mother died. I know that I have sometimes been very thoughtless and wayward, and I have not seemed to regard your wishes as I ought: will you promise me that when I am gone, you will remember only my love for you; and that you will forgive me, if I have ever made you unhappy?"

Edith clasped the slight, girlish figure that lay in her arms still more closely to her heart, as she answered:

"I have nothing to forgive, dearest Alice. You have been a comfort and a blessing to me all your life, and how papa and I are going to get along at all without you, I am sure I do not know. But we must not sentimentalise now, and you must wipe away those tears. The stage will be along in half an hour, and you shall not have one peep at Elliot until you can receive him with one of your own bright smiles. I am not going to leave you out here to cry over the flowers—come and tell me in which of the baskets those grapes Mrs. Harrison sent us will look best, and then go brush your hair. The wind has blown it about until it is in the most picturesque disorder imaginable."

"Then I had better leave it as it is, for Elliot is a great lover of the picturesque," said Alice, laughingly taking out her comb, and shaking her head until her golden brown hair fell in a rich, wavy mass far below her waist.

Edith thought, as she looked admiringly upon her, that she was lovely enough at any time.

"That will do very well; still I think smooth and neatly-arranged tresses are rather better adapted to your style of beauty. But we must not loiter here." And, lightly humming "Come haste to the wedding," Edith caught her young sister's hand and half drew her into the house.

The half-hour had hardly elapsed before the rumbling of wheels was heard, and Edith sprang to the door to greet her brother elect. As for Alice, she remained on the sofa so quietly and demurely, that one might have imagined her the most uninterested personage in the house—if her heightened colour and the trembling of her lip had not betrayed her.

The next morning Alice Templeton stood by the side of Elliot Dana, and took upon herself those vows that death can alone dissolve. Edith's cheek was very pale—paler than that of the young bride. She trembled as she thought how much of weal or woe hung upon the event of that very hour; and it may be that her memory flew back to one who was sleeping beneath the "salt sea foam"—one to whom, in the morning of her life, her own troth had been pledged. But before the blessing was pronounced she had conquered her emotion, and it passed unnoted.

"I am very sorry your mother was not able to come with you, Elliot," said Alice, that afternoon, as they chanced to be alone for a moment, while waiting for the carriage that was to take them as far as B—. "I would have been glad to have seen her first in my own home."

"You will see her first in your own home, my Alice, more truly so than if you had seen her here; for your home now is where mine is. I tried to prevail on my mother to accompany me; but she thought it was too much of an undertaking for such an invalid as herself, especially as we were to leave so soon after the wedding. We shall be with her now in about a month."

"I long to see her, Elliot—and Paul, too; and yet I almost dread it. Oh, I do hope that I may indeed call all your friends mine!"

"They will all love you, Alice—I am sure they will! how, indeed, could they help it?" was the lover-like reply; and the young husband pressed his lips fondly upon the small hand that lay within his own. "My mother loves you already; and you will very soon forget that she is a stranger; and, as for Paul, he is fairly wild with delight at the thought of having a sister. Our little circle will be a very happy one, I trust, dearest, and we shall never let you pine for the dear home you are leaving now!"

"Elliot—Alice—the carriage is at the door," said Edith, who at that moment entered. "You must not keep it waiting long, for, if you do, it will be very late before you reach B—. God bless you, and keep you, darling!" she murmured, as Alice clung to her as a child clings to its mother. "Take her, Elliot, and cherish her as tenderly as we would have done, had she been content to remain with us. You cannot do more."

"I will, Edith—I will guard her as my own life!" replied the young man, deeply affected; and then leading the weeping Alice to her father, they knelt for a moment to receive his parting blessing. It was given in low, tremulous tones; the last kisses were exchanged, the last fond words spoken, the last clasp of the warm hand given, and then the household band was broken, and the youngest and fairest went forth to lend light and beauty to another hearthstone!

CHAPTER II.

ELLIOT Dana's home was in one of the large and beautiful villages of the west of England, and thitherward, about six weeks after their marriage, he bore his young and beautiful wife. Tired of the dust and confusion of the train, they were glad enough to exchange it for the elegant and luxurious carriage that they found awaiting their arrival at a station about twenty miles from their journey's end.

The day wore away. The sun sank to rest beneath its canopy of clouds, crimson tinted, and purple and green and gold; and the soft September twilight stole slowly upon them. They became quiet then—very quiet. Alice's gay, bird-like laugh grew still, and, drawing closer to Elliot's side, her large, violet eyes sought his with an earnest, thoughtful expression half veiling their brightness. Her husband bent involuntarily to kiss that uplifted brow.

"We are almost home! Oh, Alice! I never before felt the true meaning of that word! God grant that, for you and for me, our home may indeed ever be a haven of rest!"

"Amen!" was the low, tearful response; and they did not speak again until the horses paused before a tasteful and unpretending brick mansion, in one of the most retired and pleasant streets of the village.

"Oh, mother! they've come, they've come!" shouted a gay, glad voice; and, bounding down the steps, and up upon the foot-boards, Paul Dana grasped his brother's hand, and half-gaily, half-bashfully saluted Alice; but the kiss he received in return was so cordial and sincere, that he whispered in her ear: "I know that we shall be famous friends—shan't we, now?"

"Ah, Paul, Paul—you rogue! don't be plotting treason so quick!" exclaimed Elliot, as he sprang to the ground; "where's mother?"

"Here she is, my son!"

There was a quick embrace, and then the young man silently presented his bride to his mother.

"I have never had a daughter, Alice," whispered Mrs. Dana, as she folded the trembling girl to her heart, and kissed her blushing cheek; "and Elliot could not possibly have brought me a more welcome gift. But come in, children; you must need rest."

What a pleasant room it was! Alice's heart was full to overflowing as she crossed the threshold of her new home. The evening was a little chilly—there was a bright fire in the grate, and the cheery jets of flame seemed trying to outshine the milder light of the shaded lamp that fell upon the books, the pictures, the crimson curtains, and fairly flooded the little tea-table on which it stood.

"I told Maggie we would have tea here to-night," said Mrs. Dana, in her calm, quiet way. "I thought it would seem more cheerful than the dining-room—that is so large!"

Alice's eyes filled, for she knew it was tender, kindly feeling for the stranger bride that had prompted the wish to have everything "seem cheerful."

"That's right, mother. And when Alice has disposed of her travelling-dress, I shall be right glad of a cup of Maggie's tea. These lake breezes do give one a most famous appetite."

The travelling-dress was laid aside. Maggie brought in the tea, and the little hot biscuits and the honey and the fruit, and they gathered round the table.

What a long time they lingered over that tea-table! There were so many questions to ask and to answer; so many things to tell, and so many kinds words that must be spoken.

There was more talking than eating done that night, despite Elliot's appetite: but at last Mrs. Dana arose.

"It is very pleasant sitting here and talking, children; but Alice looks tired and somewhat pale. I am sure she would be better off in her own room."

Alice assented, for she was indeed very much fatigued.

"I am very happy in my new home"—thus wrote Alice to Edith, about two months after her arrival there—"and if you could join our pleasant little circle for awhile, you would say I was the most thankless creature in the whole world if I were otherwise. The bridal festivities are all over to Elliot's great delight and I am fairly installed 'lady of the manor.' You would have laughed to have seen how quietly and easily Mrs. Dana—our mother, I mean—that word seems very strange to my lips as yet, but it is far from being such to my heart—slipped the reins into my hands."

"The people here have been very polite and attentive to me—partly out of curiosity, I presume. I have seen more dancing since I came here than I had seen in all my life before. I would like you to know a Mrs. Talcott, whom I have met frequently. She is a stranger here, as well as myself; her husband having removed to this place the same week that I was married. I like her very much—better than any one else I have met. I do not know that you would think her positively beautiful; but oh, she is so graceful and winning! Elliot is not as well pleased with her as I am; but I hope he will be, when he knows her better."

"I have not written anything about my husband's love and tenderness; but it is not because there is nothing to write. There has been no dark side yet, dearest Edith; and Love has more than fulfilled the promises of Hope. I think of you all very often, and very fondly; but I know you will rejoice to have me tell you that I feel, more and more, that my home is here, where my heart is. Tell our dear father that I am working him such a pretty pair of slippers, and that I shall bring them when we make our promised visit in the spring. God bless you all—so prays your own Alice."

The "promised visit" was made early in the ensuing spring. Mr. Templeton and Edith thought Alice had grown lovelier than ever, as they looked upon her beaming face, and heard her sweet voice carolling the old familiar songs, even more joyously than of yore. And perhaps they were right. At any rate, Elliot was not disposed to quarrel with them for opinion's sake.

CHAPTER III.

Two years passed rapidly away—so rapidly that our little circle could hardly realise their flight. The elder Mrs. Dana had been, during all that time, either more or less an invalid, but her children continually flattered themselves that they could perceive indications of returning health. Her physicians had long been urging her to try the experiment of a sea-voyage, expressing in decided terms their conviction that she would derive from it lasting benefit; and, after much urging on the part of her children, she had consented to join a party of tried and faithful friends, and was now in London, and, as she wrote, much better.

Paul, meanwhile, was at school in a neighbouring town, deep in the mysteries of Greek and Latin, and studying Euclid with praiseworthy assiduity. Elliot Dana was looking a trifle older, and more like a man of business. He was deeply engrossed in law and politics, and was spoken of as a "rising man."

Alice had changed, and yet one could scarcely tell how. She was not less beautiful, and was even more graceful—but there was a slight shadow upon her brow and lip; her eye had something less of light and gladness in it, and one felt instinctively that some "change had come o'er the spirit of her dream."

"Well, Elliot, when shall we start for Combermere?" asked Alice, one evening, laying her hand lightly on her husband's shoulder as she spoke.

"For Combermere?" replied he, starting from the reverie into which he had fallen, and drawing her to a seat beside him. "I did not know we were going there."

"Why, I supposed you would go, of course; we have been every summer since we were married."

"Yes, Alice; and we were at your father's very late last fall, also. It is only about four months since we returned, and Edith was here in the winter."

"Well—what has that to do with it? Do you mean me to understand that we are not going?"

Mr. Dana paused. There was something in his wife's voice and manner that pained him. At length he said:

"I cannot leave my business, now, Alice, without serious inconvenience; indeed, I do not see how I can possibly leave at present."

"Oh, the same old story! It is always business—business—business! What a convenient excuse it is for avoiding anything you don't want to do!"

"But it is an excuse to which I have seldom resorted, as you well know, Alice. I have a still more cogent one, however—I really cannot afford it!"

"What nonsense, Elliot! when everybody says you are doing a better business than any other lawyer in town. I am sure you could afford it well enough, if you chose."

"My word would have been sufficient for you once, Alice. I am doing a good business it is true, but my income is not large, and you know our expenses have been much heavier than usual this year. I will try to go home with you in the fall, but really I cannot go now. Will not that content you, love?" and he took her hand kindly in his own.

Alice drew it petulantly away, without replying, and soon after lighted a lamp and retired to her own room. It was contrary to her usual custom, and her husband, throwing aside the book he had taken, leaned his head wearily upon the arm of the sofa, and sighed audibly. He thought at first that she would return—but she did not; and it was very late before he roused himself from the sad thoughts that crowded upon him, and followed her to their own apartment. Alice had retired, but though her eyes were closed, a close observer would have seen, by the tremor of the lids, and an occasional uneasy movement of the lips, that she was only feigning sleep.

Very soon after Alice was married she resolved—and perhaps a young wife never formed a wiser resolution—that it should not be her fault if any misunderstanding that might arise between her husband and herself lasted from one day to the next; she resolved that she would never sleep when she was conscious that there was the least shadow between his heart and her own, if any effort on her part could remove it. And thus far she had kept the self-imposed vow religiously. They had never quarrelled, for neither of them believed the absurd doctrine, that "the quarrel of lovers is but the renewal of love;" but if there had been any light, fleeting clouds in their domestic heavens, such as will sometimes arise in the happiest families, she had taken good care that they should all be scattered to the four winds before she slept. And this was probably one of the chief causes of the perfect harmony that had characterised their intercourse. There were no long accounts of petty differences and hasty words to be brooded over, day after day, until the mole-hill had swollen to the size of a mountain.

This evening, after she had reached her own room, she took up her little work-basket, and attempted to occupy herself with her needle; but it was hard work. Her thoughts were down stairs with her husband, and she was more than half inclined to go back to him. She knew she had pained him needlessly and foolishly. She had been to her old home often since her marriage, and her conscience told her, very plainly, that her petulance had arisen, not so much from an uncontrollable desire to see her friends just at that particular time, as from a disinclination to yield her own wishes to those of her husband. Once she rose from her seat and stood for several minutes with her hand upon the door-latch; but at length she dropped it, and returned slowly to her chair again.

"Oh, I don't believe one word of it!" she murmured to herself; "Mrs. Talcott says he is worth to-day as much as her husband is, and she goes just where and when she has a mind to; Elliot is certainly growing cross, and I won't go down-stairs. If I do, he will think it is an acknowledgment that I was in the wrong, and I will not always make the first advances; I have done it long enough—though, to be sure, I was a little cross, too."

So Alice spoke, and she tried to convince herself that she thought and believed what she said; but, if her troubled face told the truth, it was far from being the case.

The next morning there was no allusion made to this little affair: it was indeed a little thing—but is not the happiness of married life made up of trifles? and in a day or two it was apparently forgotten. But in their "heart of hearts" both felt that all was not quite clear between them. For the first time the light cloud had been driven away, not by the breath of affection, but by that of time.

Not many weeks after this, Mr. Dana came into the parlour one afternoon, and threw himself upon the sofa near Alice's work-table. He had the air of one who wished to broach an unpleasant topic, and hardly knew how to approach it. Alice watched him with one of her old smiles upon her lip, as he took up one spool after another, examined the floss silk very curiously, and tossed the ball of wax and the emery cushion from one hand to the other. At last she spoke.

"Elliot, you mischievous boy, what are you about? Don't you see how you are tangling up my silk?"

Elliot threw down the things with a sigh of relief.

"I have done mischief, haven't I? Well, the truth is, dear Alice, I want to ask a favour of you, and hardly know how to begin. Will you grant it?"

"Yes, if you do not ask too much. What is it?"

"I do really wish you would have less to do with Mrs. Talcott."

The smile was gone in a moment.

"You have certainly a very unreasonable prejudice against Mrs. Talcott, Elliot! Now do tell me why you object to my visiting her?"

"Because I have some regard for my wife's reputation and happiness, Alice. You will certainly jeopardise both by your intimacy with this woman."

"It is not so, Elliot. You are unjust and uncharitable. You are not generally inclined to give credit to all the slanderous tales you hear; but you believe everything that is said against Mrs. Talcott."

"Alice, if she is nothing worse, she is a cold, heartless, selfish woman of the world, and, as such, her society can do you no good. Moreover, I do not think a woman who avowedly lives on anything but friendly terms with her husband, and yet leads a gay, careless life, receiving the attentions of half the young gentlemen in town, is a fit or safe companion for a young wife. She treats Mr. Talcott shamefully."

"You don't know anything at all about it, Elliot; but it is to be expected that you would take Mr. Talcott's part. He treats her shamefully. Why, she told me that only last week he ordered a friend of hers to leave the house!"

"And did she tell you who that 'friend' was? It was George Evans; and if he dared to visit you, I would do the same thing. Any woman of right feelings would consider his mere presence as an insult."

"I did not know it was Mr. Evans," replied Alice, speaking rather more gently; "and I do not believe he called with her consent. You are certainly mistaken in your opinion of Mrs. Talcott. She is one of the most pure-minded, refined, and delicate women I ever met."

"I do not doubt that you think so, my dear Alice, and I presume that in your presence she appears such. She has very few associates of her own sex, and it is an object with her to retain your friendship. She is an artful, fascinating woman; and she has exerted all her skill to conceal her real character from you."

"Well, if she guards herself so strictly, she can surely do me no harm, and her society is really a very great pleasure to me. She is so intelligent and well-informed, as well as warm-hearted and affectionate; and I never saw any one so exquisitely sensitive. I have seen her eyes fill with tears many a time at the recital of a rare poem; and when she plays and sings, her cheek will grow pale, and you would think her about to faint, overpowered by the excess of her own emotions."

"Exquisitely nonsensical, you meant to say! It is all affectation, Alice—every bit of it. I have seen just such women before. But, my dear wife"—and Elliot drew Alice to his side as he spoke, and wound his arm about her waist, "a danger is no less a danger because it is concealed. This woman has already done you harm. Look me in the face, darling, and answer me. Are you so happy as you were six months since? Do you find as much quiet pleasure in the discharge of your domestic duties? Do you love your home as well? And—nay, do not turn away—have you not sometimes thought, lately, that your plain, matter-of-fact, unromantic husband was a very humdrum sort of companion, when compared with this fascinating friend of yours? Oh, Alice, do yield to my wishes in this matter, and be the happy wife you were one year ago!"

Alice's colour came and went rapidly. She knew it was all true; once, for a moment, she was on the point of throwing her arms about her husband's neck, and promising all that he wished. But, alas! the evil influences that had been at work upon her heart for many months resumed their sway, and she replied:

"I cannot, Elliot; it is unreasonable in you to ask it."

"Then, Alice, I must say what I have wished to avoid. I have endeavoured to break off this intimacy by indirect means for a long time without effect, and now I have tried persuasion to no purpose. You must cease to visit Mrs. Talcott, or to receive her here. I cannot permit you thus to sacrifice your happiness, as well as my own."

There was a moment's pause.

"Alice!"

Mr. Dana was thunderstruck. Was that his gentle, affectionate Alice—that haughty, imperious looking woman, who stood before him with her figure drawn up to its full height, her eye flashing, and her lip trembling with pride and anger? And, looking him firmly in the eye for an instant, she turned and moved slowly out of the room.

Alas! alas! for thee, Alice! it is all darkness, all shadow now!

"Unjust, ungenerous, unkind!" she exclaimed, as she reached her own apartment; after locking the door, she flung herself upon the bed, and burst into a flood of passionate tears.

There was a knock at the door. She knew it was her husband, and her sobs ceased; but she did not rise.

"Alice, will you not let me come in?"

There was no reply; and in a moment Mr. Dana turned away and strode heavily down the stairs. Alice heard the hall-door close sharply after him, and the echo of his footsteps, as he passed beneath the window, sounded like a knell; but it did not soften her. She was not to blame—oh no

Elliot Dana stood for a few moments after his wife left the parlour, silent and motionless as one in a trance; but—willing to soften, as far as he might, the seemingly harsh words he had felt compelled to speak, and to think that Alice's reply had been uttered in an unguarded moment, without a full consciousness of its meaning—he, as we have seen, followed her, not doubting that he should find her scolding, and willing to meet his advances at least half way. When he turned from the door, after her refusal to admit him, he was more deeply grieved than he had ever been in his life, but he could not draw back. He knew that he had not spoken in anger, and there was nothing for him to retract. All that he could do was to wait patiently until time and reflection had taught Alice her error.

The days wore on. Alice felt as if she could not bear to be alone with her husband; but Paul was so full of all sorts of fun and mischief, that the unusual restraint and stillness of the others was not so observable. But it was almost with a feeling of relief that she heard Elliot observe, one morning, while seating himself at the breakfast-table:

"I am sorry to be away from home during your vacation, Paul, but I have just found that I must go to Combermere to-morrow."

"Indeed! I am very sorry, but business must be attended to. How long will you be gone?"

"Two or three weeks, I fear, but perhaps not quite as long."

Alice packed her husband's trunk, as usual, that afternoon. He did not request it, but her very pride prevented her neglecting any of her accustomed duties. More than once or twice during the evening previous to his departure, did Mr. Dana look eagerly in his wife's face, hoping to see some traces of a longing for a reconciliation; more than once did he think that her voice softened a little when it was necessary for her to address him; but he looked and listened in vain.

"Good bye, Paul. You must amuse yourself as well as you can while I am gone," said he, the next morning. "Good bye, Alice!" He extended his hand. Alice gave him hers very quietly.

"Good bye, Elliot."

And that was all!

CHAPTER IV.

YES—that was all! And thus parted two hearts, full freighted with love for each other; and each filled with a yearning, that was almost beyond endurance, for peace, for restored confidence, and for the wonted looks and tones of tenderness. Thus they parted—coldly, calmly, even as the veriest strangers might have done.

It was well for Alice, perhaps, that her husband was called from her side for awhile. The armour of pride and resentment in which she had encased herself—resolving, that however keenly she might feel their unwonted position, he should never know it—had hitherto prevented her giving heed to the still, small voice that was ever whispering in her ear. But now there were no keen eyes to watch her, and she could lay it aside.

Oh, those were long, dreary days! She had time for reflection, and with that came sorrow and the bitterest self-reproach. Back upon her heart, like a mountain-torrent that has been checked for awhile, in one continuous, overwhelming flood, rushed the love that, even in her pride and anger, had still been the essence of her being—and she felt that the fault had been all her own! Even if her husband had been influenced by an unreasonable prejudice, when she knew how deep and strong it was, ought she not to have yielded to his wishes? It had not been a question of right and wrong, in which her sense of duty had been opposed to his; it was merely whether, for the sake of her own transient gratification, she should persist in seeking the society of one whom her husband viewed with suspicion and dislike.

But her admissions went further than this. There was a veil removed from her eyes during those long hours of lonely self-communion, and she felt that Elliot was right in his estimate of Mrs. Talcott's character. She felt that her influence had, indeed, been unsalutary, if not absolutely pernicious. She recalled thoughts, opinions, and sentiments—the true nature of which had at first escaped her, so veiled and mantled were they with grace and beauty, as they fell from the eloquent lips of her friend—from which her very soul now revolted.

"Elliot was right," she said to herself, as she sat mournfully pondering over these things. "She has, indeed, done me harm. I am not what I was six months since. My standard of duty has been lowered—doubts and suspicions of my husband have been stealthily planted in my mind. My power of resisting evil has already been weakened. I thank thee, oh, my Father!" she murmured, falling upon her knees, while her clasped hands and streaming eyes attested the sincerity of her words; "I thank thee that my eyes are opened before it is too late!"

Long did she remain upon her knees, fervently imploring aid and assistance from above, strength to retrace her steps, and forgiveness for past errors. When she arose her face was sad, but calm and resolute; and, drawing pen and paper to her side, she poured out her whole soul to her husband. She acknowledged her partial, and even unconscious alienation, her pride and her petulance, her unreasonable anger and her determined wilfulness. She implored him to forgive her, and take her to his heart again; to love her as in the early days of their married life—and to trust her for the future. The letter was long, and touching in its simple eloquence.

She folded, sealed, and sent it; and then, with a lighter heart than she had carried for many a day, she returned to the house and resumed her wonted duties.

Mr. Dana had spoken the truth when he said that it was an object with Mrs. Talcott to retain the friendship of his wife. She felt that she occupied rather an uncertain and dubious position, and she needed the countenance of such a woman as Alice Dana to sustain her. With intellectual qualities, and graces of the highest order, a false system of education had made her what she was—cold, selfish, crafty, and capable of sacrificing any principle or person upon the shrine of her own interests or pleasure. There were many in town who, like Mr. Dana, looked upon her with suspicious eyes, and who could not sustain her in her course; but she was an elegant and accomplished woman—her parties were the most brilliant and recherché of the season. And so she floated along upon the current of public opinion—sometimes on one side of the stream, and sometimes on the other.

Mrs. Talcott had been for some time making preparations for a large evening party, and a card of invitation for Mr. and Mrs. Dana had arrived on the day of Elliot's departure.

Alice had thrown the note aside, and nearly forgotten it. After writing to Elliot, the affair recurred to her, and she remembered that the invitation was for that very evening. Seating herself at her writing-desk again, she wrote a simple regret, but before sending it, she hesitated and wavered.

"This intimacy cannot be broken off without some decided action on my part," she thought, "and it may as well be done first as last."

So, taking another sheet of paper, she at once wrote a kind, but frank and full avowal of the change in her own sentiments with regard to Mrs. Talcott, and said that it was her own wish, as well as that of Mr. Dana, that all intercourse between them should at once cease.

The arrangements for the evening were all completed, and Mrs. Talcott was busy in her dressing-room when the note reached her. She tore it open, and hastily glanced over it.

"The little fool!" she exclaimed; "this is all Dana's work. I thought my training had had more effect—but it seems she is as meek and gentle as possible. I suppose he has laid his commands upon her, thinking to keep her out of harm's way while he is gone. But I will be revenged for this insult yet. Ah! I have it, now!" and hurriedly completing her toilet, she descended to the brilliantly illuminated drawing-rooms.

The guests soon began to assemble. There was music and dancing, and song and wine, and "all went merry as a marriage bell." The evening was far advanced, when a gentleman was announced, who was received by the fair hostess with the most graceful cordiality.

"I regret exceedingly that you are so late, Mr. Howard, but you are very welcome even now. The crowd is thinning. I think, however, that I can show you some beautiful faces yet." Taking his arm, she led him towards the farthest woman in the room. "I must present you to my friend, Mrs. Dana—she is decidedly the belle of the evening;" and, approaching a very beautiful woman, who, all smiles and animation, was conversing gaily with a group of gentlemen, she went through with the prescribed formalities.

Allowing only time enough for the exchange of one or two common-place remarks, she drew her companion away.

"Is she not beautiful?" she asked. "Oh, by the way, you used to know Elliot Dana, did you not?"

"Yes, very well, and a noble fellow he is; I am sorry that he is out of town, for I must leave to-morrow, and I would have been glad to have seen him. I never saw his wife before. She is very lovely."

"She is, indeed; I hardly know any lady who is equally so. But you will see Mr. Dana in Combermere."

"Ah, indeed! I shall certainly find him out."

"And please say to him that Mrs. Dana, was the chief attraction of the party. He is so proud of her."

The lady to whom Mrs. Talcott had presented Mr. Howard, was a Mrs. Dana, it is true—but she was a stranger in town, and not the wife of Elliot Dana. That was a discovery, however, that she took good care the gentleman should not make, and he departed for Combermere the next morning with the firm conviction that he had met the wife of his old friend.

CHAPTER V.

MR. DANA had been more bitterly disappointed at the coldness of his parting interview with Alice than he would have acknowledged even to himself; more deeply grieved than even she could have dreamed. He had been buoyed up, by the strong, though almost unconsciously cherished hope, that his wife's pride—for he knew well what it was that kept her from him—would yield then; that he should hear the words for which he so longed—nay, even one look of love and regret would have been sufficient, and he would have folded her to his heart again, and have forgiven and forgotten all.

That hope was gone now, and, taking his seat in a corner of the carriage, he drew his hat far over his face, and tears, that all the pride of manhood could not keep back, started to his eyes. He had felt so sure of Alice's love, so confident that nothing could ever come between their hearts; and now—oh! was it, indeed, all past—that love and confidence? He had looked forward to so many days and years of almost unalloyed happiness—was it to be theirs henceforward only in dreams? He took no note of time as he sat there struggling with thoughts like these, and he started up in amazement when the bustle and confusion around him told him they were already in Combermere.

Days passed. The second week was drawing to a close; he had heard nothing from Alice, and something of bitterness was beginning to mingle with the love that through all these weeks of estrangement had never once wavered, when her letter reached him. How his heart throbbed! He dared not open it where so many curious eyes were upon him, but, putting it quietly in his pocket, he sought the privacy of his own apartment, and called for lights, before he broke the seal. And then he trembled lest he should find coldness where he looked for love, and he held the sheet irresolutely, dreading to cast his eyes upon the familiar handwriting. But one rapid glance was sufficient to remove his doubts, and he read on and on, scarcely drawing his breath until he had finished the last fond sentence.

Then grasping his own pen, with an eager hand he traced line after line in reply. Never in the days of her bright and joyous girlhood had she been half as dear to him as then—and he told her so. Eagerly, earnestly, he wrote of his deep and unaltered love; of forgiveness he did not speak—but he told her he would remember the shadows of the past only as a foil to the brightness of the present. He had just completed the fourth page, when he was informed that a gentleman was waiting for him in the drawing-room, and, placing the sheet in his portfolio, he obeyed the summons.

"Ah, my old friend Howard!" he exclaimed, as a gentleman advanced to meet him with extended hand. "This is indeed a pleasure; but I did not dream of seeing you here. From whence do you come, and whither are you bound?"

"I left St. Albans a month ago," was the reply; "but I have been staying at your place for the last few days, hunting up my old friends and acquaintances. I left there yesterday morning."

"Did you, indeed? I am very sorry I happened to be away. You know I have 'taken unto me a wife' since you went to the West, and I would like much to have you make her acquaintance."

"I have already had the pleasure of meeting her, my dear Dana. I called at your office, and when I learned that you were out of town, I was half inclined to go to the house and introduce myself to your wife, on the strength of our old friendship. But on the evening before I left, I attended a large and brilliant party at Mrs. Talcott's, and was presented to her there. She was the belle of the evening, decidedly."

The rooms were not very well lighted that evening, and the two friends occupied a dark corner. Had it not been for that, Howard would have been startled by the changes that passed over Mr. Dana's face. His colour came and went, his breath came painfully, the room whirled around him, and he grasped the back of his chair convulsively. It was a moment or two before he could speak; but then, by a terrible effort at self-control, his voice, though very low, was clear and steady.

"At Mrs. Talcott's, did you say? When was it?"

"On the evening of the 18th. It was very late when I arrived, and I was merely presented to her. Mrs. Talcott bade me tell you that she was the chief attraction that evening—and I don't wonder, for I thought her very beautiful."

Mr. Dana's lip curled haughtily, and, by asking some indifferent question, he succeeded in changing the subject. He felt that he should die if obliged to sit there and listen calmly to praises of his wife's beauty, and hear the comments of Mrs. Talcott repeated coolly by a stranger.

It was very late when Mr. Howard took his departure. All through that seemingly interminable interview, Mr. Dana bore his part well. He talked with his friend of "auld lang syne," of literature, of politics, of foreign affairs, as if his whole soul was absorbed in the theme of the moment, and no one dreamed that, since he had been sitting there so quietly, the arrow had entered his heart.

When he was at liberty to go to his own room again, he took up Alice's letter, and glanced at the date. As he had thought, it was written on the 18th, and bitterly, scornfully his eye glided over the page. She had written those words so full of sorrow for the past and promise for the future—words seemingly so fraught with repentant love—and then turned lightly away to deck herself for the revel and the dance, at the bidding of the very woman whose ill-starred influence had been the cause of their estrangement.

He had no repinings, no weakness now. Calmly and deliberately he read the letter to the end, and then tearing it into fragments, he threw it in the grate, and, with a fierce pleasure, watched it as it turned to ashes. Then he took the reply he had written scarcely two hours before, with a heart warm and full of all tender emotions—ah! now it was so cold and withered!—and laid that beside it.

"I could forgive anger and wilfulness," said he, "but such deceit and treachery—no, never! And yet, oh Alice! how I have loved thee!" His lip trembled—he covered his face with his hands, and the big tears trickled through his fingers. He dashed them off as if there was contamination in the touch.

"Tears! away with them! Let me rather give scorn and contempt in return for such dissimulation."

Paul's vacation had drawn to a close long before Mr. Dana was able to return home. The two weeks, of which he had spoken as the extent of his absence, lengthened into a month—and still he lingered. Alice heard nothing of him excepting through an occasional business letter to the clerk at the office, and her heart grew very, very heavy. She knew there were unavoidable reasons for his delay in returning home, but she could not account for his silence. She sometimes feared that she had offended past forgiveness; but such a supposition was so foreign to the kind forbearance that had always been a prominent trait in her husband's character, that she could not cherish it. She could only wait and hope.

She was sitting alone in the parlour, one evening, inexpressibly sad, and even desponding, when she was aroused by the sound of carriage-wheels, and an unusual commotion at the door.

She sprang to the window, drew the curtain and looked, out. A carriage stood there, and a porter was lifting heavy trunks from the rack, but no other person was in sight. She turned to go to the door, and just as she did so it flew open, and she was clasped to the heart of Elliot's mother.

"Oh, mother, mother, I am so glad you have come!" was her first exclamation; and, leaning her poor, aching head upon the kind breast that was so ready to receive her, she wept and sobbed like a tired child. It seemed so long—so very long—since loving arms had encircled her, or since a tender voice had fallen upon her ear.

"Why, Alice, love, this is a strange welcome! There—there—don't sob so, my child! Where's Elliot?"

"He is in Combermere—has been there more than a month—but we expect him every day."

"Oh! your tears are accounted for, then! I suppose you think no one was ever so lonely before, don't you, dear?"

Alice smiled faintly, but she was then busily engaged in disposing of her mother's various wrappers, and so avoided a reply.

That evening and the morning of the next day passed rapidly. Mrs. Dana had been gone nearly a year, and there was so much to be said on both sides, that, save by the casual remark that she was thinner and paler than usual, she did not appear to notice anything peculiar in Alice's demeanour. Her own health was entirely restored, and she was in the best of spirits. She had parted with her friends, and came on immediately, thinking to give the children—as she called them—an agreeable surprise.

After dinner, tired with her journey, she went to lie down for awhile, and Alice repaired to the store-room, to prepare some little delicacies for tea. While busy there, she thought she heard a step in the hall, and, stepping to the door, she peeped cautiously out. It was her husband. With a cry of joy, she sprang forward, not noticing his cold, stern face, and that there were no arms outstretched to receive her; and, throwing herself upon his breast, twined her soft, white arms about his neck.

For an instant he trembled, and his own arms rose involuntarily, as if to press that slight form still closer to his heart; but the transient emotion passed, and, coldly releasing himself from her embrace, he held her at a little distance, and looked keenly and searchingly in her face.

"Woman," said he, "would you add mockery to deceit?"

Alice at first spoke not—moved not; she had but one thought—"I am not forgiven"—and, throwing one wild, agonised glance upon her husband's face, she shrank away from him, and glided up the stairs.

When Mrs. Dana came down to the parlour again, she was greatly surprised at finding her son there, and his wife not with him; and after a few moments of greeting, she asked:

"What has become of Alice?"

"She is up stairs, I believe."

"Haven't you seen her yet?"

"Yes—she was in the hall when I came in."

"Why, Elliot, what does this mean? When I came last night, Alice greeted me with a flood of tears, and now—I am going to find the child;" and off she went in pursuit of her.

Mr. Dana made no attempt to detain her, and a minute had scarcely elapsed when he was startled by her voice from the head of the stairs.

"Elliot, Elliot, come here, quick! Alice is very sick."

With hardly more than one bound, he was up the stairs and in his wife's room.

Alice lay upon the floor, as white and rigid as marble, and apparently as lifeless.

"I have killed her—oh, my God, I have killed her!" he shrieked, as he fell on his knees beside her, and wildly kissed her white lips again and again.

Mrs. Dana was bewildered, as well she might be; but, without waiting to ask questions, she hurriedly sent for a physician, and, with Maggie's assistance, commenced making every effort for Alice's recovery.

It was vain, and many long hours passed before they could rouse her from the lethargy into which she had fallen.

Her husband was almost beside himself. One moment he would denounce himself as her murderer; the next, he would implore her to speak to him, telling her he forgave her all—everything; and the next, he would weary the doctor with entreaties to save her; or, if he could do no more, to restore her to consciousness for just one hour.

For long days and weeks they watched beside her, scarcely daring to whisper even to themselves that there was any hope.

Elliot Dana told his mother all. She had wept bitterly when she heard the sad story, but she said:

"All will be explained yet, my son! There is something wrong about it. Alice has evidently suffered terribly; but I cannot look upon her sweet, pale face, without feeling an assurance that all will yet be well. Your wife has erred greatly, Elliot, but I want you to look into your own heart, and see if you can find nothing there worthy of censure. It seems you never answered her letter, or gave her the least opportunity for an explanation; was that right?"

"Do not talk to me of it now, mother, for indeed I cannot bear it. But heaven only knows how I, too, have suffered. It seems to me that I can never forgive myself for my harshness."

"I believe you will find you have injustice as well as harshness to repent of, Elliot. It is never well for husband or wife to take anything for granted that is to the prejudice of the other. But do not be too desponding. I feel sure that all will be right in the end."

And Elliot took courage, and believed her.

"If you please, Mr. Dana, there is a gentleman in the parlour would like to see you, sir."

So said Maggie, a week or two afterwards, as her master sat in the hall, near his wife's door, fearing to go in, but listening to every sound.

He went to the parlour, and there found his friend Howard, who was now on his return to St. Albans.

They conversed awhile: not very gaily, for the sight of Howard recalled to Dana's mind all the agony of that night at Combermere, combined with the intense anxiety of the past few weeks. At last his friend's eye was drawn to an exquisite portrait of Alice that hung upon the wall, and he asked the name of the original.

"Why, it is my wife's portrait, and is considered a most extraordinary likeness. Do you not recognise it?"

"Your wife's? Oh, Dana, you are trying to play a trick upon me!"

"No, I am not. I am in no mood for joking. That is Alice; and the resemblance is really wonderful!"

"Well, if it is, I have been most wonderfully deceived, that's all. The Mrs. Dana whom I met at Mrs. Talcott's, and whom I was led to suppose was your wife, had hair and eyes as black as midnight; but in this portrait the hair is a golden brown, and the eyes are as blue as the heavens."

Elliot groaned aloud in the bitterness of his soul: he had himself met the lady his friend described, and the mystery was at an end.

"My poor, injured Alice!" he murmured; "how could I ever have doubted her?"

His guest looked up in amazement, and Mr. Dana explained in a few words the game that had been played, and its probable cause.

Howard expressed the deepest regret that he should unwittingly have been made a party to such a plot.

"No blame can attach itself to any one but Mrs. Talcott, my dear Howard—unless it is to myself. If I had trusted my wife as I ought, this would have passed for a pleasant jest. Alice had never deceived me, and I was a wretch to doubt her!"

"Alice is sitting up, and she seems so strong to-day, that Dr. Lindsay says you may go in and see her, my son; but you must not stay more than five minutes."

Elliot did not wait for a second bidding; in a moment he was kneeling by Alice's side, and his warm tears were falling fast upon her white and wasted hand.

"Alice, dearest, I can never, never forgive myself!" he whispered.

Alice had no strength to speak, but her head drooped until it rested fondly on his own, and as her tears mingled with his, he felt that it would be no difficult task for her to do so.

It was late in the fall before the visit to Combermere was made; but by that time Alice's roses were nearly restored. She did not tell Edith of their dark hours. Elliot had said:

"Do not speak of them, dearest. They are past, and let them be forgotten. We will ourselves only think of them as a warning for the future—and there is no need of alluding to them."

And they did not; but one morning, when Elliot came in to breakfast, he laid a newspaper by Alice's plate, and placed his finger upon the following paragraph:

"It is rumoured that Mrs. Talcott, a lady well known in fashionable circles in this city, eloped on Wednesday last with a young man by the name of G—e E—s. The fugitives came directly from the residence of the lady, in the West of England to this city, and, it is supposed, sailed for the continent."

PHENOMENA OF THE EBBING AND FLOWING WELL IN GERMANY.

THIS remarkable well is the subject of extreme curiosity throughout Germany. At every hour of the day crowds surrounded the well, which is encircled by a proper guard, anxiously waiting the arrival of the mysterious phenomenon. Each person tries to detect its beginning, by fixing his eyes on the empty space in the shaft, the eleven or twelve feet depth of which, from the brim to the water, presents nothing but "darkness visible." On the black surface at the bottom, a gentle ripple is scarcely perceptible, produced by a few bubbles of gas; in other respects all is still as the grave. Presently certain hollow sounds reach the ear, resembling the report of distant artillery, or drums, and the shaft is observed to fill slowly, by the water ascending like mercury in a thermometer, the surface becoming at the same time agitated and noisy. A thick foam covers it, which is only broken in the centre by a rapid succession of explosions of gas (almost carbonic acid), during which, the water, where the foam is partially dispersed, assumes the green hue of the sea in high latitudes. In the meantime, the upward progress of the water, accompanied by great commotion, continues steadily, until the great shaft is filled with water. To those who have looked down from the stern of a ship, hurried along by a gale through the sea, and have seen the water foaming against and lashing the rudder, in perpetual leaps and contortions, it will afford some notion of the aspect of the moment here indicated; in short, a sailor is reminded of that very phenomenon. Or the well may be compared, in its extreme turbulence, to a great caldron of water, boiling on a furnace as rapidly as possible. When this turbulence is at its maximum, the emission of gas which preceded the ascent of the water in the well abruptly ceases, and, in a few seconds, the surface of the water in the shaft becomes perfectly tranquil; the water descends, and continues to do so, at first rapidly, and then more slowly, until it has subsided about nine or ten feet. This point has but just been reached, when a sudden swelling up of the water first, and then of the gas, is again observed at the bottom. The shaft fills very slowly, and the flow of water and gas continues for a long time progressively to increase, apparently not attaining their maximum until the water is at its full height, which requires from thirty to forty minutes after the first return of the stream. In this state of violent agitation it remains for about two hours, sometimes more, but often much less, when the preceding cycle of phenomena is repeated. The period of intermission varies considerably. In general that peculiarity has been observed every three hours, but its recurrence is greatly influenced by the number of pumps at work to extract the water from the well; the more pumps, the fewer periods of intermission.

FACETIE.

THE latest Parisian tomfoolery is to powder the head with gold dust and silver filings.

AN independent country editor very piquantly remarks:

"We do not belong to our 'patrons,'
Our paper is wholly our own—
Whoever may like it, can take it;
Who don't, can just let it alone."

WHEN tired out, and your patience is worn completely threadbare, then—darn it.

A Frenchman thinks the English language is very tough. "Dare is look-out," he says, "which is to put out your head and see; and look-out, which is to haul in your head and not for to see—just contrairie."

THERE is a "firm" who save a hoghead of ink annually, by not allowing their clerks and book-keepers to dot their eyes or cross their t's.

A fop, just returned from a continental tour, was asked how he liked the ruins of Pompeii. "Not very well," was the reply; "they are so dreadfully out of repair."

HISTORICAL BUTCHER'S BILL.—The history of the reigns of Henry VIII. and Mary has been defined to be an account of stakes and chops.

NAPOLEON I. and Napoleon III. resemble each other in one thing at least. They both possessed a desire to make the Sovereigns fly.

MARRIED in Michigan, Mr. Henry Bills to Miss Mary Small. We hope the issuing of SMALL BILLS is not prohibited in that State.

A wag, on reading that in a certain engagement a day and two knights were killed, remarked, that that was what he called killing time with a vengeance!

BE not affronted at a jest. If one throw salt at thee, thou wilt receive no harm, unless thou hast sore places.

A traveller in Egypt called his Arab guide "a son of a gun." "I am not a soldier!" was the grave response.

TACITUS tells, that in his time the spectators in public theatres were obliged to stand during the representation, that they might not, if accommodated with seats, be tempted to waste whole days in idle amusements. A gentleman recommends the same plan to be adopted at all public dinners, that persons may drink no longer than they can stand.

A laughable story of some carrier pigeons is told in an Antwerp newspaper. The editor of a celebrated journal, published in that city, sent a reporter to Brussels for the king's speech, and with him a couple of carrier pigeons, to take back the document. At Brussels, he gave the pigeons in charge to a waiter, and called for breakfast. He was kept waiting for some time, but a very delicate fricassee atoned for the delay. After breakfast, he paid his bill, and called for his carrier pigeons. "Pigeons!" exclaimed the waiter; "why, you've eaten them!"

TURNING THE TABLES.—The wife of a man, named John Vanam, sent the town-crier round Hinkley lately, to announce to the inhabitants that she would not be accountable for her husband's debts, and that she will prosecute those found harbouring him. Of course this singular announcement caused a good deal of laughter; a large crowd of boys accompanied the bellman, and, at the close of each cry, set up loud hurrahs.

AN editor has to use pens, scissors, and brains. Correct bad proofs, and revise worse manuscripts. Write puff for nauseous medicines which he never tasted. Attend theatres, concerts, balls, races, exhibitions—in all of which he is expected to be deeply interested. Give descriptions of murders, riots, and marriages, review new books, and answer all questions proposed to him by correspondents. He is expected to use all the lotions sent to him, swallow all the cough drops, candies, and pills, to bear testimony to their value. To hear all the news, and comment upon it. To be ever ready to do anybody a service who asks it, free of all charge. To drink with every agent, mountebank, and sporting man, who wants a word or two said in the paper. To call on all distinguished strangers, and show them the lions. To read over a thousand exchanges, and not omit to notice every mammoth beet, and every Brodignag cabbage—to announce the arrival and departure of all eminent citizens, write obituaries of all friends, and biographical sketches of all dignitaries—puff all the best hotels, and lie about the poor ones. Who wouldn't be an editor?

A man superintending a nursery of children is like an elephant hatching eggs: the more he nurses, the more he hurts them.

THE LATE CHARLES MATHEWS AND MUNDEN.—Mathews was always sprucely dressed, and fond of a handsome umbrella. Munden was miserly in his habits. He was generally meanly dressed, and carried an old cotton parachute. After Munden had left the stage, Mathews met him one day in Covent Garden. "Ah, Munden," said Mathews, "I beg you'll let me have something of yours as a remembrancer!" "Certainly, my boy," replied Joe Munden; "we'll exchange umbrellas." Mathews was so taken by storm, that Munden walked off with a new umbrella.

NEW PLAN FOR BOARDING.—A Yankee has invented a new and cheap plan for boarding. One of the boarders mesmerises the rest, and then eats a hearty meal; the mesmerised being satisfied from sympathy.

MR. EMERSON, the very clever American lecturer and author, is described by a critic and countryman of his as keeping a huge manuscript book—a kind of intellectual and scientific rag-bag, into which all shreds and remnants of conversations and reminiscences of way-side reveries are incoherently thrust. This goes on day and night; and when he travels, the rag-bag travels too, and grows more plethoric with each mile of the journey. One night, before his wife had become completely accustomed to his habits, she awoke suddenly, and hearing him groping about the room, inquired anxiously: "My dear, are you unwell?" "No, my love, only an idea."

HOME AND ABROAD.—"There's many things different betune this and home, and first foremost religion, Shusan. Religion isn't the same at all. To begin, there's no fastin' at all, or next to none; maybe that's the bekase, by the nature of the cookery, nobody could tell what it was he was eatin'. Then, there's little penance—and the little there is ye can get off of it by a thrife. Ye go to confessin' when ye like, and ye keep anything back for another time that ye don't wish to tell just then. In fact, my dear, it comes to this—it's harder to go to heaven in Ireland than any place ever I heard of, and costs more money into the bargain! The priests hasn't half the power they have in Ireland, they're not as well paid, and they can't cure a congregation, nor do any other good action that isn't set down in their duty. It's the polis, Shusy, that makes ye tremble abroad, and that's the great difference between the two countries. As to morils, my dear, I'm afraid we're not supariar, for it's the women always make love to the men, which, till you get used to it, has a mighty ugly appearance. I b'leve it's the smokin' leads to this, for a German wouldn't take his pipe out of his mouth for anything; so that courtin' isn't what it is at home."—Charles Lever.

MACREADY'S REHEARSAL OF THE ART OF LAUGHING.—The following anecdote is extracted from Peabody's American Chronicle, an amusing paper, and devoted largely to theatrical news: "During the first rehearsal of Bulwer's play of 'Money,' at the Haymarket Theatre, Macready, who was engaged at that house, requested Mr. Howe, who was to appear with him, to visit him at his residence, in Regent's Park, for the purpose of rehearsing a scene. During the visit the conversation fell upon the art of laughing on the stage. Whoever remembers Macready's laugh, must be at the same time forcibly struck with the words of Cæsar, speaking of Cassius:

Seldom he smiles, and smiles in such a sort,
As if he mocked himself, and scorned his spirit
That could be moved to smile at anything.

Imagine, then, Macready's lank form placed upright against the wall, with Howe in a similar position on the opposite side of Macready's drawing-room. 'Now,' said Mac, 'my dear Howe, observe how I laugh—it took years to learn it. I always begin the cackination from the lower part of my stomach, and, making most grim and hideous faces, he began to 'Ha! ha!' till Howe, who had borne the farcical scene till ready to burst with laughter, at last fairly gave way to an immoderate, real fit of laughter, which put an end to the eminent tragedian's instructions!"

A QUESTIONABLE WISH.—Smith was starting for the diggings the other day, when he called to take farewell of Brown. "Good bye, old boy," said the latter; "I hope your efforts will prove nugget-ory!" Smith was somewhat startled; but as soon as he took the notion, he took himself off with a merry countenance.—Diogenes.

AN ALARMING INVENTION.—An enterprising dealer in Chinese Gongs has issued the following advertisement: "Will Frighten, but Not Kill.—Chinese Gongs.—One hundred powerful, full-toned Chinese Gongs, just landed. One for 40s. will effectually frighten a thief; one for 60s. will appal a burglar; one for 80s. will alarm the whole country for miles round." The advertiser does not state the dreadful effects of those beyond £4 in price. Doubtless it would be too alarming; but by a simple calculation we may well conceive that if the miserable petty-larceny, pewter-pot stealing, area-sneak, can be alarmed for 40s.; if £3 are enough to strike with terror the crime-hardened soul of the most daring burglar; if for the trifling sum of 80s. we can horriy the country for miles around, what would be the result of purchasing a gong at higher prices? For £25, doubtless, we could spread dismay throughout the country; a £6 gong would terrify the nation; for £10 all Europe might be made to tremble. Why does not the government see to this? How cheaply and how easily might our coast be thus effectually defended! Instead of voting thousands for an increase in the army, a few pounds invested in a Chinese Gong would enable us to scare the boldest invaders from our shores. Really, the improvement on the present state of things would be delightful! How much better for the interests of humanity to defend ourselves without the loss of blood! How infinitely preferable, in all respects, to provide our soldiers with an implement that "will frighten but not kill," than with the muskets now in use, which, it has been clearly proved, will neither do one nor the other!—Ibid!

RAILWAY EQUALITY.

At a late meeting of the Brighton Railway Company, we find Mr. Slight lamenting to the shareholders that they had paid £12,460 away in compensation for accidents; and objecting, very properly, to the present mode of estimating damages by the pecuniary circumstances of the sufferer. He said: "If 10s. 6d. to Brighton were a reasonable and sufficient fare for them to charge a widow lady of small fortune, with no relations, involving on them, in case of an accident, an insurance of £500, it could not be a proper sum to charge the Lord Chancellor, or the Archbishop of Canterbury, if they were taking him down by the same train, under the same circumstances, with an insurance practically of £100,000 against all casualties by the way." We shall probably soon hear of the following scene at the Railway Ticket-counter:

Labouring Man: "Third-class to Brighton."

Ticket Clerk: "Well, I suppose you don't earn above 12s. a-week?"

Wealthy Tradesman: "Second-class to Brighton."

Ticket Clerk: "Will you favour me with your card, sir?" [Reads (Mr. —) to himself, "known to be making thousands."] Aloud, "Ticket, sir, 50s."

The Baron Rothschild: "First-class to Brighton."

Ticket Clerk (who recognises him): "Really, Baron we don't care to take you at all. However, your fare will be a heavy one. Here's the ticket—£25, if you please.—Ibid.

AMUSING CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.

THE late Earl of Pembroke—who had many good qualities, but always persisted inflexibly in his own opinion, which, as well as his conduct, was often very singular—thought of an experiment to prevent the exhortations and importunities of those about him. This was, to feign himself deaf; and, under pretence of hearing very imperfectly, he would always form his answer by what he desired to have said. Among other servants, was one who had lived with him from a child, and served him with fidelity and affection, till at length he became his coachman. This man by degrees got into a habit of drinking, for which his lady often desired that he might be dismissed.

My lord always answered: "Yes, indeed, John is an excellent servant."

"I say," replied the lady, "he is continually getting drunk, and I desire that he might be turned off."

"Ay," said his lordship, "he has lived with me from a child, and, as you say, a trifle should not part us."

John, however, one evening, as he was driving from Kingston, overturned his lady in Hyde Park: she was not much hurt—but when she came home, she began to rattle to the earl.

"Here," says she, "is that beast of a John, so drunk, that he can hardly stand; he has overturned the coach, and, if he is not discharged, may break our necks!"

"Ay," says my lord, "is poor John sick?" Alas, I am sorry for him!"

"I am complaining," said my lady, "that he is drunk, and overturned me."

"Ay," answered his lordship, "to be sure he has had well, and shall have proper advice!"

My lady finding it hopeless to remonstrate, went away in a pet; and my lord, ordering John into his presence, addressed him very coolly in these words:

"John, you know I have a regard for you, and as long as you behave well, you shall be taken care of in my family. My lady tells me you are taken ill, and indeed I see that you can hardly stand; go to bed, and I will take care that you have proper advice."

John, being thus dismissed, was taken to bed, where, by his lordship's order, a large blister was put upon his head, another between his shoulders, and sixteen ounces of blood taken from his arm. John found himself next morning in a woful plight, and was soon acquainted with the whole process, and the reason upon which it was commenced. He had no remedy, however, but to submit for he would rather have incurred as many more blisters, than to lose his place. My lord sent very formally twice a day to know how he was, and frequently congratulated my lady upon John's recovery, whom he directed to be fed with only water-gruel, and to have no company but an old nurse. In about a week, John having constantly sent word that he was well, my lord thought fit to understand the messenger, and said he was extremely glad that the fever had left him, and desired to see him.

"Well, John," says he, "I hope this is about over."

"Ay, my lord," says John, "I humbly ask your lordship's pardon. I promise never to commit the same fault again."

"Ay, ay," says my lord, "you are right: nobody can prevent sickness, and if you should be sick again, John, I shall see to it, though perhaps you should not complain and I promise you shall always have the same advice and the same attendance you have now."

"God bless your lordship," says John, "I hope there will be no need."

"So do I, too," says his lordship, "but so long as you do your duty towards me, never fear, I shall do mine towards you."

A MODEL FIGHT.—Mr. Leonard, an engineer on one of the lake steamers, kept a well-trained rooster, and fought him in every port between Buffalo and Chicago. Hearing of a crack bird of the pit at Windsor, over went John, with half a dozen friends to see and rejoice with him over the anticipated sudden demise of John Crapeau's celebrated game stock: the birds were let loose, and at the first blow of the little Frenchman's bantam, John's bird was numbered with the things that had been—he was dead. Greatly mortified and astonished was John; he left the field crest-fallen, amid the laughter of his compeers. "Egad," said the engineer, "I'll try him again." On his first trip to Buffalo, John bought a full-grown eagle, cut his feathers into shape, twisted up his tail rooster fashion, fastened a cock's comb on his crown, and otherwise metamorphosed him into a game-cock; brought him up to that city, again rallied his friends, put his bird into a bag, and over he went for another fight. Parlez vous brought out his bird again, certain of success, and placed him ready for action. The engineer took his out of the bag; they slowly approached each other—the bantam stooping and picking, as he advanced to the assault, while the engineer's walked boldly up, with his head erect, beak open, and an eye of fire that never blanchied in the mid-day sun; the bird of Jove seized the gallant bantam, and, with beak and claws, tore him to pieces, and ate him up, to the utter astonishment of the crowd. The little Frenchman danced all sorts of figures, and cried out: "Sacré ventre bleu, me nevaire see one roostaire like dat; he eat him up mon bon chicken!"

A BRIDAL FRACAS IN PARIS.

A MAN named Tripiér, was lately placed at the bar of the Tribunal of Correctional Police, to answer the charge of having beaten his wife on the wedding-day.

"At first all went off well, on the wedding-day," said the complainant, a pretty young woman; "the marriage at the mairie and the church, the dinner, and the ball—all were charming. At night, everybody went away; but I had scarcely entered the nuptial chamber, when the defendant arrived, like a madman, and thrashed and kicked me as if I had been made of plaster. You can readily suppose, Monsieur le President, that I did not know what to think of it. 'What have I done to you,' I cried, 'to cause you to beat me so?' 'Ah,' he said, 'a marriage portion of only 500*fr.*! as if a man would be bored with a woman for 500*fr.*! Oh, if I only had your old wretch of a mother here, wouldn't I pay her out! But, as I can't get at her, I will pay you off instead! and he beat me again as violently as before. At length I broke from him, and rushed, half-dressed, from the room. Such was my wedding-night: a very queer one—was it not, gentlemen?"

"What have you got to say?" asked the president of the accused.

"That I thrashed my wife on the wedding is true, but I was drunk."

"Are you not ashamed of having beaten a young woman?"

"You may easily understand that I did not trouble myself about the age; whether she was fifteen years of age or sixty, mattered not—I should have used my fists just as vigorously!"

"You beat her, she says, because her parents did not give her money enough?"

"In the first place, she has no parents—she has only an old wretch of a mother. In the second place, I made such a foolish marriage, that even now, when I think of it, it causes my hair to stand on end like the quills of a porcupine! For eight months, Monsieur le President, that old woman intrigued to cause me to marry her daughter! The fact is, she is very ambitious, sir, although a simple concierge."

"Ambitious! and pray what are you?"

"An artist hairdresser!" exclaimed the man, with dignity.

"And you really think the mother was ambitious in seeking such a man as you for the husband of her daughter?"

"Why, good gracious, sir! Do you think I am not worth more in the matrimonial market than 500*fr.*? Can I establish myself with 500*fr.*?"

"But you should not render the young woman responsible for your disappointment."

"Oh, you understand, sir, that if I could catch the old mother-in-law, she would feel the weight of my fist; but she takes good care to keep out of way."

The tribunal condemned the amiable Monsieur Tripiér to a year's imprisonment.

MISCELLANEOUS.

"THAT WILL DO," is a phrase of modern invention. The ancients knew of no such expression, or the Egyptians would never have raised the pyramids, nor the Greeks and Romans displayed that love of the beautiful which led them to impart a poetic grace even to the meanest utensils for household use, as the remains of Pompeii fully testify. "That will do," is the excuse of mediocrity, unable to soar to better things. "That will do," is the self-dispensation given by the lazy painter, who glosses over the want of anatomical correctness by a showy colouring. "That will do," is the besetting sin of architects, who lay their short-comings to the want of a favourable site, or an Italian climate. "That will do," is the precept held in veneration by most servants. "That will do," makes your sleeve and your slattern. A man who adopts this motto with regard to dress, does not mind being seen with a dirty shirt, and a beard of two days' growth—while the same fatal saying allows a woman to go about the house with curl-papers, and sliphop. "That will do," applied to household matters, is equally bad, and more annoying to friends than when applied to dress. You may expect ill-cooked dinners in any house where the heads adopt this maxim—to say nothing of shabby carpets, faded paint, dirty muslin curtains, &c. "That will do," has conjured up a host of inefficient teachers, and a still larger proportion of imperfect scholars. "That will do," has sunk many a ship—caused the downfall of scaffolding holding hundreds of human beings—occasions at least half the fires that take place, and is at the bottom of most railway disasters. "That will do," is the enemy to all excellence, and would sap the conscience of the most virtuous man alive, if he hearkened to its dictates. The only persons to whom we recommend it are drunkards, gamblers, and spendthrifts, who may very properly exclaim—"That will do!" All should bear in mind, that nothing will "do" but the very best in point of excellence.

It has been ascertained that 200,000 people daily arrive at and quit London by rail. The North Western Company run 300 trains per day, and employ 11,000 servants.

HABIT.—I trust everything, under God, to habit, upon which, in all ages, the lawgiver as well as the school-master has mainly placed his reliance; habit, which makes everything easy, and casts all difficulties upon a deviation from a wonted course. Make sobriety a habit, and intemperance will be hateful; make prudence a habit, and reckless profligacy will be as contrary to the child, grown or adult, as the most atrocious crimes are to any of your lordships. Give a child the habit of regarding truth; of carefully respecting the property of others; of scrupulously abstaining from all acts of improvidence which involve him in distress, and he will just as likely think of rushing into an element in which he cannot breathe, as of lying, or cheating, or stealing.—Lord Brougham.

EXTRAORDINARY CHANGE OF FORTUNE.—The Devonport Telegraph gives the following: "Romance in Real Life.—A striking instance of the mutability of human affairs has recently occurred in the person of a stoker on board of her Majesty's ship Valorous, lying at this port. A few days ago this begrimed and sooty son of Neptune was visited on board the said vessel (we are told) by a gentleman, who, after making the necessary inquiries, communicated to the object of his visit the astounding intelligence that he was entitled to the earldom of Stockport, and the immense property attached to the title—of the value of some £34,000 per annum. The feelings of the poor fellow on learning the almost incredible transformation that had taken place in his affairs, may be readily conceived."

HANGED FOR HAVING A HANDSOME HUSBAND.—The Rev. James Fontaine, a member of the Huguenot family, writing in the seventeenth century, tells of his grandfather—he married a second time, "but happily had no addition to his family. It would have been much better for him to have remained a widower, for his last wife was a wicked woman, who became tired of him, and tried to poison him; and though she did not succeed, for medical aid was promptly obtained, yet the offence became too notorious to be hushed up, and she was taken to prison, tried, and condemned to death. It so happened that Henry IV. was then at Rochelle, and application was made to him for a pardon. He replied, that before making an answer, he should like to see the husband she was so anxious to get rid of, to judge for himself, whether there was any excuse for her. When my grandfather appeared before him, he called out, 'Let her be hanged! Let her be hanged! Ventre Saint Gris! He is the handsomest man in my kingdom!'"

CHARMS.—Not long since, the following charm was practised in an English village, on a poor lad, subject to epileptic fits. Nine sixpences were procured from nine virgins ("for which they were to be neither asked nor thanked"), which were made into a ring, which the child wore. There is matter for thought in the subject here introduced. Some will settle the whole thing by saying they don't believe a cure was ever made by means such as have been instanced; while others will admit the facts, and endeavour to account for them on rational principles. The easy and common mode by which these phenomena are disposed of, is to say that the imagination does everything. But this is not quite so satisfactory as many could wish. How does imagination accomplish so singular a work—going, often, in advance of the most experienced physician? There is something, we think, beyond the simple imaginative faculty of the mind. Disease, it has been assumed, and by high authority, is of mental origin. The power of the mind over the body is known. In fact, the body is nothing but the material investiture of the soul, and obedient to it in everything. Without the soul, it would be mere dead matter. How quickly does bodily ailment follow mental disease! Many a serious spell of sickness has originated in jealousy or from violent passion. If disease has its origin in the mind, then there may be mental cures. In other words, the mind may be brought into a state in which mental action will suspend the activity of disease in the body. Is very hard to believe this? We think not.

THE Court intelligence, or "Circular," which ordinarily appears in the daily newspapers, is furnished to them daily by an officer holding the warrant of the Lord Chamberlain for that purpose. The information is duly prepared, authenticated, and forwarded to him by the equestrian waiting; and besides being allowed a liberal salary for its daily transmission to the newspapers, he receives a handsome acknowledgment from "the press" for the same services. The appointment of this officer originated with George the Fourth, in consequence of the scandalous reports that appeared in the newspapers of the period respecting the royal movements of the then quasi-bachelor court. Annoyed at these impertinences, the King applied to Townshend, the veteran Bow-street officer—for the surest means of repressing them. Townshend replied, that "To hinder people talking of what they did not know, it would be as well they should know something to talk about." He pointed out how this could be arranged by having some person as a medium for communicating to the newspapers what it was wished they should publish, and recommended for the appointment the father of the gentleman who now holds the office. Thus the "Court news" has been furnished up to the present day.

THE TOMB OF PIZARRO.—In the crypt, under the high altar, at Lima, are deposited the remains of the celebrated Pizarro, who was assassinated in the palace. A small piece of silver, which I dropped into the hand of the sacristan, procured me admission into the crypt. Descending a few steps, I entered a small place, some twenty feet long, quite light and whitewashed, and which smelled and looked so much like a comfortable wine-cellar, that I caught myself more than once looking round for the bins and bottles. The first object that I saw was a large, square tomb, surmounted by the erect figure of an abbot; and close by, in a narrow opening in the wall, I noticed what appeared to me to be a collection of dusty rags—but a closer inspection proved that this was all that remained of the great conqueror of Peru. He had still on him the clothes and shoes which he wore at the time of his assassination. Of course his body is nothing but a skeleton covered with dried flesh and skin, so that no features are discernible. The body is covered with what was once white linen, swathed round him; but the dust of centuries had collected on it, and turned it into a light-brown colour; and it almost pulverised when touched. The body is placed on a narrow piece of plank, in a sloping position, and has been placed in this hole merely to put it out of the way. The folks in Lima do not think anything of the remains of Pizarro.

SINGULAR INSTANCE OF COURAGE IN A BIRD.—A short time ago, on descending the hill from Stockcross, a weasel, with a mouse in his mouth, was seen crossing the road, closely pursued by a robin, which frequently pounced on the weasel, uttering shrill notes of defiance. The weasel turned many times, and at last, on reaching the grass on the road-side, it dropped its prey and went back some paces to attack the robin. This was avoided by the bird rising in flight, and immediately darting to the side of the mouse, whose cries of distress had doubtless attracted its attention and excited its sympathy. Before the observer could reach the spots, the weasel had again seized the mouse, and retreated with it into a hole in the adjoining bank, the mouse being either paralysed with fear, or too severely injured to avail himself of the chivalrous interposition of its feathered friend. The bird, regardless of the presence of the witnesses, or trusting to their aid, continued for some time to flit rapidly from bough to bough on the hedge-row, making the most plaintive outcries.—Berkshire Chronicle.

A CURIOUS RELIC.—Our friend, Captain Pederson, recently arrived from Peru, brought us for examination, some time since, a remarkable curiosity. It is part of a poncho, dug from an Indian grave, at the town of Huacho, about sixty miles from Lima. Its texture is moderately fine, and the raised flowers embroidered in it are as fast in their colours as when first manufactured. It is in itself a convincing proof that the Peruvians were acquainted with the fabrication of woollen goods long before Europeans ever discovered the country—as there is no doubt that this poncho was buried, with the body which it enveloped, previous to 1532. The evidence of this is, that it was obtained from a grave near that of one of the Incas; and it will be remembered by the reader, that when these sovereigns died, it was the custom to sacrifice a large number of their attendants, who were interred with them, that they might appear in the next world with their former dignity, and be served with the same respect as they had been in this.—Panama Star.

SLAVERY.

The Paulding Clarion, a paper published in Mississippi State, has a horrible account of a Legree in real life. "James Clark, a well-known citizen of the county of Clark, made an assault upon his negro woman for a cause which we have not heard stated. He ordered her into a corner of the room, and commenced pitching his knife at her, point foremost. As the knife would enter her flesh, he would compel his victim to draw it forth and return it to him. This diabolical amusement continued until the slave was covered with about fifty bleeding gashes. The same day he whipped his wife, and cut her over the head with his knife: not dangerously, we understand, but in a mass of cruel and painful punctures. He also cut off her eyelids. This strange drama wound up by the commission of a murder. Clark one day ordered his wife to go and call Lewis (a negro belonging to the family). She obeyed, but the slave refused to come—through dread of his enraged master, we suppose. Mrs. Clark returned, and was whipped by her husband for not bringing the negro. Five times was she sent upon this capricious mission, five times was it fruitless, and each time was she whipped for her failure. Clark then called to the slave, informing him that he would shoot him next morning. The negro, it seems, did not heed the warning, for while splitting rails the next day he was deliberately shot by his master. The wound was fatal. The negro ran about 300 yards, and fell in mortal agony. Thus terminated one of the most barbarous transactions that it has ever been our painful and repugnant duty to record. Clark was arrested by a deputation of citizens, who, indignant at the horrible crimes attributed to him, deemed it their duty to aid in bringing him to undignified punishment.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

D. SMITH.—To lay water-colours on parchment, without their running, the latter should be rubbed over by what the lawyers' clerks call pounce, which is whitening dried, and applied by means of a coil of woollen cloth.

B. S. Z.—The eldest son of an intestate is entitled to all the freehold property, as heir-at-law, and to a share of the personal property. If there are three children and a widow, the latter takes a full third, and the former a third share each of the remaining two-thirds.

GEORGE LEIGH.—A promissory note is a legal instrument only during the period of six years from the date thereof.

COLUMBUS.—A marriage contracted in England is legal all the world over. International law recognises all pecuniary and necessary contracts entered into in other countries.

J. R.—The children of a deceased brother take the property of their intestate uncle, but their mother has no share or claim whatever in law.

A. B.—You say you have married your deceased brother's wife, and that she taunts you with the illegality of the marriage, and is otherwise irregular in her conduct. Serve you right. You committed an offence in marrying the woman. The analogy of a deceased wife's sister won't hold good in such a case.

LUCY DEAN.—You dismissed your lover for a trivial fault, and now, of course, you want him back again. Have faith in his love for you. Besides, you have merited some punishment. The phrase, "Under the rose," is of classic origin. In the days of the jovial Greeks, the rose figured on the ceilings and walls of the apartments in which feasts were given, and whatever was said there was considered to go no further—hence the saying.

ANNIE AND ALICE put two questions on etiquette to us: 1. If a gentleman call upon a lady, he not having dined, and the lady having done so, is it unpollite, if he wish her "good morning," for her to reply, "good afternoon or evening?" 2. If, at a party, a lady should meet a gentleman who has always shown her marked attention, ought she to consider it a slight if he does not dance the first dance with her? To the first question we reply, that the salutation, "good morning," may be used up to six o'clock in the evening—not afterwards. The lady should have replied in the same words. With respect to the second question, we think the gentleman committed a breach of etiquette. But it is allowed that when a gentleman is engaged to a lady, he should not be too conspicuous in his attentions to her in public: it excites remarks, which, as it is not everybody that is good-natured, had better be avoided.

A. QUERIST.—Before the sovereign allows a book to be dedicated to her, she must previously be consulted and approve of the work. In case of war with France, the description of property that would suffer the greatest depreciation would be the funds. The people at large would suffer dreadfully, for war would interfere with our foreign trade, and make the loaf ruinously dear. Nobody who has the least amount of feeling for his poorer fellow-creatures would ever wish for a war of any description.

JUVENTS.—The malformation called "knock-knees" may be cured in young people, by wearing a short crutch with two shoulders between the knees when asleep, and in a sitting posture.

MNNIGREY has sent a correct solution to the rebus which appeared in a late number of this Journal. It is a name most dear to every Englishman—viz., "Wellington." The following is the explanation of the figures: My 7 5 6 is a spirit—which is gin; my 8 9 10 is a weight—ton; my 7 9 10 2 is applied to the departed—gone; my 4 5 9 6 is a beast of prey—lion; my 1 5 6 7 is part of a bird—wing; my 2 3 is a fish—eel; my 1 5 6 2 is a juice of certain fruits—wine; my 9 10 5 9 6 is a vegetable—onion.

LADY OF THE LAKE AND HIGHLAND MARY wish to know why negroes are black, and why they have always been in a state of slavery? To the first question we can only reply by asking why are white men white, and yellow men yellow? The laws of colour and race are strong and exacting, but cannot be positively defined. Climate, moral and mental habits, and those inevitable tendencies which we know pervade the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, but which have hitherto baffled the keenest human research, have given the determinate character to the various races of mankind. As to the slavery question, that is the old story of the weak being tyrannised over by the strong. Man is not singular in that exhibition of conduct; for, among the fish of the sea, the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air, the strong make vassals or victims of the weak. Slavery, under certain conditions, is a natural system—a vice, if you please—which can only be destroyed by the growth of other conditions, which, in their practice and more extended action, render the existence of that particular one wholly unnecessary.

ASPINALL TURNER.—We think the argument well founded, which says that the human pulse has only a certain number of pulsations in the life-time, however healthy the person may be; and that, if it beats above a certain number of pulsations in the minute, the person is too rapidly consuming his life. Excess is provocative of decay; therefore, if health requires only a certain number of pulsations per minute, all above that number is a waste of energy. This psychological fact is the best argument that could be used against intemperance. From birth to seventy, a man's pulse, at the healthy rate, should beat about two thousand millions of times; but if, by immoderate indulgence, he quickens his pulse, he must get through the two thousand millions of beats in less time, and so hasten his death.

ANNIE.—Your husband, you say, complains about your keeping so many pets about the house. He says it is a useless expense and an objectionable whim. As to the latter, we will not pronounce an opinion; on the former, we can state that, in the first instance, the actual cost looks a mere trifle; but, when viewed altogether, it is not so insignificant as may be imagined. The cost of keeping a cat is not less than four-pence per week—say, in round numbers, seventeen shillings a year—a sum that would purchase a good winter bonnet at Christmas, or a hat for your husband. But let us go a little further, and look at the whole expenditure on the cat tribe. There are about 4,000,000 houses in Britain. Now, as one cat per house is a fair enough average, we have 4,000,000 cats, at 17s. each per annum, making £3,400,000.

Only imagine such a sum annually expended on cats! Take another of the pet family—the dog. There are at least 4,000,000 dogs in Britain. Now, as a dog costs at least twice as much to keep as a cat, we have

4,000,000 dogs, at 34s. per annum each, making £6,800,000
Add to that the cat expenditure 3,400,000

And you have a sum total of . . . £10,200,000 directly expended on cats and dogs; and the amount would be prodigiously increased, if we were to take into account the enormous pilferings by these domestic pets. This £10,200,000 per annum would pay off the national debt in half a century; or, if allowed to accumulate for ten years, would provide a fund which would be a splendid guarantee against pauperism and poverty, and also establish an educational fund in perpetuity for thrice the number of children and young men and women that are now in these islands. Little things, you see, become very great things, when properly investigated.

S. FRANCIS.—Learned societies confer degrees and honours on all great discoverers, and government sometimes rewards them with pensions. Mr. Hind, the astronomer, lately received a pension. You must make your discovery known to the whole world, and, if worth anything, you will be certain to obtain a reward for your exertions. Learning and genius of a practical character rarely go a-begging in these days.

COLLEEN ASTHORE.—We give insertion to your rebus, but cannot promise to notice any others, or give all the answers to this. I am two words of 16 letters. My 1 6 9 4 16 is clever; my 3 6 11 is a title of respect; my 13 2 12 11 is an animal; my 7 10 4 is a snare; my 5 6 9 15 is a small insect; my 16 10 12 11 is a portion of time; my 8 9 2 10 11 is to guide; my 3 9 12 11 is a luminary; my 7 2 12 11 is close; my 13 12 14 16 is a young child; my 9 15 7 is a number; my 2 11 12 is an epoch; my 1 10 8 9 is one of the cardinal points; my 11 12 4 is an animal; my 2 12 11 is one of the organs; my 9 10 12 11 is to break; my 1 6 8 10 is prudent; and my whole is a magnificent structure.

TRISTRAM.—Your question properly belongs to our essay department—but we can venture to say, that great wealth in the possession of men engaged in commerce and manufactures, if not counteracted by other influences, produces the most mischievous effects on the prosperity of a country, apart from the bad use that might be made of it. In the first place, it prevents competition on the part of men of small means, and thus limits the number of employers to those who, having made their fortune, are naturally reluctant to risk anything, and slow to engage in new speculations—and this leads to a decrease of the national commerce. And, secondly, because—there being no chance at home for those who feel they are fit to rise above the mere labourer, and whose energies and talents are craving for an opportunity to display themselves—they either emigrate to other countries, or become unproductive and discontented at home. In both cases the country loses all that those men could have accomplished in the advantageous employment of their own labour, and that of the labouring population generally; and it loses still more in providing rival countries with the sinews of industry, to be used against itself in the race of competition, and in leaving within itself an element of discord. Another evil resulting from a limited number of merchants and manufacturers is, that it destroys the intermediate grades of society—it sends too many into the rough labour market—and these few who are able to rise above the surface, rise too high.

J. M. N.—Railways are a national necessity. Of course they are—who doubts it? But if the convenience is to be thrust upon us, common propriety and decency suggest that it should be rendered as useful to us as possible. If other joint-stock companies are compelled to comply with the force of circumstances, why should railways be exempted? If water is to be cheapened and sweetened, what pretext can there be for not applying a similar reformatory rule to travelling? None in the world, except that it is forbidden by the present railway system—which, in effect, is a monopoly that has become obnoxious to the public interests. And so it will remain, until the legislature introduces a mode of management which will limit or altogether supersede the powers of boards of directors, and place the lives and limbs of the millions who annually traverse the United Kingdom, in the care of officials who shall be responsible for any inefficiency, neglect, and wanton risk of human life, to a legally constituted and prompt executive body. At present there is no guarantee of safety for a single hour on any line in the kingdom—no restraint upon railway extortion, no redress for railway impudence or abuse.

PEACE.—We entirely disagree with you, and think the public individual you have named committed a great mistake, when he ventured to put forth his absurd theories on Peace and War. Nothing is more sensitive than commerce—it instinctively dreads physical force, and would offer a desperate resistance to any violence, as well as take instant alarm at any threat of violence. Now it has everything to apprehend from France, and we need only refer to the casus belli of the last war. France then was not a commercial country, because it did not respect commerce; and, disdaining a commercial alliance with England on equal terms, and detesting and thwarting England on every occasion, provoked on the part of England a very natural antagonism. France was chastised, and very properly; and would be so again, if she rushed into a similar war of rivalry. England will not provoke such a war, because England, for the last thirty-eight years, instead of encouraging perpetual sharpening of swords and boring of cannons, has sought triumphs through the channels of industrial skill and indomitable enterprise. Instead of carving men into pieces, and enriching soils with the élite of her population, she has dug great holes in the bowels of the earth, ploughed the seas, and enlisted in her service the mental suggestions and mechanical skill of the universe. When France has the wisdom to appreciate such an example, then we shall be under no apprehension of any war between her and England.

MRS. JONES thinks Parliament ought to reduce the duties on tea; so do we, most cordially. Tea is now a necessity—but it is not within the reach of the poor man; if it were, assuming our population to be 28,000,000, instead of importing 56,000,000 lbs. per annum, we ought to import not less than 210,000,000 lbs.; for if a person takes tea twice a day, he will consume about $\frac{7}{8}$ lbs. a-year; whereas, at present, the average consumption for the whole population is only about 2 lbs. per head per annum, which would only allow each individual tea about once a week. But the truth is, the bulk of our population cannot afford to drink tea, when the average price is 4s. 6d. per lb. And they don't drink tea—hence the enormous consumption of beer: for the calculated rate of consumption is, that at present only about one person out of every fifty can have tea twice a day; one of every seven only once a day; and out of the remaining population only 12,000,000 can procure it once in the week; so that the other ten millions do not enjoy tea at all. If the ladies would only agree that the tea duties should come down to a trifle per pound, Parliament would speedily give way; and as tea in China only costs tenpence per pound, everybody would drink tea, and better habits would be introduced into society—for tea is a great reformer of manners.

FLORENCE H., a gay, lively girl of eighteen, wants a beau. She is a famous housekeeper, and would make an admirable wife.

H. H. would like to correspond with "Alfred Travers." She is a lady by birth and education, fair, considered very good-looking, and will have plenty of money.

L. S. is so charmed with the sweet account which "Amelia, the daughter of a retired gentleman," gives of herself, that he would be glad to make her an offer of his hand forthwith. He is twenty-two, tall, with dark eyes, handsome person, and a private fortune of £600 per annum.

MOUNT ALEXANDER has just returned to the Old World, after several years' absence at the Antipodes. He has been a successful digger at the Mount Alexander mines, and has secured several thousand pounds—and as, at the death of a near relative, he will have several thousands more, including a small freehold, he thinks he ought to marry. He is thirty-one years of age, in robust health, of florid complexion, and tolerably good-looking.

Snowdrop, a young lady having recently attained her majority, is desirous of obtaining a partner for life. The gentleman must possess at least £400 per annum. She is of a fair complexion, with dark hair and sparkling eyes, tall, and rather inclined to embonpoint. She enjoys a comfortable independence, derived from landed property.

EXPECTANT offers himself to "Florence," and would be proud of entering into a correspondence, in order to the ultimate formation of an alliance. He is twenty-six years of age, light in complexion, about the middle height, and good-looking. In disposition he is cheerful, with a taste for literature and music. As to pecuniary matters, he is junior partner with a relative in a highly respectable firm, the net profits of which amount to £2000 per annum.

MILLO, a middle-aged widower, living in a suburban village, seeks for another "partner for life." His friends describe him as being amiable in temper and good-looking, and he himself can say that he belongs to a good family, and is well off. The lady sought must have a little property, which might be secured to herself; not less than forty years of age, or more than fifty-five, and if stout in figure, would be preferred.

MARIA C. wishes to meet with a kind and affectionate husband. She would not object to a widower, but in either case he must be tall, and of a very gentlemanly appearance. She is about the middle height, with dark hair and eyes, and generally considered handsome. She is twenty-three, and a lady by birth and education.

EMMA, without hesitation, admits that she would like to be married. She is rather above the middle height, with a good carriage, slight figure, fair complexion, brown hair, and blue eyes, and is generally considered remarkably good-looking. She belongs to an old and opulent family, and is just twenty-two.

A TERRACE BEAU wishes to meet with a young lady who is tall, genteel, good-looking, industrious, and of a cheerful disposition. He is of the middle height, slender, and considered handsome. He has no profession, but occupies his time in assisting in the superintendence of a large estate belonging to his father.

ELLEN GLOVER'S APPEAL TO THE BACHELORS.

Dear Mr. Editor, pray do heed me,
I'll be brief, as brief as need be:
Can you tell me, if in reason,
To wed at twenty would be treason?
In stature I am pretty tall,
(Being five feet five), and fair withal;
My teeth are good, my hair is pretty,
My eyes are something of the jetty;
I do possess what will maintain me—
For being choice, pray do not blame me.

My husband's person must be straight,
In height not less than five feet eight;
He must not have his whiskers thin,
Nor wear them growing on his chin
(For in the strength of our imagination,
We do admire the "bushy" cultivation).
A man of sense, of honour's feeling,
A gentleman in strictest meaning.
My name in full is Ellen Glover,
I'm twenty years, a well-to-lover.

MISS IDA MYRTLE, having seen the notice of "F. R. S.," an English retired officer, with a foreign title, who is desirous of forming an alliance with a lady of education and fortune, responds to his appeal, as she has not only in her possession both these requisites, but health, youth, and beauty. She has a strong wish to be a titled lady; her age is twenty-three.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—James J. Hatch (Pretty, but feeble)—Nanta (Take the autograph to a collector. The cheap books constantly being advertised, would supply you with all the information you have required from us)—John Strong (Ireland is considered one of the finest grazing countries in the world)—A Reader (The sun is nearer to the earth in winter than in summer, but its rays being more horizontal, float as it were over the earth, instead of as in summer, acting upon it from a vertical position)—A. H. (Webster's and Walker's Dictionaries (latest editions) contain all the words that were in use or adopted into the English language, up to very nearly 1848)—J. Dixon (Yarmouth is chiefly a fishing port, but since the establishment of railways, it has obtained considerable foreign trade. It always had a good coasting traffic)—Forfar (Mr. Macaulay, the celebrated author, is a Scotchman by birth, family, and education)—R. J. A. (Captain "James" Cook)—Henry Williams (The anecdote given in a recent number of this Journal, of the late Duke of Wellington and the maniac, "Apollon," is well authenticated. The incident is given on the authority of Colonel Gurnwood)—E. L. M. (Study Blair's, Murray's or Cobbett's English Grammar. The latter is more adapted to an adult who wishes to study English prose composition)—Adelaide (The nurses of her Majesty's infant children are generally recommended through the ladies of the court. Mrs. Lilley obtained her situation through the Duchess of Sutherland)—Ada (Advertise in the daily Times). There are many such institutions in England)—J. E. Waller (The handwriting might be improved into an excellent style)—An Admirer (The loveliness of the Venus de Medicis is, we believe, 4 feet 8 inches)—L. M. (The "Lives of the Queens of England," commenced in No. 387 of this Journal)—A Tyro (Declined, with thanks)—Cricketer (Madame Vestris is about fifty years of age, and still a remarkably fine woman)—M. Belmont (Your penmanship is defective, but, being a free style, some careful practice would soon improve it)—Rhys ap Tudor (Drapers' and chemists' assistants are not, and never will be, allowed free passages to the colonies)—Coulson (Cling to the bank. The Stock and Share Broker business is very precarious. On the slightest probability of a war with France, Capel Court would be ruined)—Brazhen (Purchase our "Treatise on the Hair")—Charles (Never call yourself "Charlie"—it is a vulgar practice to alter or abbreviate Christian names. The proper address would be, "Mr. F. T. care of A. B. Esq., &c., &c.")—Orphan (Remove your sister from the virago's grasp, and set her at defiance. It is the only safe plan. If you allow your sister to be tortured, she will be tempted to some dreadful act. Be firm, decided, prompt, and manly.)—Clara (At the leading milliners' establishments, fancy needlework is received by post, and paid for without the parties knowing each other)—A. P. (Sir W. Molesworth is Chief Commissioner of Public Works)—T. Savill, jun. (Declined, with thanks)—E. R. L. jun. (At a chemist's shop)—Louisa (Use white precipitate, or sulphur, mixed inlard)—Mrs. W. Jones (Send the amount in postage-stamps, to the publisher, 334, Strand)—Lizzie Leigh (The price of a number of this Journal, by post, is fourpence. Procure it from a publication vender)—Apprentice (Because you think your wages are inadequate, would not be any reason at all for leaving your master. You must fulfil your engagement)—Mary Ann Howard (If the sister was the landlady and supplied the board, &c., she can recover the debt)—G. J. (Consult a Dictionary of Chemical Terms)—S. T. R. (Your letter is a mystery to us)—S. S. W. (A druggist's apprentice would have to assist in cleaning out the shop, and arranging it for the day)—F. O. S. (Some back-stairs influence is indispensable to procure a situation under government.)—J. T. H. (A biographical sketch of Miss Woolgar was given in No. 256 of this Journal)—J. Williamson—William Hopeful—Thomas York—Rosaline Scott—A. B.—Du Poire—H. H.—R. W. J.—Agnes B.—P. B.—A. Lew.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 425.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 16, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[RED RALPH RELATING HIS ADVENTURE IN THE PARLOUR OF THE KING'S ARMS.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

The village alehouse, where the gossips meet,
To talk of tales long past, of present changes;
Old men, the chroniclers of by-gone days,
Frequent the chimney nook.

HEIR OF THE SEPT.

THE King's Arms, at Mortlake, was one of those quiet, old-fashioned country inns, so fast disappearing from the road-sides and villages of England, before the united inroads of steam and rail. In its well-sanded, dreamy, odd chambers, the wayworn traveller—as the merry knight of Shakspeare expresses it—might take his ease, secure of hospitable treatment, comfortable fare, and reasonable charges—things, we regret to add, which are daily becoming more scarce.

It was not much frequented by strangers, but had its stated customers, depending chiefly for support upon the tradesmen of the place, the servants of the neighbouring gentry, and the market-gardeners—rather a numerous class, for the land round Mortlake and Sheen is cultivated chiefly for the supply of the London markets. These persons regularly passed their evenings in the parlour or tap-room of the hostel, according to their respective standing in the village.

Every parlour and tap-room has its oracle; men who are thought wise, because they pronounce dogmatically. Such persons are as jealous of their authority and opinions as a coquette of her lovers, or a politician of his influence.

The great gun of the parlour was the village schoolmaster—a canny Scotchman—who had educated most of the rising generation of Mortlake. Like many of his countrymen, he possessed considerable shrewdness and some learning. The former he used to maintain the position he had assumed, by playing off one party against another, studying their weakness, from which he drew his strength, in order to hold the balance between them.

Modern statesmen, in a wider sphere of action, do the same.

His learning was displayed in scraps of odd, out-of-the-way knowledge, and curious anecdotes connected with the traditions of the place. In politics he was a Whig—perhaps something more; had a great respect for the now almost forgotten names of Hunt and Cobbett—had a perfect horror of the Times, whose editors he pronounced ready-made rascals, although he acknowledged their talent.

Amble—the name of the schoolmaster—like other great men, was not without his weak point. His consisted in the idea that he was possessed of a remarkably fine bass voice. With all his quips and oddities, he was a fine-hearted old fellow, ever ready to contribute his mite to the distressed; quarrelling one moment with a neighbour, inconveniencing himself, perhaps, to serve him the next. He had never been known to bear resentment four-and-twenty hours but once, and then it must be owned the provocation was sufficiently strong to palliate, if not justify, the unchristian-like feeling. An artist, a painter of men and manners, had disputed the excellence of his lower G; more, he had even had the cruelty to induce a friend—one of the bassos of the Opera House—to spend an evening in the parlour of the King's Arms, and sing the old man's favourite—indeed, his only song—

I am a friar of orders grey,
And down in the valley I take my way.

The habitués of the room very properly discountenanced the attempt, by declaring that it was nothing like the schoolmaster's—and it was not.

Amble's dignity was deeply wounded. A man with one song is like a man with one idea. Woe to those who anticipate the former or venture to dispute the latter.

The oracle of the tap-room was an old Thames waterman, known by the name of Kit Crust; and never, perhaps, were name and character better assimilated. He agreed with no one; and maintained his influence, from that very reason, over all. He once had the honour of forming one of the boat's crew which rowed George III. and his queen from Kew to Richmond; and, no matter what the argument or subject of conversation, he invariably clenched his opinion, by alluding to that glorious fact. It was whispered amongst his most intimate friends that he had left directions to have engraved upon his tombstone—for he was well to do in the world—

"Here lies Kit Crust, who helped to row his Most Gracious Majesty George III."

Although their orbits were different, the schoolmaster and the boatman sometimes clasped: not in their persons, but opinions. This was occasioned by the frequenters of either room, dissatisfied with the judgment of their own oracle, appealing to that of the other—a species of treason against their authority which either potentate resented.

Both parlour and tap-room, on the evening we are about to describe, were agitated by a rumour that Red Ralph, Remnant's cowboy, had encountered a certain nameless personage in Cromwell House.

Of course our readers have not forgotten the fright the lad received from the ayah, on the occasion of his last visit to the dilapidated mansion of the great regicide.

Never previously had Ralph found himself an object of such general interest. After relating his tale in the tap-room, he had been sent for into the parlour. Amble had even condescended to pat him on the head—an honour which raised the lad considerably in his own esteem; for, like most of the youngsters in the place, he stood in great awe of the schoolmaster.

Just as he was about to recommence his narration for the fifth time, two travellers made their appearance in the parlour of the little inn. One was an elderly, gentlemanly-looking man, between forty and fifty years of age. His companion, who had rather a rustic look, was young enough to be his son.

So little were the frequenters of the room accustomed to see strangers amongst them, that every eye was directed towards the new comers, as if they almost resented their intrusion, and then turned towards Amble, to ask his opinion of them. The old man nodded solemnly once or twice between the whiffs of his pipe, as much as to say—"Wait awhile—I'll sound their bearings."

Ralph having repeated his wonderful story, was dismissed to the kitchen, where the chambermaid and cook were impatiently waiting to hear him: the latter, with professional instinct, guessed the way to his confidence—she placed the remains of a rabbit pie before him: it was savoury enough to serve as a key even to a policeman's heart.

"Well, doctor," exclaimed a shrewd-looking young man, who had lately settled in Mortlake as a builder and architect; "what is your opinion of this rigmorole?"

The schoolmaster hesitated: the question was somewhat novel. Like a prudent man, he paused before committing himself by pronouncing judgment.

"Suspicious, but not conclusive," replied the pedagogue at last; "incline which way you will, doubt, like a recurring decimal, will return. The rigmarole—which, par— is a vile word—would appear probable, if it were possible.

"You are no believer in ghosts, sir?" observed the elder of the two strangers, who had been an interested listener to the boy's story.

"In scriptural ones, sir—scriptural ones. I believe in Satan and the witch of Endor!" was the reply.

"And the one which warned your own Scottish monarch, James, before the fatal fight at Flodden?" added the gentleman: "for I perceive, by your accent, that you are from the other side of the border."

This was a sore hit—a very sore one—to Amble; who, like many of his countrymen, laboured under the delusion that he spoke English with a purity and accent which defied detection. A quiet smile played upon the features of most present.

"You have been told, sir," he answered, rather tartly,
"that I am from Scotland—I never deny my country;
But let that flea stick by the wall, as the old saying is.
As you are so learned in accents," he added, "doubtless ye must have been a great traveller?"

The stranger shook his head, to negative the supposition.
"Or at least seen many strange things in the course of your life?" continued the speaker. "Now, what is your opinion of this rigmarole, as my young friend classically calls it?"

"Nothing can be more simple," replied the gentleman;
"the boy has been frightened by his own imagination."

"But Ralph has no imagination," observed the schoolmaster, with a chuckle; "Nature has denied him the faculty!"

"Or has been terrified at finding himself alone in an uninhabited house, to which so many strange reports are attached," added the stranger.

"But Cromwell House is not uninhabited," added the Scotchman.

The two strangers exchanged glances, and the younger one whispered to his companion, in an under-tone, the name of the ayah.

Elworthy—for it was no other than the lawyer and Joe Beans who had introduced themselves into the society assembled in the little parlour at the King's Arms—nodded assent.

"By some ancient family who have long possessed it, no doubt?" he observed.

"Ancient or young," replied Amble, "we ken very little about them—the place is kept locked and guarded like a prison; now and then the gates are opened to admit a carriage which whisks through the village, and that is all any one sees of the inhabitants."

"But they pay well," observed the grocer.

"And regularly," chimed in the baker; "so they must be respectable."

The butcher, with whom they had not yet dealt, was of a different opinion.

"We shall see strange things soon," observed the sexton—who, since the fright he had received on the night of his visit to the church with the Khan, had been a constant frequent of the inn; "for my part, I believe the boy's story—the powers of darkness are loosed!"

All eagerly pressed the speaker to explain himself.
Prudence, of course, kept him silent. His traffic with the mysterious recluse in the cottage had not been of a nature to bear explanation. Many of the relatives of those whose heads he had supplied him with—as he believed, for no Christian purpose—were present. All that could be drawn from him were muttered exclamations of—

"Time will show—time will show!"

"But show us what?"

The sexton shuddered, and spoke no more, but soon afterwards he left the room.

"Old cross-bones has seen something!" whispered the landlord to the schoolmaster.

"If it was worse than himself," was the reply, "it must have been hideous, indeed!"

The two travellers had arranged to pass the night at the little inn. The elder one almost immediately afterwards retired to rest, leaving his companion to follow up the design which had brought them to Mortlake.

Red Ralph, who had been the hero of the night, both in the parlour and tap-room, was wending his way towards the cottage where he resided with his aged grandmother—

Whistling as he went, for want of thought—when a hand was gently laid upon his shoulder: the boy started, and turned.

"Lord bless I," he exclaimed; "why didst thee frighten a body so?"

"Don't be frightened!"

"I beant," replied Ralph, perfectly satisfied that the speaker was human; "there be plenty of folks near."

"And if there were not," said Joe Beans—for it was no other than our old acquaintance—"you would have nothing to fear from me! Ralph," he added, "are you fond of money?"

"Yes!" answered the savage, with a broad grin.

The young man took from his pocket five sovereigns, and showed them in the palm of his hand to the cowboy, who probably had never seen so much gold at one time in his life. It appeared a treasure to his unsophisticated mind.

"Be all that gowd?" he demanded.

"Joe nodded.

"Real gowd?"

"As good," said the young man, "as ever came from the Bank. Now listen to me—on one condition they are yours!"

"Mine?" repeated the astonished lad.

"Yes!"

"What, all?"

"All!"

"And what mun I do for it?"

"Introduce me to Cromwell House!"

"Noa!" answered Ralph, with a shudder; "Noa! I shouldn't so much mind, if it wor day!"

"Day or night—what difference can that make?"

"The ghostes never come by day," muttered the urchin, casting a greedy look upon the coins which Joe still held in his extended hand.

"Listen to me, Ralph," replied the young man.

"I will."

"The ghost you have seen was no ghost—only a black woman—one of the servants of the house. I have seen her a dozen times in a distant part of the country. Of course you have heard of black people?"

The lad hesitated: he certainly had heard of black men—nay, he had even seen one—a sailor, who had strayed from the classic purlieus of Wapping to the rustic shades of Mortlake. Therefore he knew that there were such things as black men in the world—it was the existence of black women that he doubted; but, as the schoolmaster observed, he had no imagination.

"Will 'ee go with I?" he demanded, after a pause.

"The very thing I have been requesting," said Joe.

"Dang it, then, but I'll try!" exclaimed Ralph, with sudden resolution; "if thee beant afeard, I don't see why should I be! Let I just feel the gowd—I never touched a real survin afore!"

"More," said the young man; "you shall have one in your pocket, as an earnest of the rest."

So saying, he placed one of the glittering coins in the hand of the lad, who grinned and laughed with delight—he swelled with the importance of his newly-acquired wealth.

"I'll go—I'll go!" he chuckled, his courage waderfully strengthened by the magnetic touch; "but it be really a woman," he added, "and no ghost?"

"Really a woman."

"Follow I!" continued the boy; "they may lock the gates and bar the winders, but they can't bar I out of Cromwell House—it be loike a rabbit burrow; there be plenty of ways in and out. Don't 'ee speak," he added, as they approached the narrow lane running parallel with the lawn in front of the mansion; "and if anybody comes, do as I do."

"And what may that be?" demanded Joe Beans.

By way of illustrating his intention, Red Ralph fell upon his hands and knees, and began creeping like a dog under the shadow of the hedge.

Joe had too frequently practised the same feat, when he and Henry Ashton were boys together, and they had stolen from the farm on a moonlight night, to try the farmer's gun upon the common, to find the least difficulty in following his example.

"By gum!" exclaimed the cowboy, with a chuckle;
"but thee beest one of the right sort! Thee beest used to it!"

CHAPTER LXXV.

Foul deeds will rise,
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them to men's eyes.
SHAKESPEARE.

The morning at last arrived on which Sir Thomas
Lawrence was to present our hero to the Sovereign Pontiff, Pius VII., a prince in whose gentle heart the spirit of persecution had never entered. Even his great enemy, Napoleon, loved him for his gentleness, respected him for his firmness of character—although that firmness had thwarted one of the darling schemes of his ambition.
He had endured captivity and exile patiently. Restored to his throne by the allies, after the downfall of his persecutor, he bore his honours meekly.

Since the days of Ganganelli—whom English travellers named the Protestant Pope—no one had filled the Papal throne with greater humility than the good and amiable Charamonti, who, previous to his elevation to the chair of St. Peter, had even been suspected of liberalism by the Ultramontanes. The shelter which, in the hour of adversity, he afforded to the family of his fallen persecutor, speaks more for the benevolence of his heart, than a hundred panegyrics.

To the unhappy Lady Mowbray the interview was a most important one: it was to decide, as she fondly imagined, between home and the cloister—the recovery of her son,
the restoration of her matron fame, and that living tomb which excludes the worm, but not the vain regrets and broken hopes to which death brings relief.

"Farewell, dear Walter!" said Henry Ashton, pressing the hand of his friend, who for the first time had been permitted to quit his bed of suffering for a couch, near the window. "Our kind friend Martingale will more than supply my place till I return."

The gentle smile of the invalid and his glance seemed to reproach the speaker for supposing that any one could supply his place: no—much as he felt disposed to like his new acquaintance, Walter Mowbray felt that he never could become to him a friend like Henry.

The agent of Meeran Hafaz saw the glance, and it annoyed him—for, by one of those strange contradictions of humanity, he felt desirous of securing the friendship of the youths whose happiness he was plotting against. He liked them from sympathy—he destroyed them from calculation. In feeling he was a sentimentalist—in morals a mathematician.

"I will do my best," he said; "but Walter says truly,
I cannot replace you!"

The friends looked surprised, and the invalid observed that he had not uttered a word.

"Words," continued the speaker, "are but the signs of thought. A look will often express them far more eloquently. I frequently glean from them more than from language. We may school our tongues, but not our eyes:

they are the windows of the soul, and, curtain them as we may, the spirit will peep forth."

"A philosopher!" exclaimed Henry, laughingly.

"No, a mere observer. Life is too short to analyse."

"And what has observation taught you?" demanded Mowbray.

"To doubt!" was the bitter and somewhat sarcastic reply; "none but dreamers trust!"

"Out upon thee for a slanderer of thyself!" exclaimed Henry Ashton. "Do not believe him, Walter—it is but a momentary spleen. I am sure that he would rather live the world's blind fool, than act its heartless cynic! To hear him prate, one would almost think his heart a charnel-house—its tenant bitter ashes!"

"Well, well!" exclaimed the deceiver, with affected carelessness, "you will persuade me that I am better than I judge myself!"

Shortly after our hero had taken his departure, one of the domestics of the hotel entered the room, to say that a gentleman desired to speak with the Signor Ashton.

"You know he has left the casa?" observed Martingale.

"I told him so," continued the man; "but either he would not believe me, or had his own reasons for persevering. He is in the next apartment."

"The next apartment!" repeated both the young men,
"with surprise."

"I dared not refuse him," said the waiter, in an apologetic tone. Then, lowering his voice, he added, "he is a member of the secret police of Rome—they penetrate everywhere!"

At the word "police," despite his habitual self-command, the countenance of Martingale changed. Something whispered that the visit boded him no good.

"I will see this man myself!" he said, addressing the invalid, "and learn his business. Police!" he repeated, with an attempt to smile; "this is some stupid mistake of the servant's."

"We never mistake signor," replied the man; "there is not a domestic in any one of the inns of Rome—from the Hotel d'Espagne to the humblest osteria—but is acquainted with them."

"Why so?"

The poor fellow shrugged his shoulders—the usual resource of an Italian when he either fears or does not wish to give an answer.

It is a fact no less degrading to the Pontifical government than the character of its subjects, that no man is allowed to serve as a waiter in Rome, unless he consents to act as a spy for the police, whose agents are sent round daily to collect their reports. We recollect perfectly complaining on more than one occasion to Francez, our landlord, in the Via Condotti, of the impertinence of his porter; several of his guests, as well as ourself, advised him to discharge him: the poor fellow dared not—in fact, could not—he had been imposed upon him by the secret police.

This occurred in 'forty-eight, the year of revolutions over two-thirds of Europe.

Although far from suspecting the real character of the treacherous man who, like a serpent, had introduced himself to his and Henry's friendship, Walter Mowbray could not avoid thinking it rather singular that Martingale should carefully close the door which communicated with the saloon, as he left the room. In the low, nervous state to which his wounds had reduced him, it slightly irritated him; but the feeling gradually gave way to one of a yet deeper interest, as a word spoken in a louder tone than the rest caught his ear.

"Would I were strong enough to leave the sofa!" he murmured; "would I were strong enough!"

When Martingale entered the salon de reception, he found a shrewd-looking, elderly man, plainly but gentlemanly dressed, seated at the table, upon which was the travelling desk in which Henry Ashton kept his correspondence and his papers. The Italian turned his cold, searching glance upon the Englishman, as if he would read him through. The traitor endured the scrutiny unmoved:
he had strung his nerves for the occasion—like his heart,
they were of iron.

"The Signor Ashton, I presume?" said the agent of the police.

"His friend only," replied the accomplished deceiver.

"The signor is absent."

"And when will he return?"

Martingale shrugged his shoulders, as much as to intimate that it was one of those questions which he found it impossible to answer.

"The signor is young," he said, "and has many engagements into which friendship must not pry too curiously."

The Italian smiled—he perfectly comprehended the insinuation.

"Can you tell me," he inquired, "if your friend has lately received letters from England?"

"Not very lately, I believe; the post is so irregular," replied Martingale. "I knew that some weeks since he complained of it bitterly. But may I ask the motive of such a question?"

"I belong to the police of Rome," answered the stranger.

The Englishman drew himself up with well-affected surprise.

"The secret police," added the visitor.

"I really do not see how my friend the Signor Ashton, attached to the British embassy in Naples, can have raised the suspicion of the Roman government. Any communication would have been more or less from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Cardinal Secretary, who honours him with his friendship."

"I know it," replied the Italian, perfectly deceived by the cool self-possession and assumed haughtiness of the speaker; "my visit is a friendly one."

Martingale expressed increased surprise.

"When I say a friendly one, it is made in his interest. As you are the friend of the signor, there can be no impropriety in my intrusting you with the affair."

"You must be the best judge of that," was the reply, uttered with such well-affected indifference, that it deceived even the wily agent of the police; "I can have no opinion on the subject."

"The correspondence," said the man, lowering his voice, "has been tampered with!"

"By the government?"

"Fie, signor—fie!" exclaimed the visitor; the supposition is unjust. The government of the Holy Father is no less noted for its paternal benignity than its honourable conduct towards strangers. It would blush to —"

Martingale began to yawn. The speaker, seeing that the eloquent vindication of the Pontifical government which he was about to utter would be thrown away, at once dropped the subject.

"No, signor; by some agent from England."

The Englishman shook his head incredulously.

"Certain!" continued the man; "we have the confession of the employé at the post-office, whose extravagant expenditure first excited the suspicions of his superiors. He has received three hundred ducats," he added, in a tone which betrayed more envy than indignation, "just for giving up a few letters!"

"Is it possible?"

"Fact, signor—fact!"

"But from whom?"

"That we have yet to learn," continued the agent. "The fool does not even know the name of the party who bribed him! But we shall discover him!"

"I trust so!"

"Sure of it—sure of it!" exclaimed the man. "Pucinelli—the name of the employé—has described him as a tall, gentlemanly person, about your own height, signor; dark hair and whiskers—yours, by-the bye, are dark—and wearing a remarkably fine emerald upon the third finger of the left hand."

Martingale looked the speaker full in the face, as he turned the accusing gem upon his finger till the stone was concealed in the palm of his hand.

"The emerald," he coolly observed, "may certainly lead to his detection. Pray proceed—you interest me."

"Pucinelli has confessed that he has affixed the impress of the Roman post to several letters which the stranger brought."

"The idiot!" mentally ejaculated his listener.

"They must have been forgeries," added the agent.

"Doubtless!"

"If the Signor Ashton would only give them up —"

"My friend cannot make the least objection," calmly observed Martingale; "on the contrary, he will feel, I am assured, deeply grateful for the conduct of the police in the affair. Signor Ashton has been treated infamously. By-the-bye," he added, in a careless tone, as if the question he was about to put had only the least possible interest for him, "what is the punishment for the fellow's crime?"

"For receiving a bribe, signor, a year's imprisonment."

Martingale smiled.

"But for attesting a forged document or letter with a government seal," added the speaker, "it is treason—the gallies for life."

"For the principal?"

"For him and his accomplice," answered the agent, who doubted not that he was impressing the Englishman with a very favourable opinion of Roman justice; "therefore it is that we require the letters—without them we can do comparatively little."

"What do you call little?" inquired the arch-deceiver.

"Imprisonment, as I stated, signor, for the clerk—but nothing to his employer; and he is the person we are most anxious to get hold of."

"In which praiseworthy attempt I sincerely trust you may succeed," said Martingale, rising from his chair, to intimate that the interview was at an end. "I will report faithfully to my friend all that you have stated, and doubtless he will at once communicate with the authorities upon the subject; meanwhile," he added, "your zeal must not go unacknowledged."

So saying, he thrust several pieces of gold into the hand of the police-agent.

"Ah, signor," exclaimed the fellow, with a bow; "there is no nation like the Inglese for —"

The speaker suddenly stopped. As the donor dropped the gold into his palm, he caught sight of the emerald turned to the inside of Martingale's hand. To seize it was the thought and work of an instant—his cringing, respectful manner vanished at once.

"Cosetta!" he exclaimed, "what a fool have I been all this while! You are my prisoner!"

"Tush!" whispered the detected villain; "an affair of state!"

The astute agent smiled—he was not to be baffled twice.

Signor Ashton is suspected of conspiring with the malcontents in Naples, against the Pontifical government."

"Se non e vero e ben trovato," was the reply.

"How much," demanded Martingale, "for forgetting that you have seen this idle toy upon my finger—fifty ducats?"

"Fifty!" repeated the agent; "signor, you insult me! I am a member of the secret police: you could not buy the connivance of the poorest of us at such a price!"

"I see my error," whispered the prisoner; "it should have been a hundred!"

"Two hundred, you mean!" replied his captor; "not a lucciola less! Corpo di Dio! it gives you an opportunity of destroying the letters! I dare say you know where to find them!"

Fortunately for Martingale, he had more than the required sum upon him, in notes of the Banco Romano. The police agent would have preferred gold—but as that was impossible, he contented himself with accepting the emerald ring, the possession of which had proved so unfortunate to its owner, as a buono mano for his complaisance.

"And now, signor," he said, resuming his former humility, after he had pocketed the bribe, "you are free. Adieu! I commend my soul to your prayers!"

With this not unusual salutation, the fellow withdrew, leaving the agent of Meeran Hafaz alarmed, but not crushed, by the difficulties which were rapidly gathering round him.

"I must be prompt!" he muttered; "decision will oft restore to healthful vigour the cause which despondency would abandon as hopeless—the letters are the only proofs which can compromise me—the unsupported evidence of my weak accomplice will tell as nothing: they must be mine," he added, with stern resolution, "at any sacrifice—at any cost!"

So saying, he deliberately took up the desk, which was upon the table near him, and began to tamper with the lock; with considerable difficulty he at last succeeded in forcing the blade of a strong knife between the interstices; after repeated efforts the bolt sprang back.

"They are mine!" he said.

"Villain!" exclaimed a feeble voice near him; and at the same moment a trembling hand was laid upon his shoulder. He turned suddenly round, and beheld Walter Mowbray. The faithful friend, who had with pain contrived to drag himself from the sofa to the door of the saloon, had overheard the last part of the traitor's conversation with the secret agent of the police. His first thought had been to conceal the knowledge he had thus obtained till the return of Henry; but at the sight of Martingale forcing the desk of his friend, indignation got the better of prudence, and, weak and nerveless as he was, he attempted to restrain him.

For a few seconds the two young men stood gazing upon each other in silence. The countenance of the detected felon was even paler than that of the invalid, to whose features contempt and scorn lent their honest flush.

"So," said Martingale, "you have overheard —"

"Everything! Quit the house, before I summon the domestics to chase you like a thief from the roof whose hospitality you have so infamously abused! Is this your friendship? God!" he added, "I had almost accused myself of ingratitude, in not esteeming you as I ought! At last I know you!"

"Not yet!" was the cool reply; "but you will before we part! Not that the knowledge will be of much value to you!"

The ferocious expression in the eye of the ruffian, even more than his words, warned Walter Mowbray of his danger. Tottering from exhaustion and agitation, he advanced towards the bell: the ruffian perceived his design, and intercepted him in an instant.

"You must retire to your room!" he said.

"Not till I have exposed your villainy!" replied the indignant youth.

Without another word, Martingale seized him in his arms, carried him, as he would a child, into the inner apartment, and cast him, with considerable violence, upon the bed. The invalid was too much enfeebled by the shock to stir or offer the least resistance. The unmanly villain coolly fastened the door.

"What is it you intend—to murder me?" demanded the unresisting victim.

"Even so!" was the reply. "Fool, whom a breath can crush, to cross my path! You will denounce me!—it must be from the grave, then!"

"Monster! Henry will avenge me!"

"He will never know it!" answered Martingale, tauntingly. "My sorrow for your death will rival his! The world has made me no bad actor. I but play the part your folly and mine own necessity assign me! Fear not," he added, "I will not torture you! One blow, and thy thread of life, which is frail as the web the spider weaves, is broken! By all but me your death will be attributed to the internal rupture of an artery. I heard Dr. Kisserock say the least shock would cause it!"

"Will it appear so to heaven?" faintly exclaimed the sufferer.

"It will not be the only secret," brutally observed Martingale, "which the holy place you name holds in its keeping!"

Without the least remorse, twice the brutal murderer struck the unresisting youth upon the chest with his clenched hand. At the first blow a violent shudder ran through his frame, occasioned as much by a sense of the indignity as suffering, and a light crimson froth came bubbling to his lips; still not a groan or sigh escaped him—his eyes were fixed, with an expression of proud scorn, on his assassin; at the second, he sank with a deep groan upon the pillow, from which he had tried to raise himself.

Where was Henry then? His arm would have arrested the blows, or quickly have avenged them.

Even age seldom resigns itself to death without a struggle—the love of life planted by nature in the breasts of all, prompts it, though feeble and unavailing. To youth, the approach of the grim tyrant is doubly terrible, for it falls like an untimely blight upon the spring buds of love, with its bright dreams and promises, friendships, joys, ambitious, soul-inspiring energies. To the old, death is a sacrifice—to the young, a martyrdom.

"Monster!" murmured Walter, "have you no pity?"

"None!"

"No remorse?"

"Still less!" replied the murderer; "and yet I would willingly have spared you, for I have no cause of enmity —more, I rather liked you. Your own prying curiosity has rendered your death necessary. Blame it and destiny—not me!"

For some moments he waited, trusting to see his victim breathe his last. It was not without a feeling of remorse, despite his callous indifference to suffering, that he prepared to complete his only half-accomplished purpose.

At this moment, Martingale either heard, or fancied that he heard, some one in the adjoining room. He proceeded resolutely to the door, which he unlocked—the saloon was empty.

"What cowards," he muttered, "does conscience make us! I could have sworn I heard a step!"

Walter had imagined it, too, and his eyes followed the footsteps of his assassin to the door. When he saw him coolly close it, the last hope vanished from his heart: not the hope of life—that he felt was ebbing from him; but the desire of once more clasping the hand of his absent friend—of expiring in the arms of one he loved—of warning him of his danger—of leaving an avenger.

Martingale contemplated him a few seconds in silence. He read what was passing in his mind.

"It would be a false humanity," he said, "to prolong your agony. Would I could have spared it, but that is now impossible!"

A third blow, more violent than the preceding ones, followed. In an instant, the linen of the bed was deluged with the life blood of the generous youth, who had sacrificed himself to honour and to friendship.

Happily his sufferings were but momentary. The slender thread which bound him to existence was broken, a film spread over his dying eyes, and he expired, attempting to murmur the names dearest to him—Henry and Therese.

The instant Martingale was assured of the death of Walter Mowbray, he unlocked the door, and, flying to the bell, began to ring violently. The peal, as might be expected, quickly alarmed the house. When the waiters entered the apartment, he was supporting, with hypocritical pity, the dead man in his arms.

"Fly!" he exclaimed; "assistance! Dr. Kisserock!"

Then, with all the despair of well-acted friendship, he called upon Walter to speak for his sake.

As the domestics left the room, the murderer fancied that the principal waiter cast a look of terror and horror upon him.

"Pshaw!" he muttered; "it must have been the sight of the idiot's blood—it could be nothing else!"

In his confusion he had forgotten the letters. He hastened to the saloon to secure them—the desk had disappeared.

For a few moments he stood thunderstruck—he felt that the arm he had so long braved at last had reached him, and the blow had benumbed that ready action and fertile spirit of which he was so vain. The proofs of his first crime must have been removed whilst the murder was being perpetrated, and if so, in all probability his second one was witnessed.

"I must fly!" he said, wiping the drops of cold perspiration and terror from his brow; "but while his blood is upon me, go where I will, it will accuse me!"

Hastily enveloping himself in a cloak belonging to Henry Ashton, he was about to quit the apartment, when the folding doors were thrown open, and an ecclesiastic, followed by a party of carbiniers, entered the saloon.

"Signor Inglese," said the apparitor, "you are my prisoner!"

"Prisoner!" exclaimed the baffled felon, endeavouring by assurance and self-possession to defeat the end of justice; "ridiculous! Upon what pretence do you presume to arrest an English gentleman?"

"For having conspired with and bribed a peasant, now in custody, to undertake the assassination of one of your countrymen," replied the official, not in the slightest degree affected by the airs of insulted virtue which the culprit gave himself. "Denial is useless," he added; "your accomplice is in prison!"

"For having murdered one of his countrymen! you may say!" exclaimed the chief waiter—the same whose pale countenance and terror-stricken glance had attracted the notice of Martingale.

"Explain?" said the officer.

The man proceeded to relate how his suspicions had been excited by the visit of an officer of the secret police, and that he had determined to watch; how he had seen the attempted robbery of the desk by Martingale—his detection by the Signor Mowbray, with all the sickening details of the scene of cruelty which followed. As a matter of precaution, he had entered the saloon to secure the desk, which he naturally imagined must contain a vast amount of property, to tempt an English "mild"—as he designated the murderer—to commit so despicable an act.

His presence in the room and hasty retreat accounts for the step which had startled Martingale previous to the completion of his horrible design.

The apparitor, after consigning his prisoner to the guard of the soldiers, accompanied by the waiter and the landlord, who had made his appearance, entered the chamber of the dead. All was over—not a pulse beat: the pure and noble soul had quitted its frail tenement of clay, never to return, till the archangel's trumpet shall summon the grave to resign its prey.

The landlord of the hotel was loud in his expressions of grief; not so much for the crime, as for the injury it would do his establishment.

"I would have given a thousand sondi," he exclaimed, "rather than it should have happened here!"

The myrmidon of justice did not so much regard it—he was accustomed to such scenes: each one to his interests.

"I am ready to attend you, sir!" said Martingale, as the officer of justice made his appearance in the saloon.

"This contretemps" as the cool-headed villain designated the murder of his victim—"must, I presume, be explained elsewhere. Where," he added, with one of his most elegant bows, "must I have the honour of accompanying you—to the city prison?"

"No!" replied the apparitor.

"Where, then?"

"To the prison of the Most Holy Inquisition!"

At the name of that dreaded tribunal, a scarcely-perceptible shudder ran through the veins of the assassin: he knew that, whatever else might be their failings, her judges were incorruptible—her dungeons inaccessible to all but the steps of justice.

"Perhaps," he said, trying to recover himself, "you will permit me to stop on my way for one moment, at my hotel?"

"No!"

"Any fee!" he added, in a lower tone.

For once Roman justice was not to be bribed: perhaps the offer was made too publicly. At a sign from the apparitor, the carabineers closed round their prisoner, and he was conducted to the courtyard of the hotel, where one of those dark, close carriages, whose appearance in the streets of Rome is never witnessed without a shudder, was in waiting.

Martingale entered it with the apparitor, and the next instant they drove off.

When Henry Ashton left the hotel, he directed his steps, in the first place, to the Dominican convent, in the hope of obtaining an interview with the Abbate Lucas, from whom he trusted to obtain some clue to the lost heir of Sir William Mowbray. It was not the first or second occasion on which he had attempted to see him: his visits had been frequent, but fruitless—the wily ecclesiastic was not to be spoken with. The application to the congregation of rites had alarmed him: he dreaded the scandal which the affair would cause—the unfavourable impression which the infamy of his relative's conduct might produce against himself. Hence he had used his interest with the council to reject it, and unfortunately succeeded but too well.

As usual, the lay-brother who answered his summons, informed him that the superior was not to be seen.

"Is he absent?" demanded our hero.

The monk hesitated. The piece of gold which the young man slid into his palm decided him, however, to speak.

"Not absolutely absent: that is to say," added the brother, lowering his voice, "Monsignore is engaged in the church, where a novice is pronouncing his vows."

It was enough. Henry had been long enough in Rome to know that upon such occasions the churches, even of the severest orders, are open to the public. He determined to enter and address the abbate—publicly, if necessary—and shame him into an explanation of his conduct. Fortunately, the ceremony was nearly over when he arrived.

On entering the sacred edifice, the first person he encountered was his old acquaintance, Father O'Hara, to whom he briefly related his fruitless visits, the evident resolution of the abbate to avoid him, and the determination he had come to address him, even at the altar, since his obstinacy left him no other resource.

"It would be fruitless," replied the warm-hearted Capucin, with an air of deep concern. "At a sign, you would be removed from the church."

"I care not!"

"But he is a Monsignore!" added his adviser.

The title of Monsignore is held in great respect in Rome; although, like the cardinalate, it is sometimes bestowed even upon laymen. It gives its possessor the rank of a prelate, without conferring any of the episcopal functions. When he who bears it is a priest—as is universally the case with the heads of religious houses, and the chanoines of St. Peter—it is looked upon as a step to the purple.

"What care I for his rank?" impatiently whispered the young man. "I am heart-sick of this denial of justice. If he chooses to provoke a public scandal, let him: it will have one good effect, at least—that of exposing him." "Let me try my influence with him first," replied O'Hara. "It cannot be that he has any unworthy motive, as you suspect: the duties of his holy office alone have caused his declining your visit."

Henry remained silent. The little he had mingled with the world had shaken his boyish faith in man's integrity, but not in woman's faith—that still remained unbroken as his love for Ellen.

The robe of the monk enabled him to penetrate close to the elevated seat by the high altar, where the superior of the Dominicans was in the act of conferring the habit of his order upon the kneeling neophyte. Taking advantage of a pause in the ceremony, he whispered a few words in the ear of the abbate, over whose sombre countenance an expression of mingled surprise and vexation passed like a fleeting cloud. Then all was calm again.

He bowed his head, in token of assent.

"He will see you," whispered O'Hara to our hero, as he resumed his place by his side in the body of the church, "as soon as the office is over. I told you that you had misjudged him."

"I think not!"

"What motive?"

"I do not pretend to decide on motives," replied Henry Ashton; "but I can judge of actions: and those of the Abbate Lucas have not placed him in the most favourable light."

He had not long to wait: shortly after, the brotherhood, with their superior at their head, passed from their stalls in the choir, through the body of the church. As the procession advanced, the priest scattered his benedictions on the kneeling crowd. There was a feeling of spiritual pride, perhaps in the act; his cold, serpent-like eye glanced full upon our hero, whose perseverance annoyed him: he seemed to ask if he had calculated their relative strength in the contest which was about to ensue.

The look was returned by one of steady defiance.

In a few minutes, a lay brother came to conduct Father O'Hara and Henry to the sacristy. When they entered the room, which received the rays of day through a richly stained window, they found the abbate seated, alone. He had divested himself of his priestly ornaments, and appeared in the simple dress of his order.

"My brother, signor," he said, pointing to the Capucin, "informs me that you insist upon seeing me?"

"Even so."

"Although I do not usually yield to requests so proffered," continued the Dominican, "I have consented to receive you. May I request to be favoured with the purport of your visit?"

"The Abbate Lucas, I believe," observed Henry Ashton, "is an Englishman?"

The monk bowed.

"He will permit me, then," continued the speaker, "to explain my purpose in the language common to us both?"

Hitherto the conversation had been in Italian.

"As you please."

"The principal motive of my visit to this country," continued the young man, "was to discover some traces of the lost heir of Sir William Mowbray. Fortune, which disappointed my hopes in one respect, has favoured me beyond my expectation in another."

"And may I ask what that other is?"

"My meeting," said Henry, "with the deceived, the outraged, slandered wife of my friend: her appeal to the congregation of rites, for the dissolution of her vows, has been disregarded."

"I have heard as much," replied the abbate; "was it to criticise the decision of that august body," he added, "that you have honoured me with this interview?"

"No!" said the young man, firmly; "although I am no stranger to the part you took in their decision, or the influence you exercise there. Enough! it was rejected—thank heaven, their judgment is not irrevocable!"

An uneasy glance from the priest to Father O'Hara, served to indicate his wish for further information upon the subject: he feared the decision of the Sovereign Pontiff, if once the affair were brought before him.

Mentally he resolved to visit the Vatican, and obtain from the camarilla positive information whether or not any attempt had been made to interest Pius in the question.

"Priest!" said Henry Ashton, with deep feeling; "if the weaknesses of humanity are a stranger to your breast, its sympathies should at least be unchanged! Feel for the agony of a mother—the despair of a father, robbed of his only child! Say to those care you consigned the lost heir of Sir William Mowbray, and in the atonement find an intercession for the ill you have inflicted!"

The Abbate Lucas rose from his seat.

"I have acted," he said, sternly, "as conscience and honour dictated: the secret you would obtain dies with me!"

"Is this your final answer?"

"It is."

"Hear me!" said the indignant youth. "Whilst one pulse of life remains in the withered thing you call your heart, I will not resign the hope of obtaining it! I'll wring it from you! Where there is the will, the way may yet be found!"

So saying, he left the sacristy, to keep his appointment at the Vatican.

(To be continued in our next.)

FARMING IN AUSTRALIA.

ALTHOUGH many of the farmers are capitalists, by far the greater number are individuals who arrived in the colony with nothing but a pair of sinewy arms and a stout heart; and who, by industry, frugality, and persevering energy, have attained their present state of affluence. Their colonial life, although not fraught with hardship or want, is that of incessant daily toil: husband, wife, and children, little and big, all work right earnestly, early and late; but, unlike the husbandmen in Europe, they labour from choice, and not necessity; they have become comparatively wealthy in a short time, and their success spurs them on to redoubled exertion. Indeed, the disposition of most of the labouring agriculturists leads them as soon as possible to acquire a small farm or garden of their own, as they dislike, above all things, depending on others for their daily bread; and to this may be attributed the extent of cultivation and cheapness of grain in South Australia. It was, as has been stated, the rise and rapid increase of this class of small cultivators that brought the price of grain down to 2s. 6d. per bushel, in 1844—they being able to produce it at a much lower rate than the large landowners who rely solely on hired labour. For instance, a married man with a family, who possesses a team of bullocks, a dray, a plough and a harrow, and about forty acres of land, two or three cows and pigs, and a little poultry, is already independent, and will probably soon be rich, as his income will far exceed his outgoings. In about a month or six weeks he may get thirty acres in crop, after which he can work for others. Those who have no bullocks of their own will give him 10s. or 12s. per acre to plough their land, which he can do at the rate of nearly an acre per day. When ploughing is over, sheep-shearing commences. At this, if a good hand, he can earn £2 or £3 per week. Or he may fill up any or all of his time by carting ore from the mines; which will bring in about £2 per week. While he is busying himself about his wife, if an industrious woman, will be looking after the cows, pigs, and poultry, cultivating vegetables making bread, butter, and candles, brewing ale, and attending to other matters for the family. The family will all be employed helping the mother; or if a boy or girl can for a time be dispensed with, some neighbour will be glad to give ample remuneration for their services. At harvest he and all the boys commence reaping, and, after great exertion and laudable perseverance, generally succeed in getting the crop in without further aid. This is a trying period, especially to the young settler, who, while laboriously harvesting, is usually exposed to the burning rays of an Australian summer sun. The common plan is to reap mornings and evenings, and rest for three or four hours at mid-day. To hire assistance at this period is, to the small farmer, ruinous, as harvest-men are always scarce, and their terms very high; indeed, some large farmers, who bear a reputation for paying less liberally or punctually than others, have not unfrequently had a large field of wheat standing for a month after it was ripe, for want of hands to cut it. The farmer who acts as above will, at the end of the year, have a pretty considerable balance in his favour.

It generally takes a poor labourer about three or four years to place himself in the above position; and those only succeed who are healthy, strong, industrious, persevering, and self-denying. In his progress to independence, each settler acts differently: some place their earnings in the savings bank, and otherwise hoard it until it amounts to a sufficiency to commence farming on a liberal scale; others begin with an acre of garden, then get a cow, next a pig, and so on.

The farm-houses are rough, but generally substantial and commodious; they are built of different materials, according to circumstances: if good stone or slate is handy, it is used; if not, and suitable clay exist in the neighbourhood, bricks are resorted to; and when none of these materials are to be had, the dwelling is built wholly of wood. These residences usually have no ceiling nor upper floor; when you look up, you see the roof. The walls are not plastered, painted, nor in any way decorated, except those which occasionally get a lime-wash. The windows are sometimes canvas, sometimes glass; and the fire-places and chimneys are constructed on economical principles. For flooring, some have only earth, some are paved with stone, some with slate, a few with bricks, and a very few have wood floors. Water for domestic and other purposes is usually procured by sinking wells; and though occasionally pure and excellent, it is in general impregnated with minerals, hard and brackish to the taste, and more or less unwholesome.

The farmers furnish their dwellings with few articles of domestic convenience. Only a few wood-bottom chairs, an uncushioned cedar sofa, one or two plain cedar tables, bedsteads of the plainest description, and sometimes a small looking-glass, are to be met with in the dwellings of the more wealthy. Most of the poor farmers make their own furniture, which generally consists of a few rude forms and stools, a table and bedstead; and not unfrequently the only partition between the bed-room and sitting-room is one or two outstretched sheets. Their cooking utensils and mode of cooking are similar to that of the urban population of Victoria. They all live on plain but substantial dishes, and some keep a good stock of European wines and British bottled stout and ale. They of course raise nearly all their own edibles; and, in order to live on fresh meat, three or four of them will club together, and in turn each kill a sheep or bullock, as the case may be. The farmers, and indeed all persons who reside away from the towns, dress in the coarsest apparel. The usual male attire is a pair of common slop trousers, a blue guernsey, with a leather belt to keep the trousers up and the guernsey down, a flaming red cotton handkerchief as a neck-tie, a broad-brimmed cabbage-tree hat, and a pair of heavy hobnail boots. Some wear a coarse regatta-shirt under their guernsey; and others, when circumstances permit, enjoy in the hot weather the luxury of nakedness, by dressing in only a shirt and a pair of boots. The farmers' wives and daughters usually dress in cottons; their attire, although common and coarse, is neat, chaste, and tidy; they wear high dresses, and cotton bonnets made with a large curtain, to keep the sun from freckling the neck; they nevertheless have their jewels, silks, &c., which they wear on festive occasions. Many of them are well-educated, devoid of affectation, thrifty, and industrious; indeed, I was struck in my travels in the colony with the beauty, the accomplished graces, the glowing health, the vivacity, and the open-heartedness of the fair sex in the rural districts; and I should be wanting in gratitude did I not record their disinterested kindness, attention, and generous liberality to the wandering stranger. Most of the farmers and others who dwell in the rural districts within the hundred of the counties are, although parsimonious to a fault, altogether more moral, more straightforward and honourable in their business transactions, more kind and considerate to their neighbours, and generous and hospitable to strangers, than the mammon-worshipping Adelaidians. Their chief sources of amusement are hunting, shooting, riding, and reading. Some possess their pianoforte, and enliven their homes with popular and even classical music, and occasionally dedicate an evening to Terpsichore, when the polka, mazurka, schottische, valse-a-deux-temps, and other popular dances, are gone through with a grace and gusto that would astonish the fashionables of London. There are no game laws in Australia: the wild animals are considered common property, to which all have an equal right; and accordingly every settler hunts or shoots them whenever he pleases. They hunt the native dog, the kangaroo, and the emu.—Australia as it is, by G. Lancelotti

[MEETING OF THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH AND HER SISTER, QUEEN MARY.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XL.

Vaulting ambition, which o'erleaps itself
And falls on the other side. SHAKESPEARE.

DURING the nine days' reign of Lady Jane Grey, an indisposition, real or pretended, confined the Princess Elizabeth to Hatfield, to which place many of the Protestant gentlemen repaired, in order to protect her person from any attempt which the unprincipled Duke of Northumberland and his party might make to obtain possession of her person.

The general rising of the nation in favour of her eldest sister, soon rendered these precautions useless. The Lady Jane, the victim of her husband's and parent's vanity, as much as her father-in-law's ambition, retired to Sion House, to that private station which she had abandoned with so much regret. Never, most probably, was a crew more joyfully resigned.

On the 29th of July, according to Strype, Elizabeth entered London, attended by two thousand men-at-arms, gentlemen, and knights,—a fact which proves that her influence in the country must have been great. The entire party were well armed, and must have presented an imposing appearance, as they rode along Fleet Street, to Somerset House, the town residence of Elizabeth.

The next day, Elizabeth determined to give a public proof of her loyalty and affection to her sister, by going in state to welcome her on her arrival in London, towards which place her progress had been a triumphant march—for the adherents of the Lady Jane had fled in all directions. Her father-in-law, the scheming Northumberland, abandoned by his troops—who melted from him as they saw his cause was hopeless—threw up his cap in the market-place of Northampton, and cried:

"God save Queen Mary!"

His tardy loyalty, however, failed to save him. He had offended a queen whom adversity had not taught the lesson of forgiveness; her hatred was implacable, and he was committed to the Tower, from which fortress the path to the scaffold was but a step.

As the youthful princess and her train emerged from the old, time-worn gateway of Somerset House, the citizens doffed their caps, and many cried, "God bless her." It is certain that, at this period of her life, her popularity was very great.

Her chamberlain and the officers of her household, who preceded her, were dressed in her favourite colour—green. Strype describes the procession as a goodly cavalcade, composed of the most part of gentlemen and fair ladies.

Although the royal maiden wore a cheerful countenance, her heart was far from being at ease. Several years had elapsed since she had met her sister Mary, during which period the Catholic party—who hated Elizabeth—had done everything which malice could suggest, to excite the jealousy and suspicions of the new queen against her.

With all her faults—and it must be confessed that they were great and many—Mary seems to have preserved a certain degree of affection for her sister; which is the more to be wondered at, when it is remembered that she was the daughter of the woman whose fatal beauty had rent the crown from the brow of Catherine of Arragon, and caused her unnatural father to brand her with the stain of illegitimacy. On more than one occasion, when the members of the council urged, and her husband seconded their wishes, she refused to consent to the death of Elizabeth: although such a step might have settled the question of the religion of the country in favour of the Catholics for ages; for the next heir to the crown, Mary Queen of Scots, was a devoted adherent of the Church of Rome.

As the princess and her bevy of ladies approached the village of Wanstead, Sir John Bridges, who was riding by her side, observed that her countenance, hitherto all smiles, became suddenly overcast, like that of a person fatigued with too long acting a part.

Being a man of considerable influence with the Protestant party, and of ripe years, he ventured to ask her grace the cause of her uneasiness, fearing that she might be incommoded with the heat.

"It is not that," replied the future queen, "good Sir John; but the doubt which weigheth upon my mind and heart."

"What doubt?" inquired the knight.

"Not of our sister's love, or good intentions towards me," answered the princess—"heaven forbid that I should doubt either! but I cannot forget that her counsellors and friends are my foes! I wist not how my actions have been represented to her highness, for the ears of princes are frequently abused by cunning knaves and misbegotten traitors, who profit by their errors."

"True!" observed the knight, musingly; "still I do not see what your grace can have to fear!"

"I fear nothing!" exclaimed Elizabeth, sharply, the spirit of her father flashing from her eyes; "but I anticipate much!"

"Your conduct," continued the knight, "in the late events has been so open—so loyal—so beyond suspicion! Besides, it is not upon her accession to the crown that Mary would outrage the feelings of more than half her subjects, by an act of hostility towards you."

By this time they had reached the common, over which a numerous cavalcade was advancing in an opposite direction. From the number and brilliancy of the escort, as well as the royal standard, which was carried by a knight or baronet on horseback, Elizabeth recognised her sister and her sovereign. She instantly gave orders for her own retinue to draw up on one side, to permit the cortège to pass; the princess herself reining her horse upon a gentle slope close to which Mary must pass.

The gentlemen and nobles who preceded the new sovereign, doffed their jewelled caps in homage to Elizabeth, who returned their salutations with a graceful smile. At last there was a break in the line of the procession—probably to permit the dust to subside, not to annoy the queen—who next appeared, mounted on a small grey horse, riding between Renaud and Noailles, the ambassadors of Spain and France.

Mary had never been either lovely or graceful in her person: her stature was short, and her carriage careless and undignified—at the time of her accession to the crown, she was nearly double the age of Elizabeth—her features pale with sickness and mortification. Although dressed with a certain degree of magnificence, there was nothing commanding or exciting in her appearance, unless it were in the expression of her eye, which was said at times to have exerted a strange fascination over those on whom she fixed it.

Altogether her appearance contrasted unfavourably by the side of her more youthful sister.

"Your grace may indeed say that your enemies are subdued!" observed the Spanish ambassador, as soon as he perceived the princess, whom his imperial master honoured with peculiar hate. "See the Lady Elizabeth hath found time and loyalty to ride thus far to welcome you."

"She would have done as much for the usurper Jane!" observed Noailles, Minister of France.

"You are mistaken, my lords!" exclaimed Mary, sharply; "the conduct of our sister hath been alike beyond praise or suspicion. I know for certain that when the traitorous Northumberland would have bribed her to consent to the usurpation of the Lady Jane, she not only refused his offers, but treated them with scorn, and wrote a sharp letter to the plotter, reproving him for his treasons; and yet," she added, "the nine days' queen, as men begin to call her, professes the same heretical opinions which Elizabeth inherited from her mother."

The two diplomats smiled. They could not explain to the speaker why loyalty was the most politic game the princess could play; that her own accession was considered by the Protestant party as merely the stepping-stone for her sister to mount the throne.

As soon as Mary reached the mound where Elizabeth was standing, surrounded by a circle of fair and noble ladies, who had accompanied her to do her honour, she drew her rein and dismounted. Every eye was fixed upon her as she extended her hand to the princess, who knelt and kissed it, in token of fidelity and homage to her as her sovereign.

"You have a queen to welcome," she said, with a smile; "I only a sister!"

With these words, much to the satisfaction of all present, she kissed the princess tenderly upon the cheek and forehead, and requested her to present such of her attendants as were of fitting quality, to kiss her hand, which she graciously extended to them, as one by one they knelt before her.

"The race of Cain has lost its mark!" observed De Noailles, in a whisper, to the envoy of the emperor.

"Not lost!" replied the Spaniard, with a bitter sneer.

"What mean you?"

"That it has disappeared from the forehead, to rankle in the heart! It is not in nature—at least a nature like Mary's—to forgive her sister her superiority in person as well as mind, the humiliation she endured from her birth, or her great and dangerous popularity with the people! Proudly as that head is raised," he added, glancing at Elizabeth, who was in the act of remounting her steed, to take her place on the right hand of the queen in the procession, "I should not be surprised to see it fall by the same doom as her mother's!"

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed the Frenchman, with constitutional gallantry. "At least," he added, with a shrug, "till it is old and wrinkled!"

"Amen!" replied the Spaniard, with equal serenity; for the interests of both rendered them inimical to the accession of Elizabeth.

On the royal procession reaching London, it was noticed more than once by the Catholic advisers of the queen, that the applause and shouts of the people were addressed quite as much to her sister as to Mary, whose pride could not stoop to those polite arts and graces of manner which win popularity from an admiring people.

There was something approaching true magnanimity in the calm, unruffled manner in which the Catholic queen witnessed the divided homage of her subjects, most of whom addressed their plaudits to her Protestant sister.

It was evident that she had a firm belief in the divinity of her right to govern—and that feeling armed her against any unworthy jealousy. The errors and cruelties which stain the annals of her reign, may be traced to the same source.

When the pageant was ended, and Elizabeth once more returned to Somerset House, she sent for Throgmorton, who attended in her train, and inquired after his friend Cecil.

The gentleman informed her that he had twice presented himself, in the hope of being admitted to her presence.

"It cannot be!" replied the princess, after a moment's reflection; "he is compromised in the treason of the council, against the queen, my sister!"

The words were uttered in so cold and calm a tone, and betrayed such apparent indifference to the fate of the man who had rendered her such essential service, that Throgmorton was shocked.

"Your grace misconstrues the position of Master Secretary," he replied. "True, his signature has been appended to many of the proclamations of the council—but only as a witness—he had no deliberative voice in it."

Elizabeth remained firm in her refusal to see him; she even bade his friend direct him not to present himself at her residence until he had made his peace with the queen her sister. "Unless," she added, "he should have any very important tidings to communicate, when I leave it to his prudence and discretion to find the way to communicate with me."

Throgmorton left the presence of the speaker, and sought out his friend, who possessed a small residence in the Strand, not far from the spot where Exeter Change formerly stood.

"Well," demanded the secretary; "have you named my request to her highness, as I prayed you?"

"I have," said Throgmorton, in a tone of disappointment.

"And the reply?"

"Was as heartless," replied the messenger, "as her father, Henry VIII., could have sent!"

In a few brief words as possible, he proceeded to relate the substance of his conversation with Elizabeth.

Cecil appeared buried in profound reflection.

"Truly has it been said, 'put not your trust in princes!'" observed his friend, who felt both disappointed and disgusted at the apparent heartlessness of the future queen.

"Blame her not," replied Cecil; "she hath acted discreetly and wisely, and my confidence in her star is brighter than ever! Should she live to mount the throne, the annals of her reign will not be the least striking in the page of England's history!"

Perhaps in that reign to which he looked forward with so much hope, the speaker saw dimly shadowed the place he himself would occupy by the side of the virgin queen.

CHAPTER XII.

When she, a maid, had many troubles past,
From jail to jail, by Mary's angry spleen;
And Woodstock and the Tower in prison fast;
And after all was England's peerless queen.

TAYLOR.

ABOUT a month after the accession of her sister, the perils which the Lady Elizabeth had foreseen, began to draw near. The new queen had declared her intention of restoring the ancient faith, and already began with a high hand to take the necessary steps for reconciling the nation with the Church of Rome.

Although repeatedly pressed by Mary, her sister resolutely refused to hear mass—a step at once politic and dangerous—for whilst her declaration was received with the greatest enthusiasm by the Protestant portion of the nation, it exposed her to the persecution of the Catholics, who directed the councils of the queen, and were her most bitter enemies.

She even carried her opposition so far as to decline, under pretence of indisposition, attending the ceremony of creating her cousin, Courteney, a peer: because she feared that certain Catholic rites would be celebrated on the occasion.

This was a terrible disappointment to Mary, who pursued her purpose of rooting out the reformed religion with all the stern enthusiasm of her nature; still she refused to listen to the advice of her council, who recommended that the princess should be placed under arrest, in the event of her continuing in her obstinate refusal to accompany her majesty to the Chapel Royal.

In vain the greatest lords of the court and ministers endeavoured to shake the firmness of the royal maiden. According to a despatch of Noailles to the French king, she listened to their arguments and entreaties with sullen obstinacy, and at last dismissed them with a very rude reply.

What that reply was, the gossiping Frenchman has not informed us.

There was something admirable in the firmness of Elizabeth, whose spirit certainly appears to have been unmoved by a dread of any personal danger. True, it afterwards gave way, but it was to political considerations, and a nice calculation of her interests—which, in her heart and mind, outweighed every other feeling. Her religion was secondary to her ambition—which, in fact, it served, by securing her the sympathy and support of the majority of the nation.

Things were in this uncertain state, when Cecil—who had contrived to secure immunity for his share in the late attempt to place the Lady Jane upon the throne—the fact being, that he had played fast and loose on both sides, like many other statesmen of the day—felt that the time was come when his counsel was necessary to his future mistress. He therefore dispatched Throgmorton to request an audience.

The princess, with her usual prudence, hesitated—which the messenger observing, suggested that he should be introduced privately into her residence at night, and thereby prevent alike surmise and suspicion.

"The means to excite both," replied Elizabeth, who was perfectly aware that she was surrounded by the spies of her enemies. "A dog could not pass my gates, but my sister's council would be informed of it. You say he is most anxious in his wish to see me?"

"Most anxious, your grace."

"In God's name, let him come, then!" she made answer, with sudden resolution; "but it must be openly, in the face of day and of my household. The secretary is a man of wit and judgment, and can easily find a pretext. Heaven be praised," she added, "we are not a prisoner yet!"

"Nor ever will be!" exclaimed Throgmorton, with more enthusiasm than discretion, "while there are true Protestant hearts and hands in England to defend your grace!"

"Hush!" whispered the princess, casting at the same time a hurried glance round the apartment, to assure herself that the incautious speech had not been overheard. "Such zeal is most dangerous to the object it would serve! Should it come to that," she added—"should my foes so far prevail over the affection of my sister, as to wring from her a consent for my imprisonment, I should hold that man who drew his sword in my defence my bitterest enemy."

Cecil's messenger looked surprised; for the manner of the royal maiden was too impressive to permit him for an instant to doubt her sincerity.

"It would be the signal for my death," she added; "the queen would never pardon the attempt, which, if successful, must endanger her crown. Therefore, good Master Throgmorton, as you value your own head and my safety, neither dream nor speak of such matters again!"

When Cecil's messenger related all that had passed in his interview with Elizabeth, the astute statesman was struck with admiration of her prudence and judgment.

"She is right!" he said; "doubly right! Her game is patience. At present, her fortunes may be compared to a bark drawn high upon a rock—anon the flood shall rise, and proudly float it!"

The next day the speaker went openly to Somerset House, and sent a message to her highness, through the chamberlain, humbly requesting an audience on matters of import to her service.

The message was delivered to Elizabeth in the midst of her ladies, most of whom were little better than spies upon her conduct.

With well affected surprise, she bade the officer inquire the nature of his business, adding, with an oath, "that she would admit no meddling knaves or plotters to her presence."

Let not our readers be surprised, or think the statement overdrawn. Through life, the youngest daughter of Henry VIII. indulged in a profane habit of swearing, which she had learnt, most probably, from her father. In extenuation, it may be observed, that oaths were not so uncommon in the mouths of females, as at the present day.

Shortly afterwards the chamberlain returned, and stated that he had narrowly questioned Master Cecil, who appeared to have no other motive than to advise her grace touching the dispute of her tenant, Smith, and the late Lord Privy Seal, the Earl of Bedford, whose claims materially affected her interest: the dispute in question having commenced, and been brought before the council in the late king's name, and was undecided yet.

"In that case," replied the royal maiden, who even at that early age was noted for the sage economy with which she administered the revenues of her domains, "admit him—we will not suffer this grasping earl, whom the favour of our dear father enriched, to despoil us of our right!"

When Cecil made his appearance, he presented the princess with an elaborate report upon the claims in question, which he had taken the trouble to draw up in support of her rights. Elizabeth received it graciously, and withdrew to one of the windows which overlooked the Thames, under pretence of reading it. Some difficulty seemed to present itself, for she presently called the future minister to her side, to explain it.

"Speak low," she whispered, "and briefly—there is danger!"

"There is!" replied Cecil, in the same under-tone.

"Does it affect our rights or safety?"

"Both, your grace. It has been decided to repeal the act which declares the marriage of your royal father with Catherine of Arragon null, which precludes you by name from the succession."

The eyes of the princess flashed with indignation.

"The queen herself," continued the speaker, "is opposed to this, but has promised her assent, should you still persist in your refusal to appear publicly at the mass. It is also intended to prevent you holding your place, as princess of the blood, at the coronation."

"Heaven help me!" sighed Elizabeth; "mine enemies prevail!"

"That," observed her informant, "must depend upon yourself."

"How so?" demanded the princess, eyeing him suspiciously—for she did not yet feel perfectly assured of his good faith.

"Temporise!" he made answer; "demand time to receive instruction in the dogmas and doctrines of the Church of Rome: it pledges you to nothing, yet gains everything. Appear even at the mass—the Protestants will judge that your will has been forced; the Catholics satisfied—or, if not satisfied, disarmed by the concession."

"And you advise this," said the royal maiden, "honestly, truly, and without after-thought?"

"Honestly, truly, and without after-thought!" repeated the embryo statesman. "It is of the utmost consequence to your future claims that you should appear at the coronation of your sister, as the acknowledged heiress of the crown, failing her issue."

Still Elizabeth appeared to hesitate, although in reality her mind was made up to follow his advice.

"And so leave the Lady Jane," she objected—for she wished to hear his reply—"to head the Protestant cause in England?"

Cecil smiled.

"The Lady Jane," he said, "is truly destined for a crown."

"A crown?"

"Of martyrdom! The Tudors, I need not remind your grace, never yet forgave the hand, kindred or otherwise, which touched the royal circlet of their dignity!"

Her majesty the queen is a true Tudor! Could anything," he added, "increase the deep respect in which I hold your judgment, it would be in the appreciation of that one fact, which you permitted to escape you in your conversation with my friend Throgmorton."

"You are right!" she murmured, in a low tone; "the doom of the Lady Jane, I fear, is fixed! Heaven knows that I would gladly save her!"

Cecil smiled.

"The Tudors," she added, "are not a forgiving race to those who trespass on their rights!"

In after years, when the fate of the beautiful and unfortunate Queen of Scots was debated in the councils of Elizabeth, and the maiden sovereign pleaded with affected generosity for her "dear sister's" life—as she hypocritically styled her in her letters to her successor James—Her minister remembered the words she uttered by the window of Somerset House.

Certain it is, that in after-life Elizabeth knew better how to govern than to pardon.

"Our conference is ended," she said, with an air of determination. I thank you for your advice, which I will not forget. Whether I follow it or not, I do believe your counsel is an honest course—woe to the times which force us to such measures!"

With these words, in which she gave a faint intimation of the line of conduct she intended to follow, Elizabeth dismissed her visitor. As soon as he had departed, she gave the paper touching her tenant Smith and the Earl of Bedford to her chamberlain, with strict injunctions to keep it carefully. An hour after, it was in the hands of the queen.

ESSAYS.

NO. CLXXXII.—POWER: ITS DIVISIONS AND FEATURES.

THE idea of power not only comprehends everything we can perceive, hear, understand, or imagine, but stretches into realms into which the eye of thought can never hope to penetrate. It is an immortality susceptible of every variety of classification, every order of division or arrangement. It commences with the grain of sand revealed to the eye by the microscope, the impalpable animalcule that float in the invisible air, and terminates in the Stupendous Everlasting, immeasurably beyond the infinitude of the planets, the sun, the stars, and the undiscovered celestial systems that roll round each other, in eternal, incalculable, and incomprehensible majesty. Power, then, abstractedly considered, is all—everything—more than we can conceive of the universe; but in its relation to things visible, its attributes may be marshalled and enumerated, and its analogical consequences either discussed as theories, or enlarged upon as promised and inevitable developments. We propose, therefore, to deal with the idea in its practical acceptation, as the governing principle in society, from its earliest to its latest manifestations. And if we examine them all attentively, we shall find that each has its own particular glory, and the whole collectively is a brilliant array of wonders.

Power—such as we understand the idea to be—what is it? Every insect, every animal, possesses it in some degree or other. The elephant is the colossus of the field, as the whale is of the ocean. The former will carry with ease a burthen of a ton and a half, and the latter has such a formidable lever at the end of his body, that "a long-boat he valueth no more than dust, for he can beat it all to shatters at a blow." The horse can draw sixty hundredweight over a level road, and a lion, with a single stroke of his paw, can break the back-bone of the strongest horse in the world. Man has, in proportion, the same accumulated power of muscle. The average weight carried by London porters is about two hundred pounds; but in Turkey, this class of men, who are trained to this sort of labour from infancy, are able to carry three times that weight. Many Englishmen have been known to lift eight hundred pounds, and we have seen several who could write their names on a wall, with half a hundredweight hanging on their little finger. The celebrated Belzoni was capable of supporting a pyramid of a dozen men surmounted by two or three children, whose aggregate weight could not be less than two thousand pounds. And if we were to go among that class of men employed on public works, called "navigators," we should find them generally to be men of very large frames and immense muscular power. The English collier is a very powerful man; so is the miner, the blacksmith, and every description of mechanic whose employment constantly exercises the muscles of the arms and chest. Probably as regards every requisite in physical power, England far surpasses every race and nation on the face of the earth. Her labourers are perfect giants in strength, and in these and parallel instances, it is evident that we have presented to us power in its first and rudest state.

Physical power, therefore, is the first stage in the development of the idea. And it may be said that it is at once the highest and the lowest: the highest, because it is the first exercised by man; and the lowest, when he clings to it with a feeling of savage pride, or, in other words, dependence on that limited quality. Thus it happens that those nations that prize their physical qualities most are the lowest in the scale of civilisation; and yet, among themselves, those which possess the greatest portion of this strength are the highest, proving that, under every aspect, power has its peculiar substantial glory. Personal strength is eminently useful. As it enables the elephant to rend branches from trees, to litter itself down at night; so does it enable man, in a state of nature, to hunt for his food, to repel the attacks of hostile tribes, and in a semi-barbarous condition, to overrun the territories of emasculated communities, and so lay the foundations of new empires, and establish more vigorous social arrangements. And this presents us with the idea in an advanced stage of development.

We pass from the physical prowess of individuals to the physical prowess of races. Society, in the form that afterwards becomes matured into an organised system, begins with races. One race devours another, either by the slow process of absorption, or the speedy one of extermination. Races destroy old conditions, and erect new ones on their ruins, only to be swept away with them when their mission has been performed. History furnishes us with grand illustrations of this natural law. The Palli nations of India were overwhelmed in the conquering march of the original Hindoos. The aborigines of America, three centuries ago, numbering at least a hundred millions of human beings, have all but disappeared before the devouring progress of Europeans; and we all know how the Roman empire was buried beneath the avalanche of human beings that descended upon it from every point but the west. The Vandals, Huns, and Goths were superior to the races they overwhelmed; so it was, in more modern times, with the Turks, who overthrew the Christian empire in the east; and the Spaniards, who prostrated the empires of Mexico and Peru. The same physical dominancy has established the Anglo-Saxon rule on the northern continent of America, the British authority over the vast plains of India; and, if we go back to equally notable instances, it created the Mogul empire in Hindostan, placed the Tartar dynasty on the throne of China, gave the czars of Muscovy the empire of Russia, the Saxons, Danes, and Normans England, the northern France, the Moors Spain, the English Ireland, and, in later times, the British race possessions in every part of the world. These are among the triumphs of physical superiority of race, assisted by cultivated developments and the ravenous necessities that spring from aggressions at first prompted by instinct, and afterwards consolidated by the interests that have grown upon the soil that was originally invaded.

These examples incontestably prove the power of race, and fully sustain the generic law, that even as regards man, the invincible rule has always been ne quid nimis. But on every side of us, in the present day, we have abundant testimony of the overwhelming might of this manifestation of power. The races most liberally endowed by nature, are the masters of the world. The Caucasian family is everywhere in the ascendant. In Europe and America it is absolute; in Asia, it is fast elbowing the Mongolians into the remotest corners, and promises, in a century, to assail Africa on every side. And in the divisions of this family, we find the same evidence of physical greatness. The Teutonic race is more massive in character than the Celtic, and while absorbing or being assimilated to the varieties of the latter, it always goes on improving and strengthening itself, as the large-limbed and large-brained type of the physical perfection attainable in the progress of manhood.

But this superiority requires the support of auxiliaries in the shape of national combinations; and here we are introduced to another stage in the development of the idea of power. Nations are the exponents of every description of power. Having power, per se, they are distinguished by the uses to which they apply that property, and their tendencies to improve upon and accumulate that property, as well as to create new modes of action, both moral and mental. Nations are aggregately made up of physical, political, mental, and moral power. And those are the most prosperous in which these elements are in unison and harmony. But nations have a traditional strength, which frequently is mistaken for the solid institution itself, or, as is often the case, is cherished to the injury of the power it really possesses.

Traditions are only useful when they either serve to perpetuate the good and extinguish the evil, or operate as wholesome checks upon a naturally arrogant and vivacious national temperament.

The past is a great lesson, but the worship of it becomes a vain idolatry, when it provokes a neglect or non-appreciation of the contingencies which have arisen out of subsequent events. War is incidental to certain conditions of mankind; among barbarous and semi-barbarous nations, it is the only arbitrator whose award is binding in cases of dispute. But when the condition that rendered it necessary has passed away, it betrays a flagrant weakness on the part of a people to exult over traditions of the mere animal courage of their ancestors. Science and strategy lend some dignity to war as a system—but war is nothing without the brute courage, the thews, shows, and endurance of those who fight; therefore, when more polished forms of action are brought into play, the historical memory of a great battle may become a very mischievous tradition: the descendants of those who won and those who lost have equally a sentiment on the subject. And as neither can be of the slightest possible utility, their existence must have a depreciative tendency.

What would be the value of a thousand Agincourts to the people of England and France of the present day? Nothing—nay, worse than nothing; for the memory of them on both sides would stimulate evil instead of good. Therefore we contend that all traditions should be cautiously received, for, if the circumstances they refer to are forgotten, as indications in a former period of strength or weakness and on the other, the contrast in the present day is reversed, or, probably, altogether destroyed.

The analogy with reference to politics and religion holds equally good. That which was state power, or religious power, in one age, is found not to be so in a subsequent one; and, with change of condition, there ought to come a corresponding change in the forms of government.

A glance at the leading nations of the world will satisfy almost any one, that those are the greatest which either have the fewest traditions, or the smallest veneration for those they have hoarded up. Italy is rich in traditions, but they are the traditions of a sacerdotal oligarchy, who invented an ignominious political and mental slavery; and what is Italy now? A land wretched beyond all other lands; and, because her phantom authority is maintained to suit the venal purposes of the Roman Catholic sovereigns of Europe, her decrepit institutions darken other lands besides her own. Within her fertile and beautiful limits, she cannot boast of one spot of free ground. Her Vox Populi is the mingled cry of foreign soldiers and the tremulous chaunt of a political priesthood, that has long outlived even the moral expediency that once suggested its careful preservation.

Hungary and the southern states of Europe, unquestionably, as regards soil, the finest on the continent, afford similar examples of subjection to hoary traditions. Hungary cherishes the feudal idea; and, in the guise of a republic, would go back to the baronial barbarisms of the middle ages. Turkey is in the unhallowed grasp of blind fatalists—the most perfect of perfect traditionalists. Spain is dreaming over the vanished splendour of the age of Charles V.; Portugal over her irrecoverable colonies; Germany over the mythic theories spawned in her schools; and Russia of absolute dominion over the whole of southern Europe, as the initiative to the conquest of the empire of the east. All of them are trammelled by traditions—Russia as heavily as any. Her church is a sacerdotal oligarchy, and it aims at the restoration of its authority in the fair lands which now constitute the Turkish empire: Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, it covets as its ancient possessions; and its patriarchs would charge, dragoon-fashion, through every page in the Koran.

In politics she is wedded to the traditions which have swelled her material kingdom to its present dull, lumpish, and bloated dimensions. Because her barbarous hordes have, in the course of about three centuries, gradually given in their adhesion to a central authority, first founded at Moscow, and then transferred to St. Petersburg, her government hugs the tradition, which has grown out of a series of barbarous successes, that the mission of Russia is to rule from the Danube to the Ganges. But her power, fortunately, happens to be purely material: she is a nation of nobles and slaves; and, unless she introduces new elements into her constitution, her future conquests may be brilliant, but, like the inroads of the Huns and Vandals, they will only serve to commence and define the boundaries of new kingdoms.

Without some kind of community of interest between the conquered and the conquerors, all Russian invasions eastward must partake of the character of the freebooting expedition of Timur, or the temporary success which attended the conquests of Tamerlane Mahmoud, and the other eastern potentates whose names served but to shed a false glitter over the authority of their feeble successors.

Russia is emphatically a giant among nations, but only in physical power. In the moral and intellectual departments, she is a borrower from other nations. While aiming at aggrandisements in the east, she is obliged to lean in helpless dependence on the genius and learning of the west. Even her religion is a comparatively recent importation. So that, in all the higher departments of the idea, power as belonging to nations, she stands midway between the civilisation of the west and the semi-barbarisms of Persia, India, and China; over which the Anglo-Saxon race has thrown its broad wings, and threatens, at no distant day, by the agency of the British and Anglo-Americans, to overwhelm, very likely drive back upon the broad steppes of Russia itself.

The nations we have enumerated, being the lowest expositions of national power, we have but to look at France, England, and the United States of America, for the very highest examples furnished in any period of the history of mankind, or by any races, or any solid combination of different races.

These three nations, in their several degrees, are the least burthened with traditions of the past; and they are, consequently, the most powerful and prosperous on the face of the earth. United, they might safely resolve upon an equitable partition of the two hemispheres; because, in dependent of their physical and numerical strength, they have political, moral, and mental power in the highest perfection; and, in the two latter, they are blended so far harmoniously, that all classes in their communities are comprised in the intention and application of their prosperity. But each has its traditions. Not one of them has yet cast off the swaddling-clothes of national infancy. And if they are taken in the order of their greatness, we have presented to us a vivid conception of the most perfect ideas of national power hitherto brought into active exercise.

France is the first. Her material and intellectual resources are immense. Her agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial industry are, beyond comparison, superior to those of any other nation on the continent of Europe. She is rich in men, in accumulations, and in genius. But she is in bondage to her traditions. She covets material splendour, in the form of extended territory. Her pulse beats high to the aspiration to be an empire. A simple monarchy will not content her; she pants for paramount authority over many states. The glories of Charlemagne, Louis XIV., and Napoleon haunt her, waking and sleeping. Gazing from all the elements of true greatness, of power in its wisest and noblest acceptation, she would stoop to the vulgar expedient of aggrandising herself by conquest, just as the Tartars did in China, the Moors in India, the Turks in Europe, and the Moors in Spain. Her weakness is her clinging to her warlike traditions, and out of that weakness has arisen her unfitness for a liberal government, and her subjection to the sway of a despotic monarch. Indeed, it may safely be assumed that, so long as she venerates her traditions, she must, in sheer self-defence, be governed by the most arbitrary material power—an emperor, representing her material instincts, and holding them in his hand—just as the material Jove of the Greeks did the thunder on Mount Olympus. At present her ruling passion is the empire founded by Napoleon. She has forgotten the argumentum ad judicium, and that other nations have commonwealths which the experience of centuries has proved could not be made to fuse with her own, so as to make one united and vigorous community. This is the weakness that subtracts largely from the value of the idea, national power, as regards France.

And if we turn to the United States of America, the nation least of all burthened with traditions, we find her in the coils of this serpent-longing for territory. Instead of waiting for conquests by the sure process of colonisation, or the natural assimilation of mutual interests, she is thirsting to subjugate the republics of South America by force of arms, and plainly hints that she is prepared to tear from the crown of Spain its last colonial jewel—Cuba.

This feeling is the offspring of the traditions of the glory of the war of independence. Because she obtained her nationality by war, she would extend it by war. And it is the same with England, but in a lesser degree. England's wars in India are wars of necessity—and it must be admitted in explanation of the limited character of her modern exploits in war, that in no other part of the world has she much room for the display of her martial prowess; nevertheless she is not wanting in the will. And if we closely examine the power belonging to these three great nations, we shall find that each is tinged with this gross, material yearning after the old savage, and—among nations in such normal conditions as the English and French were three or four centuries ago—indomitable desire for extended territory. But each has its bright particular glory—its dazzling and enduring excellencies; and, as representatives of the idea we would place prominently before our readers, every one of them can lay claims to the highest admiration. Each is burthened with the most monstrous social inequalities—the tyranny of wealth, and the debasing influences of moral atheism; but each is pre-eminently great, and is assiduous in its worship of the doctrine, Labor omnia vincit; and if we were to take England as the highest type of the idea, national power, and extend our inquiries to the materials that are employed in the construction and continuance of that power, as well as to the mechanical, mental, and moral agencies that form the elements of power as the ruling genius of mankind, we should find ourselves in the illimitable kingdom of thought, and in the presence of its gracious sovereign, EXPERIENCE. J. P. H.

EVA.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Dry the tears for holy Eva,
With the blessed angels leave her;
Of the form so soft and fair,
Give to earth the tender care.

For the golden locks of Eva,
Let the sunny south-land give her
Flowery pillow of repose—
Orange-bloom and budding rose.

In the better home of Eva,
Let the shining ones receive her
With the welcome-voiced psalm,
Harp of gold and waving palm!
All is light and peace with Eva:
There the darkness cometh never;
Tears are wiped, and fetters fall,
And the Lord is all in all.

Weep no more for happy Eva,
Wrong and sin no more shall grieve her
Care and pain and weariness
Lost in Love so measureless.

Gentle Eva, loving Eva,
Child confessor, true believer,
Listener at the Master's knee,
"Suffer such to come to me."

Oh, for faith like thine, sweet Eva,
Lighting all the solema river,
And the blessings of the poor
Wafting to the heavenly shore!

WAR STEAMERS.

A LONG time before the Emperor of the French was known to possess those profound and determined talents for state affairs which have enchanted certain Radicals, by the rule, I presume, that extremes meet—when, in fact, the world of political professors, incapable, as commonplace always is, of measuring what varies from their rule and line, believed him to be a fool—he was known, at least, to be a very competent engineer; and we may suppose that his tenacity of mind has not now let slip what he knew then. It is probable, that if an engineering project of great value were brought under his immediate notice, he might make a more fortunate decision than when his uncle, by the advice of his profession, dismissed the American inventor of the steam-boat, as the scheming author of a puerility.

Let us suppose that at this moment a steam-engine were offered to Napoleon III., pretending to the following advantages:

A complete deliverance from English coals, enabling the worst fuel in France to be as efficacious as the choicest

British produce; a position and construction of boilers, which not only sink their fractional bulk far under the water-line, giving perfect security against shot, but dismiss as unnecessary, in a vessel of moderately large tonnage, that enormous objection in steam warfare, the lungs of the engine rising in a tall and conspicuous funnel above the deck; and the capacity for equipping engines of 1000-horse power with less abstraction from the space and tonnage of a war-steamer than engines of 200-horse now require. I say, were these things placed within his reach, with evidence that they were undented and undeniable facts, would he, do you think, examine them, or turn upon his heel? God forbid that I should ever see Coriolanus, at the gates of Rome, inflicting upon his country that chastisement which we so well deserve for our barbarous neglect and oppression of inventive genius! But I say, were those facts placed within his reach which have been so long in ours, what sum would he joyfully disburse to place their author at Cherbourg? Would a million sterling be thought of for a moment as the purchase of the services of the man who would supply him with such engines?

The progress of invention is bringing us round, in full circle, to more or less identity with the ancient naval warfare, when the velocity which propelled the vessel was the main element of victory. The tactics of Nelson will not be the tactics of steam. Suppose steamers of equal tonnage, equipped with engines of 1000 and 200-horse power, how many of the latter could the former immediately sink without the chance of returning material injury? I could write a column on the plain and calamitous results of such a disproportion; but they are obvious to every sailor who gives the matter his attention.

No one understands a subject better than a practical Englishman, when once his attention is awakened; but how to awaken it is the difficulty. Old De Foe has long since told us, that his countrymen were the most "lazy diligent" people in the world; this lazy diligence continues; and, of course, as the national character ought to do, it especially pervades the conduct of public affairs. How long did the voice of the first authority of the world, warning us to put bolts upon our doors, and secure our homes and altars from the perils of an open sea-board, fall unheeded upon our lazy diligence? We are at last a little stimulated, from opening stinking canisters, and experimenting on the worst forms for ships; symptoms of our innate energy are appearing in those matters, which, because they are everybody's business, become nobody's business. Perhaps our next transports may neither drown the troops, nor place them on the verge of it; but we are hardly prepared to meet "beaked ships," with five benches of oars to our one.

I do not pretend to be a prophet, neither have I accepted a bond upon second-sight, and should be glad to hope that the most remarkable man now living had absorbed sufficient lazy diligence when upon our soil to control the inspirations of a daring genius, which already has contrived a broil between two closely united empires, and something more, urged on by sneers to show what he has the capacity to do.

But, be the future what it may, it is certain the ephemeral glory of Lord Granville is waning before the ancient profession of his resolute antagonist, the straightforward and undeluded member of the legislature. Arms are in the ascendant; the "Great University of 1851," for teaching peace and good-will, is closed, and the permanency of its instructions seems more than doubtful. Ichabod to Sydenham. I say nothing against it; it was a glorious display, even though its moral pretences were illusive. It might be natural that, in a crystal shrine devoted to peace, objects capable of a different application should have been obscured, neglected, or trampled on; but when clouds gather, we look for an umbrella. Whatever is to be the issue, all, at least, are talking of war; and it may be worth while to know, that in that building lay a well-patronised invention, of more utility than the whole fabric and its contents, neglected then, and for years, by a lazy diligent government, which Napoleon the Third would very differently appreciate, and which, any stoker can explain to a statesman, is of more value to the nation acquiring it, than ten armies of 100,000 men.

DAVID MUSHET.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

BRAZILIAN DIAMOND DISCOVERIES.—We learn from Minas Geraes, that fresh diamond discoveries have taken place. At Taboca a diamond has lately been found weighing 5½ oitavas, and purchased by Dr. Felix Andre, for 32,000 milreis (about £4000). This gentleman also rejected fairly immediately after he made this purchase. The population of Bagagem is very much diminished on account of the new discoveries, to which the majority of those who have not made their fortunes there have rushed.

HOW TO DETECT ADULTERATED BREAD.—The following are useful directions for discriminating pure from adulterated bread: Pure bread is of a clean colour and mellow texture; the crust is brown, the crumb soft when moderately new, the smell is fresh, pleasant, and wholesome, and the taste sweet. On the contrary, the crumb of adulterated bread is harsh, and the crust pale; the smell is raw and disagreeable, and the taste has nothing of that sweetness; neither has the crumb at any time the due consistence, for it is made up of ingredients which will not mix with the yeast and water in the manner that flour does. The paleness of the crust is one great test, and it depends upon this plain cause—flour, when burnt, becomes brown; but the ingredients added to bread by those who adulterate it, remain white in the fire. Whiting, lime, alum, and ashes of bones, are alike in this respect—they will continue white when burnt; and, therefore, the more there is of them in the bread, the paler will be the crust. There cannot be a more obvious way of discovering the fraud, than by comparing the crust of an honestly made loaf with that of one of the others.

ADVICE TO COFFEE-DRINKERS.—For the benefit of those who are necessitated to buy their coffee ground, who are unable to purchase it from any of the more respectable dealers, and who have not a microscope at command, we may mention, that if the suspected powder be placed lightly on the surface of water, should it contain chicory or roasted corn, they will speedily descend; whereas the coffee, owing to the essential oil it contains, will repel the water, and float on the surface. Again, chicory powder, in a few seconds, will impart to the water a deep brown hue; pure coffee hardly colouring cold water until after a lengthened immersion. A solution of iodine added to a cold decoction of chicory, deepens its colour materially, though it can scarcely be said to impart to it a blue tinge.

CHROMATIC BATTERY AND ELECTRIC LIGHT.

The other evening a number of scientific gentlemen assembled at the factory of the Electro Dynamic Light Company, Frogmore Lane, Wandsworth, for the purpose of witnessing the operations of the chromatic batteries and electric lamps, recently patented by the inventor, Dr. J. W. Watson. Mr. Prosser and Dr. Watson attended themselves to elucidate to the visitors all the details by which the working of the different galvanic apparatus was rendered lucrative as a commercial speculation. The process is not at all complex, and the results produced by the introduction of cyanide of potash into the solution of nitric acid, in which a galvanic battery is generally worked, have long been known to electricians. But to Dr. Watson the credit is due of having been the first to perceive the important commercial results which might be obtained by carrying out the plan on a more extensive scale, and applying the operations of a hitherto philosophic toy to purely manufacturing and trading purposes. After the visitors had been agreeably employed in inspecting the details of the factory, from the first working of the batteries to the drying of large masses of different coloured pigments upon lumps of heated chalk, Dr. Watson proceeded to explain at length the peculiar features of his inventions, and the enormous profit which trade and commerce were likely to derive from their being more extensively known and employed.

After pointing out the attention with which the study of voltaic electricity had been cultivated of late years, and the uniform want of success which had attended all endeavours to bring the electric light into competition with the ordinary sources of illumination. Dr. Watson proceeded to say, that the only test by which the value of the success of a new agent must be tried, must be a commercial one.

The case of electrical illumination was a case in point. The great superiority in brilliancy of the electric light was too well known to require any comment, yet no encouragement had been given to its introduction, owing to its great expense. As the question of economy, therefore, was of such vital importance, he would just refer to the means by which he had removed the obstacle, and for which the company were possessed of letters patent. In all galvanic batteries at present employed, nothing but electricity was gained on the profit side—all else was loss. The products were, commercially speaking, worthless. Generally, electricians contented themselves with using the common mineral acids and the metals in general use since Volta's discovery; but the company had sought to introduce some of the rarer metals, the products of the decomposition of which would cover their expense. In those experiments, however, they were not rewarded with the desired success, and had therefore turned their attention to the discovery of new exciting agents, or electrolytes; and in this they were satisfied that if they had not accomplished all, they had at least made such progress towards improvement as would materially benefit the commercial world. Electrical illumination was now possible, and he (Dr. Watson) hoped that before long the splendid light afforded by the voltaic battery would be ranked among the common things of life. Their batteries, the working of which they had just been witnessing, were termed, from the nature of their products, the chromatic batteries. It might appear difficult to those unacquainted with chemistry, how any number of galvanic arrangements could be made to produce a variety of colours. But the real number of natural colours was small, and the difference of a single shade imparted to each a distinct commercial existence as a colour.

He would then be believed when he said that, by the use of a few substances introduced into five batteries, they were able to produce no less than 100 valuable pigments, transcending by an immense percentage the original value of the articles from which they were produced. The colours were formed, not by any subsequent mixing of the products of the batteries, but were the result of the actual development of the electricity in the battery; and the materials employed aided the galvanic effect by giving "constancy" to the machine, a result of the most vital importance. The manner of working the battery was shortly this:

The cast-iron and zinc battery (invented by the Rev. N. J. Callan, of Maynooth), and commonly called the Maynooth battery, when worked by sulphuric acid, produced sulphate of iron and sulphate of zinc, which were comparatively worthless, or at least in no way equal to the cost of sulphuric acid. But they had rendered the working of this battery not only economical but profitable, by adding to the iron and zinc cells prussiate of potash, which, when combined with the sulphate of iron, produced a splendid blue pigment of very great value—Prussian-blue, and that of a quality and colour, as they had been informed by those dealing in the article, far superior to any in the market. A second colour, closely vying with ultramarine, was also produced by the same process. In another battery of platinised lead and zinc, also invented by the discoverer of the Maynooth battery, chrome-yellow pigments were produced by adding bichromate of potash, in the same manner as with the prussiate of potash. The tint of these pigments, which constitutes their value in the market, they varied by the proportion of the salts added. By combining the salts in a battery of iron and zinc—the prussiate of potash to the iron and the chromate of potash to the zinc—a green colour was produced of a depth of tint dependent on the quantity of the two normal colours forming the compound. In like manner, by adding prussiate of potash to the lead battery, a white pigment was produced of great body, and perfectly free from the fault of blackening by exposure to sulphuretted hydrogen. If chromate of potash alone was added to the iron battery, a deep brown colour would be produced; and, lastly, if lime were added, with chromate of potash, to the lead battery, a red pigment was formed, of great brilliancy and body.

During the working of the batteries, the hydrogen which escaped from the zinc cells was profitably employed for the manufacture of acetic ether, and ammonia. The various pigments, when removed from the batteries, of course carried with them a large quantity of spent acid solution, which was also employed for the manufacture of nitrate of iron, white lead, and plaster of Paris. For all these pigments which had been produced by electricity, the most remunerative offers by the colour trade had already been made, while the uniformity of the heat produced by the action of the batteries, rendered the production of the most delicate shades a matter of certainty. The preparation of the colours for the market consisted in nothing more than washing and drying. Having mentioned the chromatic effects of the batteries, he would merely add, from the balance-sheet of the factory, the cost price per day for working each battery, and the net profit derived from each. The cost of working the lead battery for one day, including wear and tear of material and hire of three men, was £2 9s. 8d., while the net profit derived from its products for the same time was £1 18s. 6d. The cost of the chrome iron battery per day was £3 11s. 1d., while the profit derived was £7 4s. 3d. The cost of the Maynooth battery was £4 2s. 10d. per day, while the clear profit was £6 10s. Having thus explained his chromatic batteries, Dr. Watson proceeded to point out the difficulties which had hitherto existed in steadying the electric light, so as to render it subservient to ordinary practical purposes. In his (Dr. Watson's) own invention, the electro magnet was made to act as a regulator, as it were, to the changes in the current of electricity; and thus any little inequalities in the action of the battery, which would otherwise render themselves sensible in the light, by causing it to flicker, were entirely removed and obviated.

Those who were acquainted with the former construction of electric lamps, would appreciate the extent and value of his improvements when he stated, that they could burn the lamp for any number of hours consecutively, that they had a means resident within the lamps themselves for increasing or diminishing the light, and lastly, that the lamp required no previous adjustment, when the electrode was once fixed, to render it available at a moment's notice. With regard to the practical value of the electric light, he would observe, that there was no comparison between the cost of gas mains and the wires used for electrical illumination. An electric main two-eighths of an inch in diameter would convey as much light-affording material as a gas main of half a foot in diameter. The electric light had no character in common with other artificial sources of illumination. Its brilliancy quite resembled the light of day, while its diffusiveness and depth of shadow was equal to the light of the sun. Colours, which by all ordinary light changed their hue, were seen by it in all their purity of tint; for the distance that its rays could travel, no other light but that of the sun approached it. At sea it could be seen as far as the visual plane extended. A point of one-tenth of an inch radiating the light, seemed at a mile distance like a ball of fire a foot in diameter. Directed through a large polygonal lens, it had been seen in all its brilliancy at a distance of thirty miles. It did not require the assistance of air to support it, and burnt as well under water as in vacuo. For lighthouse purposes it was invaluable—for signalling at sea ships in convoy—lights of all kinds for vessels—for lighting mines, tunnels, and diving-bells, it had properties and advantages which no other description of light could command. In streets he thought it must, with time and public favour, entirely supersede gas; and for lighting public assembly-rooms, theatres, and spectacles of all kinds, its achievement had only to be made known to insure its immediate adoption. In thus coming before the public, they did so neither unadvisedly nor precipitately. They knew the value of their improvements, and only sought the assistance of capital and influence to place a matter of such great importance and national interest in its right position, and on a scale sufficiently grand to insure its permanence and success.

At the conclusion of Dr. Watson's explanation, which was illustrated by many experiments, the visitors adjourned to a large room, in which a sumptuous collation had been spread. The only light for this large hall was one of Dr. Watson's patented electric lamps, which was erected in a little alcove over the doorway, with a screen across it, to prevent its too great brilliancy from hurting the eyes. The bright and steady flood of lustre which this afforded when lighted, during the whole course of the entertainment, fully bore out the high practical character which Dr. Watson had given of the value of his improvements.

[HINDOO TEMPLE, TANJORE.]

TALES OF THE BRAHMINS.

In the year 184—, an Englishman, travelling in India for the express purpose of making himself familiarly acquainted with the scenery, history, traditions, and customs of that large, but, as regards the greater portion of the past, recognised by modern chronology, comparatively unknown territory, one day found himself on a beautiful plain, in the principality of Tanjore. The highway to Madras was broad and level, and bordered at short intervals with villages, each having its pagoda, with a lofty gate of massive architecture, about which the followers of Brahma fitted in ghostly silence. On each side of the road were choultries—a species of gratuitous Indian inns, maintained for the accommodation of pilgrims to the sacred places. These buildings are found all over Hindostan, and are of Hindoo origin; they are, in fact, analogous to the caravanseras so well known throughout Asia. A Brahmin generally attends them, who administers relief to the poor and distressed, who are frequently also supplied with a mat to rest upon.

As the Englishman, in his hackery—a small, covered carriage, drawn by a pair of oxen—approached one of these choultries, he observed a dignified-looking Brahmin, seated in the shade afforded by the rooted branches of that sacred tree—

Such, at this day, to Indians known
In Malabar or Deccan, spreads her arms,
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
Above the mother tree—a pillared shade,
High over-arched, and echoing walks between.
There oft the Indian herdsman, shunning heat,
Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds,
At loopholes cut thro' thickest shade.

This description struck the Englishman as being so complete, that, on arriving opposite the choultry, where the drivers halted, he repeated it aloud.

"The words of the bard of Paradise fall sweetly and grand on the Indian ear," said the Brahmin, in a deep, sonorous voice, and pure English accent.

Somewhat astonished, yet delighted, to hear his native language from the lips of a stranger, the traveller sprang from his carriage, and grasped the hand of the intellectual-looking Hindoo with characteristic ardour.

"Eat," said the Brahmin, sententiously, as he placed a choice collation of vegetables before the Englishman. "I have travelled nearly all over the world, and ever found eating better than drinking."

"But, in this climate, thirst is natural," suggested the Englishman, who began to long for a glass of his favourite beverage, sherry and water.

"Not so," replied the Brahmin; "it is all habit, or why does the Laplander or Russian, who less needs liquid sustenance, drink to excess? The truth is, that as people depart from the simplicity of nature, they become more barbarous in their tastes and desires. The palate, when too luxuriously indulged, becomes diseased, like the mind, after contact with impurities. The body, like a furnace, requires fuel—wholesome food—not steam to hurry on its machinery to an untimely collapse. But you flesh-eaters must drink—nature is so kindly compensative, that she allows one sin to correct another."

The Englishman was amused, but as, from experience, he dreaded a discussion with a Hindoo on his dietetic opinions, he changed the conversation, by remarking that the good English of his entertainer quite as much surprised as pleased him.

"I have lived in England," replied the Brahmin, quietly; "indeed, have been employed by the British government, and when I was younger, travelled for my own amusement. Into whatever country I penetrated, I made it my first care to acquire the language—a task not very difficult for a priest of any race or denomination; for his tongue, if he be a true ecclesiastic, should be able, like the serpent you Christians have placed in your Eden, to give utterance to every vocal expression. All sounds are mechanical, and to acquire them is merely a mechanical effort."

"You do not pay much homage, I should think, to the genius and virtue of priests generally, by such a remark!" said the Englishman, smiling.

"I know them all," replied the Hindoo, with a tinge of bitterness; "and none of them have the Divine afflatus that made priests in ancient days. Christian, Mahomedan, Hindoo, and Buddhist, are all the same—weak, sordid, sensual, human. Your great elements of faith have now no exponents either to elevate or perpetuate their doctrines. As in the time of Rama and Krishnn, the religious world is stagnant. Fanaticism is mistaken for piety, rigid austerity for adoration, and hearts filled with ashes for the high-beating ones that, in days of yore, made the earth ring and thrill with new developments of the immutable law."

"Has mankind retrograded?" inquired the Englishman.

"In the spiritual relations between here and hereafter, it has," answered the Brahmin. "Everything is materialised. As science multiplies its wonders, as each new triumph crowds on the mind, the unseen is left further in the rear. The visible evidence of facts, ideas, probabilities, and possibilities, is rapidly usurping the place of that unknown but mysterious principle, which, when implicitly relied upon, guides men through the most intricate labyrinths. Your church is a visible structure—so is the Mahomedan, and—alas that I should say it!—so is the Hindoo. And the Buddhist, parent of all faiths, is now in bondage among the credulous Scythians, the inbred Chinese, the brutish Burmese, and the fanatic Cingalese."

"I will not dispute with you on the pretensions of the Buddhist priesthood—for, without any offence, I must entirely ignore your premises," said the Englishman; "but I will ask you whether, on the broad ground of wiser and more matured developments, grander material discoveries, and the most extraordinary intellectual revelations, the race of mankind, by adapting themselves, through these manifestations, to more spiritual forms—call them material, if you will, but still they are spiritualised in their essence—I say, if we adapt ourselves to these forms, are we not approaching nearer to that infinite perfection, in whose personal existence every people under the sun has a belief?"

"I do not," answered the Brahmin, severely. "On the contrary, I believe, that the mightier man becomes, the longer and more attenuated is the thread that links him to the Deity. Christian, I am a humble follower of Brahma—which, you know full well, is only the Indian interpretation of the Universal Being; but towards the close of a life not unprofitably spent, I have arrived at no other conclusion, than that the Buddhist law is right, which declares that 'the further we go from God—that is, the simplicity of nature, attended with food without labour, or just so much as is strictly necessary—the more we are materialised, and unfitted for the spiritual inner life which is essential to the union between earth and heaven.'"

The Englishman detected the error in this reasoning, but, not wishing to wound the susceptibilities of the priest, merely remarked:

"But, Brahmin, you must admit that the further we are removed from a state of nature, the more we are made to depend on ourselves—and out of that dependence arises the conditions which adorn and beautify the primitive system, and create new ones? Take our Christian idea of Providence as an example. We believe the Providence of civilisation to be the Providence of industry, of morality, of mind—"

"And good luck!" interposed the Brahmin: "twist it as you will, you must come back to destiny; therefore I think a simple, unaffected faith is better than a belief elaborated out of reason and exaggerated murky traditions. Christian, we are all children of one father, although we give Him different faces. But to prove to you that I am not abusing your ear with vain speculations, I will relate to you a story of ancient India. Not far from this stands the Temple of Tanjore—or pilgrims' rest—a Hindoo church, as you would call it, whose original erection dates back anterior to the period when Egypt flourished; now, as the evening has set in, if you will accompany me to the holy place, I will show you its glory, and tell you how it came to pass that it is a great as well as terrible landmark in the history of India."

The Englishman accepted the offer with alacrity, for he had purposely journeyed from Madras—a distance of upwards of two hundred miles—to visit this celebrated Hindoo Temple, or Pagoda, as Europeans erroneously describe these mysterious structures.

The walk was a pleasant one, of about two miles, during which the Hindoo informed his companion that, having a pension from the East India Company, he had devoted the remainder of his days to works of charity and love. The Englishman felt fascinated by the extreme singularity, as well as original tone, of his remarks; and, although he regarded him as a bigot in his religious impressions, could not avoid giving him the most generous credit for consistency.

Tanjore is one of the districts of the Madras territory, and is the ancient Chola-dera, or Chola-mandala, from which, by corruption, the modern term Coromandel is derived. Never having been permanently occupied by the followers of Mahomet, it retains its ancient establishments in considerable splendour. The capital, Tanjore, contains the most perfect Hindoo monuments to be found in the whole of the Carnatic—the scene, in modern times, of some of those stirring events which made the peninsula of India the great theatre for the display of the military prowess of England.

The town, straggling and dirty, like all Eastern cities, contains two fortresses: one of which is occupied by the Rajah, who receives an annual grant from the East India the other part of the old heated Pagoda, esteemed beyond comparison as the finest specimen of the pyramidal temple in India. It is about 200 feet high, and, as the Englishman and Brahmin entered the precincts of the fortress, its beautiful architectural proportions were fully revealed in the glorious light of the large Eastern moon that lit up the cloudless sky.

The Englishman gazed upon the noble-looking structure in solemn awe. Scattered about the doors were the figures of recumbent bulls, of the size of life; and in an open temple at the rear, was the celebrated bull of black granite, which the Brahmin said was 16 feet 2 inches in length, by 12½ feet in height.

The stillness of the night, the sublime ensemble of the ancient temple, with its rugged images of Brahma, and the hosts of dim traditions that seemed hoarded up in its sombre recesses, all inspired the traveller with a feeling of veneration for this dumb memorial of an obscured past, and monument of a still virile present; for priests, in their white robes, paced the marble colonnades, and were to be seen in devotional attitudes on the steps leading to the sacred inclosure. The building, in the soft light that fell upon it, seemed an unbroken mass of architectural beauty; and as the Englishman endeavoured to penetrate the gloom that shrouded the colossal Brahma, in the centre of the open temple, he felt the influence of those mysterious emotions which coincidence of time, scene, and mental predisposition, rarely fail to arouse in the minds of those who can perceive more in a memorial of the past, than stone and sculptured art united by the skilful hand of genius.

"It is beautiful!" exclaimed the Englishman, "but inscrutable. If these symbols of a faith that dates back to a fabulous antiquity had tongues, what revelations would fall on the startled ear of the world!"

"Destiny," remarked the Brahmin, "is merciful as well as inexorable. The mysteries of extinct eras would doubtless appal the most transcendent courage—therefore they have faded into myths; and happy is he who believes without inquiring. But when you look upon this antique pile, remember that it is a monument of that material worship which in all ages has usurped the place of the pure, elementary communion with the unseen. But the story I have to tell will perhaps be the best commentary I could give on what you may consider the prejudices of an ascetic. However, to give way to a sentiment excited by your remark, I must say to you that when I sometimes gaze upon this hoary temple, silvered by the gracious moon yet standing in repelling grandeur between my humble shadow and the unfathomable past, I ardently pant to pierce the mists of ten thousand years, and see the visages of races that have long ago perished—to study the physical and moral phases of which not even a tertiary vestige is left—and gather some knowledge of those antecedents that, like the trees of the forest, have withered, and made soils for succeeding generations of life, in its infinite variety. Yet how vain the wish, when I believe that

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul."

And however far I might be permitted to explore, I should be tempted to go farther and farther, until all I had acquired would only amount to one dread, vague nothing."

"I must confess to a little weakness the same way," smiled the Englishman; "but when, in more sober moments I measure my probable gains by a matter-of-fact standard, my regret, somehow or another, becomes more lachrymose than real."

"Ah!" said the Brahmin, "you English are a hard-headed race! You turn your heels to the past, and plunge headlong into the future. Perhaps you are right, for going back is tedious work. To me, however, dreaming is a pleasure—a stimulant, like the wine you Europeans quaff to your loves, friendships, and revenges. I am descended, too, from a strange race—one to which tradition gives a genealogy that runs into the lost history of the Palli nations of India. So, if you will lean against this broken pillar—progenitor, by the way, of the boasted Doric of the Greeks—I will carry you a short distance into the field of Hindoo romance."

THE PROPHET BROTHERS.

About the period when Babylon flourished and Nineveh was in its pride, the vast territories comprised within the boundaries of the Himalaya Mountains on the north, the mountains of Cabul on the west, the Ganges on the east, and the ocean on the south—now known as India—were divided into four mighty nations, over whom the most powerful exercised authority as emperor, or lord paramount. They never, however, were permanently united under one monarchy.

Peopled by distinct races, partially conquered and colonised by various nations, they were divided into independent states, just as the natural divisions of the country suggested, or as enforced by the religion and monarchical politics of the several rulers who flourished at different periods. The Puranas, or sacred books of the Hindoos, state, that about four thousand years ago, India comprised four rich and powerful kingdoms, virtually independent of each other, but confederate under one common head. That which ranked second in point of opulence and strength, was the kingdom of Bejanagur, comprising the whole of the Indian peninsula south of the river Krishna, to the extremity known, in the present day, as Cape Comorin. Subsequently these four states became subdivided into ten, one of which was Karnata, the ancient Bejanagur, and the modern territories of Mysore, Travancore, and Cochín, now comprehended within the Madras Presidency.

It is well known that when these lines of Pope were read to a learned Brahmin, he started up and declared that the author must have been a Hindoo.

Well, about the remarkable period when the plains of Assyria were covered with splendid cities, the kingdom of Karnata was thickly populated, rich and flourishing. The reigning monarch was Sahadeva, who alternately kept his court at Bejanagur in the north, and Tanjore in the south of his kingdom. The latter place, being contiguous to the coast, was one of considerable importance; for, besides its political and ecclesiastical establishments, it maintained an uninterrupted intercourse with the opulent island of Ceylon, and was therefore in some respects a commercial emporium.

The government was absolute, but paternal in character; and the people, amongst whom no great intelligence prevailed, were happy and contented. Their fruitful soil yielded them abundance, without the necessity for any severe labour, and as their social institutions had reached that degree of perfection in which change is neither desired nor suggested by any extraordinary necessity, their course of life was calm, equable, and unbroken by any of those gusts of passion which, in after times, disturbed the human atmosphere throughout all India, with the periodical regularity of the monsoon. The monarchy was supported by an hereditary oligarchy, who constituted the great proprietors of the land; next to them were the merchants and traders, and lastly, the agricultural population, scattered about in villages, whose sole employment was tending flocks, and bestowing upon the soil the little culture its generous bosom scarcely needed. They were a branch of the Palli nation—the aboriginal inhabitants of the whole of the peninsula—whose overthrow and dispersion constitute the most romantic chapters in Indian history. Their language was that of the Sanscrit, and Buddha—the predecessor of Rama, their incarnation of Vishnu—the highest Hindoo conception of the deity. The Brahminical doctrines in that day—essentially the doctrines of progress—were confined to Western Asia.

Following the ancient faith of all India, and being remote from the corrupting influences of change, they worshipped Buddha, who had come on earth to abolish human sacrifices, and substitute the innocent oblation of fruits and flowers. Buddha they regarded as the incarnation of the Divine Energy, who had and was to appear frequently among men as an interpreter of the law, and a mediator with the abstract, and—as with the western Atheists—the eternal, passionless, First Cause of all things. Thus, believing that the Divine Energy, for its wise and secret purposes, assumed every variety of form of life, they adopted the doctrine of Transmigration, and deified the elements and several animals, through whom they imagined this Divine Energy had passed. The cow, the elephant and the lamb, were all sacred to the Divinity; but, in the reign of Sahadeva, the lamb symbolised their abstract idea of power in alliance with some material form. Their church was magnificently supported, and governed by vicars and priests, who advocated implicit faith in Maha-Monu (the great philosopher), and Buddha, his divine interpreter.

The clergy, generally, were not celibatists, but numbers of them practised austerities, and immured themselves in monasteries, from which they occasionally emerged to preach on the efficacy of moral restraint in restoring the emanations of the Deity dwelling in matter, to the Great Spirit from which they issued.

The church being partly material and partly spiritual in its constitution, clung to the state for support, and as there were no schisms in the land, the hierarchy thus erected was mild and unobtrusive in its discipline. The people in their morals were extremely material, but their social scheme, through the absence of all stimulants to mental excitement, was harmonious. Polygamy was tolerated and defended by the priesthood on economical reasons—for the women far outnumbered the men; but a genial and innocent intercourse prevailed among all classes, and those immoral offences and crimes that disgrace European civilisation were unknown. Theft and murder were the only crimes of which the tribunals of Sahadeva ever had to take cognisance. Peace had prevailed in the country for generations, and the sovereign, himself a mild and learned personage—for he was skilled in the sciences of his own and other lands, and could converse fluently with many of the ambassadors who came to visit him from the nations bordering on Europe—in the beginning of his reign conscientiously boasted that his kingdom was a paradise.

And truly it was a paradise, if contentment, luxury, and all that soothes the senses, is the acme of human enjoyment. But, although the heart of the nation beat placidly, and the air was spiced with the aroma of the forests, and the sweet music of myriads of birds thrilled on the ear, there were agents at work beneath this glittering surface, which only required the magic touch of ambition to break into a thousand tumultuous fragments. When civilisation, or cultivated repose, reaches a certain point, it crumbles, from the very inertness of its lethargy, and new conditions rise upon its ruins. But, Sir Englishman, my story would better teach the moral I would impress on your imagination. Fancy then, my friend, in the reign of Sahadeva—a rivulet shaded by stately trees, and fringed by flowers of every hue, running gently through a shady grove in the neighbourhood of ancient Tanjore. There was music in every bough, and voluptuous murmurs in every breath of the spice-laden wind. On the margin of this crystal watercourse, a maiden reclined. She was in the full bloom of Indian loveliness, and, as her ripe lips chirped to the juggling of the white-plumaged, purple-crested bird of paradise above her head, a beholder might have wished that the companionship between her and the songster had been bestowed on himself. Jug, jug, sang the bird, and chirrup, chirrup, responded the girl, in listless ecstasy, as she lay revealing the contour of her fine form through the folds of her gossamer muslin robe. While thus entranced, she heard not the sound of a heavy footfall, or the rustling of branches in her vicinity; and it was not until a well-known voice whispered in her ear, "Owa—beautiful Owa!" that she was aroused from her waking lethargy; and, starting from her recumbent posture, beheld the familiar face of Rama, the plainest and poorest of her suitors. He was a short-statured but large-framed young man, with a broad, lofty brow, and strongly marked, dusky features. His dark, full-centered eye was as piercing as the lightning's gleam, but he was not silky enough in his demeanour to please the fastidious daughter of the richest trader in Tanjore.

"Owa—beautiful Owa!" murmured the impassioned youth, bending upon her the most ardent glances. Owa drew her robe across her bosom, and shook her glossy locks with a gesture of scorn.

"Owa—beautiful Owa!" continued the youth; "why am I distasteful in your sight? Am I not as strong as the lion and fleet as the cheetah? Am I not a brave hunter in the sight of Buddha?"

"You are Rama, the son of a moonshee!" replied Owa. "True," said Rama; "and is not my father the pundit of the court—has he not taught me the wisdom of the sages of old, and infused into my strong spirit the glory of a brighter excellence than looking on the world with the cold eye of satisfied desire? Owa, I tell you I am a man—when my hour comes I shall be great!"

Owa laughed.

"Drive me not to madness, Owa! for I have had dreams—brave dreams. I have seen horse and foot soldiers in mighty array; I have heard the clang of armour, the neighing of steeds, and the roar of combat; I have seen the thrones of kings, too, topple to their foundations. I—I tell you Owa, I have had brave dreams; I have seen Buddha, Brahma—"

The young girl at this announcement laughed merrily, and, looking mischievously at her lover, said:

"Will all your seeing make you as handsome as Wancee, or as rich?"

Rama sprang into the air a few feet, with a bellow that frightened the girl, for she dashed through an opening in the trees, and sped rapidly to her father's house in Tanjore.

"She will never be mine!" groaned Rama, who struck heavy blows on his huge chest.

"Never! why wish for her?" echoed a hoarse, deep voice at his elbow.

Rama wheeled himself round, and faced his brother Krishnu.

"Thou!" he muttered, as the hot blood mounted to his temples.

"Even I, brother!" answered Krishnu, who was a tall, gloomy-looking, and exceedingly dark-complexioned man.

"Thou hast heard?" said Rama.

"I have! Owaloves you not! she has given her heart to the smooth-fewelled Wancee!" was the answer.

"She is beautiful!" murmured Rama, dashing away a scalding tear.

"She is a woman," responded Krishnu, "and loves with her eye. Like all her sex, she has no inner vision like the birds, she mates where chance or instinct leads her."

"You are wise," said Rama; "I will tear her from my heart! Rama has pride!"

A long silence then ensued between the brothers, which was at length broken by Krishnu, the elder, exclaiming:

"Brother, do you see yonder tree? Its top is withered, and its once broad branches are now dust. Such is the fate of all things that tarry long in one place! I am weary of Tanjore; weary of mumbling prayers; weary, weary of the dull round of this unvarnished life!"

"And I tire of the chase!" exclaimed Rama: "my arrows are as swift and true—my club as heavy—but the enchantment has gone. Why did I love?"

"Say, rather, why did our father make us wise?" said Krishnu; "since his wisdom has but made us know that we are only the sons of a poor moonshee! I would be a warrior!"

Rama's eyes glistened; and, laying his hand on his brother's black, muscular arm, he solemnly said:

"I have had dreams, Krishnu! bright, brave dreams! Last night, I dreamt that the stars unfolded to me some of the leaves of my everlasting life. I thought I was a myriad of insects, buzzing in the soft light of the moon: then the sun arose, and I fell to the ground, a hard-baked mass, which the rain licked into form, and behold I crawl along as a lizard! Then I was devoured by a noble, walking thing, and I walked. The glassy waters showed me the visage of a Goa monkey; but, as I gazed, I grew, and grew, until my head reached the stars, and I could grasp the horns of Brahma. The eyes of the god looked fire; but he smiled, and said: 'Rama, thy destiny is great!' With that I awoke, and found thee, Krishnu, labouring as if in death!"

"I was in Magadha, fighting for the great lord, Japa Sanda. Brother, these dreams portend something! Let us arise and go! In every land there is good, and what is there more in Tanjore?"

Rama acquiesced, and hand-in-hand they went to bid their parent farewell.

"Go, my sons!" said the aged priest; "the stars have willed it. We shall meet in Pandha. Pandha is green. Our lord the king will give me shelter in the Kiri wood, while ye are prophesying in the world. I shall and my days in prayers and meditation. Go; ye are freed beyond the children of Bijanagur, and Tanjore is too little a space for your future greatness."

The sons received the parental blessing in silence, and, taking the dusty high-road to Seringapatam, were soon lost to sight.

Thus did Rama and Krishnu set out upon their travels.

and, being inspired by their own high confidence, and the spirits of the future, with whom they held communion, they prophesied in the towns and villages through which they passed, and foretold the advent of a greater prophet than Buddha, to the amazement and terror of all who heard them. But, after prophesying throughout all India for five years, and having been many times cast into prison as heretics, they suddenly disappeared, and none knew whither they had gone.

About twenty years after the departure of Krishnu and Rama from their native place, their very memories had been forgotten; the priest had long since been called away, and all trace of the brothers had been completely lost. But the fame of a mighty warrior in the west, named Krishnu, and of a warrior statesman in the east, who was styled Bala Rama, had spread all over India; and as reports of their astounding progress reached the usually calm court of Sahadeva, once more assembled at Tanjore, it was perceived that the now aged king and his advisers were visibly troubled.

Krishnu had firmly established himself in the Deccan, and, from the vague reports that were in circulation, it was surmised that Bala Rama was marching to effect a junction with his army, so as to found a new and formidable empire in the very heart of India.

Jara Sanda, the Emperor of Maghada, and lord paramount of India, had been slain in battle, and it appeared too probable that one of the warrior brothers would mount his throne. The Buddhist church, overthrown in Maghada, the centre of its power, was convulsed and trembling, and the alarm of the priesthood being communicated to the laity, all classes in the Carnatic were in agitation and commotion. The slumber of generations was broken by the magic name of Bala Rama. But when it was announced that an envoy from that dreaded conqueror was on his way to the court of Tanjore, the king and his ministers were filled with terror and amazement. He came, but more like a crusader than an ambassador; for, as he journeyed along, he preached to the people of the glory and power of Brahma, and not only set the Buddhist priests at defiance, but audaciously proclaimed that Bala Rama was an incarnation of Vishnu itself.

The dreaded day came, and behold the court of Sahadeva assembled to receive the messenger of the prophet. At the upper end of a long hall in the palace, sat the monarch on his throne. He wore a crown of gold on his head, and in his right hand he held the pastoral crook, to denote that he claimed to be a representative on earth of Rama, the latest incarnation of the power of Buddha. By his side stood Zandaroy, his prime minister, and the royal abbot of the church of Karnata. In a gallery behind the throne the ladies of the court were assembled, but the king's daughter, Thuree, sat at his feet, embracing his knees. The nobles, all clad in white, were seated on each side of the hall, and, at the extremity facing the throne, some priests were assembled, who chanted a hymn, and scattered flowers on the head and body of the sitting image of Buddha, which stood near the door. Presently a subdued sound came from the multitude without, and the next instant, amid an oppressive silence, the burly figure of a man, apparently in the prime of life, strode into the hall, and, without much ceremony, advanced to the foot of the dais. The aged monarch gazed at him in awe, for his features were broad and massive, his eyes large and commanding, and all his gestures conveyed the idea of immense visible as well as invisible strength. He looked like one of the reanimated gods of the elder Hindoo time.

"Declare thy mission!" said Zandaroy, firmly.

The envoy heeded him not, for his gaze was riveted on the beautiful face of Thuree, the princess.

"Declare thy mission!" repeated the priest.

The ambassador gave him one penetrating glance, and then, in a loud tone, said:

"In the name of the prophet brothers, Krishnu and Rama, the lords of India, and the vicerepts of Brahma, I come to demand for his invincible highness, Bala Rama, the Emperor of Maghada, the hand of the peerless daughter of Sahadeva, the King of Karnata, and lord of the territories on the sea."

Thuree buried her face in her father's robe, and the king, upon whom the announcement broke like a thunder-clap, hurriedly replied:

"Our council shall decide."

Then, turning to his prime minister, he gave directions for the entertainment of the envoy, and hastily dissolved the court.

Sahadeva issued mandates, directing the attendance of all the nobles and high church dignitaries of his kingdom, to assist at a solemn conclave to discuss the fate of his only child. Meanwhile the envoy was offered the most princely entertainment, but he sternly refused it, rather choosing to dwell among his own retinue, which, it began to be remarked, were exceedingly numerous; and, to add to the anxiety of the court, the near approach of an annual religious festival caused an unusual influx of visitors into Tanjore.

During this transitory excitement, the envoy openly preached the doctrines of Brahma as opposed to those of Buddha, and it was observed that he was assisted in his ministrations by a tall, black man, who indulged in the utmost licence of language towards the established faith, and even went so far as to blaspheme Buddha himself. The populace first wondered at, and then admired, the courage of these strangers, and as they began to comprehend the doctrines taught by them, gradually wavered in their ancient belief, until it only required a spark to kindle their half-adopted convictions into a living flame of worship. While the tottering monarch and his advisers were debating, the envoy employed some of his time in the society of the beautiful princess.

On one occasion when in her presence, her eyes sank beneath his burning glances, and she felt a strange thrill pervading her whole frame.

"Royal lady, may a servant of Brahma clasp your gentle hand?" said he, in a voice rendered musical by some deep emotion.

The princess extended her jewelled fingers, which the envoy clasped with some warmth, and then raised to his lips. A deep blush started through her dusky skin, and as she ventured to raise her eyes and encountered the passionate expression of the envoy's large countenance, her heart throbbed violently; and, so swiftly formed are ardent feelings under the tropics, she returned his gaze with a vividness of look which, although only momentary, caused his strong frame to tremble, and his eyes to emit flashes of fire.

"Beautiful!" he softly said; "you shall be Rama's bride—his queen—his wife—despite all the owls in your father's kingdom! To-morrow, princess—to-morrow!"

With the latter hurried whisper, he made a profound obeisance, and retired from the chamber. As he passed through a street near the palace, he observed a face the lineaments of which arrested his attention. It was that of a person standing at the door of a shop, with one hand complacently resting on the pit of his ample stomach.

The envoy inquired the man's name, and was answered, "Wanee!"

"Have you a wife?"

"Miserable man that I am, I have four!"

"How! Four! How could you have been so foolish?"

The envoy, as he said this, entered the shop unceremoniously, and, proceeding to the rear of the dwelling, had a view of the domestic ensemble. Children were sprawling about in every variety of attitude, and the four wives were seated on low stools, smoking betel.

"That is Owa, my first," said the shopkeeper, pointing to an attenuated woman, seated in a corner, and smoking furiously. She had a most hag-like appearance, and although not forty, looked at least eighty years of age.

The envoy shuddered, and, as he hurried away, muttered:

"Brahma be praised! What an escape! Destiny, thou art great!"

Later in the day, two men in the garb of warriors met by the stream beside which, twenty years before, this same Owa had refused Rama, the poor son of the humble moonshee. Each was in the prime of life, but on the brow of the taller fierce passions had set their seal, whilst the other had the appearance of greater gravity, and more massive intellectual development.

"Krishnu," said the younger, "twenty years are but a drop of water in the sea of time; yet, to us, what an ocean they have proved!"

"Destiny called us, Rama, from our humble state," was the gloomy reply; "and on its wings we have been borne to power and glory! I have been commissioned to destroy kings and giants; you, Rama, to found a dynasty and an empire!"

"Say a new world—for I will so alter this that its old face shall crumble into dust; a new time and a new people will date their commencement from its decay!" said Rama, fervently—for it was the Prophet Brothers, who once more met in one of the haunts of their youth. "We shall be gods, worshipped and adored throughout untold ages!"

"What would you do?" inquired Krishnu; for, having his own mission—that of violence and destruction—he had not divined the magnitude and more subtle character of his brother's projects.

"Do!" echoed Rama; "I would destroy this enervating Buddhism—trample on the traditions of my Pali blood, and create institutions that would endure for ever! The Devas show the way to immortality! They teach me to substitute power for repose, action for indolence, creation for preservation, Brahma for Buddha!"

"Ugh!" exclaimed Krishnu; "Brahma is a greater god than Buddha: his bellowings are like thunder in the mountains!"

"Truly Brahma is a great god!" said Rama; "and my name—as the restorer of his worship—will descend to posterity; like the grand swell of the sea, its renown will beat against the shores of all time!"

"Our troops will be in Tanjore to-morrow!" said the more ferocious Krishnu. "Shall we smite this dotard in his silver cage, or hang him on the Tree of the old temple?"

"Neither!" replied Rama, decisively; "here we were born, and here we will reign without shedding one drop of blood! In Tanjore will I wed a bride! In Tanjore will I hold the Raisoo Yag,* that to men and God will proclaim me lord and sovereign master of the vassal world! And in Tanjore will I erect the image of Brahma for all people to worship, and to be unto distant ages a landmark in our history, and a lasting memorial to the faithful, of the splendid valour of Krishnu, and the wisdom of Rama!"

The night was occupied by the brothers in busy preparation. While the city was hushed in repose, large bodies of men crept up close to its outskirts, where they concealed themselves in the thick plantations, while others boldly entered the place, in the character of pilgrims to the shrine of Buddha.

On the following day the court was assembled in the hall of audience, in the same order as before, with the exception that the envoy occupied a seat near the Princess Thuree, and appeared to be engaged with her in earnest, and, according to the expression of her face, pleasing conversation. Indeed, Zandaroy, the high priest, thought him more like a lover than an ambassador.

Sahadeva looked the composure he did not feel, when

* Literally the "Feast of Bajals" which could only be performed by a monarch who had conquered all the other sovereigns of the world.

Zandaroy rose to announce the reply of the court to Rama, the new Emperor of Maghada. It was a refusal—a simple refusal—without comment or explanation. The parental love was stronger than the fear inspired by the renown of the warrior and prophet brothers. The monarch probably trusted much to his comparative isolation from what was then called the continent of India. He little dreamed that the dreadful Krishnu had taken possession of the Malabar coast on his right hand—that the flower of the army of the brothers was already in the heart of his kingdom.

"That is your answer to the royal Rama?" said the envoy, sternly.

"It is," was the sententious reply.

"Lady," said the envoy, taking the princess by the hand, and fixing on her a glance so fascinating that she moved forward at his will, "Rama hails thee as the queen of his heart!" So saying, he drew his sword, which hung at his side, and, waving it in the air, cried out, in a voice of thunder: "Up, followers of Brahma, and let your wings rustle like the eagles' ye have heard in the Valley of Cashmere! Arise, brave ones, and salute your empress!"

The seeming pilgrims, at the entrance of the hall, raised up a terrific shout, as they easily overpowered the feeble guard, and rushed into the hall, brandishing swords and battle-axes.

"Down with Buddha!" cried the seeming envoy.

In an instant the idol was torn from its pedestal, and rolled among the troops outside, who speedily hacked it to pieces.

"Who art thou, blasphemer and destroyer?" asked the indignant priest.

"I am Rama—Bala Rama!" replied the warrior, drawing the princess to his side, and casting around him a glance instinct with pride, courage, and indomitable energy.

At this announcement Sahadeva fainted, and, being consigned to the care of the princess, was removed; and in a few minutes the Pali dynasty and the Buddhist power, after an existence of a thousand years, were numbered among the things that were. The conquest was complete; the image of Buddha, in the course of a few months was everywhere destroyed, and the worship of Brahma unhesitatingly accepted in its stead. The institution of castes was rigorously introduced; the simplicity of the Buddhist civilisation disappeared with magic rapidity, and at the end of a few months, Rama, to commemorate his bloodless victory and marriage with the princess, instituted the image of the bull as the object of worship, and caused that black one, which has so much excited your curiosity, to be conveyed hither, from some place in one night, from whence, to this day is a mystery. Like the stone of the Arabians, it is believed to have fallen from heaven. And thus, Christian," concluded the Brahmin, "it came to pass that the Temple of Buddha was transformed into the Temple of Brahma, and a new system arose out of the ashes of the past. Buddhism, banished to Tartary, China, and Ceylon, became corrupted; and in the present day has become the dull, insensible worship of Guadma, a prophet who, like Rama, changed the destiny of millions of human beings, and, like him, rolled back the stone of human development, and fixed mankind in one condition for centuries. Had Rama or any one like him not lived, the old civilisation of the Pali people would have given place to one of a more competitive character, and in India now, as in Europe, we should have had rival nations, rival creeds, rival people, and an aggregate opposition, to give vigour and vitality to the whole social and moral body.

"As it is, the Hindoos are slaves to custom—the worst slavery extant—and the dominion of strangers from a distant clime. You may think me a strange Brahmin, Sir Englishman, but I am a true one; and in speaking to one of your enlightened race, I can at least mourn over the degeneracy of my country, and show how it came to be perpetual and ever-abiding. But see, the sun just streaks the eastern sky—the home of Buddha: it is the best time to view the interior of the temple, and if you are not fatigued, I will give you a story illustrative of our Hindoo castes. I have called it the SILVER CASKET."

J. P. H.

WHY ARE ROSES RED AND WHITE?

BY W. S. SHEPLEY.

WHEN first the roses reared their heads
In Eden's sacred bowers,
They flourished o'er the emerald beds,
The brightest of the flowers!

White—as the snow o'er mountain driven
Pure—as the pearls of ocean;
Fair—as the cloudless vault of heaven;
And lovely—as devotion!

Unspotted, and without a thorn,
Around the tree they blew;
Where the forbidden fruit was borne,
And flowers of all kinds grew.

There, as Eve passed, to rob that tree,
A virgin rose she crushed;
The flowers, ashamed her fault to see,
Drooped down their heads, and blushed

But when the Saviour of mankind
Descended from on high,
Emblems of purity! we find
The roses lose their dye!

So, now they're blended, red and white
The red blushed at the fall;
The snow-buds opened to the light
When Christ redeemed us all!

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SCENE—Wooded avenue leading to Kelford Castle; the moon rising dimly; Falkner, disguised; watching.

FALKNER.

THERE is a brooding horror in the hour,
As if the heavy air held breath, alarmed!
A sluggish stifling atmosphere; I choke
'Neath its oppression!
Who says that life is short? Time hath no guage;
A moment may comprise eternity;
We talk of life, its hopes and its results:
Its span-like brevity,—but I have lived
Years in a few sad hours! It seems an age
Since dawned the day, and yet 'tis hardly night!
Oh, charitable Night, merciful Night,
That shuts the dreaming eye of wretchedness,
Consoles the weary fever of the heart,
And makes the poorest equal to the rich;
What hast thou been to me, but misery?
Sleepless, and dark, and desolate of hope.

[Paces to and fro.]

How like a prowler do I hang about!
I'll lurk no more, but challenge fate at once,
And beard the villain in his sensual den.
Were it not well to feign some message there?
Some note from Bertha whom he seeks to woo,
As Jurus tells me, and gain audience thus?
Once in the room, he goes not forth alive!
'Twere double vengeance thus to feed his love
Then curse it in the bud! A note of hers,
But change the name, is right for him as me.
He'll scarce come forth to-night,—then in—then in!
For every hour, as 'twere an avalanche,
O'erwhelms my being with some horrid fear
Of his escape, some wild anticipation
Of defeat, of failure, and disgrace!
Fate do its worst—I'll dare the worst to come!

[Exit FALKNER towards the Castle.]

Enter BROLSON and RIVDILL.

BROLSON, enraged.

Escaped! through thee.

RIVDILL.

Take my advice for once, and make the best on't;
This is the place, and near the time appointed.
Kelford expects us here—let's swear he's dead:
Receive the wage, and do the work at leisure.

BROLSON.

Not I.

RIVDILL.

I doubt this lord; doubt, if the deed were done,
We should reap aught but threats of punishment:
A rope in pay—a gibbet for reward:
By Cain, he comes.

Enter Kelford, hastily.

How now, what seek ye here, so near the lake?
Deep in the dell I bade ye both await me.
I'm glad you're found; glad, very glad you're found.
We will speak further ere ye move in this;
I have thought better of the act—the boy . . .

RIVDILL stepping before BROLSON.

Is dead:
The blood scarce dry, as you may partly see,
Upon my dagger's edge.

[Kelford starts from it shudderingly.]

One stab sufficed.

KELFORD.

Stabbed? the boy—dead? oh, villains! villains!

BROLSON.

Were we not hired to do it? promised gold?
What mean you then by this pretended horror?

KELFORD.

Murdered! It cries from earth; it will be heard.
His blood—his innocent blood.

RIVDILL.

The purse—the gold—our wage; payment for work
Even we found hard to finish . . .

[Kelford laughs convulsively.]

You laugh?

KELFORD.

Laugh?
'Twould make e'en devils merry to behold
The payment ye shall count. What ho, there, ho!

BROLSON.

Nay then, to pay ourselves . . .

[Rivdill and Brolson attack Kelford, who defends himself desperately, but is at last beaten down.]

RIVDILL.

Our payment;—Brolson, cut it from his heart.

Re-enter FALKNER, with his sword drawn.

What cry was that? Ha, ruffians . . .

[Falkner strikes up Brolson's sword and wounds him; Kelford rises—and the robbers rush off.]

FALKNER.

Not hurt, I hope?

KELFORD.

A flesh wound, nothing more
And that it is no more, I've your brave sword
And braver arm to thank;—the villain's breath
Smoked hot upon my face; an instant, and . . .

FALKNER.

The odds were much against you. Can my arm
Avail you further in assistance home?
The dastards may return.

KELFORD.

Less for your aid, than for your company,
I'll be your debtor; 'tis not far:
My castle . . .

FALKNER.

Castle?

KELFORD.

Stands close by, beyond the lake.

FALKNER, aside.

His castle? should it? no:

Fate cannot be so mad.

KELFORD, seeing his agitation, turns suddenly.

They've not returned with others in their train?

No; by your looks, methought they had.

FALKNER, breathlessly.

Your name?

KELFORD.

Kelford.

Why look ye thus? What see you?

FALKNER, in a hoarse, hollow whisper.

A monster!

KELFORD.

Heard'st thou aright? What mean'st thou?

I say my name is Kelford.

FALKNER, recovering.

I saved thy life—thou own'st it?—

KELFORD.

I do.

FALKNER.

There is a wretch—

A ruffian worse than these—villain abhorred—

Whose very name turns all my blood to fire

And burns each nerve, each writhing nerve, to torture.

I must have vengeance:—Wilt thou lend thine aid?

KELFORD.

I will.

FALKNER.

He was a friend, but he betrayed his trust;
Dishonour'd those who strove to honour him,
And murder'd one I loved:—Wilt lend thine aid?

KELFORD.

I will.

FALKNER.

You promise well.

KELFORD.

And will as well perform.

But let us to the castle.

FALKNER.

Better here.

KELFORD.

Go on.

FALKNER.

Murdered, thou heardst?

He murdered her I loved!

The first love of my heart, my young fresh heart,

Choice of its earliest wishes—life of life—

More beautiful than hues of heaven can paint,

Or angels reach, or seraphim conceive,

She was;—she is what his cursed hands have made her;

Dust of the earth! and still the miscreant lives;

The scoffer smiles;—the murderer quaffs his wine,

And laughs—and laughs at vengeance.

KELFORD.

Some rival?

FALKNER.

Rival? fiend! some fiend!

Incarnate demon; minister of hell:—

Accursed the hour my sister saw his face.

KELFORD.

Sister? thy sister?—speakst thou of . . .

FALKNER.

I was a prisoner, chained in Hyder's cell.

KELFORD, aside.

India! what, what do I hear?

FALKNER.

Imprisoned, chained; the traitor knew his time:

But ill news strides apace—I heard—heard—heard—

And called the earth to cover me.

[Falkner buries his face in his hands, distractedly.]

KELFORD.

Have patience.

FALKNER.

Patience? Hear me:

In Indian warfare, 'neath a scorching sun,

I toiled in the defences of the siege,

And saw my father perish at my side;

Whose service there some petty insolence

Of new authority enforced! He died;

But I had patience!

Hear me yet:

I had a friend who shared my heart from youth;

'Neath his command, against the Mysoreans

I battled, and was captured: sir, his troop

E'en to a man had fought, and perished too,

Ere I, in Hyder's dungeon, worse than death,

Had lain a prisoner; but he—he retreated!

Left me to suffer long captivity:

The torture of a bondage, by report

The most inhuman Tyranny could shape!

He fled—but I had patience!

God tempered me to bear it—till the news

Of a beloved sister's fame dishonoured!

The legacy of a dead mother's love,

My father's favourite and long-cherished child,

Dishonoured, and by one that sire had served!

'Twas then I cursed my chains, and challenged life

To show on earth a greater wretch than I;

'Twas then I breathed an oath in Hyder's cell

To barter all for vengeance! then, 'twas then,

I tore my flesh, and held my bleeding hands
To God for justice!

I was heard! escaped

Am here!—Now, prate to me of patience!

KELFORD, aside.

'Tis Falkner! Courage—let me lose no chance—

Detection trembles on a point—a move—

Coolness and boldness must avail me now:

He cannot know me, from my change of name.

FALKNER.

Thou look'st.

KELFORD.

How?

FALKNER.

As though some spell had struck thee into stone.

Perchance thou knew'st this . . .

KELFORD eagerly, yet with embarrassment.

Nothing—'tis nothing—nothing, save thy story.

A woman's name is light, and lightly goes.

FALKNER.

A Woman's name is linked to something holy!

It is a thing to love—to estimate—

To honour—to defend: a Woman's name,

Oh, 'tis her wealth, her power, her patrimony;

Which, wanting, opulence is beggary;

All other strength, all other vigour—weakness!

It is the very magnet of her life;

The charm, the grace, the sweetness of her being

And he whose rancorous breath—or viler still—

Whose coward treachery that name assails,

Is villain deeper stained than language finds

Contempt for!

KELFORD.

I—you mistake, misjudge my meaning—

I thought not to—but, but your story—

You lost . . .

FALKNER.

Long—long 'twas thought he had escaped although

Defeat but added strength to my resolve,

Like him (the fabled) who to earth being thrown

Rose at each new prostration doubly strong,

So leapt decision from each overthrow.

All times I sought him, morning, noon, and night—

All places, from the music-breathing hall,

The revel and the dance—the gilded rout;

Down to the meanest walls where knaves conceal

At last.

KELFORD alarmed—aside.

There is a curdling horror in my blood;

My words swell in my throat until too large

For utterance—

You, you still pursued?

'Twas wonder nature sank not 'neath the toil.

FALKNER.

Food rarely passed these thin and fever'd lips;

I had no appetite but for revenge—

No thirst, but for the chalice of revenge!

It cast a shadow 'tween me and my God,

Made day like night, clothed all the world in black;

It was the hand that struck each note of time—

Revenge! revenge! deep, terrible revenge!

KELFORD trembling, and losing all presence of mind.

What mean'st thou?

FALKNER.

At length we met! thank God of heaven, we met!

KELFORD.

Who? what? art mad?

FALKNER.

The villain, monster, I was telling thee!—

(I shall be choked) this double ruffian, lord,

This black defamer of my father's house,

Despoiler of a sister's virtuous name,

We met!

Met when the savage gloated o'er new spoil

Dainty and fair, outrivalling the old,

And in the midst—steep'd to the lips in guilt

Perform'd, and guilt intended—lord, WE MET!

KELFORD, starting back, as wishful to escape.

'Tis FALKNER!

FALKNER, rushing before him.

Oh, is it so? your lordship knows me, then?

Be blister'd thy foul tongue, and ever dumb,

That dared to utter, dared to breathe a name

Thou hast dishonoured, villain!

[Throws off his disguise, and draws his sword.]

Thy sword.

KELFORD.

Hear me yet, Falkner—thy sister . . .

FALKNER.

Sister! . . .

Will heaven not strike thee dead before my sight?

Coward, thy sword!

KELFORD, rapidly.

Not here—his blood hath not well dried—not here—

'Twill drag my soul to everlasting doom.

Give, give me time—give time—

I'll meet thee where thou wilt.

FALKNER, pressing on him.

Thy sword.

KELFORD.

One word.

FALKNER.

Thy sword.

KELFORD.

One word—in mercy.

FALKNER.

Ha! ha! ha! ha! Mercy?

Thou prat'st of mercy, whilst she stands beside thee,

Shrouded and pale, and on her cheek a stain,

A brand not e'en the grave hath bleached away.

Who fixed it there? Who stabbed her reputation?
Who slew the modest beauty of her soul?
Seest thou that dreadful finger point?

'Twas THOU!

Another yet, a grey-haired father. Nay,
Thou canst not move! Dead hands, thou mayst not see,
Secure thee like a vice!

Not draw? Not draw?

[KELFORD draws, and makes an agitated and unequal defence; FALKNER bears down each feeble guard, speaking all the time.]

Then to thy heart I strike the avenging steel
To the glad hilt—the hilt—with curses, lord!
And to perdition sink thy sinful soul;
For 'tis—hear it, thou doomed! it is a Falkner's arm
Avenge thus a dear loved sister's shame!

[After vainly endeavouring to speak, KELFORD dies.—A pause.—FALKNER approaches the corpse.]

So, dead! Then what am I, he being dead?
Was't thou, pale clod, degraded a loved name,
Stamped infamy upon a trusting heart,
And steeped a virtuous house in misery?
And we endure this from such things as thou?
Insects a blow can.

[Slight sounds of distant footsteps.]

Then I must hence—
But not without thee, lord, I love thee so!
So love, I cannot quit thee e'en in death!
To that dear sister's grave thy arts destroyed,
Thee, her destroyer, will I force to kneel;
Ay, bend thy stiffening joints in supplication!
Face to her grave thy catiff corpse I'll set,
Then leave thee there, with her accusing dust,
Until the foul fiends claim thee!

[Exit, hastily, with the body.]

(To be continued.)

TOUSSAINT L'OUVRETURE AND HIS COURT.

As the governor of the land, Toussaint L'Ouverture felt it necessary to keep up some kind of state. Like other chief magistrates, he had his receptions of ceremony, as well as his less formal audiences. The union of French vanity and negro love of parade in the foremost people, made him feel the importance of requiring due attention to appearances and etiquette. Hence he instituted what bears the name of "circles," at which all who were invited were expected to be present. These circles were of two kinds, the greater and the less. To the greater, formal invitations were given.

Toussaint himself appeared in the assemblies in the undress uniform of a general officer. His simple attire, in the midst of surrounding brilliancy, contrasted favourably with the dignified tone which he knew how to maintain. When he presented himself, all the company, females as well as males, arose from their seats. Attentive even to the proprieties, he showed his disapproval of any exposure of the person in female dress. On one occasion, he was seen to throw his handkerchief over the bare bosom of a lady, saying: "Modesty is the best charm of the sex." After having made the tour of the hall, and spoken to everybody, he withdrew by the door at which he entered, bowing right and left to the company.

The less circles were public audiences, which took place every evening. At these, Toussaint L'Ouverture appeared clad like the ancient proprietors when on their plantations. All the citizens entered the grand saloon, and were, irrespectively of rank and position, addressed by the governor as convenience served. After having gone round the room, he retired, and took with him into a small apartment in front of his bedchamber, which he used as a study, the persons with whom he wished to converse more freely and more at length. The greater number of these were the chief whites of the colony. There seating himself, he requested all others to be seated; then he would talk with them of France, of his children, of religion, of his old masters, and of God's grace in giving him liberty and granting him means for discharging the duties of the post in which he had been placed by the mother country. He also conversed of the progress of agriculture, of commerce, and never of political concerns; he questioned each respecting his own private affairs, and of his family, and appeared to take an interest in the several matters. With mothers, he spoke of their children, and inquired whether they attended to their religious education; and the young he would sometimes briefly examine in their catechism. When he wished to put an end to the audience, he arose and bowed. The company then retired, being attended by him to the door. As they left, he appointed times for special interviews with those who made the request. Then he shut himself up with his private secretaries, and commonly continued his labours far into the night.—The Life of Toussaint L'Ouverture, by Dr. Beard.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE PIGEON-HOUSE.—A young man, who fears to alarm his family by some wild love affair, seeks a respectable lady in society, and devotes himself to the passionate and laboriously jealous existence of a pigeon, as he is called. She accepts his passion. Thereupon the two lovers meet each other tenderly; and they make known the fact to their friends, acquaintances, and to all human kind, except the lady's husband, who does not know, or does not wish to know it. They visit together; but the lady arrives first, and without her husband. Five minutes after she is announced the pigeon appears. It is generally supposed that they arrived together in the same carriage, and got out together at the door, but that they separated for a moment, in order not to display the mysteries of the pigeon-house.—French Papers.

[W. S. WOODIN, FROM A DAGUERRETYPE BY MAYALL.]

W. S. WOODIN.

THE dramatic entertainments that are now in vogue contrast markedly with those that were popular when certain Thespian celebrities divided the applauses of the metropolis with Nelson or Wellington. Then, and for twenty years afterwards, the Shakspearian drama was enthusiastically received by all classes of the public, and a great actor caused about as much sensation as a great warrior. In the present day we perceive nothing of the kind. A new style of drama has been created, and quite a different taste in such matters has sprung up in every quarter. It is not difficult to account for this revolution, when it is considered how general has been the spread of education within the past twenty years, what new conditions of society have arisen since the termination of the great war with France, and how much our extended commerce and more liberal appreciation of the literature of other countries has tended to enlarge our powers of observation, and render us less exclusive in our notions than we were in the days of the O. P. riots, or of Siddons, Kemble, or Edmund Kean.

Now—and the public owes an infinite debt of gratitude to the cheap press for the boon—the plays of Shakspeare are to be found in almost every cottage. In the period to which we refer, their circulation was comparatively limited: the cheapest editions rarely went beyond the book-shelves of the middle class; and when, in addition, we bear in view the lamentable fact, that, among our artisans and labourers, not only those who had the desire, but even the mechanical ability, to read, were the exceptions, it will not be difficult to account for the avidity with which Shakspeare's drama was devoured, when the dish had the recommendation of novelty, and was well garnished with scenic attractions and talent that gave individuality and emphasis to the splendid conceptions of the immortal dramatist.

Everybody reads in the present day, and of course everybody reads Shakspeare; so that he has been to some extent banished from the glare of the footlights, to find a hearty welcome and a home in the sanctuary of the closet. The activity of the national mind has also contributed largely to produce this very dignified result. In an age of gas, railways, steam navigation, and cheap literature, the people could not afford to stop to digest Shakspeare in the old-fashioned way. Old forms must always give way to new circumstances, and the stage was the least likely to remain unaffected by a change in the aspect of civilisation.

As the mirror of the time, it must keep pace with the time. A people who work hard, both with the hands and the head, require excitement, and they require changes and variety of excitement. As the body demands variety in its diet, to sustain its stamina, so does the mind. And when we know this, so far from lamenting the elevation of the classic drama to the throne of private worship, we regard it as a sign of health and vigour in the community, and would look upon it as an evidence of exhaustion, were the public to pause, in order that they might idolise one particular manifestation of genius, in one prescribed, dull, unvarying form.

No, we must go on; and as the people must and will be amused, all dramatic entertainments must be accommodated to the taste of the public—in fact, made by the public, not the public be attempted to be made for them. Those caterers who have been the most successful, owe it all to the adoption of this rule. And as we have arrived at such a phase in our civilisation that we are a dreadfully serious people, it is only natural that the demand should be for comedy and farce, to relax our nerves, and moderate the throbbing of our mental pulse, during the brief interval of two or three hours occasionally. Were we a light and frivolous nation, we should patronise tragedy on the same principle that poor, morbid beings rush to the Old Bailey when an execution is to take place. But as we are not so unfortunately constituted, we prefer a hearty laugh when we can indulge in it, and go where we can enjoy the luxury without restraint. It is this tendency which made Matthews, in his "At Homes," so popular; which drew crowds to the entertainments of John Parry, and sustains the prestige of a number of old favourites, who venture to sustain the whole burthen of a performance on their own shoulders.

Among the later additions to this corps of adventurous gentlemen, must be mentioned Mr. W. S. Woodin, who has been before the public for some months with his marvellously stored "Carpet Bag and Sketch Book"—being, as he describes them, "an instructo, grotesco, comico, pictorio, musico, and eccentricissimo entertainment, of an entirely novel nature, illustrative of the men and manners of the age."

"Carpet-Bag and Sketch-Book!" Why the title is redolent of something racy and highly-flavoured. Who has not seen every variety of carpet-bag—from the attenuated one of the quiet bachelor, going out of town just for a stroll, to the plethoric one of the puffy old gentleman, who has made "up his mind to stay as long as he can," and never wished to know what it contained. Nobody, we are sure; and, as the favoured owners of these mysterious and perpetually wandering receptacles invariably refuse even a peep into their recesses, Mr. Woodin has done the state some service in gratifying the curiosity their flitting, flashing, and troubled existence could scarcely have failed to excite. And then the "Sketch-Book"—portraits drawn to the life, and caricatures so cleverly depicted, that even their originals cannot help grinning at their oddity.

We could say a good deal about this remarkably original and funny entertainment, but as Mr. Woodin himself is the best expositor of his rich travestissements, we shall content ourselves with the remark, that he has undoubtedly made a great hit, and amply deserves the extraordinary success he has met with.

His exposé of some of "the men and manners of the age," is exquisitely comical; he nevertheless hits hard occasionally, sparing neither the grey-haired bigot, nor the prudery that vents its spleen from out of the shadow of thirty and odd years of virgin ostracism. But Mr. Woodin's forte is drollery and invincible good humour; and when we mention that he sings an excellent song, and is a very Proteus in the rapidity of his transformations, a very lively idea may be formed of his mirth-provoking and irresistibly comic powers.

The portrait of him given above, shows that he has a good face and figure for his vocation, and, having youth on his side, it is very likely that he will long occupy and immensely improve upon his justly-earned position, as one of the very best humourists of his day. He has also talent and opportunity, and we are certain we shall be justified in bidding him persevere in his pleasant attempts to ease us of a few hours of care and anxiety. The sober ideas of business are none the worse for being well shaken now and then.

We ought to state, that our illustration of Mr. Woodin was taken from a daguerreotype portrait of him by Mr. Mayall.

DAGUERRETYPE PORTRAITURE.

The art of portrait taking by the light, has of late made rapid advances towards perfection, and little doubt can be entertained that the charming productions of the daguerreotype are surely superseding the meaningless flattery hitherto, to a great degree, synonymous with portraiture. The fidelity of the daguerreotype, when properly managed, is beyond question. Little endowed, in fact, with personal beauty must they be who pronounce their portraits harsh, ugly, or disagreeable; and by the same rule we may readily judge that there is no lack of years when "looking too old" is made a complaint.

Photographic pictures have this manifest advantage over any other kind of miniature—the moment a friend's eye meets it, he exclaims: "Here is so and so." In whatever part of the world we may meet our friend's daguerreotype, it is the same. If we have left him in London, and accidentally come across his picture in the Indies, we have the same confidence, unmixed with the slightest hesitation. But with regard to a great many drawings or paintings, unless from the hand of a really gifted artist, we are in a most disagreeable state of uncertainty as to whom they are intended for. One will declare a particular picture the very image—another will swear it is not a bit like—a third will be of opinion that it more resembles a certain distant relation—a fourth will take a medium course, by pronouncing the upper part good, and the lower part wretched; while it is not unlikely that a fifth will be equally moderate, but reverse the notions as to which division is best.

In the daguerreotype all these uncertainties are obviated; that is to say, when the portrait is taken through a valuable lens, and with the addition of such accessories as may be necessary to complete the picture as a likeness, and in an artistic point of view. There are scores, and indeed hundreds of professors in the metropolis, having a plentiful lack of knowledge, and a proportionate deficiency of appliances; and it is they who bring a beautiful science into discredit, and encourage the notion that there is invariably some kind of drawback to the advantages of the art. Parties adopting such ideas wonder at the popularity of the daguerreotype, and condemn the process without understanding to what perfection it can be brought by a combination of advantages. We have lately had an opportunity of inspecting the model Crystal Palace erected by Mr. Mayall, at the corner of Argyle Place, Regent Street. That gentleman has long been eminent for the production of photographic works; and his many years' experience, both in America and at another establishment in London, had prepared us for a combination of beautiful arrangements, and a perfection of apparatus out of the usual way; and we were not deceived. There was the hand of experience in the most minute detail, and it was nothing but the blending of these advantages that could have realised the charming representations of humanity with which his exhibition gallery was stored. The courtesy of the proprietor places the gallery free for the inspection of strangers, and a most instructive and interesting hour may be passed therein. There the visitor may gaze on the lineaments of the highest in the arts—the most illustrious in the scientific, and the most distinguished in the political, literary, and medical world.

EXPERIENCE OF A CONVICT IN AUSTRALIA.—Many a time have I been yoked like a bullock with twenty or thirty others, to drag along timber. About 800 died in six months at a place called Toongabbie, or Constitution Hill. I knew a man so weak he was thrown into a grave, when he said, "Don't cover me up! I'm not dead; for God's sake don't cover me up!" The overseer answered, "you'll die to-night, and we shall have the trouble to come back again!" That man recovered; his name is James Glasshouse, and he is now alive at Richmond. They used to have a large hole for the dead; once a day men were sent down to collect the corpses of prisoners, and throw them in without any ceremony or service. The native dogs used to come down at night, and howl in packs. The governor would order the lash at the rate of 500, 600, to 800; and if the men could have stood it, would have got more. I know of a man hung there for stealing a few biscuits, and another for stealing a duck frock. A man was condemned—no time—"Take him to the tree and hang him." The overseers were allowed to flog the men in the fields.—Confessions of John Smith.

FACETIÆ.

A lady advertises in the Herald, that she wants a gentleman for "breakfast and tea!"

ADVICE TO YOUNG LADIES.—Don't let the keys of the pianoforte make you forget the keys of the store-room, or the enlightenment of your understanding prevent you from inquiring the price of candles.

An Englishman and a Welshman disputing in whose country was the best living, the Welshman said, "There is such noble housekeeping in Wales, that I have known about a dozen cooks employed at one wedding dinner." "Ah," answered the Englishman, "that was because every man toasted his own cheese!"

THERE is a genius on Lake Champlain who takes a pair of skates, and writes a four months' note on the ice with such perfection, that in less than an hour the sun liquifies it.

THE Quarterly Review, in answer to the question, "What is man?" says, "Chemically speaking, a man is 45 lbs. of carbon and nitrogen, diffused through five and a half pailful of water."

A duel came off at Vera Cruz a short time since, between two Mexican colonels. They fought with empty pistols for over two hours, when an outsider set a bull-terrier on them and drove them from the field.

THE editor of the Greenville Patriot says, he met a friend the other morning in the streets just from the mountains, where he was born and raised, who observed that he was fifty years old the Saturday preceding, and had never taken a dose of medicine in his life!—didn't know a solitary doctor—and had never seen a lawyer! What a lucky individual!

THE GOLDEN KISSES.—Edward IV., to raise money for a war with France, set himself sundry hours every day to receive contributions from his subjects, who subscribed pretty liberally in consequence of their animosity to the enemy. Among others, a rich, yet niggardly old widow brought £20 (a large sum in those days) to him. This so highly pleased the king, "that he not only returned her thanks," but told her, "For her kindness she should kiss a king;" which being done, the woman pulled out another bag, saying: "Udsodkins, if kings sell their kisses so cheap, give me 'tother touch of the hips, and here's another £20 for you!" The king smiled at this, took her at her word, and thought his kisses well sold.

TWO STORIES RESPECTING MEN WHO HAVE BIG FEET.—One is that of a traveller, who, on asking the boots at an inn where on earth he should get a jack that was large enough, was recommended to walk back to the fork of the road, and pull 'em off there." The other relates to a shoemaker, who made the excuse that he had not finished a customer's boots, because it had rained every day since the measure was taken. "Rained!" exclaimed the astonished patron, "well, what had that to do with it?" "It had a good deal to do with it," said Crispin. "When I make your boots, I've got to do it out of doors, for I hav'n't room in my shop, and I can't work out of doors in rainy weather!"

PURITAN PREACHERS.—The preachers, in the time of the Commonwealth, looked upon coughing and hemming as ornaments of speech, and when they printed their sermons, noted in the margin where the preacher coughed and hemmed. The practice was not confined to England, for Oliver Malliard, a Coraelier, and famous orator, printed a sermon at Brussels in the year 1500, and inserted these marginal notes.

VAULTING AMBITION.—A rope-dancer lately applied to the magistrate of a little town in Switzerland for permission to perform within his jurisdiction. The magistrate refused, observing that the country was overrun with mountebanks. "But," said the dancer, "I am not one of the common class; here is a proof of my superiority." With these words he leaped completely over the head of the magistrate, and this feat of agility gained him the indulgence he applied for.

DETERMINATION NOT TO DIE.—The celebrated Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, was attacked by a dangerous disease, and had lain a great while ill without speaking; her physician, believing her case very bad, said: "She must be blistered, or she will die." Her grace, who had listened, called out: "I won't be blistered, and I won't die!" She kept her word, and lived four years afterwards.

THE FRENCH EMPEROR.—The following anecdote is now current: When Louis Napoleon resided in England, previously to Louis Philippe's deposition, he was walking one day in Trafalgar Square, with Sir Richard Acton; he stopped, looked round, and said, with a sigh: "It grieves me to think that it is my destiny to destroy all this place. I am fond of the English, and have much cause to be grateful to them, and I will do it with as little bloodshed as possible." He added, "I shall be killed by a musket-ball in the streets of London."

SUPERSTITION IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.—The following statement will scarcely be credited in these days of enlightenment and progress. An innkeeper of this town (Devonport) who also does a little as a gardener, was seen to put a pig's heart, stuck all over with thorns, in the ground, near the roots of a fruit-tree, and his reasons for doing this were, that the tree should produce larger and better fruit: it is also believed that if two lovers fall out, and the man should happen to pass by the spot where a pig's heart, so stuck, is buried, it will have such a wonderful effect on his own, that he will immediately see about making matters straight again. Has the innkeeper fallen out with his better half?

An old lady once said, that her idea of a great man was, "a man who was keeprful of his clothes, don't drink spirits, and kin read the Bible without spelling the words."

A coquette treats a lover like a bouquet—carries him about a certain time for amusement or show, and then picks him quickly to pieces.

NEW MOON DIVINATION.—Being lately on a visit in Yorkshire, I was amused one evening to find the servants of the house excusing themselves for being out of the way when the bell rang, on the plea that they had been "hailing the first new moon of the year." This mysterious salutation was effected, I believe, by means of a looking-glass, in which the first sight of the moon was to be had, and the object to be gained was the important secret as to how many years would elapse before the marriage of the observers. If one moon was seen in the glass, one year; if two, two years; and so on. In the case in question, the maid and the boy saw only one moon a-piece. Whether the superstition would, in this instance, be suggestive to their minds of anything to be deduced from the coincidence, I do not know; but, as they were both very old-fashioned folks, I suppose the custom may not be unknown to those learned in Folk Lore. What is the orthodox mode of conducting this kind of divination?

HIGH LIFE IN THE LAST GENERATION.—The Duke of Norfolk, the chairman of the Beef-steak Club, used to sit at table as long as he could see; but when the fatal moment of oblivion arrived, his confidential servant wheeled his master's arm-chair into the next room, and put him to bed. The duke frequently dined alone in the coffee-room. He ate and drank enormously; and although the landlords charged as much as they reasonably could, it is said they lost money by him. His mean apparel and vulgar appearance gave rise to various ludicrous mistakes. On one occasion, he desired a new waiter, to whom his person was not familiar, to bring him a cucumber. The order not being immediately attended to, he called to the waiter, who respectfully intimated that perhaps he was not aware that cucumbers were expensive. "What are they?" said the duke. "A guinea a piece, sir." "Bring me two," was the reply. The man went to the bar. "That shabby old man in the corner wants two cucumbers," "Take him a hundred if he asks for them," said the landlord.—Life of Munden.

OLD GENT: "Where would you have been, you young rascal, if that cab had run over you?"—Boy: "Up behind, a takin' of 'is number."—Diogenes.

A NEW READING, addressed to the publicans (and sinners), who adulterate our drink—

Man wants but little beer below,
But wants that little strong. —Ibid.

OUR NATIONAL DEFENCES.—We hope, if Mr. Cobden is a married man, that he is blessed, for his wife's sake, with no children; for although no one would doubtless worship olive branches more than himself, still, from his well-known warlike antipathies, we should question his regarding the infantry in arms with a very fatherly eye. —Ibid.

It is said that a new edition of "Paradise Lost," is on the eve of publication, with notes by Dr. Stowell, in which he purposes to prove that the tobacco plant itself was—

That forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world, and all our woe. —Ibid.

A DESIDERATUM.—We see advertised a New Quartz Crushing Machine. The man who can invent something that will crush fraudulent pints is requested to call at our office.—Ibid.

PEACE MOVEMENTS.—We understand that the Peace Society intend shortly to present an address to the Queen, begging her to interdict the Prince of Wales from playing with the miniature field-piece presented to him by Lord Raglan, on his last birthday.—Ibid.

HINTS TO OMNIBUS PASSENGERS.

SUGGESTED FOR PUBLIC CONVENIENCE.

NEVER hesitate to hail the wrong 'bus, as you cannot be expected to read the large letters on the sides, and the time of other people is nothing to you.

When you get into the 'bus, tell the conductor the place whereat you wish to be put down; and having done so, never care to look out for yourself when you reach the spot. If you go beyond it, you may then legally withhold the fare.

On entering a 'bus, if you carry a stick or an umbrella, be particular to swing it about with the point upwards. Taking care of other people's eyes is no business of yours; and the stick will clear the way for you in a most surprising manner.

If the umbrella is wet, put the point of it into anybody's shoe: you will thus prove that you are a person of precise method, having "a place for everything, and everything in its place."

If you take the seat next to the door, thrust your legs directly across it. Whether the other passengers can get in or out easily is, of course, no affair of yours.

When you take your seat, sit sideways, and occupy as much room as possible. Everybody has a right to get as much as he can for his money.

Never move to give a new passenger accommodation. You have shifted for yourself—let the new comer do the same. You will thus prove that you think yourself quite as good as anybody else.

Never get your money ready before stopping the 'bus. If the money is worth having, it is worth waiting for, and you teach public servants submission by such treatment.

Always stand on the step to receive your change. If the 'bus moves on while you are in this position, you will be set down without effort to yourself.

Consider the conductor a public menial, to be pitched into and abused ad libitum. The point of an umbrella, or the knob of a walking-stick, will be found highly useful in calling his attention to your requirements. The ribs and the knuckles will be found the most vulnerable parts of his plebeian frame.—Diogenes.

PROBLEM FOR A PLACE-HUNTER.—Is the situation of the Groom in Waiting a stable one?—Punch.

A KNOTTY POINT.—A young lady says, that in a yachting match the vessels run so many knots that she should think that the results of the race must be all ties.—Ibid.

THE BEST LORD MAYOR'S SCREENED.—We do not know whether the above title, which we have seen over many a coal-shed, is applied to the coals which have to pay the City toll, but we should say they would require a great deal of screening; under the "best Lord Mayor," to hide the injustice of the tax which is levied upon them.—Ibid.

WARM FOWLS.—The eggs of the fancy fowls recently exhibited fetched enormous prices. These hens must have pretty well feathered their nests.—Ibid.

THE POLITICAL WOOD ENGRAVER.—We think we shall get our artist to put a drawing upon a block, and send it to be engraved to Mr. Disraeli, now that he has taken so industriously to cutting away at Wood.—Ibid.

AN EXTREME CASE OF CONSCIENCE MONEY.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer has received a cheque for £0 0s 0d from M. R. C. S., the amount due for arrears of Income Tax.—Ibid.

AN UNWHOLE SOME TRUTH.—However brisk the demand may be for beer, it is pretty certain that a large proportion of it is a perfect drug.—Ibid.

AN EMPEROR'S JOKE.—Louis Napoleon justifies the fact of his not permitting the Legislative Assembly or the Senators to say a word by the good old English joke, that, "It is necessary and proper to have plenty of Mutes at his great undertaking."—Ibid.

A LARCENOUS IMPOST.—It is strange that Mr. Frewen's resolution tending to the repeal of the Hop Duty should have been rejected, when it is manifest that every shilling of tax levied on a pocket of hops is picking the pocket.—Ibid.

AN INFALLIBLE PRECAUTION AGAINST RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—No fares to be paid until the end of the journey—and then only to be paid in the event of a person having arrived perfectly safe!—Ibid.

WHAT AN INVADING ARMY MIGHT DESTROY IN LONDON.

We rejoice in the pacific assurances of Louis Napoleon. We trust that the foot of an invader will never profane these shores—Puddle Dock and the contiguous embankments more particularly to wit. Yet, if ever the French do come to London, there are certain bits of mischief which they might do for our great advantage in the end.

They might, perhaps, blow up Temple Bar.

They might certainly demolish the iron railings around St. Paul's.

It would be a good job if they were to raze the Court of Chancery to its foundations, and annihilate the whole of Doctors' Commons.

If they were to burn the National Gallery—saving the pictures—it would be no very great harm: and, considering the present state of the river, they certainly would abate a very nasty nuisance if they could manage to set the Thames on fire.—Ibid.

INTERESTING AND EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCE.

A most extraordinary occurrence has taken place on the celebrated gigantic mountain Skiddaw. On Skiddaw Forest resides a man named Donald Grant, who fills the office of gamekeeper to General Wyndham. About two years ago Grant's wife was delivered of her first child, and as this was the first birth that had ever taken place in those wild and solitary regions, and the child being a son, it was appropriately christened Skiddaw Grant. The time was fast approaching for the birth of a second young Skiddaw, and, as a preliminary step towards preparing for the looked-for event, the old midwife, Jane Webster, of Bessenthwaite (who is 67 years of age, and not less than 18 stones in weight), was removed to Grant's residence, to be in readiness. The eventful hour at length arrived, but, sad to relate, before the old woman had performed the duties of her calling, she was suddenly taken ill and died. This melancholy circumstance left poor Donald Grant in an awful position—situated as he was, 3000 feet from the level of the sea, three miles from the nearest cottage, and closed in by craggy peaks and drifts of frozen snow—with the corpse of the old woman, and his wife in the most critical position imaginable. However, as there are few difficulties in life that may not be overcome by perseverance, Mrs. Webster's place was supplied by the introduction of another midwife, a Mrs. Jane Fiddler, from Udale, who, it is to be hoped, was more fortunate in executing the duties of her mission than her lamented predecessor, though the result had not, when our correspondent wrote, descended into the vale below. On the following Sunday the parish authorities engaged sixteen able-bodied men to remove the poor old woman's remains to their last resting-place. It was with no little difficulty that the men reached Grant's dwelling, as the snow on the plain was upwards of two feet deep, and in the drifts and creeks it was lying at a depth of four or five feet. There is no road up the mountain, nor on the top of it. The party placed the coffin on a sledge, which was drawn by a horse kindly lent by Mr. Stephen Grave, of Bessenthwaite. The mournful procession, however, had not proceeded far until sledge, coffin, and all, were buried in a snow-drift. By great exertion the disinterment was at length effected, and the train proceeded onward, when they were again overcome. Fortunately, Mr. Hawell and Mr. Birbeck, who had been taking hay to their sheep on the mountains, came to the party's assistance, with each a strong horse and a large hay sheet, and, with this additional force, they made another effort, but were unsuccessful. A message was then dispatched for more forces, and at last the assistance of forty men was obtained. They then took their hay sheets and placed the coffin in them, and dispensed with the horse and sledge, taking their load by hand—sometimes bearing it, and sometimes dragging it over the snow. Thus the party proceeded along until they at length reached Peter House, where a hearse was waiting, which relieved the party of their troublesome load. Thus died poor Jane Webster, the first female on record who either brought life into the world, or departed out of it, on the far-famed mountain Skiddaw.—Whitehaven Herald.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LOVE OF THE ESQUIMAUX FOR TOBACCO.—The craving of these people for tobacco was incessant. "As we go north," observes Commander Maguire, "their eagerness for it can hardly be imagined; if we had a ship full of tobacco with us, we could not appease their wants. I can only compare them to a set of people shut up without food or drink for a week, and then let loose only on a scanty supply; add to this their being savages, and some idea may be formed of our small boats surrounded on all sides with baidars full of Esquimaux, all shouting out the same story—'Tawac!'"

THE ORIGIN OF BRANDY.—It is probable that, in 1642, brandy was not in fashion in Wales; yet the nurse, in Shakespeare's play of "Romeo and Juliet," calls for it again, under the name of aqua vite—"Some aqua vite, ho! my lord! my lady!" It appears to have been chiefly used in those days for medical purposes. It was said to be invented by Raymundus Lillius, the famous alchemist, who died in the year 1315. Charles the Bad, King of Navarre, came to a most horrible end, says the French historian Mezeray, who, to restore his strength weakened by debauchery, was wrapped in sheets steeped in eau de vie. His attendant, by accident, set fire to them: after the third day he died in the most dreadful tortures, and, it is to be hoped, thus expiated the crimes of his most execrable life.

LABOUR AND WAIT.

BY LONGFELLOW.

LIVES of great men all remind us

We can make our lives sublime,

And, departing, leave behind us

Footprints on the sands of time;—

Footprints, that perhaps another,

Sailing o'er life's solemn main,

A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,

Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,

With a heart for any fate;

Still achieving, still pursuing,

Learn to labour and to wait.

STATE OF SICILY.—The young people walk abroad, conversing in hushed breath, in an atmosphere that breathes of love; cafés and ice-shops are filled; everything seems given up to quiet, luxurious enjoyment. But the invisible presence of despotism is there like a blight; the spy is plying his dirty work abroad, and of those who walk forth amidst their friends or children in the twilight, perhaps some one before the following morning is doomed for a thoughtless word, or even, on mere suspicion, to be dragged from his bed and thrown into a dungeon. It was not unusual, I was told, for members of families who knew that they lay under the ban of the authorities, to wish each other good night with peculiar solemnity, as if uncertain whether the next day might behold them assembled together.—Bartlett.

EFFECTS OF THE ENGLISH CLIMATE.—The English climate, and especially the London fogs, have a powerful influence on the moral faculties of the natives, and even strangers cannot escape that influence. Nothing can better explain the two leading features of the English character—their silent sadness and energy. Under their skies you feel that by degrees you lose the two faculties that are dearest to man—the faculty of thinking and the faculty of enjoying. All the springs of intelligence are relaxed; you are serious without reflection; you are gradually drawn into and tossed about in an ocean of horror and slow despair; the mind becomes unmindful of itself, and you feel it vanish and dissolve into thin air; you are thoughtful without thinking; you dream yourself into a void; from the depths of your mind ascend vapours which have no shape—desires void of colouring—murmurs which have no meaning, like the silent voices of night—the voices of stillness, caused by the absence of movement and light; in five, you welter in nothingness. At this juncture you are saved by a manly and energetic reaction; the mind becomes alive to the dangers of its situation, and protests against them; it goes, so to say, out of itself, and sallies forth in search of the outer world, which it handles and analyses to make quite sure of its existence. After which it takes greedily hold of that outer world, and from the profoundest repose and the most hopeless apathy the mind leaps at once into the crudest reality. An almost frenzied activity is alone capable of reacting against the sultry torpor which is created by this climate. Hence the practical, matter-of-fact turn of the English. Under their sky a man must either work or die, or emigrate if poor, or travel if rich.—French Monitor.

THE DAMBECK BELLS IN ROBEL.—The church at Dambeck, the walls of which are yet standing, is of the remotest antiquity; it was, in fact, built before the flood; but the bell-tower has sunk into the lake, and, therefore, in former times, the bells were sometimes, on St. John's Day, seen to rise out of the water, and place themselves in the sun at noon. Once some children, who had been taking their parents' dinner to them in the field, on their return sat down on the borders of the lake to wash their handkerchiefs, when they saw the bells rise up so high that one of the little girls hung her handkerchief upon one of them to dry. After awhile, two of the bells began to sink down into the water again; but the third could not move from the spot. Hereupon the children ran into the town and related what they had seen. Now the whole town of Robel came running out; and the wealthy, who wished to get the bell for themselves, attacked eight, sixteen, and even more horses to it, but still they were unable to move it from the spot. Then came a poor man driving by with two oxen, who, seeing what was going on, instantly yoked his two oxen to the bell, saying: "With God go poor as well as rich, all alike," and conveyed the bell without difficulty to Robel. There they hung it in Neustadt Church, and every time a poor person dies, whose relations cannot afford to pay for the tolling of the other bells, this bell is rung, and its sound is ever, "Dambeck, Dambeck!"—Yule-Tide Stories: Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.—The American army is composed of Germans and Irish, with a small portion of natives of the lowest caste, and a thin sprinkling of English and Scotch. The officers are all natives, and graduate for a certain period at West Point Military Academy, before receiving their commissions. As the idea of a standing army is very unpopular in the states, and as the mass of the army are foreigners, the officers are allowed to govern or misgovern it as they choose. The system of subordination extending throughout the various grades of rank, on which the discipline and good government of an army principally depend, is very imperfectly developed in the American army. This evil arises partly from the ideas of equality in which the American officer has been educated, and partly from the difficulty of enforcing proper regulations, owing to the army being split into a number of petty detachments, scattered at wide distances. The officers commanding these small bodies, thus removed from the inspection and control of their superiors, too commonly become the petty tyrants and oppressors of their companies. The American soldier's nominal pay is larger than that of the British soldier, but his comfort and health are not cared for as well as the British soldier's are, and no amount of pay can compensate for the deprivation. It would be much better for the American soldier to have more comfortable quarters, a more wholesome dietary, more liberal treatment when sick, and the sympathy and protection of his officers, even if this should be purchased by a reduction of his pay. At present the American soldier is only paid once every two months, and his pay being most commonly consumed in riot and debauch in a few days, its large amount is more an injury than a benefit to him.—Autobiography of an English Soldier in the United States Army.

BED-TIME.

BY MARY MAYNARD.

Still around the garden-bowers

Floats the voice of melody;

Still among the waking flowers

Murmurously toils the bee;

The lawn with dew-drops is unwet,

The cistus blossoms are unshed,

The sun, red-burning, hath not set

Behind the blacksome wood, and yet

The little children must to bed!

Must to bed! though fain are they

Yet a little to delay.

Though doth nought of weariness

Heart or limb or lid oppress,

They must go:—in vain they grieve

For the quiet bed to leave

All the daylight's pleasant joys,

All their pretty games and toys.

Vain their piteous prayer to stay

A little longer,—they must say:

Good-night, father! good-night, mother!

Sister! good-night to each other!

They are gone against their will;

Who are watching, waking still?

Father, worn with many a care;

Mother, tired with household work;

Sister, in whose bosom fair

Doth a secret sorrow lurk;

Chiefly she for hour of sleep

Longeth, all unseen, to weep.

Is not going to the tomb,

Mortal, say! like going to bed?

To the dark and silent room

Who are oft the earliest sped?

Is it not the young and gay?

Is it not the lusty-hearted?

Those for whom yet smiles the day;

While the worn and weary stay,

Till the glory hath departed

From the face of heaven and earth,

Till are hush'd the songs of mirth,

And the flowers have closed, and all

Looketh chill and funeral?

Wishing it were time to go,

Still they linger, is't not so?

Well, so be it! what doth matter

A little sooner, a little later?

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EMMA.—Alexander Dumas' new publication of "Buckingham and Richelieu," is published by his agent, J. T. Sinner, 490, Oxford Street.

JOHN PAUL.—The histories of Europe in circulation are Alison's, Russell's, Guthrie's, and several by French compilers; but they are all partial, and exceedingly incomplete. Works of such magnitude ought not to be undertaken by one man. The labour should be divided, as in the preparation of a Cyclopaedia.

ANN REID.—A promise of marriage, either verbal or in writing, cannot be enforced. Marriage is a voluntary contract. But the promise, when broken, forms the ground of an action for damages, the only remedy allowed by the law.

W. B.—A guard on a railway has charge of the train he is upon from the time of its starting until it arrives at its destination. His duties are severe and numerous, and before he is trusted, he is made to undergo some previous training.

W. D. O.—Stoppage is not payment, says the law, and the executors must proceed legally. Not having been charged any rent by your father, you are not liable to any now, but at the same time you must be aware you are merely a tenant on sufferance.

ELIZA N.—For the nine-hundred-and-ninety-ninth, and positively the last time, we beg to state that the black spots observed on the faces of some people, particularly in the vicinity of the nose, are caused by the perspiration gathering in the ducts of the skin, and turning black after exposure to the air. People with thick, coarse skins are subject to these secretions, which medical men call polypus. The remedy is very simple. Squeeze the ducts, and then wash them in diluted spirits of wine. People of this habit of body should be cautious, and avoid sudden checks to the perspiration.

MARIAN HAY.—We had thought that the police reports had sufficiently exposed the Register Office for Servants' system, but it seems that we were mistaken. You have been gulled. A magistrate has power to order the money to be returned.

J. R.—When a committee of the House of Commons has been appointed to make any inquiries, or hear petitions, it is a sort of court of law; for it can call witnesses, commit them for perjury or contempt, and order any one into custody who has violated the constitution of the House. Bribing, or aiding and abetting bribery, and receiving bribes at elections, is contempt of the constitution of the house; and all persons guilty of such practices may be committed to prison, where they may remain while Parliament sits—for in all committals by Parliament, the Habeas Corpus writ is powerless.

A SCOTTISH ARTISAN.—The terms, High Church party and Low Church party are difficult to define without travelling into controversial matters—a custom in editors, we think. "More honoured in the breach than the observance." But we may venture to state that the High Church party advocate the integrity of forms and rigid discipline. They have been accused of leaning to many of the forms in vogue in the Romish Church. The Low Church party, on the contrary, while admitting that a church establishment is the most effective of all machines for moral instruction, would travel from what they style obsolete precedents, and be governed more by the spirit than the letter of the law.

DEIPHOBUS is referred to Volumes IX. and X. of this Journal, for every information on the subject of courtship and marriage etiquette. In No. 240, Volume X., all the leading provisions of the Marriage Act of 1836 are given, together with ample instructions upon the preliminaries to be observed before a marriage can be performed by the superintendent registrar.

SEE—CLEAR—NOW.—It is undeniable, and it is part of the doctrine of free-trade to make such admissions, that the land of this country is enormously overburdened as regards the occupiers. The farmer is taxed from his best room to his remotest pig-sty. Rent is certainly his monster obstacle, but that is a matter of private adjustment, and can safely be left to the control of the general course of events; it is the local and general taxes, the tithes, and the game-laws, that are the burthens of which the legislature should take present cognisance, with the view to the establishment of a permanent system of relief. The prosperity of farming is quite as much an object of importance as that of our commerce and manufactures; and the time has arrived when the pecuniary, mental, and moral condition of our agricultural districts can no longer be neglected with safety to the permanent welfare of our social scheme, in every one of its complicated ramifications. Emigration—per se a tremendous evil—may postpone the reckoning for a little time, but a balance must be struck sooner or later. The sooner the better, for the country is losing the population that should feed its towns, in which the supply of the raw material—human life—is so much more rapidly exhausted. However, let us hope that emigration will speedily bring all classes of wealthy people to their senses.

W. J. W.—The statistics of the Roman Catholic Church in Great Britain are formidable. There are in England and Wales 597 chapels, in Scotland 123—making a total of 720 Roman Catholic places of worship in Great Britain. There are 10 colleges in England, and 1 in Scotland. In England and Wales the largest number of chapels is in Lancashire—namely, 113; Yorkshire, 61; Staffordshire, 36; Middlesex, 35; Warwickshire, 26; Northumberland, 23; Durham, 22; Cheshire, 18; and Surrey, 13. The smallest number is, in Bedfordshire (1) Guernsey (1) and North and South Wales, where dissenting principles have almost ignored both the rival churches. In England there are 17 monasteries, and 53 convents; and in Great Britain there are 800 priests, 120 of whom are located in Scotland. The number of titular bishops is 13. It may be mentioned that about half the religious houses for men and women are situated in the Midland counties, and that the principal seats of the Roman power in Great Britain are Lancashire, Middlesex, Yorkshire, and the Highlands of Scotland. It languishes in North and South Wales, and only numbers among its scanty followers in the principality, the immigrants from the sister country.

MARY HANSON. The average cost of tea in China, at the ship's side, is 10d. per lb., while it is confidently asserted that it can be produced in many parts of America at 5d. per lb. The great cost in China is owing to the expensive transportation, the cultivation of the fuel used, and the absence of all economy in machinery, &c. The Russian teas, brought by caravans, are the most expensive and best teas used in Europe. The Chinese themselves pay 7d. per lb. for the "Yen Soulong" teas. But the duty prohibits the importation of superior teas into England. The duty amounts to nearly £6,000,000, or nearly double the actual cost in China of its total quantity consumed in England.

H. S. D.—A servant must be in the testator's service at the time of his death, to be entitled to a legacy under the description of servant. When there is a mistake in the will, as to the name or description of any legatee, but there is no reasonable doubt, judging from the context of the will, as to the person to whom the legacy is really intended to be given, the executor may safely pay the legacy to such person. But if the will itself do not afford evidence of the mistake, and enable the executor to rectify it, he must leave the legatee to seek his remedy in a court of equity, whence alone can proceed an authority sufficient to protect the executor. When the property bequeathed is personal only—that is, leaseholds, money, stock in trade, &c.—the words, "relations," "legal representatives," and "heirs," are construed to mean next of kin, according to the statute of distributions.

D. A. G.—Assuming that D left no issue, the freehold would descend to the second son of A, as heir-at-law.

F. E. A.—Staring in a lady's face is excessively vulgar. It is a species of ruffianism which no gentleman practises. A gentleman, when conversing with a lady, endeavours to place her completely at her ease, by avoiding any tone or look calculated to embarrass her. In conversation, the aid of the eye is essential, but looking at an object, as honest people generally do, is not staring at it. Staring rudely is a mark of either very low breeding or a bad disposition.

NOVICE.—Much circumspection is required in what are termed "introductions." Good taste, common sense, and discernment, are the best dictators of the etiquette to be observed, but a few leading rules are well established. One of them is, that people should never be introduced to each other without a previous understanding that it would be agreeable to both. Another is, when out walking with a friend, should you meet an acquaintance, never introduce him. Also, if you meet a male acquaintance with a lady on his arm, take off your hat to him—do not nod, for that would be disrespectful to the lady. In making introductions, present the person of the lower rank to him of the higher—the commoner to the peer, not the peer to the commoner. The same rule must be particularly observed with regard to ladies. The lady claiming the higher rank must have the gentleman presented to her, not she to him. It may be added, that you should be cautious how you take acquaintances to the houses of friends. Permission should be first asked. The old adage about uninvited guests, applies to these abrupt introductions, and you may compromise yourself and friend by a breach of etiquette.

PATER FAMILIAS.—We detest the cramming system. Children should not be stuffed with knowledge as you would stuff a turkey. It injures the brain just as much as a gorge of pastry injures the stomach. When the parent is sufficiently enlightened to rear his child himself, instead of plying him with rudimental books, dictionaries, and restraint, let him impart the first instructions by familiar conversation. Ideas advanced in this way are accommodated to the comprehension of the pupil by mutual good feeling, rendered attractive, and brought directly within the embrace of his mind. This instruction leads him to observe, reflect, and discriminate; offers the sciences under interesting associations, and inspires a natural thirst for instruction. Of all results which education can produce, this is the most useful. A youth thus-trained will be distinguished by the early maturity of his reason, and instead of his studies producing fatigue and disgust, they will every day give birth to new ideas and new pleasures. This was the way the Greeks taught. They abjured restraint, and taught while walking in the shade of the portico or trees. Education in England, as a science, is yet in its infancy. The system at present most in vogue is very superficial. It neither suggests nor conducts, but puts the brain in an infernal limbo of words, to the total neglect of the freedom and luxuriance of ideas, shared only in the language and forms into which they naturally shape themselves.

F. C. H. complains of the conduct of the married sister of her lover. During the absence of the husband she was a constant and welcome visitor, but since his return home she has been "cut." Her lover visits them more frequently than before. Young married women are very jealous, and sometimes rather singular in their conduct. They seem to think it better not to lead their spouses into temptation. At all events, although married, they think their husbands safer out of harm's way. In this instance the brother is to blame. He should resent the slight cast upon his future bride. Our correspondent must exhibit a little more independence, and mix more freely among her friends.

MARY.—After a wedding in a family, the cards of the newly-married pair are sent round to all their acquaintances, to apprise them of the event. The bridegroom forwards them to his acquaintances, and the parents of the bride to theirs. All cards left at the residence of the bride and bridegroom, during their absence in the "honeymoon," are acknowledged by them on their return. Friends of the bride who reside at a distance, may write letters of congratulation, but not until after the "honeymoon." The simpler and more unaffected these epistles are, the warmer will be thought the feeling that dictated them.

R. G.—Should you die intestate, your leasehold property would be divided among your representatives, as follows: one-third to your wife, and two-thirds among your five children, equally. Make a will.

RED ROBIN.—In the event of your father dying intestate, his eldest son would take all the freehold property. No agreement between his children as to an ultimate equal division of the property would be binding—at least we think not, for there would be actually nothing to divide; and therefore the premises of the deed would be only in the imagination. Consult a solicitor. In justice to the younger children, the old gentleman ought to make his will.

S. A. B. "The Neglected," a fair, round-faced, pretty girl, thus bemoans her fate:

In vain I weave my tresses on,
None linger by my side;
Not one in all the motley throng,
Would woo me for a bride.

They say I'm handsome, but they think,
My smile is all too cold;
They cannot see my heart doth shrink
From being over bold.

They deem the barrier of reserve,
Is all too strong to break;
They dream not that the stony nerve
Could easily awake.

They give me one admiring gaze,
And note my sparkling eye;
My graceful figure loudly praise,
Then coldly pass me by.

They think not there are tender chords
Slumbering in my heart;
Nor dream that a few simple words
Could bid the stern brow depart.

They guess not that the tears can fall
From out my flashing eye,
Nor that a tale of woe could call
A sympathising sigh.

They think my breast can but contain,
Feelings of scorn and pride;
They dream not that I sigh in vain
For a counsellor and guide.

MYRTLE, a dark young gentleman, aged twenty-four, who is of a prepossessing appearance, very warm in his affections, good-natured, of very domestic habits, and also intelligent, would wish to correspond with "Ivy." He is junior partner in a mercantile firm, which has an increasing business.

THE KING OF THE CANNIBAL ISLANDS having reformed, and also accumulated untold treasures, is in want of a nice little queen. If any lady will give a description of herself, and it pleases the king, he will then describe himself; and if his description pleases the lady, the king will correspond, and bring the courtship to a triumphant and splendid conclusion.

ROSA C. wishes to marry a country gentleman. She is of the middle height, fair-complexioned, with a graceful figure, light, curling hair, pearly teeth, and blue eyes; she is twenty-two years of age, aristocratic-looking, fond of home, well educated, thoroughly versed in the housekeeping department, lives in the country, is a famous horsewoman, and will have an ample fortune.

ULTRIX is deeply in love with a young lady, who is as good as she is beautiful; but since his engagement, he has discovered that she is afflicted with an hereditary malady. He is aware he is entitled to break off his engagement, but his affection is so strong that he has not the moral courage to step between his passion and his future welfare. He must do so. Marriage, with the foreknowledge of such an unhappy circumstance, would be a crime.

W. G. is desirous of entering into a matrimonial correspondence with "E. E." He is twenty-five, tall, and has brown hair and dark eyes. He is in business, from which he derives a moderate but respectable income.

CONSTANCE, not having an admirer on whom she could lovingly place her affections, wishes for a correspondence with one of our bachelor friends. She is twenty years of age, has dark hair, black eyes, and is quite a brunette in appearance. She will have a considerable fortune, being an only child; is very industrious, and thinks she should make an excellent and desirable companion to a husband who, like herself, is good-tempered.

JULIE TO THE ELIGIBLE BACHELORS.

Young men I'm very sure there are,
Somewhere in this world so wide;
But then the question is, dear sir,
How bring them to the ladies' side?

Now, there is where I want your aid,
If you will be so good and kind;
If not, sir, I am sore afraid,
A husband I shall never find.

I own I cannot boast of pelf,
Nor yet much beauty can I claim;
The man must take me for myself,
And I'll take him for just the same.

I'm twenty-two, Julie by name;
Tall, too, and rather stout am I;
Skin quite white, and teeth the same;
Can make a pudding or a pie.

And I can wash and make a shirt,
And starch, and iron it, too, to boot;
I steady am—can't bear a flirt—
Can "Teach the young idea to shoot."

But as we cannot live on love,
However strong it chance to be,
Hard work he must not be above,
But struggle on as well as me.

And I will strive and do my best,
A partner good and kind to be;
And he must work, and do the rest,
To keep the little bairns and me.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—A. M. B. (The foreign railway loan lottery scheme is a swindle. The London firm is a fiction, and if you allow yourself to be gulled by them, all we would say is, "A fool and his money, &c.")—X. M. (First-rate wood engravers are much wanted in the United States of America)—A Victim (Washing in water in which a little alum has been mixed will keep the hands dry. But rubbing a little club moss, in very fine powder, over them, is an effectual remedy for clamminess)—Joe Beans (Commence with the rudiments—English Grammar and Arithmetic)—Horace (At a first-class publisher's)—Error (Read everything useful and proper, and while you are reading—think. Dissect the shortest sentences)—G. T. S. (The volume out of print)—Ellen (Translated from the French)—Vanderdecken (Purchase the "Treatise on the Hair," published at 334, Strand)—Emma D. (We are not acquainted with any of the properties, good or bad, of the article called "Balm of Mecca")—James M'Mahon (Pitch is distilled resin. The processes differ)—W. C., Plymouth (The coin you allude to never reached the Editor)—C. Melnotte (Order the book from a respectable publisher)—J. H. F. B. (Parliamentary reporters practise almost every system of short-hand. Gurney's, Lewis's, and Harding's are the most popular)—B. C. (At a fancy repository)—R. D. Taylor (See our reply to J. H. F. B.)—A. R. W. (It should have been, "part of the fixtures were removed," because the plural is implied)—J. F. P. (The present century, the nineteenth, commenced the first of January, 1801. The numeral "one," on that day had only a commutative or prospective value)—J. M. L. (Palma Christi, or Castor Oil, should only be used when the hair is very weak indeed)—Henry K. (Corns are produced by undue pressure. Tight boots do all the mischief. Do not cut them—let them grow out, and they will fall off)—P. C. H. (Become a member of the City of London Mechanics' Institution)—E. L. M. (The sentiment is unexceptionable, but the subjects are not general enough for public interest)—James Jordan (You had better turn your attention to some other business, forthwith. The trade of "drinking-horn turners" has been ruined. Metal pots and glasses have quite superseded the old-fashioned horns)—W. D. (You will do much better at home. Clerks are not the class of people who should emigrate)—J. L. M. (You are entitled to a little recreation after business hours, but don't abuse the privilege)—John Chapman (All nonsense)—B. B. (See the article, "Camera Obscura," in the "National Cyclopaedia")—J. B. (Tobacco in leaf is imported from the West Indies, United States of America, and the southern states of America)—Poor Ignoramus (You are at liberty to leave whenever you like)—William L. C.—R. W. Barker—Caroline—A. B.—D. C. Y.—H. V. D. L.—Jonathan White—A Villager (The subject shall have our attention as early as possible)—Mexico—J. H. K. M.—Felix—Geneva—Lopez—O. P. Q. W. B.—Moss Rose—E. C.—J. B. P.—Polly—Pater Noster—Emmeline—Edmund Wilson—Jenny Lind—Henry Freeman—Wilson Morley—Lauretta—Adrian—R. H.—Ernest—Dox—Lizzie—H. P. T.—M. A. E.—L. N. D.—S. Jones—Marcus Apollo—Alonzo—L. R.—Sir Rodolph—Frederick—Vat—J. L.—True Briton—A. J.—A Benedict—H. H.—A. C.—C. H.—Mary and Emily—Kent—Amicus—House-Leek—C. K.—Homo—P. S. L.—W. C., Hackney Road—Benison—Imogene—H. F.—Alecto—A. R. Brevett—St George—T. H. Johnson—Emily—A. L. S.—James—R. A. H.—Lizzie Jameson—Thomas S.—G. W. E.—J. G.—William of York—Annie Leslie—Hebe—J. B.—Candour—Jenny—Marianne Fitzclarence—Ivy—G. C. D.—A. P. S.—Stephen B. D.—Walter Lacey—B. C. P. P. P.—Annie Lawrie—William—M. S. C.—The Stranger—T. T. F.—D. E. G. K. C. C.—R. D. V.—J. J.—Dentelle—M. H.—Arals—J. J. E.

* * All letters intended for the Publisher, Editor, or Proprietor of this Journal, should be addressed, "The Editor of the LONDON JOURNAL, 334, Strand, London."

London: Printed and Published for the Proprietor by GEORGE VICKERS, at the office of "THE WEEKLY TIMES," 334, Strand, in the Parish of St. Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex—April 16, 1865.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 426.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 23, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[THE KHAN COMPELLING DR. GUIOT TO ACCEDE TO HIS COMMAND.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"THE JESUIT," "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

The quality of mercy is not strained—
It droppeth as the gentle dew from heaven,
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed:
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown.

MERCHANT OF VENICE.

ITALY boasts of many palaces rich in storied recollections—but only of one Vatican, which is the seat both of religious and civil monarchy: that empire over mind and matter which Rome has so long arrogated to herself.

The stately chambers and interminable galleries of this vast pile exceed, it is said, five thousand in number: a calculation which, extraordinary as it may appear, the writer of these pages—who, during his frequent visits to the Eternal City, has had no ordinary means of judging—considers as rather under than over the mark. These apartments are for the most part adorned only by the genius of painting and sculpture; the upholstery fripperies which generally disfigure the seats of royalty, have not as yet been permitted to mask their noble proportions and architectural beauties. Priceless columns of the most precious marble—antique statues from the temples and palaces of Pagan Rome—mosaics from the public baths, with the matchless frescoes of Raphael, form the fit decorations of a shrine to which so many poetic and artistic pilgrims direct their wanderings.

Thrice hath Rome grasped the empire of the world: first by force, a second time by faith, and lastly, by that pre-eminence in art, which even her enemies acknowledge. Her strength has become as a broken reed; nations have cast off the yoke her pontiffs riveted; whilst that the genius of her architects, poets, painters, and sculptors impose, remains unbroken.

In one of the unrivalled chambers we have attempted to describe, a venerable old man was seated, in a chair of state, slightly raised upon a estrade covered with tapestry from the looms of Arras: it was the reigning Pontiff, Pius VII.; his dark, thin locks, escaped from the white culotte, or skull-cap, which he wore to hide his tonsure, fell on either side of his pallid countenance, in which traces of suffering and resignation were mingled; but the eye of the courageous priest who had braved the wrath of Napoleon at the height of his power, and generously sheltered his persecuted race after his downfall, was lustreous and penetrating; the weakness from which he suffered was of the body, not the mind—that remained unclouded to the last.

His costume was that usually worn by the popes in the retirement of their palace: a white soutan, falling in graceful folds to his feet, upon which were slippers of velvet, embroidered with golden crosses: it is from the custom of saluting these crosses, that a very general idea has arisen in Protestant lands, that visitors to the Sovereign Pontiff are expected to kiss his toe.

The rest of his costume consisted of a stole of cloth of gold, which fell to his feet, and a crimson cape, or pelérine, edged with ermine; upon his finger he wore the ring of St. Peter—a magnificent diamond, set by the cunning hand of Benvenuto Cellini.

At the back of the Holy Father's chair stood the Cardinals Paca and Justiniani: the former was the companion of his long imprisonment in France; the latter, a prince by birth, was descended, on the mother's side, from the unfortunate Earl of Derwentwater. The Abbate Lucas—a man of stern countenance but supple manners, whose morale resembled oil floating upon vinegar—and a crowd of inferior ecclesiastics, were grouped at a distance in the background.

Sir Thomas Lawrence—whose magnificent portrait of Pius all who have visited Windsor Castle must remember—had just presented Henry Ashton to the venerable old man.

"Rise, my son," said the Pope, extending his withered hand, to prevent our hero from paying him the usual homage, by giving him his pontifical ring to kiss, instead of the embroidered crosses before alluded to, upon his slipper; "we are doubly happy to receive you—as the friend of our painter, and an Englishman: we owe much to your sovereign and country," he added, with a smile.

To the surprise of all, the young man still remained kneeling.

"He is a suppliant, Holy Father," said Sir Thomas.

The Abbate Lucas began to look uneasy, and drew nearer to the chair of the Pontiff—who, imagining that the request which the young Englishman was about to proffer related to a permission to copy some rare work of art, or equally unimportant favour, by a smile encouraged him to proceed.

"Not to your bounty, sovereign and priest," said Henry, for the first time breaking silence; "that all who have the happiness of approaching your sacred person know to be inexhaustible—but to your justice."

Cardinal Paca advanced to the chair, and whispered a few words in the ear of his friend and master.

"Proceed," said the Pope, in a low, musical tone; "the ear of justice, like that of mercy, should never be closed."

Thus encouraged, our hero began the history of the unhappy Lady Mowbray's trials and unmerited sufferings: how the devotion of her woman's heart to the husband of her youth had been used by the infamous Captain Lucas as a snare to delude her from her country and friends; the sublime act by which she preserved her honour from his licentious passion; her temporary madness, which followed the loss of her child; and the means employed to induce the bereaved mother and slandered wife to accept the veil, as a refuge from a world whose contempt she had not deserved.

Like most who plead from the heart, his feelings made him eloquent.

"The prayers of the sufferer have been heard," he added, "even from her cloistered tomb; the means to prove her innocence are not wanting; a clue to her long-lost child may still be found. One bar only exists to her restoration to her husband, her offspring, and the world: that bar, no lips less sacred than yours, Holy Father, can remove! Feel for the yearnings of a mother's love—an outraged matron's honour! pronounce the dissolution of a vow which heaven cannot approve, and the recording angel witnessed was wrong from a broken heart! Speak it," he continued, in accents which vibrated through the columned hall of the Vatican, "and thousands in that distant isle, which no longer owns your spiritual sway, shall bless the deed of mercy and of justice!"

During this impassioned address, the countenance of Pius VII. was observed to change from surprise to pity: it was evident that, as the speaker proceeded, he became deeply interested. It was some moments before he could reply to the youthful suppliant, whose eyes continued to plead, although his voice was mute.

"Rise, my son," he said, in a mild tone; "this is informal—but we pardon that. Reduce your statement of the wrongs and wishes of your unhappy countrywoman to writing—send the petition to the congregation of rites—and it shall receive all fitting consideration."

"It has been sent, and rejected!" replied Henry, mournfully; "the voice of her enemy is too powerful there!"

"Her enemy!" repeated the Pontiff, with surprise; "name him?"

"The Abbate Lucas—of whom I have vainly sought an interview, to glean some tidings of the lost heir of Sir William Mowbray: the man, like his deeds, remains shrouded in darkness—he cannot bear the light—he is —"

An expressive sign from Cardinal Justiniani warned the speaker to proceed no further.

"Venerable father," said Sir Thomas Lawrence, who saw that the moment had arrived for him to use his influence, "I have your gracious permission to present two visitors this morning?"

"The Pope nodded assent, glad of the interruption, which, as he hoped, would relieve him from the necessity of a decision which the benevolence of his heart prompted him to give, but which he well knew would excite the discontent of the camarilla.

The painter advanced to the portals of the apartment, and, throwing them open, discovered the unhappy Lady Mowbray kneeling on the threshold, in supplication such as some pilgrim might be supposed to address at the shrine of a long-sought saint. The Duchess of Devonshire and several English ladies of the highest rank, closely veiled, were standing in a group in the antechamber.

No sooner did Henry Ashton perceive the wife of his benefactor, than, regardless of etiquette, and listening only to the impulse of his gratitude to Sir William, he hastened to raise her, and conduct her to the feet of the aged man, upon whose voice, as upon the decree of destiny, the misery or happiness of her future life depended. No other female foot ventured to pass the threshold.

"Deign, holy father," said our hero, "to cast your eyes upon the features made pale with unmerited wrongs and sufferings; convince the world that if your voice is terrible in judgments on the impious, it is rich in blessings for the innocent and the oppressed! The noblest names of England," he added, pointing to the group of ladies in the antechamber, "are the guarantees of her sufferings and virtues!"

The courtly painter, for whom the aged priest had contracted a sort of friendship, gracefully bent the knee before him.

All that the veiled suppliant herself could utter, were the words—"Pity!" and "my child—my child!"

It was nature's eloquence—and that seldom pleads in vain. As the piercing accents of her voice—which seemed to come from her heart, not her lips—the last trace of irresolution vanished from the countenance of the venerable Pontiff.

He rose slowly, and with majestic gravity, from his chair. As he did so, the Abbate Lucas advanced, as if to catch his eye; but the Cardinal Justiniani, who felt deeply interested in the scene, waved him back.

"Daughter," said Pius, "search well thy heart, and answer—as we both must answer at the judgment-seat on high: hast thou any other motive than the ones alleged, for desiring to be released from thy cloistered vows?"

"None!" exclaimed Lady Mowbray, clasping her hands with fervour; "none!"

"No doubt, or tampering with thy faith?"

The nun crossed herself, as if in horror at the thought.

"And thou dost acknowledge our Holy Church to be thy only judge?" continued the august speaker.

"The church and its venerable head," replied the suppliant.

"What if it declares thy vow irrevocable?" demanded the old man—willing, perhaps, to try her further.

"Fiat voluntas tuam sicut in terram ut in cœlum!" was the response, given in the words of the Domical prayer.

"Enough!" said the Pontiff, extending his hand over her. "In the plenitude of our apostolic power, we cancel the vow which binds thee to the church, and absolve thee from observing it! Let it be known unto all men," he added, slowly removing the consecrated veil from her pallid brow, "that by this our act thou art free, daughter of many sorrows, to return unto the world! The church will keep it for thee as a sacred deposit, that, should disappointment or misfortune lead thee once more to seek an asylum in its bosom, thou mayest return to it, as the suffering child returns unto its mother!"

The emotions of Lady Mowbray, thus unexpectedly restored to the world, were too powerful for words—her gratitude expressed itself in tears, as she kissed the hand of the benevolent Pontiff—the hand which had broken the seal upon her tomb, and had made her a living thing again.

"You spoke of the child of your countrywoman," continued Pius VII., addressing our hero; "to whom was it delivered?"

"To the Abbate Lucas," was the reply.

The old man glanced over the back of his chair, and, fixing a commanding look upon the oily priest, motioned him to advance.

"You hear, my son?" he calmly observed.

The Dominican bowed his head.

"To whom did you confide the infant?"

There was a pause: the priest was evidently struggling between his sense of duty, the dread of offending the head of his church, and the desire he felt of concealing the clue which he possessed to the lost heir of Sir William Mowbray.

The pale, meek countenance of the Pope became flushed with anger. For once he remembered that he was a sovereign as well as a priest—that one word from his lips could reduce the man who, by his silence, presumed to brave him, to worse than nothing—annihilate his ambitions dream of the future, by cancelling the past.

"What!" he exclaimed; "must I speak twice? am I braved? is the authority of the head of the church scorned by one of its ministers?"

"No, Holy Father!" replied the priest, in a submissive tone—for he saw that the spirit of the hitherto passive old man was roused; "far from ray heart and thoughts be such impiety! To me your will must ever be a sacred law! The child of this unhappy lady, whom I knew only as a wife who had fled from her husband with my misguided relation, was consigned to the care of his uncle —"

"Uncle! Colonel Mowbray?" interrupted Henry Ashton.

"Even so."

"Here," continued the abbate, "is the letter in which he authorised his messenger to receive the boy; and here is another, in which he acknowledges the safe arrival of his nephew in England."

Bending his knees, the speaker placed at the foot of the venerable Pius a small packet, containing the precious documents. It was raised by Cardinal Pace, who placed it in the hands of his master.

"Tis well!" replied the Pope, in a milder tone—for his anger was quickly appeased. "The Abbate Lucas may retire to his convent: he will receive our commands through the Vicar General of the Holy See!"

Cringing to the ground, the baffled priest retreated to the door of the cabinet. As he passed the threshold, he cast a look of deadly hatred towards our hero—who replied only by an ironical smile.

The Pontiff rose from his chair—the excitement had enfeebled him—and, leaning upon the arm of the cardinal, he prepared to retire to his private apartments. All bent the knee as he passed them; upon Lady Mowbray he bestowed his benediction, and placed the packet in the hands of Henry Ashton—who, struck with admiration of his character, and the sense of justice he had exhibited, demanded to share in his benediction.

"It is yours, my son!" replied the Pontiff; "the blessing of an old man cannot harm you!"

He extended his hand over the head of the youth, traced the air-drawn sign, and passed on towards Sir Thomas Lawrence, whom he touched familiarly upon the shoulder.

"No more presentations, caro mio!" he whispered in his ear; "or Rome will say I have turned Protestant! Addio!"

The heavy velvet curtains which veiled the portal leading to that part of the Vatican devoted to the privacy of the Pope, were drawn aside by the officers of the Swiss guard—who, during the scene we have endeavoured to describe, had been standing, in their picturesque costume, motionless as statues, on either side. All but Lady Mowbray, the painter, and our hero, passed through, and they saw the venerable Pius VII. no more.

The instant the cortège disappeared, the Duchess of Devonshire and the English ladies who were with her, passed the hitherto forbidden threshold, and, surrounding Lady Mowbray, congratulated her warmly upon her deliverance from her conventual vows, and the prospects which were opening to her.

"Alas!" faintly replied the victim of so much treachery; "it is but the last gleam of the setting sun before it sinks in night! My child," she added, with a shudder, "was consigned to the hands of his cold, calculating uncle!"

"Say, rather," exclaimed our hero, his face radiant with smiles, "the commencement of its glorious rising! Colonel Mowbray has not been so vile as you imagine: your boy—the heir of so much love, the object of so many prayers and tears—lives—worthy of you and his father! I am sure of it! my heart cannot deceive me! Soon—very soon—I shall have the happiness of restoring him to your embrace!"

"My son!" faltered her ladyship.

"In a few days, perhaps!"

"Oh, do not trifle with me!" exclaimed the excited mother; "you know him—you have seen him?"

"He is my dearest friend," replied Henry Ashton. "I dare not say more," he added, warned, by the pallor which suddenly overspread the countenance of the wife of his benefactor, to be cautious; "but, trust me, dearest lady, mine are not the lips that would deceive you! you will still be happy in his and your long-suffering husband's love! The sunshine of the future shall efface from your memory the gloomy shadows of the past!"

At the allusion to her husband, both the Duchess of Devonshire and Sir Thomas Lawrence exchanged uneasy glances. The painter, since his first interview with the speaker, had written to England, and received such particulars of the murder of the baronet, as made it impossible for them to doubt the tragical secret.

Led, or rather supported, by her friends, Lady Mowbray was conducted to the carriage of her grace—who insisted, in the most affectionate terms, upon the much-wronged lady taking up her abode with her till her departure for England—for that land where her name was still a reproach: for all believed her the guilty, not the deceived wife of the late baronet.

Henry was all impatience to return to his hotel, to impart to Walter the eventful discoveries he had made. The likeness of his friend to his benefactor had frequently struck him; the resemblance of character was even stronger than that of feature. Not a doubt existed in his own mind that the ambitious colonel had assumed the name of father instead of uncle to his brother's heir: a deception which insured him, in the event of the baronet's death, the enjoyment of the title and estates during his own worthless life. Little did he anticipate the fearful shock which was to await him on his arrival.

"I must speak with you," said the painter, seriously—at the same time placing his hand upon the arm of our hero—"upon matters of serious import!"

"Not now, Sir Thomas—not now!" replied Henry. "I am so happy in the events of this auspicious day—so anxious to impart the result to one most interested in the discovery—that I am sure you will pardon my impatience!"

"In an hour, then," replied his friend, "I will seek you at your hotel: perhaps it will be better there!"

After taking a grateful leave of the kind-hearted duchess, who had so materially assisted him in his project for restoring Lady Mowbray to the world, the young man started for his residence in the Via Condotti, eager to impart his hopes and suspicions to the ear of one cold and insensible to the voice of friendship as of love.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

What prayers can move thee?

None that thou hast wit enough to offer.

SHAKESPEARE.

OUR readers have doubtless remembered that on Meeran Hafaz, and Colonel Mowbray's first visit to Dr. Guyot, in the parlours of the Almonry, they noticed the departure of a man, closely muffled up, as if to avoid recognition, from one of the inner chambers: which said personage the old Frenchman described as a pupil who was possessed of the singular desire of treating insanity, arising from one peculiar cause.

It is time that we introduced our readers to that pupil—who was no other than their old acquaintance, the Khan.

It must have been evident, from the earlier pages of our story, that the former confidant of Meeran Hafaz—whose European name was known only to himself—had in some way been connected with the events which had taken place at Carrow. He was no stranger either to the locality or its inhabitants; the crimes of Will Siderer were more than suspected by him—and we have seen how he used that knowledge to overawe the ruffian. Some hidden motive had induced him, even before Henry Ashton had preserved his life from the ferocious attempt of the warren, to take a deep interest in his welfare: which interest would have been made apparent, perhaps, in action as well as words, had he not sworn, on the night when his former pupil and Colonel Mowbray surprised him in the vault at Mortlake, never, by word, writing, or act, to betray his suspicions that the young Indian was in any way connected with the murder of the baronet.

The renegade was seated in a small apartment in the neighbourhood of the abbey. The frame which formerly occupied the centre of his room, was placed near the window, the shutters of which were carefully closed. A strong light from a lamp fell upon a ghastly head fixed in the moveable socket.

Taking up a mallet, he struck a violent blow upon the skull, sufficient to fracture it.

After a careful examination of the wound, he removed, with a sharp scalpel, a portion of the scalp, till he laid bare the bone.

"Now then," he said, "for my last instrument!"

On a table near him was one of those circular saws similar to those used for the operation of trepanning—we say similar, for it differed in one important particular: by means of an exquisitely contrived mechanism, as the instrument cut through the shattered cranium, it was made to contract and grasp the fragments, so as to prevent their falling and injuring the brain. It had cost the solitary man long days of study and experiment to bring it to the necessary perfection.

Calmly and steadily he applied the instrument. The low, grating sound caused by the fine teeth cutting through the bone, neither jarred his nerves nor caused him the least impatience. In a few moments the operation was completed; not a particle that could injure the brain but was grasped and removed.

"At last!" murmured the old man; "at last I have succeeded! But shall I be able to operate as successfully upon a living subject? Will not my hand fail me when I hear his cry of agony, and mark the quivering muscles of his wrinkled face? I am sure of my invention—can I be equally certain of myself?"

There was a gentle tap at the door. The Khan, after having ascertained, by looking through an aperture, who was his visitor, withdrew the bolt, and gave admittance to Dr. Guyot.

"Humph!" said the man of science, with an approving nod, after carefully examining his work; "you have succeeded?"

"Thanks to your instructions!"

"And your own patience," replied the doctor. "I trust you have not forgotten your promise!"

"What promise?" demanded the occupant of the chamber, with a look of surprise, for his thoughts were deeply occupied by the result of his labour.

"My promised recompense," was the reply.

The Khan opened an iron-bound casket, which was placed upon a table within reach of the cheetah's chain, and took from it a bag of gold, which he placed in the eager grasp of his visitor.

"It is paid!" he said.

"Honestly!" exclaimed the doctor, as soon as he had counted the glittering coin; "there are one or two light pieces; but, for friendship's sake, we will say nothing more about them. May you succeed!" he added, rising to depart.

"Stay!" said his pupil, sternly.

The old man turned, with an uneasy look.

"I have a question to ask," continued the speaker.

"A question?"

"Which you must answer, and honestly!" added the renegade; "for you have seen enough of me to know that I am dangerous when sported with!"

"Speak!" exclaimed his visitor, more and more puzzled.

"How fares your patient at Cromwell House?"

The question was so unexpected and so directly put that Dr. Guyot, with all his self-possession, knew not how to lie, or conceal the embarrassment it caused him.

"What patient?" he faltered, at last.

"The victim of a false guardian's treachery, and a headstrong boy's destroying passion," replied the Khan; "the niece of the late Sir William Mowbray—Miss De Vere!"

"Better!" muttered the old man—"much better!"

"Has Meeran seen her yet?"

"Not since her illness."

"Nor must he!" replied the renegade, in a firm tone.

"His presence would destroy her! Listen to me," he continued; "I never frame a request till I have it in my power to change it into a command; you must find the means to release her from her prison!"

"I!" exclaimed the doctor. "You know not how it is guarded: he, the young Indian you name, and her uncle, quit it neither night nor day!"

"I guessed as much."

"The ayah, too, is on the watch!"

The Khan merely nodded, to intimate that he was aware of it.

"The servants devoted to him."

"Were she guarded by fiends," replied the renegade, "you must find the means to release her! I have not yet to learn the vast resources science has placed at your command!"

"And, if so," demanded Doctor Guyot, "why should I use them?"

"For your own safety!" answered his late pupil.

"Listen to me. I told you that I never proffered a request till fortune gave me the means to change the words of entreaty to those of command?"

"You did!"

"It has done so now!" continued the Khan; "the register of your dark deeds and practices—the record of your bribes, the names of your employers—has fallen into my hands!"

With a yell of surprise and rage, the man whose wondrous skill had been perverted to such fearful purposes, rushed towards the speaker: a weapon, which he had drawn from his breast, glittered in his hand.

"Dog!" he exclaimed: "the secret shall die with you!"

The Khan started back, within reach of the chain of the hunting leopard. The animal—which, during the interview, had been crouching on the ground—with a loud growl, sprang upon the assailant. In an instant he was prostrate on his back, the animal upon his breast, withheld only by a signal from its master from tearing him to pieces.

"Fool!" said the Khan, calmly; "thinkest thou that I was not prepared for this? Now, listen to me. I will leave thee here, in the guard of my faithful cheetah, whilst I hasten to a magistrate, place in his hands the record of thy crimes, search thy polluted dwelling, and return only to see thee dragged, amid the hootings of the mob, to prison—if, indeed, their indignation permits thee to reach its friendly shelter!"

The doctor groaned aloud.

"I submit!" he said; "name thy conditions!"

They were named; and such was the precaution the renegade took to insure their observance, that even the subtle Dr. Guyot found no loophole to avoid fulfilling them.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

Molida saxa—
(To soften rocks.)

UNDER the skillful care of Dr. Guyot, Ellen was slowly recovering from the fever, both of heart and brain, which for several days threatened to sunder the slender thread of life. Susan's devotion to her young mistress had been incessant: the faithful girl had watched her with the affection of a sister, or the untiring love of a young mother, over the couch of her first-born child. She scarcely absented herself one single instant from her sight; every medicine which her singular physician prescribed was administered by her hand: from no other, in the height of her delirium, would she consent to receive it.

This was gall and wormwood to the jealous ayah, who saw herself supplanted in the love of her foster-child by one whom she looked upon as an intruder. She both hated and loved the girl: hated her for the affection with which Ellen repaid her kindness—and loved her for the devoted care with which she watched over the oppressed and suffering orphan.

"You are better—much better—now!" whispered Susan, as she smoothed the pillow of the patient. "I shall never forgive myself for the ill opinion I conceived of that hideous Dr. Guyot, who is not half so evil as he looks: his skill has preserved your life!"

"To endure fresh misery!" answered the poor girl, with a deep-drawn sigh. "I am in the power of one whose heart knows no law but its wild, ungovernable impulse—deprived of all natural protectors—no friend save you; for even Henry has forgotten me!"

"Not forgotten you, lady!" replied her humble friend. "I could as soon doubt the goodness of heaven, as his sincerity! Those who have deluded you to this wretched place have doubtless intercepted your letters to him, and his to you."

"But not his old friend Dr. Orme's: surely he might have written to him!"

Susan suggested that the helpless prisoner should appeal to Dr. Guyot—if not for protection, at least to convey a letter to her friends.

"To him!" replied the suffering girl, with a shudder; "hopeless—hopeless! I have noted him—his cold glance, which might arrest the prayer on mercy's lips, and send the pleading angel hopelessly away! The only key to his heart is gold—and that my persecutor possesses!"

"Perhaps," uttered a deep-toned voice near them, "there is another!"

The two captives gave an involuntary scream: the subject of their discourse had entered the room during their conversation, unperceived, and stood, in his usual quiet manner, close to the side of the bed.

Ellen was the first to speak.

"Is it possible," she exclaimed, "that my sufferings have touched your heart? Can you befriend me?"

"I can!"

"And will you?"

"Humph!" muttered the old man; "that must depend on circumstances! Child," he added, turning to Susan, "descend to the offices, and see if the cooling drink I intrusted to the Indian woman to prepare, is ready."

The faithful girl hesitated: so great was the dread she entertained of this singular being, that she disliked leaving him alone with her young lady.

"What do you fear?" he added, with a bitter smile.

"Go, Susan!" said her mistress, inspired with a sudden hope; "the rock is not so hard but heaven can melt it!"

Reassured by the words of the patient, her attendant withdrew. No sooner were Ellen and the physician alone, than the latter drew a chair to the side of the bed, and, stretching forth his long, bony hand, placed his finger on her pulse.

"Still feverish!" he murmured; "still feverish!"

"Heed not that!" exclaimed the sufferer; "my mind is clear—quite clear; for it sees the horror of my desolate condition! I have no hope but you—no friend save heaven!"

"You have another friend," replied the old man.

"Another friend! name him?" eagerly demanded Ellen.

"I do not know his name."

"His country?"

"That I am equally a stranger to. He has commanded—and I obey. The task I have undertaken is dangerous—for your gaoler is one of those fiery spirits who sport with human life as the mad wave plays with the drifting wreck; intellect with him is but an instrument to accomplish his passions—not control them."

His listener shuddered—for she knew that he alluded to Meeran Hafaz.

"This friend," continued the speaker—for he is your friend and my taskmaster—has commanded me to save you from your persecutor; but annexed a condition which is still more difficult."

"Name it—name it?"

"That I should spare him: it were easy else," he added, in an under-tone; "easy—easy! For three days I have deceived the young Indian as to your real state: he still believes that the shadow of the dark angel's wing is over you—that the slightest shock would be fatal: therefore he has abstained from visiting you."

"Persuade him so still," replied Ellen, in a tone which betrayed the terror of her soul at the mere thought of meeting Meeran, "and I will bless you; or, if there be no way of avoiding him, make your words a reality!"

"How a reality?" inquired the doctor, with a searching glance.

"By giving me the death which frees me from my persecutor."

The firm tone in which the request was made, excited the mingled surprise and admiration of the old man, accustomed as he was to witness, in those who came to consult his wondrous skill, the most abject dread of death—to listen to their entreaties to prolong existence at any sacrifice—at any price.

"It has not yet arrived to that necessity," he replied.

"Have you confidence in me?"

Ellen hesitated: her heart beat violently.

"Foolish girl!" he continued, interpreting her doubt; "what should I gain by deceiving you? Did I wish your death, I would send it to you on the perfume of a flower, the contact of a glove; were it my will to remove you from this place, I could, for eight-and-forty hours, steep your senses in a sleep the thunder-peal would fail to break—a sleep so like to death, that not one beating of the pulse would indicate, even to the finger of science, that life still lingered in its citadel, or a breath cloud the polished mirror at your lips! The man you fear," he added, in a tone which coloured her pale cheek with blushes, "would pay me nobly for such a secret!"

"Man!" she exclaimed, "I must—I will trust thee! There is little of human feeling in thy words and manner; perhaps thy heart is kinder than thy looks! I have no other hope! God will requite thee as thou dealest by me!"

"I will deal justly by thee."

"From pity?"

"No," replied Dr. Guyot; "I will not deceive thee: from necessity—that iron law to which all bow—which crushes the fool who resists. I have no sympathy with humanity—it has shown none to me. I am commanded to do this by a will stronger than my own—for once I have found my master: it is his pleasure to save thee—I am but the instrument!"

This singular assertion, strange as it may appear, strengthened the confidence of the prisoner. She could believe in the speaker's being compelled by some good genius or secret friend to act a part so contrary to his nature; but could not trust to any of the gentler impulses of humanity influencing a character like his.

"Listen to my instructions," he resumed, lowering his voice to a whisper, as if he feared that the echoes of the old chamber should repeat his words; "to-morrow night, when all have retired, you must dress yourself in a dark mantle and veil, which I will contrive to bring with me."

"But Susan?" interrupted the deeply attentive Ellen.

"Fear not!" said the doctor, calmly; "she shall accompany you."

Reassured by this promise, the prisoner motioned him to proceed.

"When you hear a cry like the hooting of an owl thrice repeated beneath your window, quit your chamber as silently as possible."

"Alas!" replied the unhappy girl, "every night the door is locked, and my treacherous nurse retains the key!"

The old man rose from his seat, and walked stealthily towards the door, the fastenings of which he carefully examined. After a few moments, having convinced himself that nothing could be easier than to draw the screws, he returned to his former position.

"That shall be cared for," he said; "at the bottom of the stairs you will encounter myself and your unknown friend; leave the rest to us."

"But should my strength fail me?"

"Even that I will provide against," added the physician; "the last thing previous to quitting your chamber, drink the contents of a small phial, which you will find with the mantle and veil—and for five hours I pledge my life that neither your strength nor spirits flag, no matter how severe the fatigue you may have to undergo. Do you promise this?"

"I do—I do!"

"Remember, should the attempt fail, from any weakness or irresolution at the final moment, the fault will not be mine—I shall have done all that I can—and more than I wish, perhaps—to aid you: it is your last chance of escape from the power of your relentless persecutor!"

"And I will risk it!" replied Ellen, firmly; "though a grave yawned in my path at every step I keep but thy faith with me," she added, "and my gratitude shall rival Meeran's in his gifts; for I am rich—rich in the gold you love—rich in all save friends and happiness!"

"I shall remind you of your promise, young lady!" said the old man, his eyes sparkling with the anticipated pleasure of fingering the yellow idol for which he had so frequently stained his soul with crimes—"when you are free!"

"And nobly shall it be kept!"

Not wishing to excite the suspicion of Meeran, who he knew would be impatiently expecting his report, Dr. Guyot quitted the room with his usual quiet step, leaving his patient a prey to alternate hope, doubt, and fear.

When Susan descended into the gloomy old kitchen of Cromwell House, she found the ayah and Will Sidelers seated on either side of the vast grate, upon which a small vessel, containing herbs and drugs, was simmering. The warren, who had nearly recovered from the severe injuries he had received at the hands of Meeran, regarded her with a sullen scowl—Zara with calm indifference: jealous as she felt of the hold which the girl's fidelity and sympathy had obtained on the confidence and affection of her foster-child, she could not hate her—despite the waywardness of her disposition, she could but feel that the love she herself had forfeited was justly bestowed.

She slowly rose to leave the place.

"Do not leave me with that fearful man!" said the warm-hearted girl, all her former terrors returning at the sight of the warren.

"You need not fear me"—replied the warren—"yet!" he added, in an under-tone—for he had made up his mind to the completion of the revenge which, in the evil recesses of his heart, he harboured against her lover.

The ayah caught the ferocious glance of his eye, and, with a mute gesture, motioned to him to quit the room.

"I am very well here!" he said.

"Here," she answered, calmly, "you must not remain! What!" she exclaimed, seeing that he hesitated to obey her; "has not the hound been sufficiently chastised? Does he again require the lash, to teach him obedience to his master?"

Sidelers quitted his seat, and limped towards the door, to which the Indian woman pointed.

"Know," continued the speaker, "that there are instruments which we use, but scorn! Dare to set a foot athwart the threshold whilst the girl remains, and thy second punishment shall exceed the first! Thou art in the hands of one who pardons not twice!"

At the allusion to Meeran, the ruffian quailed: he had already felt the strength of his hand, and he felt cowed at the recollection, like some ferocious beast of prey who has found its master. Bitterly did he regret, as he left the kitchen, that he had ever placed himself within his power. True, the conception of the crime was mutual, but the execution had been wholly his; besides, he had none but moral proofs of the young Indian's complicity.

Relieved by the absence of her enemy, Susan began to busy herself with her task at the fire. She had not been long thus occupied, before a slight tapping at the grated window attracted her attention: turning round, she beheld Red Ralph nodding and grinning at her through the diamond-shaped panes of glass. She remembered the poor cowboy's kindness, and smiled upon him in return.

"Is 'ee quite alone?" he whispered.

"Quite," she replied.

"Fasten the door, then, and I'll come in."

The quick-witted girl, naturally suspecting that it was not without some motive that the lad had ventured back, hastily drew the bolt across the door leading from the kitchen to the offices, and then returned to the window, where Red Ralph was busily occupied in removing the iron bars, from which age had long since rotted the woodwork. Some one was assisting him: she looked closer—and could scarcely suppress a scream of joy as she recognised in his companion her faithful lover, Joe Beans.

The sight of poor Susan's emotion lent fresh energy to the arm of the young man. In a few minutes an aperture sufficiently wide was made for him and Ralph to pass through; and the next he clasped her, laughing and crying, to his breast.

"Oh, Joe—Joe!" she sobbed; "I never thought to have seen you more! You cannot imagine what I and Miss Ellen have suffered from the persecution of our enemies!"

Her lover kissed away her tears, assuring her that her sorrows were at end. As he pressed his lips to her pale cheek, the cowboy, whose delight at the scene knew no bounds, exclaimed:

"Ah, that be just what old un wanted to do! but she wouldn't let un!"

"Old un!" repeated Joe, fixing an inquiring glance upon his sweetheart; "who does he mean?"

With a shudder, Susan whispered in his ear the name of the warrenner.

"Curse him!" exclaimed her lover; "I never liked the fellow; but, since he has insulted you, I feel that I hate him! Let him but once stand within my grasp again," he added, "and I'll spare the hangman a cast of his office—almost too good for such a villain—and strangle him! Where is the ruffian?"

"Hush!" whispered the girl, laying her finger impressively upon her lips; "he is not alone!"

"No matter!"

"Meeran Hafaz and the colonel are both here; the servants, bribed by the gold of the former, are devoted to them. Miss Ellen only escaped his violence by a fever which threatened her life, by madness, produced at the sight of him: they will murder you!"

"Villain—villain!" muttered Joe; "would to heaven Master Harry were here! No matter!" he added; "Lawyer Elworthy has written to Dr. Orme—and since we have found out where the kernel is concealed, we will very soon crack the shell!"

Red Ralph, who, during the latter part of their discourse had been listening at the door, distinctly heard a heavy step carefully retreating along the passage. Walking up to Joe, whose liberality and courage had gained his confidence, he observed to him that it was time to be off.

"Off!" repeated our honest friend; "think you that I will leave the girl of my heart in such a den of infamy?"

The voice of Meeran Hafaz was now distinctly heard in the great hall, calling for lights and Colonel Mowbray. There was no time for flight. The cowboy, whose presence of mind—now that he was assured by ocular proof that the ayah was mortal like himself, for he had seen her through the window—did not desert him, at once closed the casement and shutters of the kitchen window, to hide the removal of the bars; and, pointing to a large pile of faggots, which had been brought into the place for domestic purposes, gave an illustration of his advice, by concealing himself.

It was not until he had stolen another kiss, that Joe followed his example.

"Be firm!" he said; "if any harm should threaten you, remember that I am here to defend you!"

There was a tapping at the door: collecting her self-possession as well as she was able, the agitated girl proceeded to open it. The intruder proved to be Dr. Guyot. The old man entered the kitchen, carefully drawing the bolt after him.

"You have some one concealed here?" he observed, in his usual quiet tone of voice.

"Concealed! ridiculous! who should —"

"Don't attempt to deny it!" he said, interrupting her; "I know the exact value of words! The warrenner heard voices in the kitchen: he has alarmed his employer, who is coming, with Colonel Mowbray and the servants, to search the place. Be firm!" he added; "I will preserve you!"

"You!" exclaimed the astonished Susan, who trembled for the safety of her lover far more than for her own.

"I!" repeated the old man, "strange as it may appear to you, I am your friend: do as I direct, and we shall baffle their suspicions!"

In a few moments there was a loud clamour at the door, and the voices of Meeran Hafaz and the colonel were heard, demanding admission.

"You tremble!" said the physician; "I will answer them."

With his usual calm air, he proceeded to draw the bolt, and admit the impatient intruders; then, as if their visit was a matter of the most perfect indifference to him, he walked slowly towards the table, where Susan was holding a glass tube, through which the decoction of herbs and drugs was slowly passing into a larger vessel.

"Dr. Guyot!" exclaimed his disappointed employer.

"Yes; whom did you expect to find?" replied the old man, calmly. Turning to the poor girl, whose hand trembled with terror, he added, in a tone of reproof: "if the liquid is too warm, wrap your handkerchief round the tube. Pretty laboratory for a chemist: not a still in the place!"

"Sideler informs us —"

"Pray, colonel, do not interrupt me!" observed the physician, petulantly; "the mixture is a most delicate preparation, and requires all the appliances and means of art: in a few moments I will attend to you and to your friend."

All this was uttered in so natural a tone, that it disarmed even the suspicions of Meeran. How could he suspect that the man whose only god seemed to be gold—whose avarice he had glutted with his gifts—could be brought by a poor, friendless girl to conspire against him?

"The warrenner declares he overheard voices in the room," he observed, as the man of science, satisfied that Susan had to a certain extent recovered her self-possession relinquished the task of superintending the decoction to her care.

"Not unlikely," replied the old man; "does the fool imagine that I and the girl converse by signs?"

"If I thought that you were playing us false!" exclaimed the colonel, with a threatening look.

"Bah!" interrupted Dr. Guyot; "big words cannot frighten me! My fidelity, like your honour, is a purchaseable commodity! Find me any one to pay my price, and I would sell you both with as little remorse as you would leave me to starve, if you had no further occasion for my services; but not till you have found such a one!" he added, with a sneer.

"He is right!" said the young Indian, perfectly assured that no pecuniary temptation could induce the speaker to betray him: for who possessed either the inclination or the means to pay the old man as he paid him? "It was but the jealous suspicion of yon fool!" he added, pointing to Will Sideler—who, confounded, but not convinced, sneaked out of the kitchen. "We will leave you," continued the speaker, "to your task."

"It will soon be ended," replied the man of science; "as soon as I have taken it to my patient, whose progress under my care is the best answer for my fidelity, I will descend."

The intruders, perfectly deceived by the self-possession of the doctor, left the room. As the last echo of their footsteps died in the long oaken passage, he bade Susan once more fasten the door: she did so.

"And now," he said, pointing to the pile of faggots, "you may release your friends."

Joe Beans and his companion needed no second invitation to advance from their uncomfortable position.

"Away with you!" said the old man, "before your presence is discovered, and wait for me at the corner of the lane. I shall not be long before I rejoin you: like you, my object here is to procure the release of Miss De Vere."

After the proof he had given of his good-will, it would have been more than suspicious to doubt his sincerity: so Joe and the cowboy left the house; determined, however, to return, if the singular personage failed to keep his promise.

(To be continued in our next.)

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XIX.

SCENE—Interior of Kelford Castle; CLOWN listening at the library-door.

CLOWN.

I'm sure I heard strange noises from this room, Or from the room beyond
But always are there noises in this place,
As Jeannette says, noises and startling cries,
And doors that sing and whistle on the hinge.
Yet there was something more than these just now:
Voices in passion!

[Listens again.]

There's mischief brewing in this hated castle.
Would I were out! I'm always in some scrape!
The ferrips take my legs for bringing me,
And take my mistress, too, for sending me;
'Tis always Clown, do this! or, Clown, fetch that!
Fresh orders thick as hail!—as though a Clown
Had not a soul, not even to his foot!
"Go, follow Falkner," says my lady, "Clown;"
And here I am!

[Enter JEANNETTE from side-door.]

And what's to come of it?

Could I see Jeannette now!

[Listens again.]

[JEANNETTE slaps him on the back.]

JEANNETTE.

What seek you here? Listening at people's doors—
Fine conduct, sir; sneaking in lobbies thus,
And eaves-dropping

CLOWN.

Not at doors; eaves-dropping is at windows!

JEANNETTE.

Never tell me, sir; I'm ashamed of you!

CLOWN.

Ashamed of me! 'Twas but the other day
That you were proud of me.

JEANNETTE.

What! when you saved the drowning man? ay, that
Was noble of you; this is mean.

CLOWN.

One can't find drowning people every day,
And dive and save them. Now, wouldst thou jump in,
I'd dive a mile or I would fetch thee out!

JEANNETTE.

Have done with you! A pretty fetching out!
Thou'd save a pudding sooner than Jeannette.

CLOWN.

Why thou'rt my pudding, dumpling, round and sweet,
Full of all fruits, like to a Bakewell one!
Thy lips are cherries; peaches are thy cheeks;
Thine eyes black currants; and thy nose a plum—
A white one, large and finely prominent;
Thy teeth like nuts just blanched, and fragrant white;
Honey of rose and raspberry thy breath;
Thine ears are figs!

JEANNETTE.

Figs! that for your figs!

[Boxes him.]

I'll teach you, sir, to say my ears are figs!
These ears your betters have admired, and oft.
Figs! figs, indeed! A murrain take your figs!

[Vapouring about.]

CLOWN.

I'm always in a scrape!
Gave any one to me a purse of gold,
'Twould lead me in some scrape before an hour:
What makes another's fortune ruins mine.

[Footsteps approaching.]

Here's some one coming; scrape on scrape 'twill be.
Now, Jeannette, then, I meant it all in jest!
Like figs! Like water-lilies, small and thin,
And silver fair and graceful, are thine ears!
Thou know'st I love thee! Meant thee no offence!
There's some one near, and I must not be seen.

[JEANNETTE opens the door half sulkily.]

JEANNETTE.

Figs, indeed!

[Holding the door open, and boxing CLOWN as he passes her.
That I should live to have my ears called figs!

[Exit after him.]

SCENE—Ruins of a Gothic church by moonlight; the grave-yard, stained with mossy damp, weed-grown and desolate; a low tomb in the centre, with the initials E. F., and a cross above; the corpse of Kelford leaning with the hands clasped over the tomb, the face bowed over them, a clasp-knife and cord lying beside.

Enter MIDDLEY and ADOLPHUS at the steps of the gateway.

MIDDLEY.

Thy mother was a pure, unspotted wife,
Thyself the heir of Kelford! May'st thou prove Worthier than he who now inherits it!
I've proofs substantial.

[MIDDLEY turns and sees the corpse.]

Merciful Heaven! What's that? a corpse?
Great God, that still eternal justice holds:
Thy hand is here!

Boy, bend thy knee:

Behold thy mother's grave! Pray for the soul
Of him who was thy father; for here he lies—
If there be truth in sight—a murdered man!

ADOLPHUS.

Murdered!
Oh, I saw nothing but my mother's grave!
What monster hath done this? And yet, take heart,
He may have only fainted. . . .

Dead, dead! quite dead!

Oh, what a wretch am I to find thee dead!
I prayed to see my mother's grave, and 'twas decreed
That when I saw it I should see thee dead!
My prayers have murdered thee, my dead-found father!

MIDDLEY.

Canst thou love him whose falsehood killed thy mother?

ADOLPHUS.

He is dead! All here have need of mercy,
Of pardon, of forgiveness. He is dead,
And will offend no more!

[MIDDLEY examining the foot of the grave.]

MIDDLEY.

Oh! what is this? a knife! and Falkner on it!

[As she comes forward with the knife, enter hastily Retainers and Followers of LORD Kelford, with Officers of Justice.]

OFFICER.

Seize that hag! Take heed the lad escape not!
A horrid deed, and dreadfully they'll answer it.

[As they are about to seize ADOLPHUS, he draws himself up proudly and firmly.]

ADOLPHUS.

Touch me not here! upon my mother's grave.
I will not move a limb but as you choose,
So you keep back your hands one moment, sir.

[He bends sorrowfully over the grave, kneels, and kisses it.]

OFFICER.

This is the second murder found since noon!
For 'tis more probable that poor young girl
Found some base hand to plunge her in the wave,
Than of her own accord she had found out
A stream so black, so foul, and desolate;
A place where sun did never penetrate
Since yon grey forest its first childhood knew!
There is an awful grandeur in the spot
Which had rebuked away a suicide.
Poor soul! how beautiful she looked! I wept,
She was so like a sister I had lost.
I wept, went out, and sorrowed like a child!
Well, 'tis not of my heart thou shames my face;
Yet she had parents—brothers too, perchance—
Poor souls! poor souls! it is a trying world.

FOLLOWER.

Was there no clue, then, to her parentage?

OFFICER.

Nothing; nor letter, token, ring; save one
Mysterious paper, in her bosom placed,
Written thereon, "A bridal gift to Bertha."

ADOLPHUS.

Now where ye will, I am in Heaven's hands!

MIDDLEY.

Did I not tell thee, boy, the hag was poor?
If poverty's not guilt, why looks it so?
Ha! gyves for the hag; bind hard, good Christian men,
What matters it how the old witch may suffer?

OFFICER.

Relieve her hands.

MIDDLEY.

What! twice in a day? The world grows tender, sure
[The followers bear off the corpse; ADOLPHUS follows erect, yet mournfully.]

(To be continued.)

WE often look with regret on past joys, as they depart from us, but we forget that every new day has a joy which is continually advancing to meet us.

[THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH'S RECONCILIATION WITH QUEEN MARY.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"ROBIN GOODFELLOW," "AMY LAWRENCE," ETC.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XIII.

The storm, which in its fury doth uproot
The unbending oaks, sweeps o'er the pliant reed;
So human wit doth act the subtle part,
Winning security from safety.

THREE persons were standing in one of the deep recesses formed by the projecting windows of the royal closet, in St. James's Palace, which looked out upon the park. The day was a gloomy one, the sky being charged with broken masses of dark clouds, through which at times a sickly sunbeam would penetrate, and, falling on the escutcheons of painted glass in the windows of the apartment, cast a deep stain upon the polished oaken floor.

One of the three persons was a female of short stature, and a pale, sickly countenance, which was rendered still more unlovable by the traits of pride, and a certain cold expression of the eye, indicating resolution and want of sympathy with the softer sensibilities of her sex. An open dress of purple velvet, bordered with minever, displayed an under garment of cloth of silver, made very full.

The stomacher of the wearer was embroidered with pearls, and had a cross of table diamonds and ballas rubies in the centre. Upon her head was one of those peculiar shaped velvet toques, brought to a peak in the centre of the forehead, from which peak a very large pearl was pendent.

There are few of our readers but, from the description, will recognise Mary Tudor, the first Queen Regnant of England.

One of the companions of her majesty was a tall, harsh-featured man, in the prime of life, whose purple soutan and rochet bordered with deep lace, as well as the chain and pastoral cross, which he rather ostentatiously wore over his pelerine, indicated his rank as a bishop in the Catholic church. It was the notorious Gardiner.

The second person was that no less remarkable man Renaud, the emperor's ambassador to the court of England. His costume was a plain suit of black, slashed, after the fashion of the times, with purple silk. The only ornament upon his person was a chain of gold, enamelled black and red, from which was suspended the order of the Golden Fleece.

There was an earnestness in the manner of all three, which indicated that the subject of their conversation was an interesting one. The words of the queen came slowly, as if she paused to weigh each syllable that fell from her thin lips. Both the ambassador and the prelate spoke in low, deep tones, as if they feared to wake the echoes of the vast apartment in which they were standing.

"You urge me too far, my lord!" observed the queen, addressing Gardiner; "if the conduct of Elizabeth has not been all that I could wish, during the late affairs, it has at least been blameless."

"Legally blameless, I admit," answered the bishop.

"And prudent," added Renaud; "prudent beyond her years; the Lady Elizabeth knew that her position in the state depended upon your majesty's, and wisely preferred being the sister, to the cousin of the queen: had her name been instituted for the Lady Jane's, in your feeble brother Edward's will, it might have been different."

"We must not examine motives too curiously, my lord ambassador," interrupted Mary, with a slight gesture of impatience. "He who framed the heart alone can read it. I neither can nor will punish my sister for what her conduct might have been!"

"Your majesty is too tender of this same tie of blood between yourself and the daughter of Anne Boleyn—the crowned harlot whose advancement to the throne caused your sainted mother's misery and death!"

The countenance of the queen became deeply flushed, and then deadly pale. Through life she cherished a tender reverence for her mother's memory, and in more than one instance, as in Cranmer's, fearfully visited her wrongs upon those who assisted in her downfall and degradation.

"Ne nos inducas in tentationem!" she murmured, at the same time placing her hand upon her heart, as if to restrain its impulse.

"Is it not said," continued the prelate, "that the crime of the parent shall be visited upon the children?"

"We both share it, my lord," exclaimed Mary, with gloomy earnestness, "since we are equally the daughters of Henry VIII. Until Elizabeth by some rash act offends the law, she shall suffer no injustice at my hands. If I cannot love her," she added, "I will treat her as if I did: she shall not have a plausible pretext for disloyalty in the harshness of her sister and her sovereign!"

"Could your highness be assured of the loyalty of the Lady Elizabeth," observed the Spaniard, speaking in his usual cold and measured tone, "the resolution you have formed might perhaps be right—if, indeed, it be ever right to tamper with a principle; but I fear that it will fail your majesty when you least expect it."

"And when it does," replied Mary Tudor, "I have the Tower and the headsman at my service: woe to the hand which lays a finger on my crown!"

A glance of mutual intelligence passed between the statesman and the priest, but not so rapidly that the queen did not observe it.

"You smile, my lords!" she continued; "I am aware that my poor wit is little shield to contend against your learning: therefore I take shelter in that which is stronger than either my judgment or your wisdom—my will!" she added, proudly; "which you will find as difficult to bend as break!"

"Heaven forbid, madam," exclaimed Gardiner, bowing obsequiously, "that your faithful servant should attempt either! If I interpret rightly the glance of my lord ambassador, he was trying, like myself, to reconcile your gracious declaration with the fact that the Lady Jane Grey—the nine days' queen, as men have learned to call her—still lives: not only hath her hand been placed upon your royal crown, but her impious head hath worn it!"

"And though the weight hath crushed her," added the ambassador, "her crime was none the less."

"Perhaps my lords, it was her misfortune!" observed Mary. It is too soon to stain the annals of my reign with blood. When parliament has restored the ancient faith—reversed the act which declares the marriage of our sainted mother illegal—and the crown hath solemnly been placed upon our brow, it will be time to think of the Lady Jane. Till then, let her rest. The shadow of my hand is already over her. Am I not right, my lords?" she added, with one of her cold smiles—for she both saw and felt flattered by the look of surprised approbation with which the two statesmen had listened to the exposé of the motives of her seeming forbearance.

"So right," answered the astute ambassador of Spain, "that even my experience stands abashed. Whilst the heretical parties—which I regret to say are numerous, both in the Peers and Commons—are in doubt as to your royal intentions toward the traitorous house of Suffolk, they will be pliant to your gracious will, and pass what measures you desire."

"And the act," added Gardiner, "which declares the marriage of Henry and Catherine of Arragon lawful, annuls, by implication, his adulterous union with Anne Boleyn."

"And consequently renders her issue illegitimate," said Renaud; "making her for the future dependent on the will of her sovereign and sister."

The Earl of Arundel, one of Mary's ministers—who, being, like herself, a strict Catholic, enjoyed a large portion of her confidence—entered the royal closet. He appears to have been a clear-sighted, honourable man, and on more than one occasion defended the Princess Elizabeth from her enemies. He came to announce to her majesty that Elizabeth had arrived at the palace, and earnestly implored to be admitted to the honour of an audience.

Mary hesitated, and appeared for awhile irresolute.

"Had not her grace," suggested Gardiner—who feared the effect of her presence and eloquence—better communicate with your majesty through one of the council?"

"Or by letter?" added Renaud.

The queen looked at the Earl of Arundel, as if to ask his advice.

"The Lady Elizabeth," he said, "is your majesty's sister."

"True," replied Mary; "and her treatment shall be such as fits the nearness of our blood. Admit the Lady Elizabeth to our presence. You can retire, my lords," she added. "Heaven knows what motive has brought our sister to our presence: in charity, we will hope it is a good one. Your presence may be taken in token of mistrust: it is fit she feels that we neither mistrust nor fear her. You can remain," she added, "in the council-chamber: it is possible we may require your advice and service; Arundel alone will remain."

Neither Gardiner nor Renaud could conceal their mortification. The latter, who was urging Mary to accept the hand of his future sovereign, Philip of Spain, felt jealous of the favour shown to the English earl, whose loyalty was opposed to the match, which he foresaw would destroy the popularity of the new sovereign. The wily Gardiner felt equally annoyed at the preference; but neither ventured to dispute it, for the queen had inherited much of her father's temper, and little brooked opposition to her will. She was every inch a Tudor.

As soon as they were alone in the council-chamber, which was connected with the royal closet, where they had left Mary and Arundel, Gardiner threw himself, with an air of impatience, into the chair usually occupied by the queen. His companion secretly smiled at the choice he had made: it indicated alike the mind and ambition of the man, who evidently aimed at directing the affairs of the kingdom, and governing it indirectly, by working on the superstition and bigotry of the new sovereign.

"What think you of this interview?" he said.

"That it bodes mischief!" replied the wily priest. "Mary, like most women, is impressionable, and listens to the dictates of her heart oftener than those of her head. Fortunately for the good cause, Catholicity is a sentiment as well as a conviction with her: her will will ever bear every obstacle opposed to her faith."

"Where, then, lies the danger?" demanded Renaud, with a look of surprise.

"Elizabeth may conform!" drily answered the bishop.

"And what danger can you perceive in that?"

"The deceit," continued Gardiner—"the policy of the reed, that bends to the storm, which else would crush it. The blood of the accused Boleyn cannot remain otherwise than Protestant. In conforming to the true Church, Elizabeth would acknowledge the illegality of her mother's marriage, and her own illegitimacy. Still, she may seemingly conform, and, by her condescension, gain time: and time with her is everything."

Renaud shrugged his shoulders: he began to fear that the cause of Catholicity was a losing one; for he knew the temper and disposition of the queen too well to suppose that she would consent to the death of Elizabeth, unless clearly and openly justified by some act of treason on the part of her sister—an excuse which that prudent princess was not likely to afford her.

"Is it possible, my lord," he said, "that you, the champion of the Church, despair?"

"The Church never despairs, my lord!" replied the prelate; "The word is erased from her vocabulary. Its hopes, like its designs, are immutable. Were this country to remain plunged in its heresy for a thousand years, Rome would still pursue the object of its conversion as at first. Its action may be modified by time, the changes wrought on the minds and opinions of mankind—its purpose, never. It is as firm and unchangeable," he added, "as the rock on which its faith is built!"

"Would that the queen were married!" exclaimed Renaud, willing to sound the views of the speaker; "the birth of a Catholic heir to the crown would end these doubts, and fix the faith of England for the future!"

A slight shade passed over the countenance of Gardiner: probably he had reason to suspect that Mary would never be a mother—an opinion not unlikely to be formed by a calculating mind, when her age and health were taken into consideration—although he was far too prudent to give utterance to such a supposition.

"I am not of your way of thinking, my lord bishop," continued the ambassador, after a pause; for, finding that Gardiner made no answer to his previous observation, he resumed the subject. "Even the Lady Elizabeth's pretended conversion will not save her—the Protestants will perfectly understand that her will has been forced. The death of the Lady Jane, which is merely a question of time, will make her their only hope. Intrigues, and perhaps insurrections," he added, "will take place, in which her name must be compromised!"

"That," observed Gardiner, with a sigh, "is not so clear, my lord: her prudence puzzles even me; for she hath directed her vessel through storms which might have wrecked a more experienced pilot. She will reach the port," he added, bitterly, "unless, indeed, some bold and desperate hand should wrest the rudder from her grasp!"

Probably the attempt which the speaker afterwards made upon the life of Elizabeth, by sending an order for her execution in the Tower, during the illness of her sister, was dimly shadowed forth in his mind.

CHAPTER XIV.

And I must brook this shame! Blister my tongue
With hollow words; pledging my heart and sense
To that which heart and sense alike reject;
Give truth the lie, nor blush in mine own shame!

HEIR OF THE SEPT.

WHEN Elizabeth entered the royal closet, she found her sister seated, the Earl of Arundel standing at a respectful distance at the back of her chair. The queen neither rose nor extended her hand to welcome the Protestant daughter of Anne Boleyn, for her mind was filled with dark doubts and suspicions concerning her. The insidious words of Gardiner and the ambassador of Spain, if they had not shaken her resolution to act justly, had at least predisposed her to judge unfavourably. The non-conformity of the princess threatened to prove a serious obstacle to the re-establishing of the ancient faith—the purpose nearest her heart; by more than one of her counsellors it was branded as disaffection. No wonder, then, considering her naturally jealous nature, that Mary received her sister coldly.

"Alas!" said Elizabeth, sinking on her knees at a short distance from the chair of state upon which her sister was seated; "it is true!—too true!"

Sobs and tears, either natural or assumed, appeared to choke her utterance, and she remained kneeling and wringing her hands in silence.

"What is true?" demanded the queen, in a tone of surprise, for she could not comprehend the cause of Elizabeth's grief.

"That your majesty no longer retains for me the affection of a sister!" replied the princess, passionately; "and yet I have done nothing to forfeit your good opinion!"

At the words "affection" and "sister," Mary's lips contracted with a slight spasmodic action; for, although she respected the tie, it was hateful to her.

"The sister who really loved me," replied Mary, sarcastically, "would have neither interests nor affections apart from mine—would not lend her influence to the support of a traitorous faction—enemies alike of heaven and the throne! But I will crush them!" she added, with an air of terrible determination. "I will rear again the altar and the cross, though I raise a scaffold at every step I take!"

"I am no traitor!" exclaimed Elizabeth, with proud humility. "I am a poor, weak girl, and can only defend your majesty's throne by prayers! Ask of my accusers, I entreat you—ask of them to prove one treasonous act or thought against me!"

"Prove!" repeated Mary, harshly; "dost think if they were proved, thou wouldst be standing in our presence? Were the crimes whereof you are suspected proven, thy place would be the Tower, girl, and thy confessor the headsman—even were the heretics and traitors who look forward to your name as their rallying cry, in arms around our palace!"

"Alas, madam!" said Elizabeth, in a more humble tone—for she saw that the danger in which she stood was imminent; "it seems that my religion is the cause of my offence, my crime, and punishment! Be just! Am I to blame in that? Were I the deceitful, treacherous thing mine enemies infer, I should abandon it without a word to regain the good opinion of your majesty, which is dearer to me than my life! Alas!" she added, "I have never been instructed in any other!"

"That were an evil easily remedied, were it the only evil," observed the queen, in a more conciliatory tone; for she thought that she perceived in the words of her sister the first symptoms of the concession she so earnestly desired to obtain. "There are learned prelates and doctors of the church who would speedily disabuse your mind of its dark and fearful errors, were it really bent on seeking the truth."

"It is bent upon it!" replied the princess, making a violent effort to overcome the repugnance she felt at the humiliation she was compelled by policy to submit to. "Let them show me the error of my faith, and readily—most readily—will I abandon it! Let me have the books," she added, "written by the defenders of Catholicity in support of their creed, in opposition to the Protestant works—the only ones I have yet read—they may, perchance, induce me to adopt other views and sentiments than those I know profess."

"Is this sincere?" demanded Mary, fixing her eyes upon her with a searching glance; for she was naturally of a suspicious nature, and, in her estimate of human actions, inclined to judge them from their worst motives.

Elizabeth endured the scrutiny unmoved: the danger in which she stood, and the reversion of the crown—which, from the hour of her sister's accession, she never, even in a prison, or when menaced with the scaffold, lost sight of—armed her with a prudence and command of countenance beyond her years.

"Let the manner of my proceeding," she replied, "convince your majesty that it is so. Were I the thing you judge me, I should at once abjure the faith in which I have been reared; but what confidence could be placed in such an act? Even you," she added, "would despise me for it, and those of my own church say that it was forced upon me! No," she continued, "let me have some learned man to instruct me in these mysteries. I promise to be diligent and docile—my studies will be the more earnestly pursued, in the hope that the issue may restore me to the affection of my sovereign and my sister."

"The Lady Elizabeth speaks wisely and discreetly!" whispered the Earl of Arundel in the ear of the queen.

"And sincerely, think you?" demanded Mary, in the same under-tone.

"By my faith and my allegiance, madam," said the earl, "I do believe it: her enemies have made this question, in my poor judgment, of more importance than it really is. Your majesty's marriage," he added, "by giving us a direct heir to the throne, will, I trust, speedily end these cabals, surmises, and suspicions!"

The queen, knowing that the speaker was strictly Catholic, and pleased at the allusion to her marriage and its consequence, received the offers of Elizabeth in a conciliatory spirit; the frown gradually disappeared from her brow, and she extended her hand to the princess, who kissed it humbly, and with such apparent thankfulness, that even her sister began to think she had been too hasty in her judgment.

Perhaps the consciousness of the instinctive dislike she entertained towards the daughter of Anne Boleyn assisted her in arriving at the conclusion.

"Your wish shall be granted," she said. "We will appoint one of the most learned fathers of the church to reason with you upon this subject—to explain your doubts and difficulties; nor shall our unworthy prayers," she added, "be wanting for his success. My lord," she continued, turning to the Earl of Arundel, "inform my lord bishop and the ambassador of Spain that we require their presence—they must witness and rejoice in our reconciliation with our sister!"

The statesman left the royal closet with reluctance: he resolved to delay his errand as long as he conveniently could, in order to give Elizabeth time to confirm the favourable impression she had made upon her sister—an impression which both Gardiner and the ambassador, he well knew, would do their best to weaken—for they were the unrelenting enemies of the princess.

No sooner were they alone, than Mary rose from her chair of state, and, taking her sister by the hand, kissed her on the cheek.

"Elizabeth," she said, "I judge actions, and not words: the first display, the second but too often belie the heart! Deal sincerely with me; never forget that I am your sovereign—still less that I am your sister: do this, and the machinations of your enemies will prove powerless to hurt you!"

The princess professed—what probably at that moment she felt—the warmest gratitude for the kind words and generous conduct of the speaker.

"More," continued the queen, with a pause, and speaking very slowly, as if every word she uttered cost her a painful effort; "I will not only bury the memory of my mother's wrongs and sorrows, but treat and try to love you like a sister; and the act," she added, "which parliament is about to pass, declaring the marriage of our father and Catherine of Arragon valid, shall leave the settlement of the crown untouched. No matter who may advise or urge the contrary, I pledge my royal word to this."

Deep as the humiliation was, Elizabeth received it without a word of remonstrance: she knew that Mary held, and not unnaturally, perhaps, that it was a sacred duty to her mother's memory to declare her marriage with Henry legal. At any rate, she felt that it would be useless to oppose it, and wisely held her peace.

Mortifying as it was to her pride, Mary conceded one great point in her favour: the law which declared Elizabeth heiress to the crown, in the event of her own death without issue, was unrepealed. It was in virtue of this law that the daughter of Anne Boleyn ultimately succeeded to the throne. It has been remarked by many writers, that both before and after she became queen, her mother's name was a sealed subject with her. Certain it is, that when firmly established, the idol of the nation, and a pliant parliament at her command, she never took the least step to vindicate her mother's memory, or mooted the subject of the legality of her marriage: a circumstance from which unfavourable inferences have been drawn of the character of Anne Boleyn.

"You are welcome my lords!" said Mary, as the Earl of Arundel returned to the royal closet, accompanied by Gardiner and the ambassador of Spain. "Our sister hath given us such tokens of her royalty and right good will, that we are well contented with them, and have restored her to her place in our affection and favour."

The three statesmen expressed their gratification at the harmony thus happily restored; but Elizabeth was not deceived by their hypocritical professions. Two of them she knew to be her enemies, in the deadliest sense of the word—since there was no measure they would pause at to compass her destruction. Of the third—the Earl of Arundel—she was as yet in doubt.

"My lord bishop," added the queen, "you will select from the most learned doctors of the church, one most suited to instruct the Lady Elizabeth in the dogmas of our holy faith, and disabuse her mind of those pernicious errors in which, unhappily, it hath been trained."

"Is such also her grace's wish?" demanded the prelate, casting a satirical glance at the princess—whom, if he could not injure, he resolved to let no occasion pass to humiliate.

"It is!" replied Elizabeth, scornfully. "I should have thought that the word of her majesty needed not confirming by my lips!"

The mortified prelate bowed, to hide his confusion.

"A happy day for England!" exclaimed the Earl of Arundel, whose honourable nature really rejoiced at the reconciliation between his sovereign and her sister.

"And herself!" added Renaud, in an under-tone, but not so low that Gardiner, who was standing next him, could not hear it.

Once more saluting the princess, Mary commanded the three noblemen to attend her to her litter. As they were leaving the royal closet, Gardiner returned, and, approaching the chair on which Mary had resumed her seat, asked how the Lady Elizabeth—for he studiously avoided styling her princess—was to be treated.

"Treated!" repeated Mary. "I do not understand you!"

"I mean, your majesty, by the palace guard, which is drawn up in the courtyard—doubtless by the officious zeal of some one of her partisans!"

The queen approached the window. A frown passed over her pale countenance, as she saw the men drawn up. Fortunately her glance rested on the dial of the old clock-tower, and she remembered that it was the hour for relieving them—consequently the malice of the speaker was defeated.

Turning her back to him, she answered hastily: "Treat her with the honours due to the heiress of the crown, and your sovereign's sister!"

With a bitter scowl, the prelate left the room.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, &c.

ADULTERATION OF LARD.—A communication has been received by the Pharmaceutical Society, on the above subject, from Mr. Whipple, in which he states that for some time past he has had reason to suspect the purity of commercial lard, and had recently made a few experiments, which led to the detection of large quantities of some lardaceous substance in it. In a quantity weighing 105½ lbs. he found as much as 22½ lbs. of this foreign matter; and in another lot, weighing 43½ lbs., he found 12½ lbs. of a similar substance. Mr. Whipple points out the pernicious effects which this adulteration would be likely to produce in the employment of such lards for some pharmaceutical purposes, and the danger which might ensue from its application to machinery. In another communication from Mr. Calvert, of Manchester, that gentleman confirms Mr. Whipple's statement, and informs us, in addition, that the American lard analysed by him contained from 10 to 12 per cent. of water, 2 to 3 per cent. of alum, and about 1 per cent. of quicklime. The quantity of alum, it is supposed, is added by the manufacturer for the purpose of communicating to the lard the property of facilitating the raising, and increasing the whiteness, of the confectioners' paste, in which it is largely employed.

TAX ON CLEANLINESS.—Mr. Erasmus Wilson has just printed, though not, we believe, published, a little pamphlet on soap, the facts contained in which are well worth the attention of the public. He has long been well known for his exertions in the cause of sanitary reform, and for the promotion of public health; and he is perfectly right in saying that the reduction or removal of the duty on soap would be an incalculable benefit to the community. It is found by inquiry that the people of Jersey consume soap at the rate of thirteen pounds a head per annum; while in England it is only seven pounds a head—a little more than half. Now, as the use of these articles is in proportion to their cheapness, the quantity of soap used would probably be doubled if the duty were removed, and very greatly increased if it were reduced. The tax at present amounts to a million sterling, and, if it were at once lowered to half a million, it would increase, in the course of one year, to between six and seven hundred thousand pounds, and shortly rise to what it is now. The duty is fourteen guineas a ton, and presses, as usual, hardest on the poorer classes: being 100 per cent. on the cheaper kinds of soap, 50 per cent. on the middling, and only 16 per cent. on the finer sorts.

SHIP-BUILDING.

DARIES DAVIDSON, a celebrated naval architect of Boston, proposes to construct an immense steamer, 700 feet in length. She is to be driven by sixteen separate engines, having a total of 5000-horse power, and the average speed of twenty-five miles per hour, and to have berths and state-rooms for 3000 passengers! These figures seem large ones, but we are travelling towards their realisation. Three thousand passengers is a great number to be on board a single ocean steam-ship, but one-half that number have, if we mistake not, already been carried on a single trip by some of the California steamers. Seven hundred feet is a great length for a sea-going vessel now; but not nearly so great as half that length would have been considered fifteen years ago. The 350 feet we have—the 700 feet may yet have.

Where are the passengers to come from? say the doubting. Put the passage at £4 to £5, and you will see. If 250 per week offer themselves at £25, it is not unreasonable to expect 500 at £15, or 1000 at £10, or 3000 at £5; and when the figures are made, the "Leviathan" will carry the palm by odds, both of profit to the owners and comfort to the passengers. All that prevents the experiment is the fear that passengers and freight will not offer, because the people cannot be made to believe that such a vessel would be safe. There are merchants and moneyed men, who are personal believers in the project, but they want confidence that they will be sustained in the undertaking.

It is worthy of notice, that the largest ocean steam-ships now plying on the Atlantic bear precisely the same proportion in length, breadth, and depth, as is recorded to have existed in Noah's Ark. The dimensions of the Atlantic steamers are: length, 233 feet; breadth of beam, 50 feet; depth, 51 feet. The dimensions of the ark were: length, 300 cubits; breadth, 50 cubits; depth, 30 cubits. It will be seen, therefore, that the Ark was nearly twice the size in length and breadth of these vessels, the cubit being 22 inches. Both had upper, lower, and middle stories.

After all the improvements of forty-two centuries, which have elapsed since the Deluge, the ship-builders have to return to the model afforded by Noah's Ark.

THE REAPING MACHINE INVENTED BY A NATIONAL SCHOOLMASTER.

THE reaping machine is justly considered to be the most important piece of farming machinery that has been invented since the thrashing machine took the place of the flail. The invention of this valuable machine has been ascribed to the Americans, in consequence, no doubt, of the celebrated reaping machine having been presented to the British public in the American department of the Great Exhibition; but the invention, as we purpose to show, is really due to an English schoolmaster of the name of Ogle.

When Mr. Ogle was a national schoolmaster at Newham, near Alnwick, in 1803, the construction of a reaping machine was occupying his thoughts. Mr. Common, then a young man about twenty-four years of age, was setting up a thrashing machine at Fleetham, and, being well known for his mechanical skill, was sent for by Ogle, and their common consultations originated a reaping machine—Ogle making a model of one in 1803; and Common, in 1810, constructed a machine which was tried in a field near Denwick, and afterwards at Broomhouse, and cut very well. The corn, in Mr. Common's machine, was received in a sheet immediately behind the clippers, and, by means of a roller, carried to the back part of the machine, and laid into even sheaves on the ground. There was also a provision, by means of a sort of comb, to raise the fallen corn before it was cut—an advantage which none of the reaping machines now in use seem to possess.

Ogle made another model of his machine in 1822, which he presented to Brown and Son, the proprietors of the foundry at Alnwick, who made a better model in iron. Number 116 of the "Mechanics' Magazine," for November 1825, contains a drawing, description, and brief history of the attempt then made to bring it before the public notice. "They presented it," says Mr. Ogle in his letter to the editor, "to the public, many market days at Alnwick, thinking to carry it into execution by subscription, but they were disappointed—the farmers considered it an impossibility. The Browns then made the machine at their own expense, and tried it first near Alnwick; it did not, however, altogether answer: the teeth of the frame where the knife cuts upon were too long, and collected the dirt upon the corn too much. They made the teeth shorter, and tried it again at a place called South Side, near Warkworth, in a field of wheat. It then cut to great perfection; but still, not laying the corn into sheaves, the farmer did not think it lessened the expense much. Mr. Brown took it home again, and added the part for collecting the corn into a sheaf; when he tried it again at Alnwick in a field of barley, which it cut and laid out in sheaves extremely well. Messrs. Brown then advertised, at the beginning of the year 1823, that they would furnish machines of this sort, complete for shearing corn, at the beginning of harvest, but found that none of the farmers would go to the expense, though the machine was seen even to cut the lying corn, where it was not bound down with new rising green corn. Some working people at last threatened to kill Mr. Brown, if he persevered any farther in it, and it has never been more tried. It was estimated from what was tried, that it would cut, at that rate, fourteen acres a day."

The Browns not very long after emigrated to America, taking the model of Ogle's reaping machine with them; and it is asserted, on trustworthy evidence, that the American reaper was constructed from this model, or a copy of it; and after a lapse of a quarter of a century, it reappeared in the land of its original invention, in the American department of the Great Exhibition, to attract the notice of the English agriculturist, enrich the patentee, and confer a great and lasting benefit on the community.

The concluding part of Mr. Ogle's simple narrative is highly significant, when we contrast the enlightened notions now prevalent amongst us with the discouragements which mechanical ingenuity then met with, and the ignorance and prejudice which frustrated the efforts and crushed the hopes of the original inventors and improvers of the reaping machine, and which indeed, not long after, broke out into lawless acts of open destruction.

And what became of the inventor? He died as he had lived—in comparative neglect and poverty. Poor Ogle! your fate was hard; unfriended by the wealthy and the great, and even despised as a visionary by the labouring classes, you still toiled on to promote the well-being of society; and now when you are gone, strangers have stepped in to gather the fruit of that invention which comprised the history of your thoughts, feelings, and dreams of happiness. Poor Ogle! often have I stood at the door of your little cottage and heard you talk, in your own quiet, reflective way, of the advantages of machinery, and of a coming day when creative minds would be duly appreciated, and when the elementary schoolmaster would hold that rank in society to which his talents and usefulness justly entitle him.

THE QUEEN'S DREAM;

A SEQUEL TO "UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."

SCENE—The emerald drawing-room in a Palace of Freeland, the walls adorned with portraits of the philanthropists of all nations; also, with two remarkable paintings: one showing Howard, the illustrious prison reformer, administering consolation to the tenants of a loathsome dungeon; the other, representing JOHN POUND, a humble cobbler, in his habit when he lived, seated on a three-legged stool, teaching little ragged boys and girls to read, so that they might better find their way to their Heavenly Father. PRESENT—The Queen of Freeland, surrounded by the Ladies of her Court, weeping and sobbing.

FIRST LADY, who has just finished reading a novel, called "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Can such things be, and overcome us like a summer's dream?

SECOND LADY.

It almost surpasses belief!

THIRD LADY.

That monster, Legree!

FOURTH LADY.

That sainted martyr, Tom!

FIFTH LADY, hysterically.

That darling Eva!

QUEEN (who is young and beautiful, and has a very silvery voice.)

Such scenes of life are horrible! I would not be monarch of that realm in its present state for all the glory of the undisputed sovereignty of the universe!

SIXTH LADY, old, and supposed to be light-headed.

May not the description have been over-coloured?

QUEEN, sadly.

I fear not. My archbishops, bishops, ministers of state, and privy councillors, all concur in stating, that negro slavery is one of the great sins of the western world. But I never knew before that its features were so utterly repulsive. I wish, my dear duchess, I had never asked you to read the book.

FIRST LADY.

Rather rejoice, your majesty: since the information you have obtained will enable you to protest against the iniquity.

QUEEN.

No; I am queen only in my own realm! And if I were to protest, or even implore, the appeal would be useless. The intercommunication between states is founded on expediency, not sound moral principle.

SECOND LADY.

Suppose the ladies of your court and empire were to send a pathetic address on the subject to the ladies of the west. I have heard that woman's voice, when raised in the cause of humanity, rarely falls unheeded on the ears of even the sternest of the opposite sex; and surely our sisters will not refuse us a patient hearing.

FIRST LADY.

I cordially approve of the scheme, and intended to have suggested it to your majesty myself.

LADIES, in zephyry chorus.

So do all of us!

QUEEN.

Do as you like—you have my permission! But be loving and kind in your language; for if our land be the blessed abode of liberty and happiness, we should not forget that the lands in which the negro is held captive have not had, like us, the advantage of the experience of a thousand years of monarchical and Christian rule.

[Exeunt Ladies, in agitation.]

THE QUEEN, taking up "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Morning, noon, and night, I am thankful that the air of Freeland is too pure for a slave. If I thought there was one in my dominions, I would tear the jewels from my crown to buy his ransom. But there is not: it is only in the land of the West that liberty is profaned by traffic in the life that only God can give, and only God should use and take.

With this queenly reflection her majesty began to read, until at length, overpowered by the emotions the contents of the book had excited, she fell into such a deep study that the shadows of this world gathered around her lovely head, and gently closed her cerulean eyes. Her cheek fell into the hollow of her lily hand, and, resting on her elbow, buried in the cushions by her side, she slept. While slumbering, strange sights, stupendous doings, awful revelations, crowded upon her soul.

THE DREAM.

"The air of Freeland is too pure for a slave!" thought she, as, seated on her burnished throne, she gazed around her in all the swelling pride and consciousness of angust superiority.

"Queen, behold thy people!" sounded a sonorous voice in her ear.

Her large blue eyes opened as by enchantment, and, looking round her, she beheld a glittering throng of familiar faces. The proudest and most beautiful of the land swept before her in gorgeous array. Costly jewels blazed on alabaster arms, while diamonds flashed glory across brows of marble, and shed splendour on necks majestic in their haughty curvature. Contempt of all things low or little darted from the eyes of this moving mass. Their every gesture betrayed an innate sense of power, and exultation over the tradition of an ancestry unsullied by poverty. They were of the race

Of the lofty brow, th' imperial eye,
The patrician lip, that feeds on scorn.

The scene changed to one of gold. It was all gold. The gold was here, the gold was there, the gold was everywhere. The splashing, rolling, tumbling, jingling, and ringing of gold were terrific. Whichever way the eye turned was gold. The human beings themselves seemed gold. One, overgorged, parted in twain, and behold! his heart was crusted over with gold.

Rows of shops and piles of warehouses next crowded upon her view. They were the hives of the riches of the world. The produce of every clime, ennobled into usefulness by human labour and inventive genius, were here to be had for money. The great globe itself had been ransacked to furnish them. And their owners looked plump and comfortable. And well they might, for they were driving a roaring trade; had snug investments in stocks, railways, and mines; and, at eventide, were whirled down to pretty Gothic cottages, overlooking

Meadows trim, with daisies pied, or

Shallow brooks and rivers wide.

"These are the middle classes, who claim to hold the balance of power between the higher and the lower!" whispered the voice in her majesty's ear. "They are the strength and glory of your nation, for they are the most industrious, the most moral, the most intellectual of the population!"

The monarch felt pleased: a smile lit up her expressive countenance—but only for an instant; for, as

Coming events cast their shadows before, the radiance fled, and in the darkness she timidly asked:

"Where are the people? Where are the masses, from whose bosom I draw my soldiers, my seamen, my artificers, my labourers?"

Quicker than a flash of lightning, they crowded upon her regal vision. Scores, torn to ribbons, lay scattered in railway tunnels, where they had fallen victims to human cupidity. A hundred, suddenly borne from their quiet beds by an avalanche of water, were hurried into eternity, by human negligence. Sixties in one place, seventies in another, and dozens all over the country, the helpless victims of a remorseless element, lay in charred and blackened heaps, as sacrifices to human comfort, convenience, and glory. They had perished, deep in the bowels of the earth, while hewing riches out of grim chambers for the advancement of mankind at large. They had warmed the hearths of millions—fed the engine that works the factory, ploughs the main, and heaps up a magnificence which

Not Babylon,
Nor great Alcairo, equalled, in all
Their glories.

And they died unmourned—scarcely remembered—by their accident-hardened kith and kin. While their requiem is sung in a casual paragraph, their elegy is written in a later and more appalling catastrophe, and so they are forgotten. No

Ardennes waves above them her green leaves,
Dewy with Nature's tear-drops;

although they died in a nobler cause than any that ever marshalled armies in Battle's magnificently stern array.

Their remains,

In one black burial blent, are consigned to oblivion; and the only harps that hymn their praise are steam-pipes, hissing and shrieking over land and sea.

The vision, as it deepened in horror, exposed the bottom of the sea, strewn with thousands upon thousands of corpses of true-hearted sailors. There they lay, in their fathomless grave, pale, mute evidence of the peril to be encountered in the pursuit of that commerce which covers the seas with ships, and brings the nations of the earth together. The ocean heaves hugely around them, exulting in its prey; while the millions who are clustered on the land little think that the cotton and silk they wear has cost the life of many a gallant seaman.

Her majesty being Queen of the Main, shed bitter tears at this sad spectacle, and, turning her eyes to the broad expanse of ocean spread out before her gaze, saw it dotted with vessels, whose white sails glistened in the noonday sun.

The decks were crowded with human beings—men, women, and children—who had dared the perils of the storm, the sharp edges of unseen rocks, the lightning's blast, and the uncertain chances of fortune in a distant clime, in search of the daily bread they could not obtain in their own "dear native land."

"Those are emigrants from your dominions," whispered the voice in her ear; "three hundred thousand of them annually leave your shores to enrich that great continent, now darkened by that slavery which your majesty so grievously laments, but which at no distant day will control the destinies of the world. What Freeland discards as a surplus, it receives with the open arms of affection."

"The spectacle saddens me," said the queen, "for I can read sorrow, deeply blended with hope, on the countenances of that ocean-bound multitude. The sacrifice of country, home, and friends, is not half redeemed by the prospect of a brighter future. Their hearts yearn after the ties they have left behind them, perhaps for ever. There is the husband thinking of his wife and little ones, the lover of his sweetheart, the maiden of her numberless sweet associations, and the lone man, with the ivy-shadow creeping into every cell of his heart, is covertly wiping away the tear shed over the only thing in life left him to love—his country. Sad—oh, frightfully sad—must be the necessity that drives so many true hearts away from my empire! Hark! the strains of music are wafted to my ears! They come on the sigh-laden air like a requiem for the banished living. It is and I see the decks are wet with tears, and that hearts are throbbing that never wished to throb again!"

Home, home, sweet home

One vessel in that mournful fleet filled her majesty with vague but shuddering apprehension. She saw the clouds over its track in the distance had no silver lining. And as her eye pierced the dim vault of time, she read its destiny.

The moon hath twelve times changed her form,

From glowing orb to crescent wan,

'Mid skies of calm and scowl of storm,

Since from her port that ship hath gone

But ocean keeps its secret well;

And though we know that all is o'er,

No eye hath seen—no tongue can tell

Her fate:—she ne'er was heard of more!

Oh! were her tale of sorrow known,

'Twere something to the broken heart:

The pangs of doubt would then be gone—

And fancy's endless dreams depart!

It may not be:—there is no ray

By which her doom we may explore;

We only know she sail'd away,

And ne'er was seen nor heard of more.

Such was the grief-song of friends left behind, but to the queenly gaze the veil of darkness was uplifted. Her majesty saw the doomed emigrant ship, two months out of sight of land, and her hold was hot and vapoury. The shelf-like couches were occupied by the raving sick, and

In the dead waist and middle of the night, a shriek from a fair young girl tells all the ship that her shame will never smile in her face again. It has gone, and in the morning it is cast into the sea, to be food for the sharks. Another week out, and the mother is tossed overboard—more food for the sharks; and now the ship is swathed up in red, and from her depths ascend the wails of pain and the maddening cries of delirium—more food for the sharks. No water on board, but abundance of fever. The bread mouldy, the beef and mutton putrid—more food for the sharks—and the mate hoarse with reading the burial service. A black cloud gathers in the horizon, and the vessel plunges sheer over a gigantic wave.

A storm!

"Make all snug aloft! On with the hatches! Let her drive before it!" shouts the captain.

And, as the wind howls and the lightning glares—

"Five feet of water in the hold!" whispers the carpenter.

"All hands to the pumps!" and the men passengers labour and sweat for beings dearer to them than life, until the flesh drops from their hands, and their hair whitens like the house-tops on a moonless winter's night. The long-drawn cry of the agony of helpless women and children suffocating below, rises above the storm, and as the whirling clouds and rolling sea blend their wrath, the wind and waves become wilder and wilder, madder and madder. One shout—one tremendous explosion of horror, shoots up to the starless firmament, and the emigrant ship has plunged, bows foremost, into the dark, deep, raging sea.

"Where are my people?" shrieked the queen, horror-struck and appalled.

"Queen!" whispered the genius at her side, "you shall see them, and in a guise in which subjects were never yet presented to a monarch; but, to nerve your woman's courage for the presentation, let me tell you that although the world we live in has its bright and glorious aspects—although kindly feelings, pure desires, and holy passions march with us to our destiny, and heaven's gracious sunshine falls on all alike—there are those among us with bruised hearts, blighted hopes, and perverted instincts, whose way of life is either a curse or a crime. The stately buildings, the pomp and insignia of wealth, the regal magnificence of power, the landscapes glittering in their almost garden beauty, and the waving fields of God's food that surround us on every side, contrast so hideously with this awful condition, that you must be informed that there is a world within that which meets the dazzled eye of prosperity, of which no one knows aught, save those whom capricious fortune has doomed to be its inhabitants. This world is a —frozen continent,

Dark and wild, beat with perpetual storms,
Of whirlwind and dire hail—wherein the tossed and troubled soul bewails the hour of its birth, in the bitter language of despair. Those born in more genial social climes, know nothing of this dreary existence. They never felt the pang that corrodes the heart, or the bitter woe that fires the brain as with a red-hot iron, or had to deplore the loss of a knowledge of the pure or true, or struggle with a life made up of fretful anguish, wounded delicacy, bruised sentiment and that gnawing and unceasing, though hopeless craving for those blessings which the human mind, in its lowest degradation, instinctively feels to be its heritage on earth. Believe it, most gracious queen, that there are shadows deep and broad on the ground we tread; and the children of success, when they pursue their thousand different ways, are too apt to forget they are treading on the funeral pall of a multitude whose hearts were never intended to beat only to the dirge of their own sorrows and miseries—to the wild, sad notes, breathing eloquent reproach, sent up from every corner of the land. This is a condition of existence as dreadful as the fabled one of Tantalus, and every feature of its wretchedness, every variety of which it is so susceptible, claims from your majesty that consideration and affectionate attention which are based on the best, the warmest, the holiest feelings. The wrongs and sins of your empire start up in the gloom like

A forest huge of spears, tipped with dark-red fire. Behold them as they appear before you in dark and ghastly array!"

The scene changed from the wide realm of Neptune to that of merry Freeland. Her majesty saw pass before her, in close columns, the élite of her industrial population. First there came the men of thought, the men of action, and the throng who, wearing the garb of gentlemen, are presumed to be the most successful in the industrial struggle; but few were adorned with the coveted decoration of prosperity; the majority had care-ridden brows, sunken eyes, pallid cheeks, and those pursed-up lips, which seem nervously to hide the contention raging in the prison-house within. Urged on by hope, or goaded by despair, they pressed frantically forward, leaving in their rear a dismal train of beggars, maniacs, and suicides.

Then there came a mighty section of the more mechanical portion of the community. They were a stalwart race, with naturally intelligent and cheerful countenances; but when they glanced at the banner borne before them, their faces darkened, and they surlily, sometimes savagely, thrust the weaker out of their way. On the banner was inscribed the following instructive and warning summary:

Average wages of a skilled mechanic, 24s. per week, out of which he must make a decent appearance abroad, pay rent, buy food for his family, clothe them, educate his children—generally five in number—and out of the residue, indulge in such luxuries as his conscience will allow him.

Then there came intermediate grades of employed mechanics and artisans, until the panorama ended in a squalid mob, who belonged to no particular trade, but hovered on the confines of every one, and starved on them all.

Then there burst on the startled royal vision, countless masses who toiled from early morn to dewy eve, for a remuneration so attenuated, that its recipients, in its distribution, every day accomplished miracles. The average for each head of a family, consisting of husband, wife, and five children, was 15s. per week: out of which, in addition to being expected to furnish a satisfactory example of order and morality, the following disbursements were punctually to be made:

	s.	d.
Rent.....	4	0
Bread, 4 lbs. per diem, at 6d. ...	3	6
Oatmeal.....	1	0
Bacon, 4 lbs.	2	0
Sunday's joint.....	1	6
Do. Pot of Beer.....	0	4
Vegetables.....	1	6
Milk.....	0	7
Tea, Sugar, &c.	2	0

16 5

Thus making an excess of expenditure over income of 1s. 5d. per week, without taking into consideration such necessities as clothing or medicine, or such luxuries as books, newspapers, or periodicals; or such moral duties as self-improvement, or education of children. For all these there was provided a blank—a dead, soul-blighting blank.

These lived in towns and cities, and at their heels came a more squalid array, bearing before them the banner of their social condition, upon which was inscribed the following tabular statement:

"Rates of weekly wages paid for agricultural labour throughout 'merry' Freeland:

	s.	d.		s.	d.
Cumberland.....	13	0	Oxford.....	9	0
Lancashire.....	13	6	Gloucester.....	7	0
Cheshire.....	12	0	North Wilts.....	7	6
Derby.....	11	0	Devon.....	8	6
Nottingham.....	10	0	Norfolk.....	8	6
Stafford.....	9	6	Suffolk.....	7	0
Northumberland.....	11	0	Huntingdon.....	8	6
Durham.....	11	0	Cambridge.....	7	6
Yorkshire, West.....			Bedford.....	9	0
Riding.....	14	0	Hertford.....	9	0
Do. East Riding.....	12	0	Essex.....	8	0
Do. North Riding.....	11	0	Berks.....	7	6
Lincoln.....	10	0	Surrey.....	9	6
Warwick.....	8	6	Sussex.....	10	6
Northampton.....	10	0	Hants.....	9	0
Bucks.....	8	6	South Wilts.....	7	0
Dorset.....	7	6

Average of northern counties, 11s. 6d.; average of southern, 8s. 5d.; average of west, 10s. 1d.; average of the east, 9s. 1d.; average of the whole, 9s. 6d.

"How do they manage to exist upon such pittance?" was the sovereign's mental query; and the next instant a country village, infested by lank and hungry curs, came before her, and she saw—

A bold peasantry, once their country's pride—at home, with only the beer-shop for a lounging place. Their aspect was defiant, truculent, half-bashful, half-savage. Their labour brought them only a pittance, and in their hearts they cursed that labour, and the soil upon which it was bestowed. The women in this sweet, rural spot, were thin and haggard—the children squalid—the cottages dirty. And, as if to heighten the contrast, there right against the brow of a finely-wooded hill, stood a stately mansion—it was the landlord's! Some miles down the valley, close by a stagnant, putrid ditch, stood a glaring brick edifice—it was the UNION HOUSE, which opened its dismal doors to receive the rustic swain, the village belle, the humble field labourer, the hungry, wrinkled wife, and children that never were rosy, to pinch, starve, snub, crush, and dehumanise.

The ghastly panorama then extended to one of those hives of industry which have made Freeland famous throughout the universe. The sky was obscured by the smoke of hundreds of tall chimneys, and vast edifices, stretched in lines, for miles and miles. The latter were crowded with women and children, young in years, but withered in form and feature. The countenances of the men were as colourless as the white fabric in their looms. Their eyes sparkled with intelligence, but it was chiefly the intelligence of suffering, of privation, of keen sense of wrong, of inability to be better, of rankling hatred against existing institutions, and a furtive wish that some hideous calamity would bury them all in one common, undistinguishable ruin.

"Are these the people?" groaned the queen, as the cold damp of more than mortal agony moistened her marble forehead.

"Not all of them!" sounded the voice in her ear, so sharply, that her majesty looked up eagerly, and saw written, in letters of fire, on the palace-wall:

1. EVERY TWELFTH PERSON IN YOUR DOMINIONS IS A PAUPER DAILY RECEIVING PAROCHIAL RELIEF.

2. EVERY TWENTIETH PERSON IN YOUR DOMINIONS IS A DESTITUTE WANDERER, WITH NO ROOF BUT THE SKY—NO HOME BUT A PRISON THEY ARE THE ISHMAELITES OF MODERN SOCIETY: EVERY ONE'S HAND IS AGAINST THEM, AND THEIR HANDS ARE AGAINST EVERY ONE.

At this moment a thrilling episode occurred in the royal vision. The noblest of the rivers of Freeland, dotted with vessels from every clime, and spanned by bridges of magnificent proportions, came slowly on the scene. On one of the most splendid of the bridges, at the dead hour of midnight, a fair girl stood, with her white face turned upwards to the sky. She was very beautiful, but there was a slime in her loveliness; her once glowing cheeks were pale, and her eyes dim and lustreless. One prayer, one convulsive sob of regret for the past, and

Sheer o'er the battlements she hurled herself into the muddy depths below. But little time had the sovereign for womanly sympathy, or to ask:

Who was her father?
Who was her mother?

for the solemn drama before her widened and deepened in horror. Behind the gorgeous splendour of the material greatness of Freeland, were the abodes of privation, festering depravity, and crime. Mists and fogs crept upon the scene, but they wreathed themselves into appalling shapes. There was ignorance, lumpish, stolid, and stupid, but active for evil. There were fever and pestilence swathing up the homes of the industrious in clouds of blended red and black. Death hung on their rear, rattling his bones, and while deeper, darker, blacker, more hellish than all, Vice chuckled and slunk, drank and thieved, leered and wallowed, and, in its frantic abomination, so dabbled and paddled in filth, that a merciful angel in heaven let fall a curtain, and the monster was hidden from the queenly gaze.

Grinning ghastly a horrible smile;

"Gracious lady," said the Director of the vision, in solemn, touching accents, "it was womanly and noble in the ladies of your court to weep over the wrongs of the negro—such crystal drops become bright stars in the human firmament; but I must warn you that such sympathy is dimmed in the light of an all-ruling Providence, when, in your own land, LIBERTY, the absence of which in another is deplored, is, in its most God-like developments, but a name—unless that may be termed liberty, which, practically, is but vulgar licence: licence to work from rosy morn to dark midnight for the most scanty pittance; licence to store up wealth in the hands and for the benefit of the few; licence to bellow lustily for rival politicians; licence to send children to ragged schools; licence to sot in an ale-house; licence to grow lumpish and brutal; licence to neglect the offices of religion, to swear, to lie, to blaspheme; licence to steal, to pander unchecked to the coarsest appetites, to fawn and slaver over the little great ones of the earth; licence to creep like a worm through life, or bound through it like a wild beast; and, last and most precious of all—for it is untaxed—licence to starve, to rot, to die, and be buried in a fetid pauper's grave, on which the sweet-smelling flowers sent to strew the pathway of man and woman with beauty, love, and hope, will refuse to grow, much less bloom."

J. P. H.

[THE RAILWAY TERMINUS IN THE CITY OF LONDON.]

CITY RAILWAY TERMINUS.

In presenting our readers with an engraved illustration of Mr. Charles Pearson's design for a grand central railway terminus, within the precincts of the City of London, we cannot do less than state that the scheme has always had our hearty approval, and we have frequently had occasion to express our surprise at the tardiness evinced in its complete and generous adoption. But in this country a good suggestion is never appreciated immediately. Railways themselves, at first, were only accepted by piecemeal. The feeling which excludes them from Italy, except in one or two insignificant instances, which limits Spain to only some fifty miles of them, and prevents India having any accommodation of the kind, assailed all these undertakings for years. So that, what between the apathy of the public, the hostility of those who dislike, because they fear all change, and the incapacity of the legislature to deal with so great a question, the system had to fight its way through countless obstacles, until it attained its present unwieldy shape, and all the leading lines, as regards practical intercommunication, their present complete and disgraceful isolation.

After the Liverpool and Manchester line had demonstrated the practicability and paying qualities of a railway communication, the country was most unwisely parcelled out into districts, and handed over to separate companies, irrespective of the future, and in defiance of even ordinary prudence.

We do not deny that the British system is worked with vigour and activity; nay, that it is unparalleled in the extent of its operations; but we do say that it might be worked better, more safely, and more economically. The carriage of 60,000,000 of passengers annually, demands the utmost possible facility as well as circumspection; and we deny that any such facility is afforded, in the presence of the fact, that the 7000 miles of railway in operation have communication with each other only to a partial extent; and the difference in gauge is aggravated by hostile boards of management, animated by the most rancorous jealousy of each other. As the Rev. J. C. Whish said, in "The Great Exhibition Prize Essay," "Everything which quickens circulation or facilitates intercourse between either the different members of the same nation, or between members of different nations, is calculated to promote the general welfare."

The directors of railway companies, however, seem to have repudiated the sentiment, and striven to the utmost to avoid promoting that genial intercourse which, experience has proved, is so healthful to the morals of the country, and so advantageous to its material prosperity. The state of the various lines that run into the metropolis is a convincing instance to adduce. All parts of the country maintain a direct communication with the capital—the centre of power, money, politics, influence, and public opinion. London is a great reservoir. Giving and taking unceasingly, it is the heart of the empire; therefore, every precaution should be adopted to maintain an uninterrupted flow in this essential connection between this pulsating power and the extremities it feeds and is fed by; as well as to give these extremities the privilege of communicating with each other, in the great terminus through which they conduct their operations.

Now, what is the fact? Why, that the metropolis is worse provided in this respect than any of the great centres, necessarily made so by their manufacturing or local importance. The six lines which, from their aggregate magnitude, almost have a monopoly of the British railway system, run into London, and pause at the several places selected for them in the outskirts. They have no communication at all with each other. The Great Western halts at Paddington, five miles from the General Post Office: a distance, measured by time, equal to at least forty miles on a railway. The leviathan of railways stops at Euston Square, the Great Northern at King's Cross, the Eastern Counties at Shoreditch, the South Eastern at London Bridge, and the South Western at Waterloo Bridge: all unreasonable and unnecessary distances from the City, and all offering an insurmountable barrier to that free intercommunication with each other which was one of the purposes for which railways, as a system of transit, were originally intended.

Mr. Pearson, the able City Solicitor, exerted himself to remove this nuisance—a nuisance, because the isolation entails loss of time, money, and renders railway travelling less secure than it would otherwise be; but up to this moment has failed to induce the metropolitan railway Solons to acknowledge the correctness of his views. He suggested a grand central terminus, into which all the railways of Great Britain should converge; in fact, his plan was the same in principle, only on a larger scale, as that which the various companies whose lines run into or near Birmingham, have so successfully carried out in the latter place. He proposed one large terminus, instead of six inefficient ones, at expensive, time-losing, incommensurable distances from the capital and from each other; and we think very clearly proved the amazing benefits that would accrue to the companies, as well as to the public, from such an arrangement.

The locality he proposed was Smithfield Market, from which the connecting line would take the course of the Fleet Valley, and, completely cutting up a neighbourhood that is at present one of the poorest and most unhealthy in the metropolis, terminate at King's Cross, where, through the agency of the Great Northern Railway, a cheap and easy communication could be established between all the railways north of the Thames—viz., the Great Western, the North Western, the Great Northern, and the Eastern Counties. The portion of the scheme embracing the southern lines was deferred until a more favourable opportunity. This is the substance of Mr. Pearson's suggestion, and, to carry it into execution, a company has been formed, who are applying to Parliament for the necessary powers.

The support of the Corporation of the City of London has naturally been anticipated—for the undertaking, if carried out, would wonderfully improve every description of property in the City, and on the route; but, as that body is at present constituted, it is difficult to ascertain their real feeling on such a subject. That they will offer no opposition, may probably be assumed as certain, so that the fate of the scheme rests with Parliament and the public. Parliament no doubt will sanction it, if the promoters make out a good case. But that they can scarcely do, without the cordial co-operation of the public. The owners of property on the proposed route will throw obstacles in the way—so will the companies—and most assuredly so will the omnibus and cab proprietors of London. The interests of the owners of the ten thousand cabs and three thousand omnibuses that are daily plying through the streets of London, would no doubt be sensibly affected by the measure; but, as private considerations must always yield to the comforts and reasonable demands of the public, we do not think Parliament would recognise any force in objections of this class: if it were to do so, it might just as well be consistent, and order the country to go back to the old stage coach system. Parliament, however, is not likely to be influenced in this manner; and, if the promoters can only succeed in convincing it that the scheme could be worked profitably to the shareholders—would save hundreds of thousands of pounds per annum to the householders of the metropolis, in highway rates—would cheapen and facilitate railway travelling—and be, in addition to all this, a great boon, not only to the metropolis, but to the whole country—our readers may rest satisfied that Parliament would not refuse its authorisation of the undertaking, or allow it to be crushed by either the indifference of the railway companies, or the hostility of any of the advocates for the continuance of the metropolitan railway termini, in their present separate and inefficient condition.

FATHER BROMLEY'S TALE.

"I WILL tell you a tale," said Father Bromley.

Father Bromley sat on the piazza of his cottage, looking over the green breadth of lawn which stretched down to Willow Brook. The sun had just gone down, and the western sky, still a-glow, seemed—seen through the willows—like a splendid tissue—gold and green; and the stream, as it rolled, might have been supposed to have its rise in that strange El Dorado which filled our country's ancestral dreams. On his right sat his daughter Alice, needing to be but a shade paler to be wrapped in a shroud, and laid to her dreamless sleep with a white rosebud pressed between her slender fingers; and on his left his other daughter, Margaret, fresh as a June rose at sunrise. The father sat between them, the very pattern of paternal grace and quiet benignity. His worldly cares had been slight, so his face had been left smooth, full, and sunny; so sunny, in fact, that it appeared to have taken and retained the quintessence of every sunbeam which had fallen upon it. But now, like external nature, it had a sort of twilight expression, approaching to spirituality, which would awaken in the beholder an abiding interest, and lead him to pause and study ere he passed. Various circumstances conspired to this—the time, the place, and the proximity of his pale child, propped up with pillows and almost as ethereal as a moonbeam. For a long time they had been sitting in a deepening silence, which neither wished to disturb; and so absorbed were the two daughters with their own thoughts, that the first words of the grey father fell upon unheeding ears.

"I will tell you a story," he repeated, after a little pause, and in a firmer tone.

Slowly, and with a sigh, like one awakening from a pleasant dream to an unpleasant reality, Alice lifted the lids, and upturned her eyes, filled with a gathering dreaminess, to the dawning love-look of her only parent. Those deep, dark eyes, they must have known many tears.

"Do let us hear it, papa," she murmured, "but let it be in harmony with gathering stars and slanting moonbeams, and let it have a true golden tinge from the sunset which lights up the gloaming."

"And do let us hear it!" echoed Margaret, turning quite away from the moon, which was just rising.

"And of what shall it be?" asked Father Bromley, as he looked inquiringly from one to the other.

"Oh, something that will please Alice!" returned the sweet girl. "For who knows how many times we shall have it in our power to please her?" she thought; but did not say; for all of that household knew that, sooner or later, death would knock at their door.

There was a long pause, and then Alice said:

"Let it be of the picture, with the angel-face, which hangs in the green parlour?"

There must have been strange thoughts suggested by it, for her face in the white moonshine grew a shade paler, and her hands trembled a little, as if nervously affected, but no one noticed it.

There was another pause, and then she continued, as if to explain the reason of her wish:

"I have been reading to-day a beautiful poem, in which a lovely lady died of a broken heart, and her spirit nightly haunted her old home. Thinking on the sad tale, I paused to weep, and sat for a few moments with shut eyes. When I opened them, the first thing that I saw was the portrait, and—will you believe it?—it had acquired a new sadness, such as I never saw on a mortal face. It seemed to be looking at me with an incomprehensible intensity of earnestness; and, as I still gazed, a tear—I saw it as plainly as I see the moon—started in the eyes, and rolled down the face. And then another, and another, she went on, in higher tones, as if trying to impress a burning truth on incredulous listeners; and all the while it looked at me so sadly—but not with pity—and seemed so to invite me, that I fancied I heard the lips say, 'Come! That was only tancy, but, as I live, I saw it weep.'"

Father Bromley looked with deep and tender anxiety upon the pale face at his side. He well knew of a report, formerly current in the house, that this same picture was seen to shed tears just before the death of any member of the family. But this piece of information he restrained, justly deeming it not pertinent for the occasion. Margaret looked anxious and perplexed, but said nothing; and the father, after a little pause, began, in a low voice, his tale. Let us listen, dear reader, seated attentively on the sward, at the corner of the dim old mansion. We may be as sceptical as we please, since neither of us ever saw a strip of painted canvas, in a gilt frame, weep.

My great grandfather's second wife—for so far back his story was to date—was a strange, bad woman. There was no peace in her vicinity. The estate had become involved, and my great-grandfather, knowing her to be possessed of some money, married her. But he always had cause to bitterly rue that day and hour which made her his. He had two daughters—both sweet girls, and she one son, who had inherited all her bad qualities, with an additional coarseness and ugliness of manner, which she, if she possessed it, from superiority of education, seldom showed. Her son, whose name was Andrew, had that sensual perception of beauty which always marks vulgar natures; and he had been but a short time in the family before he gave evidence of the impression which the beauty of the younger sister made upon him. Lisette, from the first, rejected his overtures, and withdrew from his society to that of her elder sister as much as possible; but Andrew, not heeding her contempt, and abetted, moreover, by his mother, still pressed his suit with all the pertinacity and regardlessness of feeling, which characterise such semi-barbarous beings. The persecuted girl sought her father's protection; and he, in giving it, alienated from himself the spark of affection which the bosom of the step-mother might have known. From that time she "hated him with the hate of hell!" but, with all the cunning of her peridious heart, she covered it with a smile. She softened towards her step-daughters, and, by her open advice, Andrew discontinued the attentions which had made him so odious in their sight. All was seemingly about to be harmonious and well again, when the father suddenly sickened and died. There were strange circumstances attending his death, which made it to be as much talked of as an eighth wonder. Sturdy men put their bushy heads together, and whispered mysteriously in corners; and old dames—stooping over the few last embers on the hearth, as the hours drew on towards the ghostly midnight—muttered to each other in under-breath, starting over and anon if the wind but wailed a little louder, or flapped a clapboard which chanced to hang loose. Children whimpered if they were put to bed alone in the dark; and young women, in broad daylight, would not go ten rods unattended over an unfrequented road. Dame Burton had had, for a long time before this, an unfavourable reputation with a few, and the assertions of this few were latterly gaining believers. It was now currently reported that she was in the habit of going nightly to the Devil's Crag, under which was a cave, whose black recesses had never been seen by mortal eye. It was furthermore reported, that whenever any one approached it, a dark vapour issued from its mouth, in the midst of which were sometimes seen two fiery eyes, and ominous voices also added to the fright of whosoever might chance to be lost or stray in this vicinity.

The foundation for all this was the testimony of two superstitious woodmen; who, in plying their trade, occasionally ventured into the vicinity, and, besides what has been here told, one of them gave out, as a piece of definite information, that, being one night belated in the neighbourhood of the cave, and coming towards home in great terror, he suddenly heard the sound of rapid footsteps, and, pausing, he saw Dame Burton come into an open spot not twelve feet from him. Suddenly there appeared a man, as black as ebony, at her side. Whence he came he could not tell, but his identity was not to be mistaken.

"Why are you so late?" asked the dark personage.

"Mercy, mercy!" cried the cringing dame, piteously.

But mercy did not seem to be one of his component parts; for, seizing her roughly by the arm, and rushing off with her like lightning through the dense underbrush, he made directly for the cave, leaving nothing but an overpowering smell of brimstone, and a line of blue light, pointing, like a guide-board, toward the place of rendezvous.

How the man ever got home he could not tell; but it was not at all uncertain that he did get home, and tell the tale here given to a thousand incredulous hearers.

Father Burton died, and was laid with his fathers, and Esther and Lisette wept together in their sorrow, and arrayed themselves sadly in mourning weeds. The suspicions of their neighbours never troubled them. The thought that their step-mother could be so utterly depraved would have killed them at once, had it entered their minds. The father had not, however, been long gone to rest, when they perceived a change in the mother and son. The mother's face assumed a crafty and hag-like expression, and the son's face seemed to have gotten a look of stupid cunning quite foreign to it. Except this, for some time nothing was to be seen; but soon matters took a more overt and decided turn. Andrew again renewed his odious attentions, but with a confidence which he formerly lacked. He was met with the same coldness as before, to which was added an entreaty—couched in the most conciliatory language—to the effect that he would desist. But coldness and entreaty were alike vain. He still persisted, and Dame Burton at last seconded his suit, by commanding Lisette, in unequivocal terms, to marry him.

"I cannot! I will not!" said Lisette, with a passionate burst of tears, at the close of an interview in which the matter had been pressed upon her with more than ordinary vehemence and fiendish show of malignity.

"Cannot? will not?" muttered the dame, half to herself and half to her auditor, accompanying the same with an impatient gesture, and a laugh hissed through her closed teeth; "we will see! we will see!"

"I beg to hear no more of this," continued the persecuted girl, "or I shall expect our poor dead father to come in his shroud to defend us from such cruelty!"

"Thy poor dead father in his shroud!" echoed the step-mother. "Ah, ha! it was a good drug—a friendly drug!" she muttered, in an under-tone; "a pleasant potion for a peevish child!" and then she laughed at her devilish wit. "Thy father sleeps well, child. Did thy keen wit ever take exception at the friendly nursing which waited on him to the grave?"

Lisette started, and looked fearfully at her; but, recovering herself, she proceeded to state her refusal more definitely.

"I will look upon thy son as a brother, but do not think I can ever do more. Why will he persist in asking what he has so often been told I cannot give? We are dissimilar, and I cannot love him—but I do not hate him. I repeat, and I will continue to regard him as a brother, but in any other light I cannot—nay, I will not—look upon him!"

Rising with the last words, she would have passed from the room, but she was detained.

"Dost love another?" queried the crone, looking her full in the face.

The blood rushed to the young girl's cheeks.

"Ah! I see! I heard Andrew tell of the young painter, who —"

Lisette's face was scarlet.

"Let me go!" she cried, impatiently. "Have not I told thee that I will not marry any man?"

"But you will!—you shall!—you cannot escape me! I will summon every fiend to my aid! I will torture thee to submission! I will melt thee in the crucible of my wrath!"

The last words were lost on the object of her anger, and the dame stood with her arms a-kimbo, and a peculiar exultation of expression, such as a fiend, conscious of his diabolical power, might be supposed to wear.

Lisette rushed to her room, and threw herself, half-fainting, into the arms of her sister.

"Strange things at the Burton House, Neighbour Guernsey," said Widow Hamersley, as she lighted her pipe, and, having taken an initiatory whiff, drew her chair towards the bright wood fire.

It was now autumn, and the winds were growing colder day by day, and the external aspect of nature more dreary.

"Yes, yes," returned she who was addressed. "Since Mistress Alton lost her two little children in Marsden Forest, who were no doubt eaten of the wolves, there has not been the like of it. I pity poor Esther, who is left all alone with so ungracious a woman as Dame Burton!"

"Ay, ay, Neighbour Guernsey. Many a long year have I known this strange woman, and I have yet to discover if there be any good thing in her. And the dolt Andrew is no better than a stupid beast. It has been noised about, that the step-mother has been trying to force the younger girl to marry him. Heaven knows what might happen if the poor child would not yield!"

Here the widow puffed forth a volume of smoke as large as a small thunder-cloud, and gazed knowingly among the embers.

"And the young painter in the village, they say, is going distracted at her loss," continued Mistress Guernsey, not observing the drift of the other's remarks. "He has been painting a portrait of her, and now he has left all, and gone off to search for her in the woods."

"Snail chance of his finding her, Neighbour Guernsey!" answered the widow, drily; her remarks still tending in a direction which her companion did not perceive. "It is no wolf of the forest which will have the pleasure of picking her bones!"

"Heaven grant it may be as you say!" was the reply, referring to the last clause of the sentence, whose ambiguity was unnoticed.

"Hast thou not heard tales about this dame?" asked the widow, dropping her disguise and speaking more openly.

"Ay, ay, many a time and oft; tales smacking of mystery and mischief, which boded no good to Dame Burton. They say she has unholy company o' nights in the wood. But, after all, they were only tales about which I knew nothing certain."

"Hast thou not," continued the widow, "noticed a strange twinkle in her eyes, a shrillness in her voice, and that her hair is becoming coarse and grizzled? What does this portend?"

"Alas, I cannot tell!" replied Mrs. Guernsey. "There were strange hints when her good man died, and now I bethink me that they might have been true, and the remorse of the inner conscience might thus have developed itself outwardly."

Here there ensued a pause, and the two sat awhile quietly listening to the hollow moaning of the wind among the trees of the old forest hard by. Superstition, which always attends ignorance, was a prominent point in the characters of both; but more especially in that of the widow. No doubt she heard demon voices in the wind, wailing in the crannies, and fancied the air filled with evil spirits, hurrying like lightning upon their various errands of mischief. When she spoke again, her voice quivered, and her frame shook as with an ague-fit.

"I tell thee, Mistress Guernsey, I have seen —" said she, at last, her gaze fixed intently on vacancy.

"Seen what?" asked the other, drawing closer, and looking distrustfully into every corner of the room.

"Seen —" repeated the widow, still looking into vacancy.

"Seen what?" repeated her auditor, drawing still nearer, and looking with still greater scrutiny into all the dark nooks of the apartment.

But the expected speech still hung half-way between conception and utterance, as if some impalpable auditor were present, who might convey the tale to the ears of the object of both her aversion and fear.

The sad moaning of the wind filled up the chasm in the conversation, and the subtle influences of the place, and their loneliness, seemed to be rapidly gathering about the two lonely women. The speech was still unspoken, when the thread of the proceedings was broken short by the abrupt entrance of Mistress Hamersley's son. Whether or not the embryo disclosure might have embodied new and startling developments, or only old statements re-hashed, we cannot tell; but certain it is, that the vein of mystery was explored no further that night. The son plied new faggots on the fire—the widow refilled her pipe—the conversation took a more and cheerful turn, and the place took again that air of rude pleasantness which belongs particularly to a farm-house kitchen, while the weird lady was for the moment forgotten.

As may have been gathered from the remarks in the preceding conversation, Lisette had disappeared: lost, it was supposed, in the forest, into which she sometimes strayed alone; for, as to superstition, she had none of it, and wild animals had mostly retired to a safe distance before the advance of civilisation. Every possible means had been tried for her recovery, seconded by apparently every effort of Dame Burton and her son. They seemed inconsolable; and some of those who looked upon her as a slandered person, affirmed that she spent the nights for a week in weeping.

Esther was now alone and friendless, thrown entirely into the power of these protectors. Surmises and ill-boding opinions passed occasionally from mouth to mouth, but never reached her ears. She wept in silent sorrow, away from all intercourse.

Thus matters went on for some weeks, until one night, at dusk, Andrew was brought to his mother a corpse. He had been accidentally shot in a hunting excursion. Her sorrow at this occurrence was real. Every other tie had been to her nothing, while this had absorbed all her soul's capability of affection. She had indulged him in everything, and had attempted to gratify his every wish. Now that he was gone, all that she possessed was gone, and all her thoughts and deeds glared upon her in all their malignity. She had nothing now to take from herself those hell-bound thoughts which bred in her a bitter remorse. One night she lay by his coffin, another by his grave; and a third she would have spent thus, but they led her away. She yielded as pliantly as a child.

Thenceforth she was completely broken down. She could do nothing more; and all day she sat like a fixture in the chimney-corner, while all the house-affairs fell into Esther's hands. But, at dusk, the dame would be gone mysteriously for an hour. Esther never questioned concerning it, nor cared; but the ignorant neighbours whispered, wondered, surmised, and told of strange things that happened at these times, until it became so much a matter of course, that nothing more could be said. At the end of a year she married my grandfather Bromley. The portrait of the lost sister was taken from the painter's studio, and hung in her room. Each succeeding year added a new balm to her wounds, until they seemed so far back in the past, that sometimes she would almost question with herself whether or not they had had actual existence.

Thus twenty years of married life passed calmly and pleasantly. Sons and daughters were growing up around her in full bloom, and all promised that the afternoon of her life should be peace. Dame Burton had grown old and decrepit, and bent nearly double. Her hair was white as snow, and her face had a sort of blank, passive expression, except at times, when her eyes would glow like half-extinguished coals, and she would start as if some frightful object looked in upon her visions. Through all the long day she sat in the chimney-corner, and never stirred until the bats wheeled in the dusk, and the rude noises of day were displaced by a stillness so still, that the bark of life might be said to move down the noiseless river of Time with muffled oars.

One night, in the early autumn, my grandfather was gone, and my grandmother was left alone with the family. All were quietly at rest before she retired. That day she had been labouring hard, and was over-wearied, and now a strange restlessness and loneliness of feeling came across her. It was just at the moonrise. The moon came up looking red and angrily over the ripening fields, glistening with dew, near at hand, the mill-pond still and large, further off, and the black and massive woods in the distance. Those weird influences were at work which incline every mind at times to retrospection. And now, as over a dim sea, from a dim-seen island, came the memories of the past. She saw, as in a dream, the mother of her childhood, who pressed her childish hands in hers. A few years past, and she saw her die, and felt the intense agony of that moment. A few years more were gone, and she saw the death-bed of her other parent, and felt the keener and more enduring pain which maturer minds must feel. Still farther, and she saw the sister-branch, which had grown side by side with her upon the parental tree, torn rudely away. And now she could think no more. It was too much pain. Turning from the window, she hastily disrobed herself, and dropped wearily upon the bed. Memory, in the guise of a headless figure with a lantern, seemed to lead her through all the past, which was nothing more than a field covered with brambles and underbrush, and filled with pitfalls, into which she continually fell. Her flesh was torn and bloody; but still she went on, and on, and on, and still there was no end.

She might have slept thus nearly an hour, when she became conscious that there was another presence in the room. She stirred a little, and the village clock drowsily clanged to tell the midnight. She opened her eyes. The moon was far up, and poured a flood of white light through the casement. A tall, attenuated figure, in a long, loose, and tattered gown, which showed ghostly white, stooped over her.

The shape stood between the bed and the window, and yet so ethereal was it, that she seemed to see the casement, the climbing moon, and the white church spire, as though nothing intervened. But the face, so ghastly white, so thin with want and woe—cross-lined and inter-lined—and the eyes—so faded and expressionless, she had never seen anything like it.

(Here Margaret pressed her father's arm, and pointed to Alice, whose fingers were quivering like aspen-leaves—but he did not pause.)

Like two pictures on a wall, her imagination placed the image of her lost sister beside this form, so like in every particular. The conclusion was irresistible. It was her sister, or—as her disturbed fancy would rather indicate—her ghostly representative. Overcome by her emotions she fainted, and when she recovered, the visitor was gone. She lay quite still, in her terror, until the approach of dawn, and then arising, she dressed herself all in a tremor, and prepared to descend. All was still as death, for it lacked a half-hour yet of sun-rise. She heard Chanticleer's shrill cry without, just as he emerged from his dormitory, and she noticed a cricket's sharp voice within, and even the tick of a death-watch in the wall fell distinctly on her ears. A chill crept over her, like the forerunner of some frightful calamity.

(Here Margaret pressed the narrator's arm again, but with the same success as before.)

She crept, rather than walked, down the stairs, and peeped through the kitchen door, which stood ajar. The eastern shutter was swung partially back, and admitted a streak of the cold, grey light of dawn, which fell upon the features of the midnight visitor, who sat erect at one side of the room. She did not stir, though Esther, staggering in her terror, thrust the door back with considerable noise. Perfectly still she sat, gazing, as if in fright, at the hideous face of old Dame Burton, who sat a little more in the dusk, regarding her attentively. The old crone was inclined a little forward, her shrivelled lips separated in a grin, and one lean finger threateningly raised in a gesture which said more than words. Neither spoke; but, cold, still, and pale, they gazed at one another, and then was felt around—

A smell of clay, a pale and icy glare,
And silence—

"See, see!" exclaimed Margaret.

Alice sat motionless, with her head thrown slightly back, and her face whiter than the moonbeams which fell upon it.

"What is this?" asked Father Bromley.

"It is DEATH!" shrieked Margaret.

THERE are now eleven widows at Rugby Station, whose husbands, with one exception, have been killed on the railway.

ESSAYS.

No. CLXXXIII.—COLONIES AND COLONISTS.

COLONIES and COLONISTS are the great words of the present day. They have placed political agitation hors de combat. Absorbed in anticipations of a more solid material condition, the theories of government seem to have been abandoned by the public to the care of authors, editors, and theorists of every class. This is a healthy sign, for politics as manifested by parties and speculative thinkers are but bubbles in the great firmament of everyday life. The real politics of nations are the manifestations that come after the latest developments in their progress; and those who aim at moulding and adapting these manifestations, through the agency of a mere change in forms, to infant or unborn circumstances, are merely like flies buzzing and breeding in a sunshine they only feel, but do not understand.

But nations, even in the pursuit of objects recommended by common sense, like individuals, are apt to be led away by impulses, without pausing to examine the road they are taking. When this is the case, the observer who dispassionately stands aloof, uninfluenced by the mania, can advisably step in, and point out the features as well as the tendencies of the movement.

Colonies and Colonists rank among the vital politics of the present day. They are creating revolutions as steadily as coral insects are building up future islands and continents in the bosom of the deep sea. Therefore they are deserving of the most earnest consideration; for while it is evident that their gigantic doings have done good in directing the mind of the nation to great facts, in preference to the fanciful suggestions of the little men who can only dabble on little things, it must be admitted that their own peculiarities are lost sight of in the magnitude of the promise put forth by their extraordinary operations.

Colonies and Colonists, as a subject, should be viewed with regard to the future as well as the present. And when economists tell us: "Ships were never more in demand—mills were never running and increasing faster—trade was never more rapidly extending"—and that all this prosperity is attributable to colonies, colonists, and emigration, it becomes necessary to look at all the sides of the great question here brought into prominence, so that, if possible, some glimpse of the ultimate end may be obtained.

Our sentiments on emigration have been already enunciated. We still regard it as a tremendous evil, and that for every ounce of present ease it will afford the country, it will lay up in store for the future a ton of misery. But the question of colonies and colonists is more narrowed, it occupies less debateable ground, and can be discussed without necessarily provoking any very great difference of opinion.

Emigration, as promoted, has become a fiere argumentum ad populum; colonies, per se, are not susceptible of such blind advocacy—such a closing of the eyes to home interests and home abuses; and we think it would be a profitable occupation of the attention of the public, if their history, prospects, and destiny were a little more seriously studied. At all events, regarding both colonies and colonists as indissolubly linked with the progress of the British nation, we would draw attention to a few facts concerning them, which we do not recollect having seen grouped in this shape before, and which, either isolated or together, could scarcely fail to excite the deepest reflection in minds accustomed to look beyond the boundaries of social conditions, whether passive or active.

Colonisation is natural to every people that have advanced somewhat far towards maturity, or that stage of development in which the manual productive power either exceeds the demand, or is trammelled by monopolies of property, and the unequal distribution of the products of labour. The Greek nations complained of a superabundant population, and they established colonies in neighbouring territories. But it should be remembered that they were nations of masters and slaves—they had no middle class to be fed from an independent lower class. The state and all the property in the nation were monopolies, which effectually limited the amount of labour required to support the ruling classes in opulence and idleness. Colonies were therefore indispensable, and they were created, and in time threw off the yoke of the mother country, and materially contributed to its ultimate downfall. The Romans were also a great colonising people, but their system was a defensive one, and their colonies were merely garrisons planted in the countries they had conquered. The Spaniards pursued this plan—so did the Portuguese: so that neither the colonisation of any of the great nations of antiquity, or of more modern times, resembles that of England or France, or Holland or Denmark. It was based on conquest, and the territorial idea was the fundamental principle of the institution.

The system adopted by Tyre and Carthage approached more closely to the one now in operation. Those nations established colonies for the purpose of extending their trade. England, within the past century, has copied their example; but if we regard the origin of English colonisation attentively, we shall find it unlike anything of the kind which previously occurred—in short, we should discover it to be an amalgamation of all the systems, ancient and modern. As the attempts of contemporary nations have, except in a few minor instances, failed, we shall confine ourselves to a sketch of the leading incidents and character of English—or, to use a more proper and comprehensive term—British colonisation.

The first attempts were in the old-fashioned way of conquest. After the consolidation of the kingdom under Henry VII. and VIII., the ardent spirits who formerly had found ample employment in the wars with France and Scotland, and the broils that perpetually disturbed Ireland, suddenly found their occupation gone—they really had nothing to do; and the court—to get rid of such inflammable material—directed their attention to the wealth of Spain, and the almost fabulous resources of her American colonies. The enmity subsisting between the two countries favoured, as well as suggested, the mode of attack; and accordingly we find that our first efforts to obtain a footing out of Europe, were conducted in arrogant defiance of the laws of meum et tuum. The first adventurers were decidedly pirates, and the pursuit grew so popular, that, instead of—as in the present day—emigrants going out peaceably to the other side of the globe, to dig for gold, vessels were equipped for the express purpose of plundering the towns on the Spanish Main, and intercepting the argosies of that nation, freighted with gold from the mines of Mexico and Peru. This trade was found to be so profitable, that piracy became a regularly organised profession; and pirates—by fixing their rendezvous among the islands and along the coast of America—formed the nucleus of the colonial power of England. The next step was a revival of the Tyrian and Carthaginian idea. Virginia and the colonies on the Atlantic coast of America were founded. The first settlers were gold-hunters, but the absence of that metal obliged them to become tillers of the soil and to traffic with the natives. Then trading associations were formed, and as the middle class was rapidly increasing in numbers and wealth, commerce took a firm grasp on the national mind, and imparted the most energetic encouragement to every scheme—no matter how audacious or unprincipled—which aimed at the acquisition of foreign territory, and the establishment of commercial relations with countries which had not before been brought into communication with England.

The first footing obtained was on the continent of America; the second in the West India islands; and the third—by treaty, intrigue, and force of arms—in India. The Roman and Tyrian ideas of colonisation were seized, blended, and used with remorseless vigour.

The decay of the Spanish power, the almost constant wars with France and Holland, the rise of the commercial spirit in England, and the activity—it might be said cupidity—of the national mind, all tended to foster this combination of the Roman system of conquest with the Carthaginian and Tyrian one of settlement; and thus, in process of time, the foundation of the colonial power of England was securely laid.

But other elements were brought into requisition, to give compactness and vitality to the institution. The Ulster colonisation scheme suggested the settlements in America. Noblemen obtained grants of land, and carried their retainers over with them. Farmers and men of capital followed their example. While a Catholic lord was colonising Maryland, a Quaker was outwitting the simple aborigines, and founding the present state of Pennsylvania. Then arose the troubles in England, and Roman Catholics and Protestant Nonconformists fled to America. After this, the transportation of criminals commenced, and, with change of locality, has endured ever since. The trading associations, meanwhile, were indelible; the wars with France always resulted in the acquisition of one or two settlements, and thus the system went on progressing at a prodigious rate; but the speed was not deemed satisfactory. Accordingly, a new element was introduced, and the passion for discovery commenced. The Pacific was explored, and Australia, Van Diemen's Land, New Zealand, and some smaller islands, ultimately added to the British possessions. Affairs at this juncture looked smooth enough, but the American revolution broke the spell: our colonial empire was shaken—almost shattered. But it was speedily repaired, and chiefly through two concurring, but entirely opposite causes. The French revolution enabled us to pursue our conquests in the East and West, and the multiplication of our manufactures, through the agency of machinery, gave us a market for them in every country in the world. And thus commenced our wonderful modern career, and the last phase in the progress of our colonial system.

Accelerated commerce and manufactures multiplied the population; but the gradual introduction of machinery narrowed the field of manual labour—and voluntary emigration was the consequence. While steadily pursuing the combined Roman and Tyrian idea, the old Greek principle was introduced. Economists and calculators began to talk of a superabundant population; Malthus broached his infernal doctrines, various sections of the population became depressed, mentally and physically, and emigration, encouraged by the Tyrian spirit, and promoted by the higher and middle classes, was suggested as the only remedy for the poverty and indigence which, instead of abating, was rapidly accumulating.

The hint was eagerly seized, and voluntary emigration from these shores commenced about thirty years ago, and went on increasing, until, at the present day, it is conducted on a scale unparalleled in the annals of any period. The United States of America and Canada were the great reservoirs into which this strength was poured; now it is Australia, and there, we think, the mania will have reached its culminating point. But, while we have been peopling the United States and Australia, the Roman principle of conquest has been steadily advancing, and the old, hardy, Tyrian spirit has been also at work in every corner of the earth. Transportation of criminals has likewise been unceasingly pursued; and thus, from these various causes—all acting together, although seemingly independent—it has come to pass that the colonies of Great Britain are, in this blessed year, 1853, extraordinary in number and variety, prodigious in extent, and ravenous for the food, the life, which the mother country is glad to part with as a superabundance.

The manufacturing and commercial spirit promote the supply of the raw material to Canada, New Zealand, Van Diemen's Land, and the Cape of Good Hope; the dread of a redundancy to any place out of the three kingdoms; the conquering principle to India, China, and Borneo; the voluntary desire for self-expatriation to Australia; and, as a climax to the whole, the government are still sending criminals across the seas, to the disgust of settled and purified communities, and the anger of those who, like the Cape of Good Hope and Sydney, can afford to do more than protest against such an invasion of manifestly their moral—and, as they themselves urge, their material—interests.

Such has been the origin, and such is now the aspect of our enormous colonial power. Every day that passes by it becomes greater, and every day it is hastening more rapidly to its inevitable consummation.

Colonies, therefore, is a word of grave import. There is something awfully significant in its interpretation.

The offspring of piracy, conquest, settlement, banishment, trade, desire to do better, discontent, finely varnished theories, and glittering allurements—the system in the aggregate looks ominous, as well as grand. And the question flashes across the mind: Will it endure—will it fall to pieces—what will be its fate—for what is it destined—and how will its future either way influence the future of the parent country?

A survey of the map affords no indication of a solution. The West Indies are bankrupt, but may be restored to some degree of prosperity. Canada is about to be joined more closely to the United States by the bond of free trade—but her institutions seem republican enough for her wants; and the conduct of the home government, on the question of the clergy reserves, must materially weaken even the present faintly expressed wish for a separation. Vancouver's Island, and the enormous territory of the Hudson's Bay Company, capable of being profitably cultivated, are not yet colonised at all; British Guiana pines for British labour and capital—Van Diemen's Land labours under the same complaint—so do the Australian States and New Zealand. Men, men—still the cry is for men. India is a Roman-Tyrian colony, deriving its sustenance and strength from home; the Chinese and Borneo settlements have only just been commenced: so that, geographically speaking, no termination at all can be seen to the visible dependent connection subsisting between the mother state and her gigantic and widely-scattered broods.

But if the colonies as a whole are too wondrous for a solution of their mystery—too vast in outline, too shadowy in physical revelation, for even guesses as to the nature and extent of an event dreaded by the higher and middle classes in England—the same impracticable obstruction is not offered by the less pretentious word, Colonists. There is, after all, something soluble, something convincing in the multum in parvo doctrine. So let us look for some key to the ulterior meaning of the great words of our day, in the lesser one, Colonists.

Looked at superficially, it is an exceedingly humble word. Judged by home feelings and unbroken heart-ties, it is chilly, like an easterly wind. Poverty, privation, despair, abandonment of kith, kin, the old hearthstone and country—to say nothing of the breaking of those tender links which, when once severed, can never be reunited—are all conveyed to the minds of the prosperous, by that experimental, vagabond-looking phrase. But to those who will take the trouble to look beneath the surface of meanings, the word becomes a very large one indeed. And to obtain some idea of its dimensions, it is only necessary to ask: "Who are the colonists? what are they? what did they emigrate for? will they ever come back? and, if they do not, what is it likely they will be or do in the course of years?"

"Who are the colonists?" That is easily answered. A small proportion of them are agricultural labourers, with sufficient independence left in them to seek a better market for their labour than that which at home enables them to starve, to see their families grow up around them in ignorance and degradation, with the only certain prospect before them of the gaol or the Union House. These people will carry more bitterness than regrets with them; the memory of home horrors will be more than a match for home longings; and, when once they have become settled, the sentiment which naturally springs from new associations, and a feeling of security as regards the future, will become entwined with their new existence, and the past will only be remembered as a hideous dream. The same thing precisely will occur with the next grade—operators from the manufacturing districts, mechanics, carpenters, bricklayers, tailors, shoemakers; with the addition, that these latter classes carry with them a larger amount of independence, a spirited tone of thought, a budget of dogged opinions on church and state matters, and a certain consequentialness, which, even at home, is considered dangerous. Such men, of all others, will have the least veneration for either the mother country, or anything connecting the land of their adoption with the mother country. At home they were Chartists or Socialists, and abroad they naturally become revolutionists. The change in their condition produces a corresponding change in their ideas and habits. They leave their old chrysolite state of churlishness and moodiness, and in the free air of a colony step forth fully-born men.

The last and least numerous, but most influential class, are the young men of some little means, who, disdaining to drudge on at home, seek a wider and richer field for their enterprise and energy.

In the days of Elizabeth and James, these adventurous spirits turned freebooters: they eased the Spaniard of his gold with all the sang froid of a good-for-nothing "ne'er-do-well" acquaintance, who is perpetually teasing you to do a little bill for him. Now they turn their attention to commerce, to speculation, to gold-digging. They are not troubled with much sentiment about father-land: their country is the country where they can earn a living, or make a fortune. In the colonies they become traders, merchants, lawyers, magistrates, and judges—an importance they never could have obtained at home; and it would be supposing that the laws of necessity and circumstances could be reversed in their case, to imagine they had the slightest political affinity with, or affection for, institutions out of the land in which they have been so prosperous and so honoured. In Australia, now the accepted type of all our colonies, there are the descendants of the convict population, men imbued with a traditional resentment—who hate England, and everything English. So that, if we take these elements of a future population, and bear in mind that with all classes the grand text is—

"That country is our home where we can earn a living or make a fortune"—after some little dispassionate consideration, it will not be very difficult to conceive what the future of Australia and all our colonies will be. And that, we confidently pronounce, will be separation and independence. The precedent established by the descendants of precisely the same description of emigrants to the United States, will be closely followed—for it seems to be a law with the Anglo-Saxon race, that they must judge for themselves, pro loco et tempore. They must have political as well as geographical independence. This is now in a great degree an accomplished fact. Canada has a local legislature, so has the Cape of Good Hope, New South Wales, and, by the time these remarks are published, so will all the colonies in Australia, except the western, which, at present, it is proposed to reserve for convicts. When the mother country grants so much voluntarily, reserving to itself only a veto and a kind of executorial control, it is easy to foresee what will be the denouement. New circumstances, fresh social conditions, and a multiplication of interests which owe nothing to the parent state, must necessarily demand to be ruled by regulations of their own manufacture; and when that condition has once taken firm hold of the public mind of such energetic, iron-willed men as Anglo-Saxon colonists, there will not be much deliberation before the flag of independence is hoisted, and the governor, or governor-general, as the case may be, quietly shipped off to England.

Whether that would be a calamity or not to this country, it is not our purpose to inquire; at present, our opinion is, that, except to the mongrel race of place-hunters, it would make no difference either way. But we think we have written enough to show that Colonies and Colonists are really portentous words. They are indices to conditions surpassingly grand in material wealth and character. But to this country in the present day, it strikes us very forcibly, that, as machinery has given Great Britain a monopoly in the supply of manufactures to two-thirds of the globe, large masses of its working population—300,000 annually—are thrown off as a superabundance, to feed these colonies, and lay firm the foundations of future empires.

This being the case, we can perceive no moral difference between the policy of this country, with respect to certain portions of its population, and the United States of America. As the planters in Virginia raise negroes to dispose of to the proprietors of the unexhausted soils in neighbouring states, so does England, relying with confidence and exultation upon her prodigious machinery, raise men and women to populate other countries, and enable her to retain at home only the great and the rich, and a raw material for future operations, in the shape of an ever-abiding quantity of squalid, time-serving, but ever-useful poverty.

J. P. H.

FIGHT WITH A JAGUAR, OR AMERICAN TIGER.

A CORRESPONDENT of The Galveston News gives an account of a desperate fight between a Mr. Absalom Williams, who is about seventy years of age, his wife, and an enormous tiger, which occurred about the 1st of December last, at Mr. Williams's residence. While Mr. and Mrs. Williams were sitting in their house, the rest of the family being absent, they were startled by a strange noise in the yard. Mr. Williams, on going out, discovered his dog engaged with a tiger. He seized an ox-yoke and aimed a blow at the beast, but, missing it, struck his dog, which immediately retreated. In an instant the tiger sprang upon Mr. Williams, and, seizing him by the hand, jerked him about twenty feet. The old gentleman, finding himself in the too powerful grasp of the wild animal, courageously determined to give it the best "rough and tumble fight" in his power, and, having no weapon within reach, he seized the tiger by the throat with the other hand, and throwing his whole strength forward, bore the animal to the ground, both falling side by side.

At this time Mrs. Williams came to the rescue, with a gun, which she snapped at the tiger, but there being no priming in the pan, it did not go off. Mr. Williams then, with one arm round the tiger's body, and grasping its throat with his other hand, by an effort disengaged himself. The tiger, discovering a new adversary in the person of Mrs. Williams, jumped at her, and attempted to grasp her head within its jaws, while it struck and lacerated her breast with its fore paws. She tried to avoid the monster, but was felled to the ground. The tiger made another grasp at her head, his upper teeth penetrating at the top of the skull and, sliding along the bone, peeled off the skin till they met the lower teeth, which penetrated on the right side of her face. In the meantime Mr. Williams had seized the ox-yoke again, and, giving the tiger a tremendous blow, caused it to leave Mrs. Williams, when it leaped into the house and got under the bed. The door was immediately closed, and the monster secured. Mr. Williams was exhausted from the effects of his wounds, from which the blood flowed in streams; but not so his wife. When she saw their foe attempt to take possession of their house, she determined to finish the battle, and, notwithstanding the severity of her wounds, her dress almost entirely torn from her person, and covered with blood, she deliberately took the gun, and, shaking some powder from the barrel into the pan, placed the muzzle between one of the openings which the logs of the house afforded, and fired with steady and deadly aim. The tiger was killed. When subsequently measured, it was found to be twelve feet from the tip of the tail to its nose. During all the time the fight was progressing no one was within hearing. Mr. Williams's nearest neighbour lives three miles off. However, as Mrs. Williams was washing the blood from her person, a neighbour came riding by, and, alarmed at her appearance, inquired the cause. The old lady, unable from the loss of blood to speak, pointed to the dead body of the tiger. The escape of Mr. and Mrs. Williams is indeed wonderful, and they are now recovering gradually from their wounds. Mr. Williams jokes about the tiger fight, and intimates that the old lady was most enraged when the "varmint" took possession of his bed and house.

THE DASH.—I am not sure whether it is to Brougham or to Jeffrey, to both, or to the "Edinburgh Review," in general, that we are indebted for that great revolution in English literature and style, effected by the abolition of punctuation and the institution of the dash, for colon, semi-colon, comma, and often period. No doubt the great quantity of steam-power given to thought required it. Words now run on a rail, of which the dash is the visible portion. Of old, they used to rumble on a paved road, at the rate of some four or five miles an hour. But by the aid of the dash, the English pen has learned to run express, and at a speed such as a new intelligence acquired.

THE CALENDAR OF FLORA.—The bursting of the leaves and opening of the flowers of the same plants are so constant to their times (their appointed times, as we are naturally led to call them), that such occurrences might be taken as indications of the times of the year. It has been proposed in this way to select a series of botanical facts which should form a calendar, and this has been termed a calendar of Flora. Thus, if we consider the time of putting forth leaves, the honeysuckle protrudes them in the month of January; the gooseberry, currant, and elder, in the end of February, or beginning of March; the willow, elm, and lime trees, in April; the oak and ash, which are always the latest amongst trees, in the beginning or towards the middle of May. In the same manner the flowering has its regular time: the mezezon and the snowdrop push forth their flowers in February; the primrose in the month of March; the cowslip in April; the great mass of plants in May and June; many in July, August, and September; some not till the month of October—as the meadow saffron; and some not till the approach and arrival of winter—as the laurestinus and arbutus.—Whewell's Bridgewater Treatise.

PEDESTRIANISM EXTRAORDINARY.—At Callandar, some time since, a boy, of the name of M'Nab, was sent by his mother to the post with a pair of shoes, which were to be delivered in Stirling that night. On his way to the post-office, the little fellow was met by two or three "chums," and they soon started a game at marbles. Game after game was played, and the shoes were forgotten. The result was, that when he called at the office, he was told that the "man and the gig were off" a few minutes previous. Without a moment's delay, the boy commenced the chase. After a mile or two of hard running, and not coming up to the object of his desire, he threw his own shoes and stockings in a hedge, to hide until his return. The chase was then resumed with redoubled vigour. More than once he was attacked on the road by acquaintances to give up; but no—he went, until the first sight he saw of the "man and the gig" was in King Street, here. The gig had arrived only half an hour previous. When about to give up the shoes to the post, the thought occurred to him that he would deliver them to the party himself, which he accordingly did, and thus secured the twopence at first intended for their freight. Next morning he left Stirling at the same time the post did, and he was not above ten minutes behind him in arriving at Callandar, having thus nearly beat the royal mail! Our pedestrian has added another laurel to the noble clan, and is well exemplified in their motto—"Dreadnought."—Stirling Observer.

A POEM—FOR MOTHERS ONLY.

The hour arrives, the moment wished and feared,
The child is born, by many a pang endeared.
And now the mother's ear has caught his cry:
Oh, grant the cherub to her asking eye!
He comes! she clasps him, to her bosom pressed,
He drinks the balm of life, and drops to rest.
She, by her smile, how soon the stranger knows
How soon by his the glad discovery shows!
As to her lips she lifts the lovely boy,
What answering looks of sympathy and joy
He walks—he speaks—in many a broken word,
His wants, his wishes, and his griefs are heard;
And ever, ever, to her lap he flies,
Where rosy sleep comes on with sweet surprise.
Locked in her arms, his arms across her flung,
That name most dear for ever on his tongue.
As with soft accents round her neck he clings,
And cheek to cheek her lulling song she sings,
How blest to feel the beating of his heart,
Breathe his sweet breath, and kiss for kiss impart,
Watch o'er his slumbers, like the brooding dove,
And, if she can, exhaust a mother's love!

[HERNE'S OAK, WINDSOR FOREST.]

HERNE THE HUNTER.

OF arborescent celebrities, none takes a higher rank than "Herne's Oak." This arises from the wild legend attached to it, and from Shakspeare's notice of it in the "Merry Wives of Windsor."

There is an old tale goes, that Herne the Hunter, Sometime a keeper here in Windsor Forest, Doth all the winter time, at still midnight, Walk round about an oak, with great ragged horns; And there he blasts the tree, and takes the cattle; And makes milch-kine yield blood, and shakes a chain In a most hideous and dreadful manner: You have heard of such a spirit; and well you know The superstitious, idle-headed old Received, and did deliver to our age This tale of Herne the Hunter for a truth.

To discover the particular oak of the extract just given, has been the desire of numerous individuals; and the differences of opinion resulting from the investigation have been a fruitful source of controversy. Mr. Charles Knight and Mr. Jesse are the latest combatants. The latter addressed the following letter to the editor of the "Times" newspaper, on the 28th of November, 1838, in support of the oak which he had figured and described as "Herne's Oak," in his "Gleanings of Natural History."

"To set the matter at rest, I will now repeat the substance of some information given to me relative to Herne's Oak, by Mr. Ingalt (Engall), the present respectable bailiff and manager of Windsor Home Park. He states that he was appointed to that situation by George III., about forty years ago. On receiving his appointment, he was directed to attend upon the king at the castle; and on arriving there, he found his majesty with 'the old Lord Winchilsea.' After a little delay, the king set off to walk in the park, attended by Lord Winchilsea; and Mr. Ingalt was desired to follow them. Nothing was said to him, until the king stopped opposite an oak tree; he then turned to Mr. Ingalt, and said, 'I brought you here to point out this tree to you: I commit it to your especial charge; and take care that no damage is ever done to it. I had rather that every tree in the park should be cut down than that this tree should be hurt. This is Herne's Oak.' Mr. Ingalt added, that this was the tree still standing near Queen Elizabeth's Walk, and is the same tree which I have mentioned and given a sketch of in my 'Gleanings of Natural History.' Sapless and leafless it certainly is, and its rugged bark has all disappeared:

Its boughs are mossed with age,
And high top bald with grey antiquity.

But there it stands—and long may it do so—an object of interest to every admirer of our immortal bard."

After careful consultation of other authorities, we are inclined to agree with Mr. Jesse's opinion, and have therefore given a beautiful engraving of his tree, from an original drawing.

THE LEGEND OF HERNE THE HUNTER.

ABOUT the middle of the reign of Richard the Second, there was among the keepers of the forest a young man named Herne. He was expert beyond his fellows in all matters of woodcraft, and consequently in great favour with the king, who was himself devoted to the chase.

Whenever he stayed at Windsor Castle, King Richard would pass his time in hunting, hawking, or shooting with the long-bow; and on all these occasions the young keeper was his constant attendant. But in proportion as he grew in favour with the king, Herne was hated by his comrades, and they concerted together how to ruin him. All their efforts, however, were ineffectual, and rather tended to his advantage than injury.

One day, it chanced that the king hunted in the forest with his favourite, the Earl of Oxford, when a great head of deer was unharboured, and a tremendous chase ensued, the hart leading his pursuers within a few miles of Hungerford, whither the borders of the forest then extended. All the followers of the king, even the Earl of Oxford, had by this time dropped off, and the royal huntsman was only attended by Herne, who kept close behind him. At last, the hart, driven to desperation, stood at bay, and gored the king's horse as he came up, in such manner that it reared and threw its rider. Another instant, and the horns of the infuriated animal would have been plunged into the body of the king, if Herne had not flung himself between the prostrate monarch and his assailant, and received the stroke intended for him. Though desperately wounded, the young hunter contrived slightly to raise himself, and plunged his knife into the hart's throat, while the king regained his feet.

Gazing with concern at his deliverer, King Richard demanded what he could do for him.

"Nothing, sire—nothing," replied Herne, with a groan. "I shall require nothing but a grave from you, for I have received a wound that will speedily bring me to it!"

"Not so, I trust, good fellow," replied the king, in a tone meant to be encouraging, though his looks shewed that his heart misgave him "my best leech shall attend you."

"No skill will avail me now," replied Herne, sadly. "A hurt from hartshorn bringeth to the bier."

"I hope the proverb will not be justified in thy case," rejoined the king; "and I promise thee, if thou dost recover, thou shalt have the post of head-keeper of the forest, with twenty nobles a-year for wages. If, unhappily, thy forebodings are realised, I will give the same sum to be laid out in masses for thy soul."

"I humbly thank your highness," replied the young man, "and I accept the latter offer, seeing it is the only one likely to profit me."

With this, he put his horn to his lips, and, winding the dead moat feebly, fell back senseless. Much moved, the king rode off for succour; and, blowing a lusty call on his bugle, was presently joined by the Earl of Oxford and some of his followers, among whom were the keepers. They all hastened with the king to the spot, where the body was lying stretched out beside that of the hart.

"It is almost a pity his soul cannot pass away thus," said the king, gazing compassionately at him; "for he will only revive to anguish and speedy death."

"Your highness is right," replied the chief keeper, Osmond Crooke, kneeling beside him, and half-drawing his hunting-knife; "it were better to put him out of his misery."

"What! slay the man who has just saved my own life!" cried the king. "I will consent to no such infamous deed. I would give a large reward to any one who could cure him."

As the words were uttered, a tall, dark man, in a strange garb, and mounted on a black, wild-looking steed, whom no one had hitherto observed, sprang to the ground, and advanced towards the king.

"I take your offer, sire," said the personage, in a harsh voice. "I will cure him."

"Who art thou, fellow?" demanded King Richard, doubtfully.

"I am a forester," replied the tall man; "but I understand somewhat of chirurgery and leechcraft."

"And woodcraft, too, I'll be sworn, fellow!" said the king. "Thou hast, or I am mistaken, made free with some of my venison."

"Make good thy words, fellow!" replied the king, after a pause; "and thou shalt not only be amply rewarded, but shalt have a free pardon for any offence thou may'st have committed!"

"Enough!" replied Urswick; and, taking a large, keen-edged hunting-knife from his girdle, he cut off the head of the hart close to the point where the neck joins the skull, and then laid it open, from the extremity of the under lip to the neck. "This must be bound on the head of the wounded man," he said.

The keepers stared in astonishment. But the king commanded that the strange order should be obeyed. Upon which the bleeding skull was fastened upon the head of the keeper with leathern thongs.

"I will now answer for his perfect cure in a month's time!" said Urswick to the king; "but I shall require to watch over him myself till all danger is at an end! I pray your highness to command these keepers to transport him to my hut!"

"You hear what he says, knaves!" cried the king—"do his bidding, and carefully, or ye shall answer to me with your lives!"

Accordingly, a litter was formed with branches of trees, and on this the body of Herne, with the hart's head still bound to it, was conveyed by the keepers to Urswick's hut, situated in the wildest part of Bagshot Heath. After placing the body upon a bed of dried fern, the keepers were about to depart, when Osmond observed to the forester:

"Thou art Arnold Sheafe, who was outlawed for deer-stealing!"

"It matters not who I am, since I have the king's pardon!" replied the other, laughing disdainfully. "My name is Philip Urswick!"

"Thou hast yet to earn thy pardon!" said Osmond.

"Leave that to me," replied Urswick. "There is more fear that thou wilt lose thy post as chief keeper, which the king has promised Herne, than that I shall fail!"

"Would the deer had killed him outright!" growled Osmond; and the savage wish was echoed by the other keepers.

"I see you all hate him bitterly," said Urswick. "What will ye give me for revenge?"

"We have little to give, save a fat buck on occasions," replied Osmond; "and, in all likelihood, thou canst help thyself to venison!"

"Will you swear to grant the first request I make to you, provided it shall be in your power?" demanded Urswick.

"Readily!" they replied.

"Enough!" said Urswick. "I must keep faith with the king. Herne will recover, but he will lose all his skill as an archer—all his craft as a hunter!"

"If thou canst accomplish this, thou art the fiend himself!" cried Osmond, trembling.

"Fiend or not," replied Urswick, with a triumphant laugh, "ye have made a compact with me, and must fulfil it! Now begone; I must attend to the wounded man."

And the keepers, full of secret misgivings, departed.

At the time promised, Herne, attended by Urswick, presented himself to the king. He looked thin and pale, but all danger was past. King Richard gave the forester a purse of nobles, and added a silver bugle to the gift. He then appointed Herne his chief keeper; hung a chain of gold round his neck, and ordered him to be lodged in the castle. About a week after this, Herne, having entirely regained his strength, accompanied the king on a hunting expedition to the forest, and they had scarcely entered it, when his horse started, and threw him. Such an accident had never before happened to him, for he was an excellent horseman; and he rose greatly discomfited, while the keepers eyed each other askance. Soon after this, a buck was started; and, though Herne was bravely mounted on a black steed, bestowed on him on account of its swiftness by the king, he was the last in the chase.

"Thou art out of practice!" said the king, laughingly, as he came up.

"I know not what ails me," replied Herne, gloomily.

"It cannot be thy steed's fault," said the king; "for he is usually as fleet as the wind. But I will give thee an opportunity of gaining credit in another way. Thou seest yon buck. He cannot be seventy yards off; and I have seen thee hit the mark at twice the distance. Bring him down."

Herne raised his cross-bow, and let fly the bolt; but it missed its mark, and the buck, startled by the noise, dashed down the brake, wholly unharmed. The king's brow grew dark, Herne uttered an exclamation of rage and despair, and the keepers congratulated each other in secret.

Again Herne went forth to hunt with the king, and his failures made him the laughing-stock of the party. Richard, at length, dismissed him with these words: "Take repose for a week, and then thou shalt have a further trial. If thou dost not then succeed, I must, perforce, discharge thee from thy post."

Instead of returning to the castle, Herne rode off wildly into the forest, where he remained till eventide. He then returned with ghastly looks and a strange appearance—having the links of a rusty chain which he had plucked from a gibbet hanging from his left arm, and the hart's antlered skull fixed upon his head. His whole demeanour showed that he was crazed. After committing great extravagancies, he burst from all restraint, and disappeared among the trees of the forest. An hour after this, a man found him suspended by a rope from a branch of an oak-tree (now known as Herne's Oak). Despair had driven him to the dreadful deed. Instead of cutting him down, the man ran to the castle, to relate what he had witnessed; and the keepers, satisfied that their revenge was now fully accomplished, hastened to the tree. But the body was gone; and all that proclaimed it had been there, was the rope hanging from the branch. Search was made in all parts, but without effect.

On that night a terrible thunder-storm occurred, and during its continuance, the oak on which Herne had hanged himself was blasted by the lightning.

Osmond was immediately reinstated in his post of chief keeper; but he had little time for rejoicing, for he found that the same spell that had bound Herne had fallen upon him. His arrows went wide of their mark, his hounds lost their scent, and his falcon would not be lured back. Half frantic, he feigned illness, and left his comrade, Roger Barefoot, to take his place. But the same ill-luck befel Barefoot, and he returned in awful plight, without a single head of game. Four others being equally unfortunate, the whole of them resolved to consult Urswick, who, they doubted not, could remove the spell. Accordingly, they went to Bagshot Heath, and related their story to him. When they had done, he said:

"The curse of Herne's blood is upon you, and can only be removed in one way. As you return to the castle, go to the tree on which he destroyed himself, and you may learn how to act."

It was midnight, and pitchy dark, as they came up to the fatal oak. All at once, a blue flame appeared, flitted thrice round the tree, and then remained stationary, its light falling upon a figure in a wild garb, with a rusty chain hanging from its left arm, and an antlered helm on its head. They knew it to be Herne, and instantly fell down before him, while a burst of terrible laughter sounded in their ears. Without heeding them further, the spirit darted round the tree, rattling its chain, and uttering appalling imprecations. It then stopped, and turning to the terrified beholders, bade them, in a hollow voice, bring hounds and horses, as for the chase, on the following night, and vanished. They obeyed the spirit's command; when Herne called to Osmond to bring him his steed. In an instant the mysterious being vaulted on its back, and then cried:

"To the forest—to the forest!"

With this he dashed forward, and the whole party, hounds and men, hurried after him. They had ridden at a furious pace for several miles over the Great Park, where Herne halted before a huge beech-tree, when he dismounted, and pronounced certain mystic words.

A flash of fire burst from the roots of the tree, and the forester Urswick stood before them.

"Welcome, Herne!" he cried; "welcome, lord of the forest! And you, his comrades, welcome, too! The time is come for the fulfilment of your promise to me. I require you to form a band for Herne the Hunter, and to serve him as a leader."

Not daring to refuse compliance, the keepers took a fearful oath to obey him. As soon as it was uttered, Urswick vanished, as he came, in a flash of fire. Herne now blew a strike on his horn, rode swiftly on, and, a stag being unharmed, the chase commenced. Many a fat buck was hunted and slaughtered that night; and, an hour before daybreak, Herne commanded them to lay the four finest at the foot of the beech-tree, and then dismissed them, bidding them meet him, at midnight, at the scathed oak in the Home Park. Night after night they thus went forth, thinning the herds of deer, and committing other ravages and depredations.

At last the king, getting intelligence of these strange doings, was determined to ascertain the truth of the statement. He therefore ordered the keepers to attend him one night in an expedition to the forest. Much alarmed, Osmond endeavoured, by representing the risk he would incur, to dissuade him from the enterprise; but he would not be deterred, and the keepers now gave themselves up for lost.

When the king and his attendants came to the oak, the figure of Herne, mounted on a black steed, was discerned beneath it. Deep fear fell on all the beholders, but chiefly upon the guilty keepers, at the sight. The king, however, pressed forward, and cried:

"Why dost thou disturb the quietude of night, accursed spirit?"

"Because I desire vengeance!" replied Herne. "I was brought to my present woful condition by Osmond and his comrades."

"But you died by your own hand, did you not?" demanded the king.

"Yes," replied Herne; "but I was driven to the deed by an infernal spell laid upon me by the malice of the wretches I have denounced. Hang them upon this tree, and I will trouble these woods no longer while thou reignest!"

The king looked round at the keepers. They all remained obdurate except Barefoot, who, falling on his knees, confessed his guilt, and accused the others.

"It is enough!" cried the king to Herne; "they shall all suffer for their offence!"

Upon this a flash of fire enveloped the spirit and his horse, and he vanished.

The king kept his word. Osmond and his comrades were all hanged upon the scathed tree; nor was Herne seen again in the forest while Richard sat upon the throne. But he reappeared with a new band at the commencement of the rule of Henry IV., and hunted the deer at night. His hand was destroyed, but he defied all attempts at capture.

RHYMING DIALOGUES.

I TELL thee, wife, I'll have our daughter bred
To book'ry, cook'ry, thimble, needle, thread;
Make her expert and ready at her prayers,
That God may keep her from the devil's snares;
Teach her what's useful; how to shun deluding;
To roast, to toast, to boil and mix a pudding;
To knit, to spin, to sew, to make, to mend;
To scrub, to rub, to earn, and not to spend;
With all such hussify as well becomes
A wife for one that deals in mops and brooms:
That when she's wed, she may not think it scandal
To serve a neighbour with a farthing candle.

FACETIÆ.

AN artist painted a cannon so naturally the other day, that when he finished the touch-hole, it "went off."

"SAM, did you see Mr. Jenkins, the new overseer?" "Yes, massa, I meet him down by de cotton-gin." "He's a good-looking fellow, isn't he?" "Well, massa, he talks like a good-looking man: he made a bow—dat's all he said."

"MADAM," said a cross-tempered physician to a patient, "if women were admitted to Paradise, their tongues would make it a purgatory." "And some physicians, if allowed to practise there," replied the lady, "would soon make it a desert."

A late celebrated judge, who stooped very much when walking, had a stone thrown at him one day, which fortunately passed over without hitting him. Turning to his friend, he remarked: "Had I been an upright judge that might have caused my death!"

THE Toledo Blade tells a good story of one of the land-owners of that thriving city, who was offered, for an eligible lot, as many silver dollars as would cover it. He took a night to consider the offer, and agreed next morning to accept it, on condition that the dollars were placed upon their edges.

A chemist in Albany, a few days ago, expatiating on the late discoveries in chemical science, observed, that snow had been found to possess a considerable degree of heat. An Irishman present, at this remark observed, "that truly chemistry was a valuable science," and (anxious that the discovery might be made profitable) inquired of the orator what number of snow-balls would be sufficient to boil a tea-kettle.

THE advertisement of a Scotch Linen House, conveys the following information, which we transfer to our pages for the benefit of newly-married couples: "A lot of babies, very rich, long robes, elaborately worked, original cost from £2 to £5, slightly injured, and marked 16s. 6d. to 43s. 6d." There is either some indifferent punctuation about this, or else it must be regarded as a positive realisation of that well-known trade announcement—"Families Supplied!"

HOW TO GET THE GIRLS MARRIED.—A thriving trader in Wisconsin, claiming the paternity of eleven daughters, greatly to the astonishment of his neighbours, succeeded in marrying them all off in six months. A neighbour of his, who had likewise several single daughters, called upon him to obtain the secret of his husband-making success, when the latter informed him he had made it a rule, after a young man had paid his attention to one of his girls a fortnight, to call upon him with a revolver, and request him to choose between death and matrimony! "You can imagine," continued he, "which of the two they preferred."

"MR. JONES, you said that Mr. Rozin was a composer. Does the court understand from that, that he was a writer of music?" "No, sir; he's called a composer, because he never talks to a man without putting him to sleep."

A GOOD PRICE FOR A LADY'S TOOTH.—M. A. Lenoir, the founder of the French Museum, relates, that during the transport of the remains of Abelard and Heloise to the Petits Augustins, an Englishman offered him £4000 for one of the teeth of Heloise.

A young Thespian was once intrusted to deliver the following message to Lord Randolph, in the play: "My lord; the banquet waits!" But having lost the run of the sentence, he called out, amid the roars of the audience: "Mr. Randolph, your supper has been ready for some time!"

BELOW PAR.—Some literary and scientific gentlemen one day dined with Mr. Hogg, at his farm of Mt. Benger, when it was mentioned by some one as a strange thing that Mr. Parr should have been lately married in a somewhat clandestine way, and that nobody knew who his wife was, or anything about her. "Ah!" said the shepherd, "I am afraid she must have been a little below Par!"

"DEBBY, the door-bell rings, and you must run, light the match, and touch the shavings, and let the sticks and brands get on fire in the fire-place, or they will think we don't keep a fire in the sitting-room, and that would not be genteel." "Yes'm—there—it is all roaring, and the bell rings again—shall I go now?" "Yes." "Oh, Lord, marm, it was only a pedlar!" "A pedlar! Confound him—take the fire apart, and get ready for another alarm!"

SIR FRANCIS HEAD says: "It is no use any longer trying to conceal the fact, that during my short tour in Ireland my prejudices against bare ankles and naked feet were considerably softened; indeed, there can be no doubt that there is a freshness in this costume of Nature that cannot belong to a fine fashionable gown, which, from sweeping the ground, and from being tightly bandaged round the waist, forms a splendid unventilated palace, in which the architect has forgotten to insert either chimney, staircase, door, or window!"

THE SCHOOLMASTER WANTED.—The following is a copy of a bill sent to a gentleman some time since:

assafœta	1 50
atacainonimomagin	50
	2 00

Pade, Josef—

Can any of our readers interpret it? At first we took it for apothecaries' Latin; judge our surprise, then, when the key was given to us, to find the above inscrutable items were simply these: "A horse half a day," and "a taking of him home again."

A weekly newspaper thinks it is the first duty of tea-totallers to get the duty off tea, totally.

"CAPITAL PUNISHMENT," as the boy said when the schoolmistress seated him with the girls.

ANYTHING BUT CU-RIOUS.—A "marker" asking a raw amateur to play a match of billiards with him, received the answer of the latter, "that he was not in the cue for it!"

GENIAL.—"Bob," said a townsman to a farmer, "which do you like best, the long evenings or the short ones?" "Why," replied Tom, "I prefer the short 'uns, because they be summery!" (summary.)

"JACK! does the kettle boil?" the father cried.

"No, 'tis a block, sir!" the son replied.

"A block?" "Yes, sir! I'll prove it by the metal; For a block tin must be a tin block kettle."

"Logic: you're clever, boy! I plainly see; So, with the blocks content, pray make my tea.

Now, Jack, 'tis my turn: turn your block aside; Pray take your knife, and that nice tongue divide."

"Block, sir! You something mean instead?"

"No, Jack—your head block proves you a blockhead!"

A HINT TO THE CITY CORPORATION.—As the tax upon coals in the City of London has recently been discussed with a view to its removal, we would suggest that the Corporation should study the law on the subject. Under all circumstances they could not consult a better work than Coke upon Little ton; especially where short measure is concerned.

HEADS v. TAILS.—Danielo, the Montenegrin Prince, has forbidden his soldiers to cut off the heads of the fallen Turks. Query. Supposing a Pacha of many tails to fall into the hands of the Montenegrins, would they cut them off? In that case, a Montenegrin might exultingly exclaim: "Heads I win—tails you lose!"

HAIR PAPER AT A DISCOUNT.—In the Scottish game of "Curling," the ceremony of using paper is dispensed with. What would our fair readers think of a good curling match without the almost indispensable play-bill or tissue paper so frequently used for the purpose of adding a charm to their flowing tresses?

WHAT NEXT?—A new umbrella, called the "Mush-room," has made its appearance in Paris: it has no handle, and sustains itself over the head of the wearer. An adjusting apparatus fastens it to the hat, and when not employed on duty, it may be rolled up, and carried in the pocket.

RAYS FROM THE LANTERN.—Stricken Youth (just beginning to make himself agreeable): "You are an artist, are you not, Miss Georgina?" Diffident, but Encouraging Young Lady: "No, I regret to say that I have no talent for that accomplishment." The aforesaid Youth, somewhat surprised: "Dear me, why our mutual friend, Miss Tattle, told me that you painted!"

PLEASANT SURGICAL ADVICE.—For the inconvenience of a fractured thigh, Hippocrates prescribes this: "In a fracture of the thigh, the extension ought to be particularly great, the muscles being so strong that, notwithstanding the effect of the bandages, the contraction is apt to shorten the limb. This is a deformity so deplorable, that, where there is reason to apprehend it, I would advise the patient to suffer the other thigh to be broken also, in order to have them both of one length."

WHY DON'T YOU MARRY?—Shrove Tuesday was observed, as usual, at Southport and the neighbourhood, as a day of visiting and "pancake turning." At Crosby a custom prevails of unmarried ladies being licensed to pull grey hairs from bachelors' heads, while the unblessed wight is enjoying (?) the pancake. The ladies, at least the unmarried ones, when told the practice is cruel, only say, "Oh! serve them right; they ought to get married before their hair turns grey!" Of course, there is no reasoning against such an extinguishing argument as this.

WHIMS OF AN EMPRESS.—We learn that the new French Empress had ordered, as part of her trousseau, two dresses for the civil marriage—one in rose-coloured satin, covered with point d'Angleterre, and the other in white satin, covered with point d'Alençon; but as the ceremony only occupied about an hour, it was quite a mystery to us of what use two dresses could be. It seems, however, that the fastidious bride had not been able to make up her mind which of the two she would prefer, and thought it the safer course to order both.—Scottish Press.

INGENUITY OF A SAILOR.—Several sailors on board of a vessel had brought a supply of leaf-tobacco with them. How were they to escape the revenue Cerberus at the gate? "I have it," said one of them, hitting upon an idea, and scratching his head with glee. "I'll jump into the dock, and while they're making a great fuss to save me, you bolt with the leaf!" It was immediately carried out. The tar, who was almost amphibious, plunged into the dock, crying at the same time lustily for help. The alarm was given, lights procured, and the officers from every part attracted to the scene, and while the search and the uproar continued, the companions of the apparently drowning man got safely away.

ADVICE OF AN OLD LADY.—Now, John, listen to me, for I am older than you, or I could not be your mother. Never do you marry a young woman, John, before you have contrived to happen at the house where she lives, at least four or five times before breakfast. You should know how late she lies in bed in the morning. You should take notice whether her complexion is the same in the morning as it is in the evening, or whether the morning wash and the towel have robbed her of her evening bloom. You should take care to surprise her, so that you may see her in her morning dress, and observe how her hair looks, when she is not expecting you. You should hear the morning conversation between her and her mother. If she is ill-natured and snappish to her mother, so she will be to you, depend on it. But if you find her up and dressed neatly in the morning, with the same countenance, the same smiles, the same neatly-combed hair, the same ready and pleasant answers to her mother, which characterised her appearance and deportment in the evening—and particularly if she is lending a hand to get the breakfast ready in good season—she is a prize, John, and the sooner you secure her to yourself the better.

CUT AND COME AGAIN.—A Quaker one day, in taking his usual walk before dinner, chanced to meet with a friend whom he had not seen for a long time, and, after a hearty shake of the hand, and a little friendly conversation, he asked the friend (in their usual mode) to go home with him, saying, "Friend, wilt thee go and stick thy fork in my pudding to-day?" The friend replied in the affirmative: "Thank thee, neighbour, I will," and so the two Quakers trudged off home together. Well, in consequence of the friend being just off a journey, and a good trencherman also, he stuck his fork not only in his pudding, but in his meat also; and, having passed his plate so many times, and being almost ashamed to do so again without making an excuse, he says, "Neighbour, according to custom, I cuts and comes again!" "Well, friend," replies the Quaker, "thee shalt cut as long as thee thinks proper, now thee beest here, but come again thee never shalt!"

ANDERSON, THE WIZARD, SOLD BY A YANKEE.

PROFESSOR ANDERSON was looking over the American and foreign newspapers, in the office of the New York Dutchman, when he saw that he was closely scrutinised by a gentleman of tall stature and swarthy appearance, and who was evidently from the country. The following conversation took place:

"I say! are you Professor Anderson, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"Wal, you're a tarnation smart man, I hear. You aint got that are bottle of yourn with ye—have you?"

"No, sir."

"Wal, I'm from down East, having been raised in Maine, and I should like to purchase a duplicate of that are bottle, as I am going out stumping for —. I guess if I had your bottle, or its twin-brother, I'd soon swamp the Scotties, without talking politics, either!"

"I never carry my bottle with me, nor have I a duplicate of it."

"Sorry for that, sir," said the — stumper. "However," he continued, "I was once taught a trick when a boy, but I almost forget how the thing was done, now, I'll tell you how it was, stranger, as near as I can. I used to take a red cent, and change it into a ten-dollar gold piece."

"Oh," said the professor, "that is quite simple: a mere trick of sleight of hand."

"Wal, I know it's not very difficult, but as I forget how, will you show me?" At the same time handing a cent to the Wizard.

"Oh, yes, sir, if it will oblige you, I will show you in a moment. Hold your hand," said the Wizard. "This is your cent, is it not?"

"Yes, sir."

"Close your hand."

The down Easter closed his hand fast.

"Are you sure you have it?" said the Wizard.

"I guess I have," said he; "and I'll bet a dollar you can't change it into a ten-dollar gold piece."

"Done!" said the Wizard. "Now hold fast!"

"Yes, sir! I reckon I will—but stop! down with your dollar! here's mine!" said the Yankee.

She Wizard covered his dollar.

"Now, sir, are you ready?" said the Wizard.

"I aint nothing else!" said the down Easter.

"Change!" said the Wizard. "Now, sir, open your hand."

He did so, and, to his utter astonishment, he held a bona fide ten-dollar gold piece!

"Well, sir," said the Wizard, "you see you have lost your dollar?"

"I guess I have!" said he, handing over the two dollars.

"Now," said the professor, "I'll bet you another dollar I'll change the ten-dollar piece into your cent again, much quicker."

"No, yer don't!" said the gent from Maine, placing the ten dollars in his pocket, and buttoning up tight. "I'm much obliged to you, professor, but I reckon I'll leave it as it is! Good morning, old hoss!" said he, walking out of the office; and, turning round as he reached the door, he placed his digitals in a close approximation to his professor, saying: "I guess there aint anything green about this child!" and left the professor in utter amazement at his coolness.

INFORMATION FOR THE PEOPLE.

MR. DISRAELI, in the course of a debate in the House of Commons, laid down the startling doctrine, "that every minister is expected to know something about everything."

The result of this announcement has been just what might have been anticipated. Downing Street has been quite impassable ever since, by reason of the crowds who flock there daily to consult the government on various topics.

From Dorsetshire, "A Tenant Farmer" writes to ask if Lord John Russell will be kind enough to tell him if guano is a good manure for mangold wurzel?

"A Love-sick Maiden" wants to know whether Lord

Aberdeen considers men with whiskers can love as ardently and lastingly as men without.

"X. Y. Z." would like to know which kind of adhesive envelopes or sealing-wax Sir James Graham considers most secure.

"Susan Hopley" complains that her "Missus" won't allow no followers. Does the Marquis of Lansdowne think her justified in refusing her cousin, F 23, to come occasionally to tea?

"Marianne" would feel obliged if Lord John Russell would tell her how to work a chest of drawers in double-crochet.

"A Traveller" requests Lord Palmerston to inform him as to the cheapest and quickest route to Battersea.

"A Suitor" writes to Mr. Sidney Herbert thus: "My uncle, dying, leaves £500 to be divided as follows: his widow to take two-thirds, his nephews and nieces three-quarters, £250 to go to charities, and the other £400 to be paid to his creditors. What is my share?"

"Edwin" would feel obliged if Lord Aberdeen would tell him how to win the heart of "Emma," with whom he is madly in love.

"Emma" would thank the First Lord of the Treasury if he would advise her as to how she may obtain the love of "Edwin."

"Sam Hall" wants to know whether there is any chance of getting in at Baron Rothschild's back bed-room window.

"A Patient Waiter" begs to ask Lord John Russell, about what time—as near as he can reckon—does he really expect the arrival of "The Good Time Coming?"

These are a few out of the numerous inquiries received by her Majesty's government since the publication of Mr. Disraeli's speech. Perhaps, now the ministry find how dearly they have to pay for their own sagacity, they will be better fitted to understand the heavy pressure of the "Taxes on Knowledge."—Diogenes.

GOVERNMENT LABELS.

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced that he will permit the adulteration of coffee, on condition that to the packets sold by the grocers there shall be affixed labels bearing the words,

MIXTURE OF CHICORY AND COFFEE.

We understand that it is the intention of government to carry out this system, and to issue a series of labels to be used by other tradesmen. Among those already in preparation are:

For Jewellers' Gold Chains.—Mixture of Brass and Electro-plating.

For Porter.—Mixture of Thames mud, Spanish liquorice, and treacle.

For Warranted Indian Handkerchiefs.—Mixture of Silk and Cotton.

For Potted Bloaters.—Mixture of Sprats and Brick-dust.

For Milkpans.—Mixture of Water and Chalk.

For Snuff.—Mixture of Sand and Pepper.

For Pepper.—Mixture of Rice and Dust.

For Port Wine.—Mixture of Logwood and Brandy.

For Pale Sherry.—Mixture of Brown Sherry and Water.

We sincerely congratulate this commercial country upon the proposed approach to something like common honesty.—Punch.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

LITTLE thinks the ball-room beauty, when the tapers are almost burnt out, that the wax by whose light her charms have been exalted was once hidden in the bells and cups of innumerable flowers, shedding perfume over the silent valleys of the Susquehanna, or nodding at their own reflected colours in the waters of the Potomac or Delaware.

ALL the world are delighted to watch the young as they grow up together. To me it is not less delightful to see two creatures of distinct tempers and passions by degrees melting into one—to see how happy those may be who habitually prefer the happiness of another to their own; to see, finally, real love, like a flower blooming amid ruins, surviving the vigour of youth, and all those attractions on which it is thought to depend.

A TEAR.

OUT that the chemist's magic art

Could crystallise this sacred treasure!

Long should it glitter near my heart,

A secret source of pensive pleasure.

The little brilliant, ere it fell,

Its lustre caught from Chloe's eye;

Then melting left its coral cell—

The springs of sensibility!

Sweet drop of pure and pearly light!

In thee the rays of virtue shine,

More calmly clear, more mildly bright,

Than any gem that gilds the mine:

Design restorer of the soul,

Who ever fly'st to bring relief,

When first we feel the rude control

Of love or pity, joy or grief.

It is painful to grow old, to lose by degrees the suppleness, strength, and activity of the body; to perceive each day our organs growing weaker; but when we feel that the soul, constantly exercised, becomes daily more reflective, more mistress of herself, more skilful to avoid, more strong to sustain, without yielding to the shock of all accidents, gaining on the one hand what we lose on the other, we are no longer sensible of growing old.

MISCELLANEOUS.

POET LAUREATE.—The duty of the English poet laureate consists of the mere sinecure of composing an ode in honour of the sovereign, on the occasion of the ascension to the throne, or the coronation. It is generally bestowed on some poor man of letters, and is worth £300 per annum. Lord Byron once applied for the appointment, not certainly for the endowment, but possibly for the honour—more likely still for the joke of the thing; for Lord Byron's was no courtly muse, to strain its harp-strings in honour of royalty. The following letter was written by him to the lord chamberlain: "My lord, having many hours of idleness on my hands, and being an adept at versification, it would be not unacceptable to me to try the experiment of writing the laureate odes, in order to ascertain if that new pursuit would kill the ennui by which I am devoured. Being in politics between a Whig and a Jacobin, the subject of our sovereign's praise will have so much of the Romant in my eyes, as sufficiently to resemble the species of composition in which I am most successful. My desires, my lord, do not point at the perquisites or emoluments of the office. Wine I now loathe, money I detest, praise is irksome to me, and the world only one dull round of apathy and misanthropy. It is for the variety I undertake the task, and, if possible, to amuse the forlorn,"

BYRON.

AN EXTRAORDINARY STORY.—An extraordinary story is told by Captain Wallace, of a lover and his mistress, who were saved in a miraculous manner from the jaws of a shark: "A transport with part of a regiment on board, was sailing with a gentle breeze along the coast of Spain. One of the officers was leaning over the poop railing, conversing with a young lady who had inspired him with the tender passion. The fair one was in the act of handing a paper to her lover, when, overreaching herself, she fell into the sea, and, supported by her clothes, drifted astern. The officer lost no time in jumping in after her, and upheld her by one arm. The sails were quickly backed, the ship lay to, and preparations were made to lower the boat, when, to the dismay of all on board, a large shark appeared under the keel of the vessel, gliding towards its victims. A shout of terror from the agonised spectators called the attention of the officer to the approaching danger. He saw the monster, at length, near him; he made a desperate effort, plunged and splashed the water, so as to frighten the shark, which turned, and dived out of sight. The current had now carried the officer and lady close to the vessel, when the shark appeared a second time, and was in the act of turning on his back to seize the hapless pair, when a private of the officer's company, who was in the hammock nettings, jumped fearlessly overboard, with a bayonet in his hand, which he plunged into the back of the shark, which, instantly disappearing, the three were saved before he dared to make his reappearance."

THE HORSE-SHOES ON THE CHURCH DOOR.—Count Ernest, of Klettenberg, rode once, on a Sunday morning, to a great drinking match at Elrich. Many knights were invited thither to drink for a prize: the reward offered was a gold chain. The old, well-proved knights continued drinking for many hours, until the victory should be decided; and one here, and another there, fell under the influence of the monstrous bumpers, and were laid on the floor as poor weaklings, amid the loud, scornful laughter of their companions. At length, four only of the so-called noblemen remained on the battle field; and of these three leaned against the wall, exulting, with stammering tongues and trembling hands, that they could still hold the huge beaker. Only Ernest von Klettenberg could keep on his feet; who, seizing triumphantly the gold chain, which lay on the table, hung it round his neck. That he might show himself to the people as victor, he tottered out of the hall, and ordered his horse to be brought. Four esquires lifted him on the saddle, and he rode, amid the cries of the rushing multitude, through the town, on his way home to Klettenberg. As he passed through the suburb, he heard vespers being sung in the church, which was dedicated to St. Nicholas. Count Ernest, in his drunken frenzy, rode through the open door, in the midst of the assembled congregation, straight up to the altar. The song of devotion passed first into dumb astonishment, and then into a wild scream. But not long did Count Ernest enjoy his outrage. For as the spurred horse trod on the steps of the altar, oh, behold! oh, wonderful! its four shoes fell off, and it sank down together with its rider. In perpetual remembrance of this event, the four horse-shoes were nailed to the church door, where they remained for ages an object of wonder on account of their size, and of that awful catastrophe.—Bolin's Antiquarian Library.

THE PICTURE OF A PERFECT WIFE.

BY TENNYSON.

Eyes not down-dropt, nor over-bright, but fed
With the clear-pointed flame of chastity:

* * * * *

* * * * * Locks not wide disparted,

Madonna-wise, on either side her head;

Sweet lips, whereon perpetually did reign

The summer-calm of golden charity,

Were fixed shadows of thy fixed mood

Revered Isabel, the crown and head.

The stately flower of female fortitude.

Of perfect wife-hood and pure lowliness.

* * * * *

A courage to endure and to obey—

A hate of gossip parlance, and of sway—

Crowned Isabel, through all her placid life,

The Queen of Marriage—a most perfect wife.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. W. W.—A memoir of Mr. C. Kean was published in Vol. VII. of this Journal.

LIONEL LINCOLN.—The asphodel is useful in driving away rats and mice. These vermin have such an antipathy to this plant, that if their holes be stopped up with it, they will rather die than pass.

E. H.—Income-tax is levied on the aggregate income. It commences at £150 a year. It is a villanous tax, for it allows of no deductions for essential expenditure, and is therefore a tax on industry.

THESES.—Legacy duty is recoverable by government at any time. The penalty for non-payment is 10 per cent. on the legacy. Go immediately to the nearest distributor of stamps.

F. WATSON.—St. George's Channel is comprised within the geographical limits of the Atlantic Ocean.

TOM PINCH.—Hundreds of soldiers who fought at Waterloo are still in the British army. The majority of the general officers, from the commander-in-chief downwards, are all "Waterloo men." Those in the service now, who were privates on that memorable day, are chiefly non-commissioned officers.

X. Y. Z.—Write to the clerk of St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, London. Modern churches are not named after great battles.

AN ARTILLERYMAN.—The issue of medals in honour of great victories, is a very dilatory process with the British government. It was only the other day that the Peninsular medals were distributed. At that rate, you ought to let another ten years elapse before you begin to grumble about your Lahore decorations. But then it is the East India Company to whom you must look for the decoration.

THE ONE.—1. A person never voluntarily loses his property in money. But when a lost Bank of England note has passed through many hands, the innocent holders are not prejudiced. 2. Preaching in the pulpit is not prohibited by the Canons of England, but the bishop has authority to regulate the discipline to be observed in his diocese. But the colour of the gown does not determine the soundness of the doctrine.

R. W. A.—The following is a substitute for brass. Take pewter two parts, and zinc four parts. Fusible from 300 to 350 degrees.

J. E. W.—Choose almost any other profession in preference to that of the stage. Its respectability is unquestionable, but it is only the tritons who succeed—the minnows starve. At present there is no national theatre in England.

C. W. G.—The title of "Count" is not always territorial. It can be purchased on the continent for a mere trifle—in some of the gambling German principalities or duchies, for about £20 of our money. "Count" is an old Norman title; but in France, in the present day, counts, and other members of the old aristocracy, retain their titles among their own private friends by courtesy. With this exception, the title is about as respectable as "knight" is in England.

GEO. ROBERTS.—Strive to improve your worldly condition before you marry. At all events, don't marry a woman for her money. Unless there is more of the celestial in her than in the majority of her sex, she will be certain to taunt you with the circumstance of your dependence when the memory of the honeymoon has faded.

JOB BEANS.—Large eyes are considered handsome. Juno was called the ox-eyed. But it is not the most prominent eyes that are the largest. Some deep-set eyes are considerably larger than those that look as if they were being pushed from their sockets. The middle-sized eye—black, hazel, brown, grey, or blue—when fringed by a long, drooping lash, is considered the best formed either in man or woman.

P. HANLEY.—Your song breathes a sentiment that will be appreciated by-and-by. All manias are soon exhausted. But then the revolution: "Ay, there's the rub!"

They tell us of a wondrous land,
Far on a western shore;
Where all who toil, with heart and hand,
May find rich golden ore.
Great ships they build to voyage there,
And brave the stormy sea;
Let other hearts the dangers dare—
Old England's Isle for me.

They love to speak of countless wealth,
And would warm hearts allure;
They never tell of loss of health,
While riches they secure.
They love to paint in colours bright,
The pleasures all may see;
But home is dearer to my sight—
Old England's Isle for me.

No chance of wealth can make amends,
While anguish fills the mind,
Or calm the hearts of loving friends,
All weeping left behind.
From Britain's shores I ne'er would roam,
What'er my lot might be;
I'd rather dwell with friends at home—
Old England's Isle for me.

W. G. P. inquires how a vessel is launched. The particulars are interesting, and we willingly find room for them. When a ship is building, her keel rests on a series of blocks of wood placed about three feet apart, and she is supported on either side by pieces of timber—one end of each "shore," as these timbers are technically termed, resting on the ground, and the other "shoring-up" the ship; or, in other words, keeping her from falling over sideways. The ordinary practice in building ships is, to place the stern next the water, and the head of the ship up the yard, so that the vessel shall go stern foremost into the river. When the launching time comes, the ship requires to be released from all these supports and barriers. First of all, large beams of timber are placed lengthwise under each side of the ship, with a slight inclination towards the water end of them. These timbers are bolted to blocks of wood in the ground, and they have other pieces of timber bolted to the sides of them, so as to form "ways," as the shipwrights say, or grooves, by which the ship is to move into the water. The next process is to place another beam of timber on each of these "ways," and to bolt smaller pieces of timber upon them, which are fitted, but not fastened to the ship's side, so as to form a kind of cradle in which the vessel is to rest, and which goes with the ship into the water. The beams of timber fixed to the blocks are plentifully greased with soft-soap and oil, to make the vessel move smoothly, and when all is in readiness, the supports are knocked away, and the ship glides into the water. The ship is liberated by striking down her "daggers," which are the last hindrances to her taking the water. There is a "dagger," so called, at each side of the ship. It is just at the head of the launching timbers, and is simply a square piece of wood placed in a slanting direction, one end of which rests against the fixed beams of timber which lie under the vessel, and the other end is placed against the cradle on which the ship rests. It is an honourable distinction in a shipbuilder's yard to knock down the daggers, and it is the custom to award that honour to the two eldest apprentices.

A SCHOLAR.—The Thames, from its source to its mouth, is about 180 miles in length.

J. T. B.—The predecessor of Bishop Watson, in the See of Llandaff, was Shute Barrington, Canon of St. Pauls, who, in the life-time of the opponent of Thomas Paine, was successively translated to the Sees of Salisbury and Durham. In the good old days of George III., a clever bishop was rather thought an incubance than a gain. Watson held the See of Llandaff more than forty years.

M. M. M. LEW, AND OTHERS.—We have once more to repeat our announcement, that we do not undertake to return any manuscripts which may be forwarded to us for perusal. The labour of reading is quantum sufficit.

A. W. R.—The following is a list of the ships of the Royal Navy, in commission, that carry 140 guns and upwards:

Britannia	120	Waterloo	120
Neptune	120	Impregnable	104
St. George	120	Queer	110
Trafalgar	120	Victory	101

The Duke of Wellington will carry 140 guns. Besides the above, there are 13 line-of-battle ships in commission, upwards of 20 in ordinary, and at least a score building.

GRACE L. had a young man who paid her great attention for some months, made her presents, and treated her with the greatest affection, when, all of a sudden, he turned very cold, scarcely speaking, and instead of shaking hands as formerly, merely bows. She loves him, and cannot account for such conduct. Probably the man is infatuated with his high notions of himself. There are many young men to be met with in society who fancy they ought to be looked upon as Manfreds or Monte Christos. Give the fool his congé.

J. M. L.—We like the sentiment very much. It has no similarity to the "Other Hearts and Other Lips" trash.

Oh! live and love thou child of earth,
And happy be thy song,
How many dreams of love and mirth,
To childhood doth belong.
All bright thy smiling look appears,
E'er veiled by sorrow's fretful tears;
What raptures round thee throng!
The prattling lays of early days
In gentle accents fall:
From youth to age this life displays
A joy on earth for all.

Oh! live and love; be free from strife,
In hall or homely shade,
A charm is in the bloom of life,
Thou' soon that bloom will fade.
There is within the heart of man,
If he himself aright would scan,
A blessing to be made.
Thou' gloom o'erhangs our path to-day,
And dark'ning hills appal,
Oh! soon may beam a brighter ray,—
There's joy on earth for all.

The sonnet is defective. Try again, but select an original subject. You ought to have known that "The Arm Chair" has been appropriated by a distinguished living authoress.

J. B.—We think rings would be quite as useful on the toes as on the fingers. In ancient times the ring was an emblem of authority; but as barons and brigands have gone out of fashion, the custom of wearing rings seems to have descended almost exclusively to snobs, blacklegs, and prize-fighters. Ladies are privileged in this respect, but you never observe a well-bred lady looking "flashy." In "Hints on Etiquette," edited by a lady of rank, we find the following very apposite advice: "Avoid wearing jewellery, unless it be in very good taste, and then only at proper seasons. This is the age of mosaic gold and other trash; and by dint of swindling, any one may become 'flashy' at a small expense. If you will stand out in 'high and bold relief,' endeavour to become eminent for some virtue or talent, that people may say, 'There goes the celebrated (not the notorious) Mr. So-and-so!'"

J. C.—The emigration mania will die away, but not just at present. The brother of this correspondent, writing from Eighty-Eight Valley, 20 miles from Nelson, N. L., in August last, says: "You are, I trust, established well in business; if so, remain in England; if otherwise, retrench as far as possible your expenses and superfluities—stick to your country, and don't emigrate. Not that I think you will, or that you are going to quit now; but you may be impressed with the idea—if so, discourage it. I have no hesitation in saying that, had I known what it was to leave home and come out here, I never would have done so."

Q. O.—It is a melancholy fact, that insanity is rapidly on the increase among all classes. In the upper ranks of life, the disease owes its origin to luxurious habits, idleness, and want of employment. Among the labouring classes, drunkenness is the great provoking cause. But the number of insane women is larger than that of men, and that is owing to idiosyncrasies peculiar to the sex. Insanity, however, is peculiar to civilised nations, young as well as old, for the proportion in the United States of America is as great as in this country. It is in contemplation, we believe, to reform the law relating to lunatics, this session. The sooner the better, for the present system is disgraceful.

PATRICK MAHON.—The paupers of England form a terrible contrast with the peers of England. The latter number only some 400 put together; with their collateral kindred, they receive a gross income of £50,000,000 a year, while the 2,000,000 of paupers drain it of only £10,000,000. But the £50,000,000 absorbed by the peerage is less beneficial than the £10,000,000 swallowed up by the paupers; for with the latter the money is not only absolutely lost, and for ever gone, but it gives permanence to a hideous pest, a wholesale leprosy, which taints and disfigures the national constitution, and defiles the whole community. It is a chartered abomination, supported by the fears, the injustice, and the weakness of British society. It arose at the same time as the peerage: first it was serfdom, then mendicancy, then pauperism. It must eventually be suppressed, but that will not occur until there is developed another and higher stage of civilisation.

ANGELINA M. B. says a good word for Louis Napoleon. We quite agree with her, that reproaches are more easily manufactured than praises, and that at this present moment the emperor suffers from this want of generosity—this absence of sagacity large enough to comprehend the man and his mission. For ourselves, we confess that, while we have not a particle of sympathy or moral respect for the man, we have confidence in him. He has courage, inflexibility, endurance, energy—and those are precisely the qualities that France needs in her ruler. It is only the strong arm of absolute power that can keep her infidel tendencies and sensual passions in subjection to law, morality, and religion. We admire despotism in no shape; but when necessary, as it sometimes is, it must not only be tolerated, but sustained in its authority. Like all other institutions, it has its appointed time—its ultimate extinction is inevitable; and we on this side of the channel would exhibit more wisdom, if we paid more attention to the real influences that govern the human race, and less to the superficial ones, which are so dazzling to the uninquiring mind.

R. SEYMOUR.—The nineteenth century commenced on the 1st of January, 1801. The numeral "1," representing the year, was, of course, prospective, for the complete time to be measured by the figures "1801" was not made up until midnight of the 31st December, 1801. The editor of the ——— was dreaming when he said we were now in the 1854th year. Count on your fingers. Begin with 1 a day, and then make up 365 days a year, and you have 1 a year. The 366th day was the 1st day in the year represented by the figure 2, which, in its turn, was only fully made up on the 730th day. The 731st day commenced the year 3, and so on.

A BACHELOR, exulting over his free condition, exclaims with Otway:

A man, made of the dross and refuse of a man
Heaven took her when man was sleeping;
Had man been waking, he had ne'er consented.

Quite forgetting that one of his parents was a woman, and the equal of her husband in the eye of heaven. Such morbid sentiment leads to downright wickedness; but as the majority of men and women who indulge in it—for it is not confined to one sex—are generally severely punished for their folly, it may be despised as a weakness. It is precisely these kind of silly persons who obtain uncongenial partners, who "nag" away their lives. Our bachelor will catch a Tartar before many years have rolled over his head.

ALICE, an only child, would not object to correspond with "Verax," she has a fair complexion, blue eyes, and light-brown hair. Her accomplishments comprise a good knowledge of music, French, drawing, and dancing.

THE COUNTRY CURATE presents his compliments to "Eva," (noticed in Number 415), and begs to say that he will be most happy to correspond with that young lady, in pure sincerity and integrity of purpose, through the medium of the first page of the Times newspaper.

FANNY FRONIC responds to the matrimonial wish of "Frank Wilton," but thinks three years a long time to wait. She is considered very good-looking, having dark hair, dark-blue eyes, and pearly teeth. She can laugh a little, sing a little, and love very much. Her age is nineteen.

INEZ AND ALICE are two orphan cousins, living with a cross old maid aunt, who wishes them to marry two gentlemen of her acquaintance, both ancient enough to be their fathers. Wishing to escape their persecutors, they appeal to the gallantry of the young and handsome among our bachelor friends. Inez is just seventeen, dark in complexion, with black, wavy hair, eyes and eye-brows to match, lips of coral, teeth of pearls, and it is impossible to be in her company ten minutes without loving her, and feeling the influence of her merry spirit. Alice is fair, with light hair, and violet-coloured eyes, is of a gentle, loveable disposition, and aged twenty.

AN OFFICER in the Army would be happy to correspond with "Julia Ann." He is about to join his regiment, but on giving a reason so important as a prospect of being married, his leave of absence might be extended.

U. C. B., having flirted with the world until he has become quite wearied with trifling, is sorry to say that, at the age of thirty-four, he is alone, although respectably connected, with an excellent trade, and fair prospects. During business hours his time passes pleasantly enough, but afterwards he feels to want a friend and companion, whose amiable disposition would make a home happy. He therefore would marry, and would be happy to meet with a pleasant-looking, cheerful, domesticated, well educated young lady, with a view of making her a happy partner for life. He is good-looking, has a comfortable home, pleasantly situated in an agricultural district, and enjoys an income of £500 a-year.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—N. N. (Your objection carries no weight with it)—Emily Friend (What is the object of your eulogy?)—Critic (Written some years ago, and was published in a volume with other poems)—E. R. (Applications for situations in the Crystal Palace must be made to the directors, through the secretary, Mr. Grove. The offices of the company are in Adelaide Buildings, London Bridge)—The Reiver (Entreats Mr. Grogger Peter to give him some account of the family of "Hall," said to be descended from a border clan of that name)—J. E. (Have no confidence in such statements. The advertising fraternity are very clever, but they profess more than they can perform)—Joe Beans (Mrs. Stowe realised a large sum by the sale of "Uncle Tom's Cabin;" but, as merit ought to be rewarded, we think a testimonial from her admirers in England would only be just and proper)—J. J. Morley (Send something original, and we will give it the most respectful attention. But do not attempt deception—it will not do with us)—T. M. W. (Is one of those unreasonable, dissatisfied, growling, grumbling mortals, whom it would be impossible to please)—Juliette (Write to the Secretary of the Royal Academy of Music)—A. W. B. (Order the numbers through a bookseller)—Novello (Consult a physician)—J. L. H. (Washing the hands in soft tepid water, and wearing gloves, will make them sufficiently white)—Henry Davies (The "Life of Wellington" was published in an expensive form some years ago. The work lies on the booksellers' shelves, unsalable; and no wonder—for the man was dreadfully overrated both alive and dead)—Veracity (Seems not to have sufficiently prized the moral of the saying, which forcibly refers to the medical attendant of the Father of all Evil)—Hope (Advice for a situation)—John Ellis (Declined, with thanks)—W. M. M. P. (Do not be alarmed—the girl will not break her heart for your sake)—L. A. H., Hackney (The description is quite complete—you have nothing to fear)—Maria (The management of birds)—Philander (Consult the advertising pages in the WEEKLY TIMES)—K. W. W. (The application must be by memorial to the Lords of the Treasury)—E. M. P. (The sentence, as written, is incorrect. The mood is the subjunctive, the tense the past. Purchase "Lennie's English Grammar")—J. Cooper (We regret that the society is not better occupied)—A Mechanic (A very nice style of handwriting)—Will Sidler (The memorandum is valueless. All deeds of apprenticeship must be stamped. The duty to have been paid in this instance was £1)—John Cashman (Consult a solicitor. You may administer to the effects of the deceased, and so legally obtain payment of the money due to you)—James Macpherson (The anecdote is amusing, but not sufficiently so to interest the general reader)—E. C. (The volume may be had at the Office, 334, Strand)—Aglaia (The standard height for the Life Guards is 6 feet, for the Grenadier Guards 5 feet 10 inches)—Pro Bono Publico (You are speaking for yourself—not the public)—Francis Payne (The lady is unmarried)—James R. S. (All our literary engagements are completed for some time to come)—Rene—Ebor—Marianne—Melville—Clara and Harriet—Caractacus—E. W. J.—Hyderabad—W. S. K.—Chas. Adams—A. W. L.—John Hickson—Clara Hall—A. Baker—J. P.—J. W. C.—J. H. G.—Thomas Williams—H.—T. B. Rover—T. G. Wood—W. Clotworthy—T. P. R.—Miss E. G.—Z. Y. X.—G. R. T.—Maud—T. S.—C. W. C.—Talisman—Quintin—Kent—G. W.—Edward—Mark—F. A.—Clara Parry—J. W.—W. King—Ben Brust—Jno. E.—Edward Wyatt—Stephen R. D.—Mentor—Frank S.—J. D.—A.—Harry—John Cross—Snowdrop—Jean—Pater Noster—Amicus—Jessie Allen—Genevra—J. B., Cleatham—P. J., New Radford—C. Lonsdale—X. Y.—E. W.—J. O.—Susan S.—B. P.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 427.—Vol. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 30, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

THE APPARITORS OF THE INQUISITION PREVENTING MARTINGALE FROM TAKING POISON.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

THE JESUIT, "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC

CHAPTER LXXIX.

He knew not there were hearts whose nerves,
Like tempered steel, bend with the blast;
Hearts which oppression only serves
To strengthen when the storm is past.

WHEN the artful superior of the Benedictines, at the command of the venerable pontiff, acknowledged that the infant son of the unhappy Lady Mowbray had been consigned to the care of his unprincipled uncle, the heart of our hero bounded with joy; for he felt assured that the long-lost heir of his benefactor could be no other than the generous, noble-hearted Walter, whose virtues endeared him to all who knew him, and rendered him every way worthy of such a parent as Sir William.

There are beings so antagonistic in their natures, feelings, and sympathies, that when they encounter, even if they fail to offend, are certain to repel: such was the case with Henry Ashton and the colonel. Although the youth had seen but little of the selfish man of the world, that little had anything but prepossessed him in his favour. He had contrasted his cold, calculating manner and haughty bearing with the warm heart, ingenuous frankness, and manly qualities of his supposed son, and frequently found himself regretting that the friend he loved should owe his being to such a father.

We need not remind our readers that Colonel Mowbray honoured the protégé of his brother with a feeling stronger than dislike—with positive hatred—not, however, unmixed with fear; for there was something in his reckless courage and determined spirit which alarmed him.

The conviction—the truth of which his sanguine temperament did not permit him for an instant to doubt—that Walter was the long-sought heir of the baronet, relieved the mind of our hero from a bitter reflection which frequently had crossed it: namely, that if he succeeded in discovering the object of his search in Italy—his success would be the means of depriving his friend of the fortune and honours he was every way worthy to bear.

Oh, how he longed to see him pressed to his outraged mother's heart—to say to his benefactor, "Behold your son—worthy of the name he bears—worthy even of you!"

Ellen, too—he pictured how her sunny smile would reward him.

There is no happiness so exquisite to a grateful mind as the pleasure of requiting the benefits it has received—of proving that the seeds of kindness have not been sown in a barren soil—of pouring balm on the bruised heart—of recalling the long-banished smile to the pale lips of those who have befriended us in the arduous struggles of life.

So great was the impatience of Henry Ashton to behold his friend—to grasp him by the hand—to impart to him his convictions and hopes—that he disregarded the landlord of the hotel, who, with a countenance full of dismay and terror, stood in the courtyard to intercept him, fearing that the unexpected, cruel sight of Walter's body might upset his reason; for he had observed, in common with all his household, the devoted friendship existing between his guests.

"Stay, signor!" he exclaimed.

"Not now, my good fellow—not now!" replied our hero.

"I must speak to you!" said the man. "For the love of the saints—". Then, recollecting that the Inglesi was a heretic, and that such an invocation was little likely to restrain him, he added: "for the love of your friend, pray hear me!"

"For the love of my friend!" repeated Henry, descending the stairs, which he had partially mounted; "in the name of heaven, what has happened?"

"Shocking! horrible! I would not that such a thing should have taken place in my house for the revenue of a chanoin! I have received notice to quit from two familiars already!"

Struck by the pale features, and still more so by the words of the speaker, the youth felt a sickening sensation at his heart—a presentiment that the intelligence he was about to hear would destroy the joyous hope which lately animated it.

"Is Walter worse?" he demanded.

"Worse than that, signor—worse than that!"

"Do not trifle with me—for pity's sake, do not trifle with me! You do not mean that he is— No—no! heaven is not so pitiless!"

Before the landlord could reply to him, Father O'Hara entered the courtyard. He had heard of the fearful crime which had been committed, and came, urged by sympathy for sorrow, to offer consolation, Taking Henry by the arm, he led him, unresisting as a child, into the saloon, and pointed to a chair, taking care to seat himself between the door of the bed-room and his countryman.

"What have I to learn?" exclaimed the latter; "something terrible—for there is a tear upon your cheek, a sympathy in your voice and manner, forewarning me that something has occurred to Walter—something which—"

He could proceed no further. The heart of the young man was full—grief choked his utterance.

"Requires the soul's stern quality, fortitude, to bear," replied the priest; "your friend is dead: earth has one noble spirit less—heaven an inmate more!"

"Dead!" faltered Henry; "and I left him full of returning health and confidence: hope in his eye, a smile upon his lips—dreams of a happy future in—and now—"

The bereaved friend buried his convulsed features in his hands, to hide the tears which heaved, not disgraced, his manhood. The blow was doubly terrible, from being unexpected—falling at the instant of so much promised happiness. His soul seemed crushed—his very self annihilated. His companion remained gazing upon him for several minutes in silence. He rejoiced at the sight of his tears, for he knew, by sad experience, how they relieve the overfraught heart.

"I know," he resumed, "how deep is the wound inflicted by the loss of those we love—the strong agony which follows the sundering of old, familiar ties; how we miss the grasp of manly friendship—its pure confidence and gushing sympathies: it is terrible—but doubly terrible, when violence despoils the seat of life!"

"Violence!" exclaimed Henry, starting from his lethargy of grief; "you do not mean that any ruffian hand again has—No—no—it is too horrible; you cannot mean that!"

O'Hara's countenance expressed the tearful intelligence his tongue refused to utter.

"God!" continued our hero, with a sudden burst of passion; "and I not by to save or to avenge him! Name me the villain, father? give me the finest clue, and fear not but I will find him! Earth shall not bind him from my reach, or power shield him from my hand! I'll hunt the un pitying monster through the world!"

"Does no secret whispering point out the assassin's name?" demanded the old man.

"No!"

"Had your friend no enemy?"

"None!" replied Henry, with passionate sorrow. "He was all gentleness and virtue! a fiend could not have hated one so pure and unoffending! Stay!" he added, as he suddenly recollected his attachment to the beautiful Therese, and the reputed character of her father—a man no less proud than vicious; "the shadow becomes more palpable—its hideous outline distinct—its features terribly deformed: the Prince Colonna!"

"The Prince Colonna, my son!" repeated the monk, in accents of surprise; "what motive could possibly prompt his highness to such an act? No—the author of your misery is our countryman—a wretch who, under the garb of friendship, has glided like a serpent into your confidence, to sting you to the soul!"

"His name—his name?" impatiently demanded the young man.

"Martingale," replied the Capucin.

Henry stood for an instant as one thunderstruck, so unexpected was the blow. True, he had at times entertained vague suspicions of the plausible agent of Meeran, which, with the generous feelings of an ingenuous mind, he had dismissed as soon as framed, mentally accusing himself of injustice and precipitation in his judgment.

"Fool!" he murmured; "fool! to have been caught in such a spring!" A child might have seen through it!

He was about to leave the room, with that calm air of determination in his looks which is more terrible than the wildest passion—for it denotes the settled purpose of the soul—impossible to danger, prayers, or tears.

"Where go you?" said the priest, laying his hand upon his arm.

"To place my heel upon the serpent's neck, and crush it!" answered the youth, in a tone so passionless that O'Hara shuddered as he heard it.

"Stay!" he said.

"Stay!" iterated Henry, scornfully; "when every instant of delay appears like treason unto manhood as to friendship, when the murderer's step pollutes the earth with its unholy tread! No, Walter—no!" he added, apostrophising his deceased friend; "if I could not save, I will at least avenge you: the heart's blood of the assassin should precede friendship's tears!"

"My son," said O'Hara, seriously, "he is where the hand of justice alone may strike him!"

"Dead?"

"No—in the dungeon of the Holy Inquisition."

"I must see him!" murmured the young man, gloomily—for he felt a secret disappointment at the thought of Walter's death being avenged by any hand save his. The interference of justice between himself and the assassin, appeared like robbing him of the ministry to which friendship had consecrated him.

His benevolent visitor proceeded as gently as possible to relate to him the terrible details of Walter's death, which he had learnt from the landlord and waiter of the hotel—the visit of the agent of the secret police—the attempt upon the desk—the detection, and crowning tragedy. As the scenes of Martingale's treachery and Walter's devotion were unrolled before him, the heart of the listener swelled by turns with rage, or melted with the tenderest pity. As the priest described the blows, and the effect which followed them, his lips quivered with rage, and he started convulsively from his seat, to pace the floor of the saloon with hurried steps.

"Time!" exclaimed the youth, in answer to O'Hara's observation on its soothing influence; "can it restore my friend? It may deaden the agony of the wound his loss inflicted, but never heal it! His mind was as a mirror, in which virtue saw reflected her own image—no selfish feeling or ungenerous thought e'er sullied it; his heart the seat of truth, beating to honour's impulse! I was ennobled in his friendship—it was my moral strength," he added; "for reason assured me such a man could not bestow it on the mean or worthless!"

"Such a man," said the Capucin, willing to draw his mind from dwelling too much upon his loss, "must have been worthy alike of man's regard and heaven's. He is less to be pitted than his assassin!"

"Curse him!" interrupted Henry, fiercely; "curse him!"

The priest was inexpressibly shocked.

"And who gave man," he said, in a reproving tone, "the right to curse his fellow-man? Think you it is no punishment for the assassin to know that every breath he draws is numbered by the passionless decree of justice, whose iron hand is conducting him to an ignominious death—to feel that, whilst every pulse is beating with painful life, his grave is already dug—to hear his own passing-bell tolling the earthworm to its banquet? Picture the wretch in his lone cell—the fever of excitement past, sleepless and wretched—counting the hours, the minutes allotted him to breathe! Picture his despair, his terror, and remorse! No, my son!" he added; "society may have the right to punish, but it has none to curse the murderer!"

"You are right," replied our hero, in a more subdued tone; "but it is hard to school the mind to Reason's lessons, when every pulse throbs with the agony of the heart's wound! I am calm!" he added—"quite calm! Leave me now, and bear with you my thanks for the sympathy you have shown, when sympathy was most welcome!"

"Before I leave," said the friendly Capucin, "let me perform my errand: he—the wretched man who, in the prison of the Holy Office, waits his doom—requests to see you."

"To see me!" repeated the astonished youth, with a shudder of disgust; "what can the ruffian hope from such an interview?"

"Nothing," answered O'Hara: "he seems like one whom hope and fear have alike deserted. He is calm and sullen as the pause which precedes the bursting of the thunder-cloud. To the interrogation of the judges he has remained obstinately silent. All that can be extorted from him is: 'Where is the Signor Ashton?'"

"I will see him!" exclaimed our hero, after a moment's reflection. "Hard as the task will be, I must endure it!"

"To-morrow, after the examination?"

Henry nodded assent, and inquired at what hour the members of the Holy Office met.

"At ten," answered the priest; "by mid-day you may visit him."

So saying, he left the room, and the young man was left to his own bitter reflections.

To the sensitive, grateful disposition of our hero, the blow was doubly terrible—terrible to his heart from the friendship he bore to Walter, and the disappointment of his hopes. He had anticipated the happiness of presenting to his benefactor his long-sought son, in the person of his friend—of bidding the bereaved mother's heart again rejoice: and now the promised joy was dashed aside at the moment of fulfilment.

"And this is life!" he murmured; "its lessons, from the cradle to the grave, are but one tissue of pain and sorrow! One by one the brilliant hues which colour the landscape disappear, the flowers fade, the foliage withers, and the barren trunks and branches alone remain! Wisely it is ordained that the blight should be gradual; when it falls at once, the heart withers with them!"

He felt that he had still a duty to perform. With a slow step, he advanced towards the door of Walter's chamber—his hand trembled as it rested upon the lock. With an effort he opened it, and stood in the presence of the dead.

He who has gazed upon the dead,
Ere the last trace of life has fled;
Ere yet decay's effacing fingers,
Have swept the lines where beauty lingers.

At the sight of the pale, calm features of Walter Mowbray, the tears of Henry Ashton flowed afresh. So true—so good—so worthy of the most sacred name which man can give to man—the name of friend!

There are sorrows which are profaned by being gazed upon—which language is powerless to describe: over such we draw the veil. Those who have mourned can feel them—to those whose feelings the iron hand of grief has never wrong, no description could paint them.

CHAPTER LXXX.

Who goes there?
Friends to this ground, and liegemen to the Dane.

SHAKESPEARE.

THE night at last arrived on which Dr. Guyot had arranged with Joe Beans to attempt the rescue of Ellen: an undertaking of no small difficulty and danger, when it is remembered that Meeran Hafaz and his servants had taken up their abode in Cromwell House ever since the illness of the orphan.

The ayah, too, was continually upon the watch. Her eyes were everywhere—her ears addressed to every sound; not a word or look could escape her. Despite her devotion to the young Indian, she was unhappy. Grief at the estrangement of her foster-child, and remorse at the treachery she had been guilty of, were struggling in her breast with the fidelity she had vowed to Meeran. A word would have confirmed the wavering purpose of her heart. Unfortunately, Ellen was too confident in the efforts of her friends—too mistrustful of her influence with her former favourite—to speak it.

The night was dark, and suited to the attempt. At the hour of midnight, Joe, accompanied by Red Ralph—who, since he had ascertained the ayah to be a thing of life—a being with muscles and sinews like his own—had recovered his former confidence—was at the place of rendezvous appointed by the doctor. It was the trunk of a blasted oak, at the entrance of the lane which led to the house. At a short distance, Lawyer Elworthy was waiting with a carriage, to receive them.

They had waited for some time, in silent expectation of their confederate: not a sound was to be heard, except the whistling of the wind, broken, in its career, against the chimneys and quaint old gables of the mansion, or the rustling of the leaves, with which the icy breath of winter had strewn the pathway.

"Whist!" said the lad, in a low tone; "there be some one coming!"

Joe listened, but could not detect the sound of a footfall. Ralph, however, persisted that he was not mistaken.

"I think it be an old man!" he said; "it do fall so careful, loike!"

A few moments proved that he was right; for a light from a dark lantern was suddenly turned upon them, and they recognised Doctor Guyot.

"Humph!" said the old man, "you are punctual! Is everything prepared?"

"It is!" replied the young man; "Lawyer Elworthy and the carriage are at a short distance."

"Tis well!" continued the physician; "I will return to the house, where I fear my absence may be every moment suspected—for the Indian woman is evidently upon the watch: I have noted her eye following my every action—her ear listening for every word. She is dangerous," he added—"very dangerous! would I had thought of some means of removing her!"

"Why didn't 'ee?" demanded the young man.

The party to whom the question was addressed replied only by a shrug: Joe, in the simple honesty of his heart, little understood what the doctor really meant by removing her.

"You say that you can obtain entrance to the house?" he observed.

"Leave that to me, master!" answered the boy; "they mun bar more than doors and vinders, if they expect to keep me out!"

It was finally arranged that the man of science should return to the house, and that in ten minutes his two confederates were to be at their posts in the great hall.

As the hour of her expected deliverance from the captivity in which she had been so infamously detained drew nigh, Ellen became excited and agitated by alternate hopes and fears. A hundred times during the day she had asked herself the question whether the physician was really to be trusted—if his sympathy might not be a deep-laid scheme to remove her from the society of her only remaining friend—to separate her from Susan, and conduct her to some retreat yet more remote, where Meeran and her unworthy guardian could more securely carry out their design against her happiness and peace.

"Trust him, lady!" said her humble friend; "he cannot be so vile as to act the part you dread! The snow of age is on his brow—his steps already totter on the verge of the grave: he must have the fear of offending that Being who will one day judge him, before his eyes! All will go well!"

With these and similar reasons, the speaker endeavoured to reassure her. The resolution of her young mistress was balanced between alternate doubts and fears, when the subject of their conversation entered her chamber, with his usual stealthy step.

"Where is the ayah?" he demanded.

"Below," answered Susan.

"And her employer?" added the old man.

"In the library, with Colonel Mowbray," continued the girl. "As for the warren, there is little fear of his interfering with our project: he has been complaining all day that his pains are greater than ever; he can scarcely raise a limb from his pallet."

Dr. Guyot smiled: he perfectly comprehended the reason why Will Smiler was not likely to interrupt his design. He would have taken similar precautions with the ayah; but, from the peculiar habits of the woman—who was a strict adherent of the Hindoo faith, and would consequently touch no food unless prepared by her own hands—he had no opportunity of carrying out his intention.

"No time is to be lost, young lady!" he said; "the moment has arrived in which you will require decision and energy. Your friends are already at their post."

The orphan fixed her eyes with a searching glance upon him, as if to read his very heart. The old man met her gaze with his usual impassibility of countenance: he read her thought, without feeling either surprised or offended by it—to him virtue and vice were but names. Had his interests prompted him, he would have betrayed the persecuted girl to her oppressor with the same willingness that he was prepared to save her.

"You doubt me, young lady!" he observed; "it is natural; for there are few in this world ready to assist the helpless—and service proffered for service's sake is seldom welcome. I told you that I was prompted to the step I have taken by one of your friends."

"You did; his name?"

"He is one of those men who make themselves known by actions, not names; but I can give you those of two, who even now are anxiously counting the moments of your indecision."

"Do so!" said Ellen, eagerly—for her mind was terribly agitated with fears of the prudence of the step she was about to take.

"Lawyer Elworthy is waiting at a short distance, with the means of flight."

At the name of the agent of her late uncle, the eyes of the captive sparkled with pleasure—it was one doubt removed.

"And a simple fellow—Joe Beans, I think they call him"—continued the physician, "is even now concealed within the house, to protect your flight."

At the name of Henry's friend, the last hesitation vanished. It was like mistrusting Henry himself, to doubt the fidelity of one for whom he had vouched. Susan's confidence at the name of her lover was unbounded: she already in anticipation saw herself and mistress at liberty.

Dr. Guyot advanced to the table, and began to prepare a draught, the effect of which he knew, by long experience, would be to give temporary strength and nerve to his still feeble patient. When he had duly mixed it, he advanced to the bed-side of the orphan, and presented the glass.

"Drink!" he said; "and, for an hour at least, your cheek shall glow with the rich hue of health—the blood run freely in your veins! there is strength and liberty in the draught!"

Without daring to give herself a moment for reflection, Ellen drained the glass.

"Tis done!" she said, as she returned it to his hand.

"Prepare your mistress," said the old man, addressing Susan; "I shall soon be back."

So saying, without casting a second look towards the bed, he left the room.

When he returned, he found the young lady and her attendant ready for their departure. The eye of the former was bright and firm, and her whole air evinced a determination which augured favourably for the result of their enterprise. Both the females, according to his directions, were clothed in dark dresses.

"Are you ready?" he demanded.

Susan answered in the affirmative, and immediately extinguished the light. With slow and cautious steps they descended the great oaken staircase. How their hearts trembled as the swirs created, like sentinels upon the watch, beneath their steps! It seemed an age till they reached the hall, which was faintly illuminated by the light of a single lamp, suspended from the ceiling.

The instant they made their appearance, two figures emerged from the recess formed under the staircase: they were Joe Beans and his guide, Red Ralph. To avoid giving the least alarm, they had removed their shoes, and they glided like shadows over the stone floor to meet the fugitives.

Susan could scarcely repress an exclamation of delight as she recognised the manly form of her lover. All danger seemed to vanish at his presence: she knew his strength, and the calm, steady courage of his heart. Joe's joy was scarcely second to her own; he contented himself, however, with silently pressing her hand, and then proffered the support of his arm to Ellen, who took it with a satisfaction only to be exceeded by that with which she would have reposed upon Henry's.

For an instant there was a pause in their proceedings: it was ended by Ralph, who was to act as pioneer, crouching upon the ground, and running like a dog, upon his hands and knees. As they passed the door of the library, Ellen recognised, with a shudder, the voice of her persecutor, in loud conversation with her unworthy uncle.

As we before observed, the great gates of Cromwell House were kept locked by day as well as night, and the keys never permitted for an instant from the custody either of the colonel or the young Indian. Their only mode of egress, therefore, was by the offices—to reach which it was necessary to pass through the kitchen.

They had advanced a certain distance along the passage between the great hall and that part of the mansion devoted to the domestics, when Ralph returned, and whispered a few hasty words in the ear of Joe Beans, who instantly arrested his steps.

"What does he say?" inquired the doctor, in an undertone.

"The warrenner is in the kitchen," said the young man.

"Any one else?"

"No!"

"Leave me to deal with him!" said the old man, with an air of determination; "better him than the ayah."

Joe thought so, too.

"Will you require assistance?" he said.

"No. Science is far more sure than strength: it can arm the air with pestilence, and make the breath of heaven the instrument of death. Not that I think," he added, with a pause, "that his death is necessary."

"If it prove so, do not hesitate—for he has merited it by a thousand villainies; there is scarcely a crime of which he is not capable: you would but forestall the laggard hand of justice."

"When you hear me whistle," said the physician, without any direct reply, "enter the room boldly! I will answer for the result!"

So saying, he raised the latch, and entered the room, carefully closing the door after him.

Will Sidelar was seated by the fire; his countenance betrayed the agony he was enduring. The muscles of his cheeks quivered, and played with a nervous, spasmodic affection, which his closely-pressed lips showed he was endeavouring to suppress.

"Impudent!" said Dr. Guyot, as he entered the room; "why have you left your chamber?"

"Because I cannot bear to be alone!" replied the wretch; "my pains increase with solitude!"

"I can soothe them!" replied the old man; "here is a balm which never fails to procure the sufferer nature's best boon—refreshing sleep."

He drew from his pocket a small phial as he spoke, and, taking up a glass from the table, would have emptied the contents, had not the impatient exclamation of the warrenner interrupted him.

"I don't want to sleep!" he said, in a surly tone. "I won't sleep, for then I dream—and dreams torture me more than the agony of my bruised limbs! You are a wise man, and know many curious secrets," he added; "have you no medicine which will procure repose without those hateful dreams?"

"No!"

"I'll pay you for it well!"

"Art has no such secret," replied Guyot; "some dreams are the images of our past crimes, reflected in the mirror where the soul sees itself reflected. They are either bright or dark, as our crimes or virtues make us."

The only answer of the warrenner was a fierce scowl.

Every moment was precious, and the physician was not a man to risk his safety by trifling with it; for he knew that the scheme once frustrated, and his share in it made known, all future attempts would be hopeless—to say nothing of the risk he would run from the vengeance of Meeran Hafaz.

Hastily changing the phial for a packet, which he drew from his capacious pocket, he cast the latter upon the red embers of the wood fire burning in the grate. A dense white vapour followed the burning of the drug. Will Sidelar no sooner inhaled the odour, than he sank back in his chair, like a man suddenly seized by apoplexy.

At the same instant the doctor gave a low whistle.

It was horrible to mark the convulsive efforts which the Russian made to overcome the effect of the vapour, when he saw Ellen and her companions pass with noiseless steps through the kitchen; but the drug was too strong for him, and he sank back, with groans of rage and disappointment.

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed the orphan, as she breathed the fresh air; "we have escaped!"

Scarcely had the words passed her, when a loud cry, which she recognised as the ayah's, startled her. The Indian woman, who had been lurking about the grounds, had heard the incantations speech of her foster-child.

"Now, then," said Joe, "for your lives—your lives!"

Urged by terror, the party directed their steps towards the little door, half buried in ivy, in the walls. Ralph, who carried the key, had already opened it, when Zara sprang forward, and, throwing her arms around the orphan, attempted by violence to detain her.

"Let me pass!" said Ellen, firmly.

"Never!" replied the nurse. "I have told you that you attempt in vain to fly from your fate—it is written in the characters which never lie!"

Joe Beans cared but little for the prediction of the speaker. Seizing her by the waist, he vainly attempted to drag her from his charge—but she resisted him with a strength and tenacity which baffled all his efforts. Bitterly did Dr. Guyot, who stood gazing on the scene, regret that he had wasted upon the warrenner the means of silencing her.

The shrieks of the ayah were piercing, and it became evident that the inmates of the house were alarmed, for lights were seen moving in every direction.

"What you do," he said to Joe, who was terribly embarrassed how to act, "must be done quickly!"

"Save me!" exclaimed Ellen, exhausted by her struggles; "save me for the sake of your friend—of Henry! Save me!" she added, in a yet more desperate tone, "or kill me here!"

At the name of the companion of his youth, the young man, with dogged resolution, drew a pistol from his vest, and, placing the barrel close to the temples of the ayah, commanded her to release her hold.

"Fire!" replied Zara, calmly; "in the grasp of death I'll hold her fast!"

Rendered desperate by the sound of Meeran's voice, which he heard calling upon the domestics to follow him, Joe placed his finger upon the trigger of his weapon.

"Fire!" said the doctor.

"God forgive us both!" exclaimed the poor fellow, his countenance pale with terror at the awful resolution he had taken. "It be your own fault—all your own fault!"

A loud explosion followed; but at the very instant it took place, Ellen, with a convulsive movement of her hand, had dashed the barrel of the pistol aside. She could not endure to see the guilty creature, whom she had once so fondly loved, perish at her feet—to feel her warm blood cover her shuddering limbs.

"No—no!" she said; "my life—mine! Bad as she is, I cannot see her die!"

That which the menace of instant death could not effect, the words of the orphan produced in an instant. Zara relinquished her hold, like one who has been suddenly paralysed. Her iron nature was melted at the generous devotion of her foster-child. Her relenting, unfortunately, was too late. The effect of the wondrous draught of the physician was not proof against the shock which the victim of so much tyranny had received, and she fell into the arms of Susan, nerveless and hopeless.

Not an instant was to be lost. Joe caught her in his arms, and, darting through the door, ran down the avenue, followed by his three companions. As he reached the bottom of the avenue, Meeran overtook him. Fortunately he was unarmed.

"Villain!" exclaimed the young Indian, springing towards our honest rustic; "resign your burthen!"

"Villain to your teeth!" replied Joe, placing Ellen upon the sword, and preparing, with the last drop of his blood, to defend her. "I never yet shrunk from man, and am not going to show the white feather now!"

Long and fearful was the struggle which ensued. Both were in the prime of life, with hearts and energies unbroken. Twice Meeran got his deadly grip upon the throat of his antagonist; and twice, with a desperate effort, the young man tore it from him; but he felt that his strength was failing.

"Coward!" he muttered, between his set teeth.

Again the contest was renewed, and it must have ended fatally for the lover of the pretty Susan, if Dr. Guyot, Ralph, and the faithful girl had not arrived at the very moment when his breath was getting shorter, and his eyesight waxing dim. Without a word, the old man knelt upon the grass beside the combatants, and pressed his long, lean, bony fingers upon the temporal arteries of the young Indian, who, after an ineffectual struggle, gradually relaxed his hold.

"Just in time!" said the physician, with a chuckle; "Just in time!"

A hasty kiss assured Susan that, however exhausted, her lover was uninjured; but the danger to the party was not over yet—for Colonel Mowbray, with several servants bearing torches, were fast approaching down the avenue.

"Where is Miss Ellen?" exclaimed Joe, looking round him. "Gone—gone! No matter! I'll return to the house," he added, with dogged resolution, "and have her out of that infernal den, or leave my bones there!"

"She beán't there!" interrupted Ralph, who, with cat-like alacrity, had mounted into a tree during the contest.

"Where, then?"

"Carriage came up, and a gentleman got out, took the young woman up in his arms, and rode off."

"Saved!" said Joe, joyfully; "thank heaven, Elworthy has been upon the watch!"

So assured did he feel that such was the case, that he took Susan by the arm, and commenced his retreat towards the King's Arms. Guyot lingered behind till he was overtaken by the colonel.

"Villain!" said the latter.

The old man replied only by a contemptuous smile: it was Meeran Hafaz that he feared; he laboured under no alarm at the wrath of his confederate.

"Where is my niece?" continued her unworthy guardian.

"Probably with those whose society, colonel, she prefers to yours! Nay, do not frown, or affect big words—I know their value! The young lady has escaped your snares: your employer has missed his bride, and you your recompense!"

So saying, he turned upon his heel, and continued his way. The baffled man of the world hesitated for an instant whether he should follow him or not; reflection convinced him that it would be impolitic to quarrel with the physician.

"They must have bribed him well!" he muttered; "I never knew the old poisoner, avaricious as he is, sell his fidelity before!"

After waiting nearly an hour at the King's Arms, a carriage drove up: it contained the lawyer—he was alone.

"And Miss Ellen?" faltered Joe.

"I know that you have failed," replied Elworthy, with an air of vexation; "but I lingered to the last!"

"And have you not seen her?"

"No!"

"Nor heard?"

"Nothing!"

With an air of desperation, the poor fellow rushed from the house, despite the entreaties of Susan, and the endeavours of his companion to detain him. Elworthy closely questioned the boy, who persisted in the story he had told to Joe: that he had seen a gentleman drive up during the contest between him and Meeran, remove the still insensible Ellen, and drive off.

"Poor girl!" said the lawyer, with a sigh; "her trials are not over yet!"

CHAPTER LXXXI.

It is the crime, and not the scaffold,
Which makes the infamy.

WITH a heavy heart, Henry Ashton, at the appointed hour on the morning following the death of his friend, directed his steps towards that ponderous pile at the back of St. Peter's, which is occupied by the Holy Office—as the Inquisition is generally termed in Rome. There is nothing in the appearance of the edifice to indicate the purposes to which it is applied: it is a heavy, palatial-looking building, of mixed architecture, not without some attempt at ornament. The exterior windows are neither barred nor guarded by jalousies: visitors who have interest enough to obtain an order to inspect the establishment, find that this simple exterior merely serves as a mask to the main building, in which the prisons, halls of audience, and the cabinets of the judges are situated.

On presenting himself at the lodge, our hero was received by the governor of the place, who at once conducted him to the cell of Martingale.

Despite his resolution, the blood rushed to his pale features as he beheld the murderer of his friend, seated at a small table in the dark, solitary cell.

"Remember," said the official who had conducted him to the place, "that no violence can be permitted."

"I understand!"

"That all here are under the protection of justice, whose shield protects the criminal from himself—her rights must not be disputed."

"Fear not," replied the visitor; "I am master of my reason; although, heaven knows," he added, with a sigh, "that I have had enough to shake it from its throne!"

The officer left the men who had so lately met as friends together. How changed were their respective positions since a few hours: one was a prisoner, in the hands of one of the most relentless tribunals in the world; the other, heart-broken, and disappointed in his dearest hopes.

For some moments they regarded each other in silence. Martingale was the first to speak.

"I sent for you, Henry Ashton," he said, "neither to ask your forgiveness nor pity: for the first, I have wronged you too deeply to expect it—there is a limit, even in your generous nature, to the virtue which religion affects, and seldom exercises; as for the latter, I despise it!"

"Take it, then, unasked!" replied our hero, with an effort; "you say truly, you have deeply wronged me; for you have broken the dearest hope of my life at the moment of its fulfilment—robbed my heart of its dearest friend—broken my trust in the future—in man's truth and honour: yet I pardon you, as a Christian should do one whose hours on earth are numbered."

"Had my trust in humanity not been early broken," observed the assassin, "perhaps I had not fallen so fearfully; but enough of that, regret, in my opinion, has ever been the greatest weakness of the heart, because the most useless—with me it shall be the last. You have acted more generously by me than I expected, and you shall find that I am not ungrateful."

"Ungrateful!" iterated Henry.

"Hear me patiently: you have an enemy!"

"I know!" interrupted his visitor: "one who proceeds by the serpent's winding, slimy path—not with manly frankness—Meeran Hafaz! You need not name him to me!"

"You are right! It is to atone, as far as is in my power, for the wrongs that you have received, that I have sent for you—to warn you against that man. Neither in intellect nor heart do I believe him human. He grasps the mind of the instrument he would employ as a vice, analyses its qualities, and uses them according to his purpose. He knew that I was poor, but without the moral courage to look the lean spectre in the face; discovered that I, like greater villains, had my price. He paid it without a murmur—weighed down each rising scruple with his accursed gold! You can guess the rest!"

"But why against Walter, who never wronged him?" demanded our hero.

"The blow which stretched him on a bed of sickness was not directed against him!"

"Who, then?"

"You! The dangerous position in which my intrigues at the post office had placed me, compelled me, in a fatal moment, to attempt the concealment of the secret by the commission of another yet more fearful, and steep my hands in blood! Here," he added, "are the letters I intercepted."

He held out a packet, which he took from the lining of his coat as he spoke.

"Do not read them!" he added, as Henry Ashton was about to open the envelope, "lest the intelligence of the misery which your enemies have occasioned since your departure from England should induce you to recall your generous forgiveness, and you should curse me!"

The youth, with a violent effort, repressed his curiosity, and placed the packet in his bosom.

"Thanks! thanks! In a few days you will doubtless return to England?"

"Instantly!" replied his visitor. "That is," he added, recollecting himself, "as soon as the last rites are paid to —"

"My victim!" said Martingale, finishing the sentence or him. "Tis just! he was a friend: not in the idle parlance of the world, but in the truest import of the word! His memory merits no less a sacrifice at your hands. The rites once past —"

"I shall return to England!" exclaimed our hero; armed with my injuries, and Walter's blood to avenge; or you are but the instrument of a yet greater villain! By heavens!" he added, "ambition does not thirst for the moment which is to crown its dream—the bridegroom for his bride's first kiss—as I do for the moment when I shall stand face to face with the destroyer!"

"And when you do," added Martingale, "let the safety of the girl you love nerve your arm!"

"Farewell!" said our hero; "in this world we shall meet no more: address yourself to that Judge before whom you must appear, for pardon. If your repentance is sincere, you will not want a pleading angel at the footstool of His throne—for Walter—the noble and forgiving Walter—will be there!"

"You say truly," replied the prisoner, with a melancholy smile; "we shall not meet again! Unless," he added, "you should be crossing the Porta del Popolo at noon to-morrow!"

Henry shuddered, for he knew that it was the place of public execution in the Eternal City.

"So soon?" he said.

"Even so," replied Martingale, with a careless air; "for once the arm of Roman justice will strike speedily—and the speedier the better, for anything is better than the torture of the mind! I shall have few to mourn for me," he added, "except a foolish child, who will wonder, perchance, that his father has abandoned him to the mercies of the world!"

"A child?"

"Yes!"

"And without friends?"

"None, save its guilty parent!"

"I will be a friend to him!" said Henry Ashton, after a pause, in which the generous impulse of his nature struggled with the horror he entertained of its father's crime. Where shall I find him?"

The unhappy man placed upon the table a paper, with the address. He did not dare to place it in the hand of the noble-minded youth, lest the contact should sully it.

"Be assured," he said, "that I will not forget him!"

"Bless you! Oh, bless you for the promise! That child is the last tie which tells my heart it still is human! For the rest, I have done with earth, and social injustice and distinctions: all that now remains, rests between its judge and me!"

Henry left the cell of the prisoner, and, after an interview with Micara, returned to his hotel.

No sooner was Martingale alone, than his manner suddenly changed. It appeared as if a heavy weight had been removed from his heart and brain.

"The scaffold!" he murmured; "they may rear the scaffold, but never shall my footsteps press the accursed planks! I have played with destiny too long, to be taken unprepared: the judgment has been given, but it shall only be executed upon my lifeless body!"

So saying, he drew from his pocket a letter-case, and, with patient labour, began to tear open the inner lining, which was firmly stitched together. At last he had made an opening sufficiently large to admit of his withdrawing a packet which he had concealed within: it contained a swift and certain poison.

Once the paper in his grasp, he felt that he was to a certain extent, the master of his fate.

"The scaffold!" he repeated, scornfully. "Oh, what a jest for those who have known and slighted me in the world; to see their predictions accomplished—that the roué and schemer has met with his merited reward!"

There was a coarse earthen jug, containing water, upon the table, and a glass beside it. Deliberately he filled the latter with the limpid element, and stirred the powder with his finger till it was quite discoloured.

"Now for the secret," he exclaimed, as he raised it to his lips, "the sphinx could never solve, nor Egypt's nor all Rome's craft yet find the key to—the future!"

Scarcely had the impious words escaped him, when the glass was dashed from his hand: two of the apparitors of the Holy Office, who were appointed, from a concealed recess, to watch their prisoner day and night, had marked his every motion, and, at the very instant when he imagined himself about to escape from human justice, by anticipating death by his own hands, rushed into his cell, and disappointed him.

He was seized and bound, before he could recover from his surprise.

"Curse you!" he murmured, with a look of despair; "I would have balked the Romans of a holiday!"

"You know little of the Inquisition, then," replied one of the officers. "From the hour a prisoner enters it, till he leaves it, or is—you understand—"

"Executed!" added Martingale. "Speak plainly, such ceremony is useless!"

"Till he is executed, Signor Inglesi," continued the man, "unseen eyes are ever on him—unseen hands ready to preserve him from himself."

"Half the care bestowed upon the culprit, in many instances might prevent the crime!"

"Signor, I do not understand you!"

The criminal replied only by a shrug: he did not expect to be understood. The attempt which he had made upon his life was instantly reported to the resident judge of the Holy Office; for it is one of the peculiarities of that powerful tribunal, that it is supposed to be always sitting: the consequence was, that he was instantly compelled to assume the prison dress—his hands were heavily fettered, and his cell was changed for one in which several officers of the place were to pass the night.

"The modern Romans, like the ancient ones," he muttered, "are determined not to lose a holiday!"

With this bitter thought, he threw himself upon a bench, as near as possible to the little grated window—the only source of ventilation in the place—and gazed for the last time upon the sun, whose rays faintly illumined his cell.

"To-morrow!" he muttered, with a groan "to-morrow!"

(To be continued in our next.)

DRAMATIC CHAPTERS.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

CHAPTER XX.

SCENE—Early morning; rural lands; a mill by a mountain-stream, with huge stepping-stones; CLORIO, still in disguise, crosses the stream, and comes forward.

CLORIO.

They're fools that love, but double fools that wed!
Let who will wed, I'll live and die a maid:
Love! 'tis a draught of gall, with one poor drop
Of honey! A nettle hid 'neath roses!
'Tis years of sours to one short month of sugar
Love is a gambler!—staking all her heart
Upon a single throw, and losing it;
Where winning, she'd win nothing!
Men's hearts are nothing, as much feeling there
As there is feeling in a painted heart!
Men's hearts are nothing—empty as their vows,
On which maids build love-castles in the air,
To fall and crush them; no, I'll love no more:
I'll love no more!

But who comes here so sad?

'Tis, as I live, a wooer of my hand
Some twelve months back; but who methought
Knew less of love than of philosophy!
I'll stay and plague him.

Some had pined for weeks,

Sunk into apathy, or died of grief.
I feel all action; Would I were a man;
I'd challenge every man, and one by one
Rid earth of her worst fruit!

Enter JURUS thoughtfully; CLORIO walks up to him, and touches him on the back with her cane.

CLORIO.

Give you good morning, sir; you know me not?
Men have long memories when they serve or lend,
But short ones when they borrow—you owe me . . .

JURUS.

What?

CLORIO.

A kindness, sir: that is not much, you'll say;
Which proves you've learnt but little of the world,
From which 'tis hard at any time to get A kindness!

JURUS.

You're merry, sir.

CLORIO.

Merry? 'tis not an hour ago I wept,
And now my heart betwixt a smile and tear
Seems vibrating; touch ye but either side
The difference of a feather, nay, a hair—
I'm laughing or lamenting! Mark you, sir,
Mirth is to mourning nearer than supposed;
Smiles may be born of sorrow, joy of grief;
The blushes of the morn are types of tears!
You're a philosopher, an alchemist,
And should at least know this . . .

JURUS.

What kindness owe I you?

CLORIO.

There was a giddy girl you late admired,
A clever gay coquette you favoured once,
One who'd have wreck'd your heart within a week,
Or in a month at most: you loved her much,
And I persuaded you to wed her not:
This is the kindness you're my debtor for.

JURUS.

Methought I knew thy face—a something there
Reminded me of . . . of the kindness, sir,
Your counsel granted me; there's danger oft
In talent: like the glowworm in the grass,
Its brightness is its ruin. Poor Louise!

CLORIO.

You loved her, then?

JURUS.

Would I had not! For plainly, sir, she was
Of Nature's contradictions still the first!
Much loved, much feared, much censured, much admired

Was good, yet giddy; vain, and yet had sense;
Trustful, yet jealous; humble, yet ambitious.
She could be humble, good, admired, and loved,
Or giddy, vain, ambitious, and despised.
She was to me the single ray that lit
The home my heart had longed for; and when lost,
When lost . . .

CLORIO.

Lost! I thought she lived,
And that in no choice company, 'tis said.

JURUS.

I know what's said:

Oh, we are wondrous moral—virtuous too
In shaping paths for other feet to travel!
Where there's no interest, no self-sacrifice,
No private ends to compass or complete,
Our sense of justice is unparalleled:
Moles are we to our own deficiencies,
Lynx-eyed to others' follies and defects.
I know what's said—'tis Scandal, sir.
There's a nobility within her soul
At which vice stands rebuked. Vain, but not vile Giddy, not guilty. No; 'tis Scandal, sir.

CLORIO to herself.

And I refused this man to court a fop,
An empty mask of man, a coxcomb, fool!

(Turning to JURUS smilingly and sportively)

Oh, scandal, sir! I know my Lady Scandal:
I saw her busy at our neighbour's house,
Peeping beneath the blinds, and whispering;
Blushing a thousand shames, with lifted hands,
As wondering to herself, "Can such things be?"
She travels half the universe and more;
Speaks every language underneath the sun;
Familiar with the Ganges as the Thames;
Knows all from Tartary to Ethiopia,
From Moscow to Madrid. With eager step,
Fresh from St. Petersburg she breathless brings
The hundredth faux pas of Queen Catharine.
She's the world's monitor, and people fear
Her little finger more than courts of law.
She rails of husbands false, of wives eloped,
Of babies born the mothers only know of;
Divorces and seductions, damages;
Of dukes and debt, conceit and beggar-pride.
And whilst she rails she laughs, and wonders where Such creatures think they'll go.

JURUS.

You're out of breath. . . .

CLORIO.

So is not Madame Scandal:

Nothing's too high, too low, too near, too far for Scandal
She speeds upon a moonbeam, and tells tales
Of fair Diana and Endymion;
Cautions the stars 'gainst Jupiter's amours;
Something of Leda's swan and showers of gold;
Swears Saturn ate his children; nay, what's more,
That Venus is no credit to the skies,
And marvels how the heavens can harbour her.
To maidens lacking partners for the dance
She speaks of rival beauties, of false teeth,
Dyed locks, and padded shapes, and cheeks of rose—
Blushes just born of vegetable rouge—
Flirtings, coquettings, jiltings, and intrigues.
And thus she laughs through life: for each she whips,
She's twenty laughers to enjoy the lash.
Leave but their own backs scoreless, half the world
Will laugh to see the other half exposed.
So Scandal keeps her audience. E'en from church
She'll seize the preacher on his passage home,
Mix with the congregation, and set all
The parish in a broil: this done, she laughs,
And says the world has grown too bad for her—
This giddy world, this madcap wicked world,
Has grown so bad 'twill be the death of her!
Oh, Scandal, sir—I know my Lady Scandal!

JURUS.

'Tis pity mirth like thine should e'er know change.
I like thy mood: thou'rt something like Louise,
In talent as in features; forward, pert,
Yet pertness losing its offensiveness
In something innocent and loveable.
I like thee much; for sorrow is with me
So constant in attendance, I would fain
Claim friendship with a nature light as thine.
What sayst thou? shall it be so? are we friends—
The cheerful youth and grave philosopher?
Morning and night make but a single day;
So we, though separate and different,
May still be one in friendship; as the day
Is one, though morn and night be different.

CLORIO.

If ever friend were true, I will be true.
Not for the sunlight merely was I born;
Not for the morning only: well I know
The night hath glory richer than the dawn.

JURUS.

I shall believe in sympathy—believe
That souls have kindred chords, which, once but touched,
Thrill through the being with a sense of joy,
Of love, of happiness, unknown before.
I'd thank thee for thy friendship, but that thanks . . .

CLORIO, interrupting him.

Are words, mere words, which any one may say:
Let's have no "words" on friendship's first sweet day.

(To be continued)

[Exeunt.]

[INTERIOR OF THE TEMPLE AT TANJORE.]

TALES OF THE BRAHMINS.

THE SILVER CASKET.

WHEN that remarkable Asiatic potentate, Tippoo Saib, was in the zenith of his power, the principality of Tanjore was subject to the Nabob of Arcot, and through him to the British, who from Madras issued orders to the whole of the Carnatic. The Hindoo religion and customs prevailed in all their severe integrity, and it was the policy of the British to uphold them, in opposition to the dreaded influence of the Mahomedans, who naturally sympathised with the Mahomedan court of Mysore. The bulk of the people, however, were Hindoos, divided with rigorous exactness into four great castes, with the innumerable subdivisions which such a monstrous system could scarcely have failed to create. Everything wore the same features as it had a thousand years previously. The Brahmins were the chief rulers in church, state, and the military; the agriculturists and the traders, mechanics, and labourers were the descendants of those who had occupied the same social position for centuries. It was life in death—a fixed, unchanging monotony—a curse dark as the brand on Cain's brow. And it is to this cause alone that India has never wandered beyond certain ancient unalterable landmarks, and in no great instance exhibited any signs of virility; or, as among more energetic people, ever assumed the attitude of a belligerent power, or sent forth a conqueror to invade other territories by sea or land, or in the person of its native monarchs long preserved a substantial independence. In almost every age, India has been a tributary; and the country has not more enriched its princes and its merchants, than it has its foreign conquerors and spoilers. The hereditary claim to this splendid dependency passed from hand to hand—if we may credit tradition—from the immediate heirs of Japhet to the days of the Great Mogul, and, subsequently, to the monarchs of England. It has never been a maritime power—in this respect strikingly resembling ancient Egypt and modern China. The Phenicians, the Arabs, the Egyptian Greeks, the Malays, the Portuguese, the British—those who have successively been lords of the sea, have been the masters of India. And all this negative existence may be attributed to the abasement of the mass of the people, through the horrible institution of caste, and the systematic social degradation considered indispensable to the permanent ascendancy of a sacerdotal nobility.

The conquests of Bala Rama and Krishnu effectually established a people whose posterity would never depart from their precepts; and it is remarkable, so complete was the change produced in the course of a few years, that all over India the religion of Brahma overthrew the ancient faith of upwards of a hundred millions, and the ecclesiastical supremacy of the Buddhic world was transferred from the magnificent King of Maghada to the baby pontiff of the wilds of Tartary. India is unquestionably the land of marvels, but its greatest marvel is itself. It is a corpse round which the rest of mankind whirl in maddening circles.

Well, about 1780, when Tippoo Saib was a great monarch, the peninsula of India was divided between him and the miserable protégés of the East India Company. Tanjore, under the latter power, enjoyed a semi-state of independence. The rajah was a luxurious gentleman, who loved an easy life above all things, and was only capable of strong emotion when his superstition was excited. The great temple, originally designed for the worship of Brahma the creator, but then perverted to the horrible doctrines of Sieva the destroyer, he supported as liberally as his limited revenues would allow him. His propitiation of the priesthood of the monster god had not protected his territories from many calamities, especially invasions: one of which had taken place about three years previously, under the terrible Tippoo, then a general in the army of Hyder Ali, his renowned father, and occasioned grievous losses to the city and temple—but particularly to the rajah, the greater part of whose jewels and plate were carried away; he was, however, somewhat consoled by the possession of one article, upon which he set an incalculable value.

These and other disasters had wofully impoverished his principality; and, to make matters worse, the cultivation of the land was beginning to be neglected; and, in many districts, the zemindars and ryots were at open variance. Certain transactions on one estate led to very important events in the chequered career of the rajah, and ultimately led to not only his fall, but that of the mighty Tippoo himself.

A few miles from Tanjore there stretched a very beautiful and fertile tract of country. Valleys of rich waving rice-fields were spread as far as the eye could reach, like a vast sea of green. On either side of those fertile tracts rose gently undulating lands, in which grew many crops of motley-tinted green; and over those waved to the morning breeze the sparkling leaves of nobly-timbered trees; while, high above, the lovely azure of the sky set all in harmony.

It was a scene of splendid cultivation; but a person in the shade of a grove of thickly-planted bamboo and mango-trees, did not at all exult in the rich prospect around him. He was seated before a low mud hut, looking ruefully at a few rupees, which he kept tossing from one hand to the other. He was a young man, not tall, but muscular, and seemed, from the expression of his features, to be one who would have thought the world a very good world, if it had only used him a little kindly.

"Ah, me!" sighed he; "the naik will sweep you all away into his big bag, and poor Sumro must be content to live as usual, on two rupees a month.* 'Tis hard usage, but I suppose it is my destiny; and I ought not to grumble, seeing that a paria fares worse, and is accursed in the sight of Sieva!"

At this moment his meditations were interrupted by the appearance of the naik, or collecting clerk, whose visit he had dreaded.

The consequential underling made a demand which startled the ryot, and the pair were soon engaged in a hot contention. While they are haggling, it may be as well to explain that the Indian peasantry, or, strictly speaking, farmers, are termed ryots; the great landed proprietors, who are accountable to the government for the land-tax, zemindars; but between these, as in Ireland, there are a variety of middle-men, who prey upon the working tenant, just as a pack of wolves do, when they get amongst a flock of sheep. All these middle-men grind down the miserable ryots to their utmost ability; so that, as Burke stated on the trial of Warren Hastings, the tax-gatherers—for all these exactions are in the shape of taxes—take from them eighteen shillings in every pound. An impartial traveller states, that "at the conclusion of each crop-time, the grower of rice or cotton is made to appear a debtor to his superior, who thereupon—provided the ryot appears able to toil on for another season—advances more seed for sowing, and a little more rice to keep the labourer and his family from absolute starvation. But should there be any doubt as to the health or strength of the tenant labourer, he is mercilessly turned from his land and mud hut, and left to die on the highway."

"Abwab!"† cried Sumro, after a long and ineffectual conference. "I am devoured by abwab! Why, you come to me at every feast, festival, or ceremony, for abwab!"

The naik smiled, and said:

"Have you a measure of rice?"

"Yes, thanks be to the ever gracious Lachsmee."

"And a bundle of tobacco?"

"Yes."

"And a yard of cloth?"

"Yes."

"Then," cried the naik, indignantly, "how dare you refuse abwab to our lord and chief? He but asks for the bundle of tobacco."

Sumro expostulated, but in vain: the collector was inexorable.

"I wish to lay up something for the future," said Sumro, desperately.

"The future!" shrieked the naik. "What business has a rascally ryot with the future?"

"I would marry."

"Pooh! There are plenty of paria girls on the estate."

"I am engaged, and intend to celebrate my nuptials this autumn."

The naik sneered, and made such an offensive remark, that the ryot knocked him down, and trampled on his body. When his rage had somewhat subsided, he bound the half-insensible man to a tree, and then ran over the fields to another mud hut, which stood about a mile off. The villainous naik had spoken the truth: attracted by the beauty of the girl to whom Sumro had been betrothed, he had compelled her starving parents to sell her to him for a trifle—half a score of rupees. When Sumro learnt this, he felt that he was a doomed man. Walking back dejectedly, he did not hear a sound behind him, and was only roused from his dismal meditations by finding himself violently jerked into a pool of water. After scrambling to his feet, he saw a white bull, which had long been the terror of the neighbourhood. As all bulls of that colour are considered sacred and dedicated to Brahma, his pious owner had turned him loose, to be fed by the public. He was a vicious beast, and seemed to have taken a particular dislike to Sumro; for he had broken his fences, and trampled down his rice and tobacco, times innumerable. And now, to complete the measure of his iniquities, he had committed an assault on the much-abused ryot. This was too much for even Hindoo endurance, and he commenced pelting the sacred beast with stones; but that only enraged the animal the more, and Sumro was obliged to run; but the bull kept close at his heels, bellowing dreadfully. When Sumro gained his hut, he entered precipitately, leaving the unfortunate naik to his fate. That was soon determined, for the representative of Brahma put an end to his existence by one thrust of his sharp, perpendicular horns.

* About seven shillings, the average cost of the subsistence of a ryot and his family for a month.

† An irregular exaction beyond the rent or levy, made at the discretion of the locusts who devour the substance of the poor ryots.

Sumro, whose heart misfortunes had hardened, was not much discomposed by this catastrophe; but, as he clearly saw that the death of the unfortunate collector might be laid to his charge, he thought the wisest thing he could do was to decamp at once. As his sacred lordship had gone away, raging like a fiend over the rice-fields, Sumro rifled the pockets of the naik, made up a bundle of portable necessities, set fire to the rest, and, after casting one glance over the fields he had cultivated with such care, turned his face to Tanjore, without one sigh or pang of regret.

His brother, a bhysse or trader, supposing he had visited the city for the purpose of disposing of his produce, gave him a hearty welcome. Sumro was shrewd enough to keep his own secret, for he was well aware that, although a Hindoo is bound to abstain from shedding blood, he would sacrifice his own father to obtain a score or two of rupees.

In the morning he crept to the Temple of Sieva, to commune within himself, and take counsel of the god. In the temple, as usual, were Brahmans, at their orisons, perfectly abstracted to everything around them. Their naked, dusky trunks were brought into shadowy outline by the white drapery they wore around their loins; and so silent were they, that they might have been taken for ghosts rather than living beings. The gloom that reigned within the richly-carved building added to the effect, as Sumro knelt at a respectful distance from the great idol; for, being only a sudra, or Hindoo of the fourth caste, he was not permitted to approach nearer than three yards, much less to touch the black bull of Tanjore.

While he was offering up prayers to Lachsmee, the goddess of his caste, and entreating Polleaz, the god of wisdom, to enlighten his understanding in the peculiar difficulties that encompassed him, another devotee prostrated himself by his side. Sumro's mind was so agitated, that he began to mutter aloud, and bewail his hard fate in a string of running commentaries on the occurrences of the day.

"Pray to Kalee!" whispered the man by his side. "He is the only god of the afflicted. What if you did slay the rascally naik? he deserved it!"

"I am innocent!" groaned Sumro.

"Follow me!" said the man; and, after making the customary genuflections, the pair left the temple. In the moonlight they recognised each other: the man was a well-known robber, who carried on his depredations with the connivance of the cutwal, a police magistrate of the district. Sumro unbosomed himself to this independent gentleman, and received, in return for his confidence, the salutary advice, that there was no safety for him but in becoming a dacoit, and of course a worshipper of Kalee, the goddess of thieves. Sumro gladly assented; and when they had passed out of the city, they soon came to—a rare thing for native Indians—a troop of horsemen. Sumro was speedily mounted, and away they galloped. The leader kindly informed him, on the way, that he and his band had been to an entertainment—in fact, a suttie—and regaled his ears with an account of the victim's charms, her perversity and shrieks, when hurled on to the fatal pile. He also told him that, at a certain village whither they were bound, a festival was being held in honour of Kalee, and that they would be just in time to see the swingings, mutilations, and sacrifices. The village, consisting of one street, a few hundred yards in length, was lit up from end to end, and in a perfect uproar. In the crowd were men, beating large, double drums, ornamented with plumes of black feathers; some played large, crooked trumpets, and others created a hideous noise by beating gongs. Everybody—even the children—was in a state of intoxication. Kalee being fond of the bottle—so affirmed the ascetic Brahmans—her followers emulated her example, by indulging in copious libations. It may be remarked, that at that day, among the lower classes, thieves and robbers were the only persons who lived well. Among them the use of flesh and all kinds of spirituous liquors was common.

The devotees on this occasion were numerous; some had small spears thrust into their tongues and arms, others went about with hot irons pressed against their sides. But the most disgusting spectacle was the swingings. The victim, stupefied by opium, was led, covered with flowers, to the foot of a tree, hooks were then thrust through the muscles of his sides, which he endured without shrinking; he was then raised up and whirled round; at first the motion was slow, but gradually increased to a fearful rapidity. The people shouted and danced round the panting wretch like demons, and, to keep him from fainting, water from time to time was poured down his throat. In one corner, a young girl quite naked, wearing a garland of flowers, was forcibly held by two men, who, at a given signal, hurled her into a pit which had been dug for the purpose, and at the bottom of which some combustibles had been placed and ignited. As the victim's screams rose above the howls of the mob, and the hideous din of the drums and gongs, every light in the village was extinguished, save the blue flame which rose from the pit, and ascended higher and higher as the cries of the murdered girl died gradually away.

Sumro, who all his life had been a gentle, docile Hindoo, under the influence of the savage scenes around him, and the frenzy of drink, joined in the ferocious exultation of the crowd, and shouted as loudly as the rest, when the blue flame had expired, and only the light of the moon fell upon the horrid sacrifices of virgin innocence.

But Kalee was supposed to be propitiated, and in order to do full honour to her example, the people squatted on the ground, and drank to furious and beastly excess. Sumro and the robber-chief, together with a choice selection of cut-throats, formed a party by themselves, and passed the time until sunrise in drinking, telling stories, and singing obscene songs. One of the stories powerfully excited Sumro. It was to the purpose that the Rajah of Tanjore possessed a silver casket which contained the key not only to unbounded wealth, but to universal empire, and all the voluptuous joys of a paradise besided over by Cama, the ever-blooming god with the bow of cane and immortal shafts wreathed with flowers.

"I will have that casket!" exclaimed Sumro, mentally, as he fell backwards, quite exhausted with the debauch, and dreamed that he saw Bala Rama on his throne, surrounded by beautiful women, and that he said, in a voice of celestial depth and music: "Sumro, your destiny is great! The Silver Casket holds the mystery of India. Solve it, and you will have a princess for a bride, and a kingdom for a fortune. Never mind your caste. If gold can purchase a seat in Paradise, it can surely place you high above all castes."

Sumro having been duly sworn in as a bandit, and offered his blood to Kalee for his fidelity, was dispatched to the city, in the disguise of a yogie, to reconnoitre, and transmit intelligence of the various routes which merchants would take on leaving Tanjore. This was just what he wanted, and as he was a clever fellow, he made an admirable yogie, and was much applauded for his apparently fearful but simulated lacerations, and unctuous piety. The rajah invited him to court, and as he preferred being coiled up at night in a corner like a dog, instead of reposing on sweet rice straw, he was allowed to linger about the out-buildings just as he liked.

One night he had crept unobserved into the courtyard that bordered the gardens of the zenana, and when all was hushed, he clambered over the walls, and wandered among parterres that had never before been profaned by the foot of a Sudra.

"Extortion," he said to himself, "first made me a poor man, the villainy of the naik an accessory to his death, and now necessity has made me a thief! Well, no man can run away from his destiny! I have learned that the charmed silver casket always stands on a table in the apartment of the princess, and as I can climb like a cat, and Bala Rama promised it me, I will attempt to obtain it this night, or die! I can but die once in this form—so here goes for fortune or Yama!"

To reach the second story of the building was a matter of little difficulty, and Sumro soon found himself in the balcony of the harem. A light glimmering through one of the lattices drew him towards it, and, on peeping through, he beheld a sight which made his heart leap and his head giddy.

The princess Dodoo lay reclining on a couch of golden tissue, while an attendant was preparing her hair for the dreamy slumber of virgin repose. She was in the full summer of Indian loveliness, probably fifteen years of age. Her mother was a Persian, consequently her complexion was many degrees fairer than that of the Hindoo women: and to account probably for Sumro's sudden passion, it may be remarked, that though most of the male deities are represented of a deep-brown colour, like the natives of the country, the females are not less red and white than the porcelain beauties hawked about in England. And it is evident, from the expressions of most of the Indians themselves, from the style of their amatory poetry, and other circumstances, that they consider fairness as a part of beauty, and a proof of noble blood. They do not like to be called black; and though the Abyssinians, who are sometimes to be met with in the country, are little darker than they are themselves, their jest-books are full of taunts on the charcoal complexion of the Hushies.

The princess Dodoo was considered very fair, and, in addition, a remarkably finely featured, tall, aristocratic-looking girl. Her father would have had her married long ago, if he could have found her a suitable husband; but as the wars had slain most of the promising young men, and drained the elderly ones of their cash, Dodoo was allowed to luxuriate in her innocent freedom. Her heart, however, it seemed, had been touched—for, as Sumro looked and listened, he heard her say

"The English resident is fair!"

"Tall, as a palm-tree!" added the attendant.

"His eyes are like the sky, celestial!"

"His teeth are pearls!"

"His mouth is ripe with kisses!"

"His tongue is soft as the breathing of the lute!"

"In war it is as terrible as the blast of the trumpet!"

"He is noble like myself!"

"His officer, Sergeant Brown, swears he belongs to my caste. His father was a law-writer, so he must be a true vaisya."

Thus did the two girls talk until they fell asleep, making it quite clear to the comprehension of Sumro that the princess had fallen in love with the British resident, James Ratcliff, and the attendant had been smitten by the early figure of his only military officer, Sergeant Brown. Remembered, if possible, more accurately by this disclosure, and remembering the promise connected with the silver casket, when the princess and the girl were locked in each other's arms, he stole on tiptoe into the room, and seized the coveted prize, which had lain on a table, and which rajahs for successive generations had always kept in the apartment of the zenana, not only as a charm against evil and all manner of intrigues, but for safety.

* The city of Yama, the god of death.

Sumro fled from the city before sunrise, and, as he did not much like making a confidant of the robber captain—who, when it suited his purpose, was an excellent decapitator—he took to the open country; and, as he allowed chance to direct his footsteps, without being aware of it, he was soon several miles advanced along the high road to Coimbatour, a large town then in the possession of Tippoo Saib.

After refreshing himself at a choultry by the road-side, and finding the heat of the day becoming intolerable, he crept into a jungle, and, under the shade of a venerable banyan-tree, examined his treasure. It was a beautifully shaped casket, in the form of a heart, but seemed to be solid, for Sumro could discover no opening, or the slightest indication of one. As he was peering into every wrinkle and line of the chasing, his quick ear caught the sound of a rustling of leaves and a cracking of twigs. He knew the cause well—there was a tiger in the jungle; so, unless he decamped with speed, he never would solve the mystery of the casket, or marry a princess. Winged by fear, he soon regained the road, and was careering blindly along, when he suddenly found himself in the midst of a party of horsemen. His heart sank within him as he recognised the cavalry of Tippoo Saib.

The leader, a fierce, one-eyed warrior, finding the casket upon him, would have hanged him on the spot for a thief; but as Sumro began to rave about a mystery, and the casket looked very like the workmanship of a magician, he resolved to send his prisoner to Seringapatam, to be examined by the sultan in person.

Tippoo Saib was remarkable for his superstition, and the captain wisely thought that he should advance his fortune if he could add anything to the large stock of amulets and talismans that the monarch had collected.

Sumro was therefore tied to a horse's tail, and, in that ignominious manner, after a week's march, the future husband of a princess entered the capital of Mysore, and was hurried into the presence of the renowned Tippoo, then holding a court of justice in person, in the great hall of his palace.

Tippoo was then the terror of both Christians and Hindoos. One of the first acts by which he signalled his accession to the throne was the deportation and the forcible conversion of upwards of 30,000 Christians, from the Portuguese settlements on the coast of Canara. On another occasion, entering Coorg with two columns, he drew a military circle round the great mass of the population, which he gradually contracted, sending his troops to beat up the woods before them, precisely as if dislodging so much game. By these means he inclosed about 70,000 of the inhabitants, who were driven off, like a herd of cattle, to Seringapatam, where they also were "honoured with the distinction of Islam."

No wonder that he was dreaded, or that Sumro would have preferred encountering a hundred sacred bulls to facing such a terrible potentate.

He was seated on the musnud, looking savagely magnificent. His dress consisted of a jacket of fine white linen, loose drawers of flowered chintz, the usual girdle of the east, crimson-coloured, tied round his waist, and a handsome pouch, with a belt of silk, red and green, hung across his shoulder. He wore an amulet on his arm, and his person blazed with jewels. He was above the middle age, with massive shoulders, a brown complexion, large, full eyes, and an aquiline nose.

"Who is this infidel?" he exclaimed, as the one-eyed captain led Sumro to the foot of the throne.

"May it please your majesty, who is the ornament of the world—the asylum of the nations—king of kings—I found this uncircumcised wretch stealing like a thief from a wood on the great road to Coimbatour, with this silver casket concealed under the rags of a yogie."

The sultan took the casket, and, having eyed it curiously for several seconds, asked Sumro how he came by it.

Sumro, in desperation, told the truth, and related the legend. Tippoo was keenly interested, for he was a fanatic in his superstition, and attributed the most wonderful properties to any trifling article that was presented to him as having a touch of magic about it. But, dissimulating, he fixed on Sumro a terrible glance, and said:

"Art thou willing to become a true believer? Hesitate not, wretch, for the rage of Islam boils in my breast!"

The Hindoo promptly answered in the affirmative. On the road he had revolved in his mind apostasy to Mahomet or the alternative death, and had quickly decided upon the course he should take. As a Hindoo, he had experienced nothing but poverty, and when his faith in any of the incarnations of Brahma had been shaken by his prostration before the god of thieves, it must be conceded that turning Mahomedan was not a matter of much difficulty. The sultan was inexpressibly gratified by his readiness to recant his infidel errors for his immediate conversion to Islamism. But the casket puzzled the monarch: in imitation of the illustrious Alexander, he ordered it to be cut in two pieces. The royal smith soon brought his block and tools before the throne, and proceeded, with his work, while the emperor dispensed the Koran or a halter to the multitude of miserable creatures who were driven before him like wild beasts.

At length the casket was opened, and a roll of parchment was banded to Tippoo. It contained some writing in an unknown character, which a renegade pundit present declared he could interpret.

"Read!" cried the monarch. The pundit glanced over the document, and turned deadly pale.

"Read!" roared Tippoo, grasping the heavy sabre he usually carried.

The pundit, overwhelmed, did not dare to falter or deceive; he tremblingly read:

"The treasures of Bala Rama, concealed in the Temple of Tanjore."

"Alla be praised! Read!" gasped the sultan, labouring under great excitement.

The pundit went through a catalogue of surprising length, and filled with astounding items of gold and jewels.

"Where are they deposited?" ejaculated Tippoo.

The pundit was about to read on, but Tippoo checked him, and, giving a signal, that learned man and Sumro were hurried away into close and separate confinement.

Meanwhile all went wrong at Tanjore. The rajah was inconsolable for the loss of his casket, and even suspected his daughter of being concerned in some intrigue affecting his throne as well as honour. But Dodoo protested her innocence with such earnestness, that he was fain obliged to believe her, and seek consolation in the society of his favourite, the bottle.

The British resident—one of those energetic young men whom the success of Clive attracted to the East—exerted himself to protect the province from the utter ruin that the miserable rule of the rajah, combined with a failure in the crops, threatened to bring about, but all in vain. The ryots, ground to the very dust by the land system, had grown reckless and idle, and, to make matters worse, war had commenced between Tippoo Saib and the British. The Princess Dodoo had long ago acknowledged that he was dear to her, but there were various obstacles to their union, not the least of which was their mutual poverty.

Matters were getting desperate, when, one fine morning, the alarming intelligence was brought to him that a large force of cavalry were almost at the city gates. The rajah could not muster a hundred effective troops, and his own little garrison did not exceed a score of infantry. Resistance was useless: therefore he prudently retired into the fortress in which the rajah resided, and which, he knew, might be held against cavalry until the arrival of some troops which he knew were on their way from Madras. But the enemy, who consisted of no less than five thousand of Tippoo's grand army, seemed more bent on executing a vulgar razzia than attempting a conquest, for they took possession of the temple, and after remaining in it until after sunset, took their departure.

When they had gone, the resident went out to reconnoitre. He found the Brahmins at their devotions and in the act of purification, for a headless goat lay in a pool of blood on the steps of a small shrine, apparently of Kalee, at the entrance of the temple. Admission under such circumstances he would not insist upon; and, while the mysteries were being performed, he thought, amongst other things, over the tradition which said, that in ancient times a man was sacrificed there every day; that the custom had been abandoned, until the reigning monarch had a frightful dream, in which the destroying power appeared to him, and asked him why her image was suffered to be dry. The rajah, afraid to disobey, and reluctant to fulfil the requisition to its ancient extent of horror, took counsel, and substituted a goat for the human victim, with which the Dark goddess of the azure flood,

Whose robes are wet with infants' tears,
Skull-chaplet wearer, whom the blood
Of man delights three thousand years—was graciously pleased to be contented.

When the sacrifice had been completed, the resident entered, and was informed by a blind Brahmin, prostrate before the shrine of Siava—a marvellous piece of wood carving, inlaid with gold and precious stones—that some treasure, which had been hidden a thousand years, had been carried off by the soldiers of Tippoo Saib, who had left in their place a headless pundit, and a raving paria, who could talk of nothing but some princess the idiot had fancied was to have been his bride.

The resident was startled, as well as chagrined, for such an exploit could not have been performed without some previous precise information. Hastily disposing of his men so that no person could escape from the building, he entered the sacred sanctum—the holy of holies—and beheld ample confirmation of what the blind Brahmin had informed him. A pillar of cast-metal, which had been called Brahmin's walking-stick, and to which a tradition was attached, similar in import to that connected with the coronation stone of the Scots, lay on the floor, broken in pieces. Beside it lay the headless trunk of a man, and a little further off the prostrate form of another, muttering incoherently. The resident gave him some water, which revived him a little, and he began to speak more collectedly.

"My name Sumro!" he faintly exclaimed; "the prince I shall embrace will be death, and the kingdom I was promised the grave—perhaps the detested form of an ass! Oh! that I had paid the naik his abash! If I had, I should never have struck him, or been chased by a Brahmin bull, or cursed his untimely end, or become myself a thief, or have heard anything about the accursed silver casket! O fatal destiny! And O Lachmee! you would never have shown me what great things arise from little things!"

Sumro felt himself dying, for he had been shockingly murdered, and told the resident his extraordinary story, which the latter pit was fabled in truth, seeing that it was corroborated by the circumstances of the loss of the casket, and the plunder of the temple.

And so a miserable ryo, through a chain of avenging events, supplied the tyrant of Mysore with that prodigious wealth in precious metal and jewels which enabled him to carry on two wars with the British, and, when finally vanquished by them, so enriched the conquerors, that, independent of the private optima spolia, the government of India realised such an enormous sum, at the taking of Seringapatam, that, under the able administration of the Marquis of Wellesley, it contributed largely, through its judicious expenditure, in effecting the subjugation of continental India, as far as the very borders of the Punjab.

As for the rajah, he was so mortified by the news, that he drank himself to death in three days, and his daughter, being his sole heiress, sold his lands and principalities to the Resident of Madras, packed up his plate, and, like a sensible, loving girl, married the British resident.

THE MERCHANT'S DREAM.

ALGERON was a merchant. All through a long summer day he had been engaged among boxes, bales, and packages; or poring over accounts current; or musing over new adventures. When night came, he retired to his quiet chamber, and refreshed his wearied mind with music and books. Poetry, and the harmony of sweet sounds, elevated his sentiments, and caused him to think, as he had often before thought, of the emptiness and vanity of mere earthly pursuits.

"In what," said he, "am I wasting my time? Is there anything in the dull round of mercantile life to satisfy an immortal spirit? What true congeniality is there between the highly-gifted soul and bales of cotton or pieces of silk? Between the human mind and the dull, insensible objects of trade? Nothing! Nothing! How sadly do we waste our lives in the mere pursuit of gold! And, after the glittering earth is gained, are we any happier? I think not! The lover of truth—the wise, contemplative hermit in his cell—is more a man than Algeron!"

Thus mused the merchant, and thus he gave utterance to his thoughts—sighing as he closed each sentence. The book that he loved was put aside; the instrument from which his skillful hand drew eloquent music, lay hushed upon a table. He was unhappy. He had remained thus for some time, when the door of his room opened, and a beautiful being entered, and stood before him. Her countenance was calm and elevated, yet full of sweet benevolence. For a moment she looked at the unhappy merchant, then, extending her hand, she said:

"Algeron, I have heard your complaints. Come with me, and look around with a broader intelligence!"

As she spoke, she touched the eyes of the young man. Arising, he found himself in the open air, walking by the side of his strange conductor, along a path that led to a small cottage. Into this they entered. It was a very humble abode—but peace and contentment were dwellers in the breasts of its simple-minded occupants—an aged female and a little girl. Both were engaged with reels of a curious and somewhat complicated construction; and both sang cheerily at their work. A basin of cocoons on the floor by each of the reels, told Algeron the true nature of their employment. A small basket of fine and smoothly-reeled spools were upon a table. While the merchant still looked on, a man entered, and after bargaining for the reeled silk, paid down the price, and carried it away. A few minutes after, the owner of the cottage came in. He asked for his rent, and it was given to him. Then he retired. Shortly after, a dealer in provisions stopped at the humble dwelling, and liberally supplied the wants of its occupants. He received his pay, and drove off, singing gaily, while the old woman and the child looked contented and happy.

"Come!" said his conductor; and Algeron left the cottage. The scene had changed. He was no longer in the open country, but surrounded by small houses. It was a village. Along the streets of this they walked for some time, until they came to a store, which they entered. Standing beside the counter was the same man who had bought the cottagers' silk. He had many parcels, which he had collected from many cottages; and now he was passing them over to the storekeeper, who was as ready to buy as he was to sell.

"Another link in the great chain," remarked the mysterious companion, significantly. "See how they depend the one upon the other. Can the hermit in his cell, idly musing about truths that will not abide—for truth is active—is in fact the power by which good is done to our fellows, and will not remain with any one who does not use it—thus serve his fellows? Is his life more excellent, more honourable, more in accordance with the high endowments of the soul, than the life of him who engages in those employments by which all are benefited?"

Algeron felt that new light was breaking in upon him; but as yet he saw dimly.

"Look up," continued his companion, "and see yet another link."

The merchant raised his eyes. The scene had again changed. The village had become a large town, with ranges of tall buildings, in which busy hands threw the shuttle, weaving into beautiful fabrics of various patterns the humble fibres gathered from hundreds of cottages, farm-houses, and cocoaneries, in all the region round about. Through these he wandered with his guide. Here was one tending a loom, there another folding, arranging, or packing into cases the products thereof; and at the head of all was the manufacturer himself.

"Is this a useless life?" asked the guide. "Is he wasting the high endowments of an immortal mind, in thus devoting himself to the office of gathering the raw material, and producing it as an article of commerce and luxury? But see! Another has presented himself.

It is the merchant. He has come to receive from this man the products of his looms, and send them over the world, that all may receive and enjoy them. Are his energies wasted? No Algeron! If the merchant were not to engage in trade, the manufacturer could not get his goods to market, and would no longer afford the means of subsistence that he now does to hundreds and thousands who produce the raw material. Without him, millions who receive the blessings furnished by nature and art, in places remote from their city or country, would be deprived of many comforts, of many delights. The agriculturist, the manufacturer, the merchant, the artisan—all who are engaged in the various callings that minister to the wants, the comforts, and the luxuries of life, are honourably employed. Society, in all its parts, is held together by mutual interests. A chain of dependencies binds the world together. Sever a single link, and you affect the whole. Look below you. As a merchant, your position is intermediate between the producer and the consumer. See how many hundreds are blessed with the reception of nature's rich benefits through your means. Could this take place, if you sought only after abstract truth, in idle, dreamy musings? Cease, then, to chafe yourself by fallacious reasonings. Rather learn to delight in the consciousness that you are the means of diffusing around you many blessings. Think not of the gold you are to gain, as the end of your activity; for so far as you do this, you will lose the true benefits that may be derived from pursuing with diligence your calling in life—that for which, by education, you are best qualified—and into which your inclination leads you."

"I see it all now, clear as a sunbeam," Algeron said, with a sudden enthusiasm, as light broke strongly into his mind. The sound of his own voice startled him with its strangeness. For a moment he seemed the centre of a whirling sphere. Then all grew calm, and he found himself sitting alone in his chamber.

"Can all this have been but a dream?" he murmured, thoughtfully. "No—no—it is more than a dream! I have not been taught by a mere phantom of the imagination, but by Truth herself—beautiful Truth! Her lovely countenance I shall never forget, and her words shall rest in my heart, like apples of gold in pictures of silver! Henceforth I look upon life with a purified vision. Nothing is mean, nothing is unworthy of pursuit, that ministers to the good of society! On this rock I rest my feet! Here I stand upon solid ground!"

From that time, Algeron pursued his business as a merchant with renewed activity. The thought that he was ministering, in his sphere, to the good of all around him, was a happy thought. It cheered him on in every adventure, and brought to his mind, in the hour of retirement, a sweet peace, such as he had never before known. Fully did he prove that the consciousness of doing good to others, brings with it the purest delight.

A REAL MISER.—A notorious miser, named Jameson, died at Newby, Westmoreland, lately, in abject wretchedness. He made his own clothes, washed his own linen, and lived on the sparest diet. He sat in his lonely cottage on the dark winter nights without fire or candle. He had three feather beds, and plenty of bed-clothes, in his house, which belonged to his less penurious ancestors; yet he slept on a miserable pallet, and wrapped himself up in his mother's old cloak, the hood of which served for a nightcap. A few weeks before his decease, one of his neighbours insisted that he should have a woman to wait on him. The doctor came to see him twice, but he gradually became weaker, and, with his eye turned towards the box at the foot of his bed, containing cash and securities, he thus died. Everything in his house was ticketed, from the wines sent to him by his relations, which remained untouched; and the stockings which his mother had knitted for him before she died, remained packed up, and lined with bay-leaves, to preserve them from the worms. His property has been variously estimated at from £20,000 to £30,000, the principal part of which will go to a nephew in London, his sister's son.

THE INFANTRY AT WATERLOO.—The cuirassiers were repeatedly driven off by the 30th and their comrade regiment, themselves reduced by painful degrees. Line was again formed with unwearied alacrity; no complaint escaped the patient soldiers' lips, if we except an occasional cry to be led on. The storm was seen again gathering and rolling onwards. The command, "Reform square: prepare to receive cavalry!" was promptly and accurately obeyed. The whole were prostrate on their breasts, to let the iron shower of artillery fly over, and erect in an instant when the artillery ceased and the cavalry charged. Such were "the Men of Waterloo!" Unable to break in upon a square by open force, a commanding officer of cuirassiers tried a ruse. He lowered his sword to General Halkett; several of the officers cried out, "Sir, they surrender." The General justly suspected an offer of surrender to infantry, fixed to the spot in a defensive position, by cavalry, who had the option of galloping off with all the plain behind them. The volley sent the colonel and the cuirassiers, as usual, about, with a laugh of derision from the men he had meant to cut to pieces, and many a ring from their balls upon the back pieces of their mails. This gallant brigade was honoured with several visits from their illustrious chief. In one he inquired how they were? The answer was, that two-thirds of their number were down, and that the rest were so exhausted, that leave to retire, even for a short time, was most desirable—some of the foreign corps, who had not suffered, to take their place. General Halkett was told that the issue depended on the steady, unflinching front of the British troops; and that even a change of place was hazardous in the extreme. "Enough, my lord," he replied, "we stand here till the last man falls!"—Simpson's Paris after Waterloo.

[PRESENT APPEARANCE OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE AT SYDENHAM.]

ROYAL VISITS TO REMARKABLE PLACES.

No. IX.—THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

HER MAJESTY and Prince Albert have visited the Crystal Palace, now in progress of erection at Sydenham, and expressed their warm approval of not only the building, but everything embraced by the leading purposes for which it is intended.

Our engraving represents the structure in progress of erection, such as it appeared to the Royal party; but we think sufficient has been done to afford a lively idea of what it will be when completed. Standing, as it will, more than three hundred feet above high water, it will be seen forty miles from the metropolis, and will unquestionably be the most conspicuous object in its neighbourhood. Indeed, in point of attraction, it will be a formidable rival to St. Paul's; and, as to dimensions, completely throw St. Peter's and St. Paul's into the shade. The length of the two cathedrals is 1169 feet; the Crystal Palace will be nearly 1900 feet in length. In breadth it will be 384 feet, being 161 feet more than the greatest width of St. Paul's, and about 58 feet less than the greatest width of St. Peter's. In height it will far surpass the bodies of both churches, and approach nearly to the perpendicular grandeur of our metropolitan cathedral.

There are three transepts in process of erection: two of the same size and height as the original transept in the building in Hyde Park, and a central one of 130 feet span, and an altitude of 108 feet above the smaller ones. These will have a grand effect; and, as the ground slopes, the building will appear as if rising out of the brow of a hill, and, when seen in the light of a summer sun, effectually realise the gorgeous conception of the Palace made of glass, which Chaucer gave to the world some four centuries ago.

Mr. Owen Jones was cicerone to the Royal party; and, as her Majesty is very exact in her inquiries, no doubt he informed her that the commodious available space under the floor-line will be used for heating the interior; for the stoves and the machinery that will be requisite in working the industrial, and displaying the ornamental portions of the exhibition. By this arrangement all the rough mechanical apparatus will be placed quite out of sight. Gas-meters, boilers, and stoves, will not interfere with either the uniformity of the aspect, or the operations conducted in the interior of the building. This basement story will be formed of columns and girders, with brick arches fitted to receive the earth for the plants above. Another admirable arrangement which ought to be mentioned is, that the galleries will not, as in the first Crystal Palace, run along the nave, but be kept to the outside walls, so as to come forward only at those points where the most striking views will be commanded.

When the structure is completed, and we shall be in a position to describe it in detail, we shall take care to do so; but as, in such a great undertaking, there may be many modifications of the original plan, we are obliged to restrict ourselves to such generalities as will afford a comprehensive idea of the character of the whole when finished, and ready for the admission of the public.

Our illustration shows what has been done and what is doing; and we may add, that at present it is intended that the interior shall be arranged on certain fixed general principles.

The character of the tropics will be exemplified at one end, and gradually change, until, at the centre transept, a temperate climate and temperate vegetation will be reached, and prevail throughout the remainder of the building. This arrangement will allow of a magnificent botanical variety. The palm and cocoa-nut trees of the East, together with the gigantic flowers of the Indian islands, the aloe of America, the fig of Turkey, and the grape of Greece, will all be shown, to introduce to the eye the rose of England, the plum, the apricot, the peach, the apple, the orange, and the mulberry of Europe. Scattered about will be quadrangles, similar to the Fine Arts and Medieval courts of the Exhibition. These courts will be so constructed and furnished as to represent the people, manners, and customs, of different nations.

India, with its awful dead weight of a Hindoo population, its bigoted Mussulmen, its horrible idolatry, and the fearful oppression and waste of human industry, engendered by the institution of caste, will be adequately illustrated; as will also the social manners of the people, as well as their manufactures.

A second court will be devoted to the characteristics of China; and we anticipate more practical information as to the actual condition and peculiarities of that locked-up country from this department, than could be obtained from all the books that have or could be written on the subject.

A third court will contain a reproduction of one of the divisions of the celebrated Alhambra—one of those beautiful structures which some time ago furnished a prominent pictorial feature to the LONDON JOURNAL. Another will show a Pompeian house fully restored.

And in one of the smaller transepts, there will be Egyptian antiquities, casts from the celebrated reliefs, illustrative of the trades of Egypt, and from the most noted statues, all coloured like the original, and so disposed as to look like a living reproduction of Egyptian manners and things.

Sculpture and architecture, from their commencement to the present time, will be fully exhibited. The latter ought to be a glorious department for the lover of art—for, if properly occupied and arranged, it will exhibit architecture in its various stages of progress, from the wigwag of the savage to the palace of the monarch; and also show that the several orders—such as the Hindoo, the Egyptian, the Moorish, the Gothic—instead of being copies of each other, are essentially the same in origin: being the spontaneous production of genius in different countries, and the necessary results of similarity in the materials at hand, and the necessity that required their use. The pyramid, the obelisk, the spire, steeple, and minaret, will be so displayed as to make it evident that they are bold imitations of the romantic forms of spire, towering rocks, which the imitators of humble huts or the hollows of trees never presumed to attempt. So with the flat-roofed, hundred-pillared Egyptian temple. That is a copy of a natural cavern, and the arched vault and lofty dome of the Egyptian, Hindoo, Moorish, and Gothic architectures, can all be traced to a common origin, for their very heaviness shows that the idea of them was taken from caverns in granite, containing massive pillars which supported the weight of mountains.

However, we trust to have the opportunity of discussing this, among the other grave questions which the opening of the Crystal Palace will suggest; and we are glad to learn that, as regards architecture, the collection will form a progressive series, with which will be mixed the industrial arts and manufactures of the middle age. In this department the promised combination of statues and foliage will be as new as striking.

Geology, that wonderful and not half-understood science, will occupy a considerable space; and when we are told that modern machinery and manufactures will be represented in exhibitions of materials, from their raw state, in every progressive condition up to perfected articles, it will be at once understood that the erection of the building—the shell—beautiful as it will be, both inside and out, will form but a portion of the labour—the extraordinary labour, both of head and hand, which will have to be brought into requisition before the finishing touches shall have been given to this colossal undertaking. The intention of all the museums within the building will be educational. They will not constitute mere collections interesting and instructive only to those who are acquainted with the subjects, but will be so arranged that they will exhibit the connection and progress of the different parts. The popular accompaniment of lectures by eminent men will be added, as a matter of course; and thus, in the course of a few months, an institution, on a scale of unparalleled magnitude, and of infinite and immeasurable tendencies for the development of good, will have been designed and completed, without the grant of, or even the request for, a single penny from the government, or anything in the shape of a donation. The task will be accomplished solely by private enterprise, and we are sure it will be acknowledged that the directors, at the conclusion of these their arduous, initiatory labours, will have richly deserved the gratitude of not only London, but, in these days of cheap and rapid travelling, the whole of the country.

As to opening on Sundays, that is a large question. Parliament and the public must be consistent. Sanctioning the taking of money at the doors of the Exhibition on the Sabbath Day looks awkward, in the presence of the circumstance that Parliament and the influential portions of the public shut up the National Gallery and the British Museum. If the Crystal Palace is to be opened on Sunday, the two latter could not in decency be closed. But it is a large question. What is Sunday? When does it begin and end? Is the observance of Sunday essential? Is it an institution? Ought it to be modified or abolished? Those who can answer these questions conscientiously will be the best able to form a conscientious opinion of this part of the Crystal Palace project. For our parts, we deeply regret that the directors ever made the proposition to open at all on the Sunday. Taking money at the doors of a public building on a Sunday, under the sanction of a special Act of Parliament would look monstrously ugly in England.

We know that it is done at the various gardens and places of entertainment outside the metropolis and the large towns in the country; but the practice is illegal and a breach both of the common and statute law. And if it were not, it is unseemly, when the moral and instructive national institutions are hermetically sealed to the public on the Sabbath Day. If there is to be a principle on the subject, let it be observed by everybody, whatever it may be. Don't let Mr. Groggins, who keeps tea-gardens open on Sunday to all who can pay so much per head, have a privilege or an indulgence which is denied to the manager of a theatre.

If there is to be a Sunday, let it be really a Sunday. If there is not to be a Sunday, let us have perfect equality in the matter.

HANDWRITING.

At a recent sitting of the Academy of Sciences, some papers were read relative to handwriting. Among the facts stated, the most remarkable was, that no man can ever get rid of the style of handwriting peculiar to his nation. If he be English, he always writes in English style; if French, in the French style; if German, Italian, or Spanish, in the style peculiar to his nation.

I am acquainted with a Frenchman who has passed all his life in England, and who is English in dress, habits, tastes, and everything; who speaks English like one of our countrymen, and writes English with ten times more correctness than ninety-nine in the hundred of us, but who cannot, for the very life of him, imitate our mode of writing. I have also heard speak of a Scotch youth, who was carefully educated in this country, and, for eighteen years of his life, mixed exclusively with French people, but who, though he had a French writing-master, and, perhaps never saw anything but French writing in his life, always wrote in the same style as we all do; it was really national instinct. In Paris all the writing-masters profess to teach the English manner of writing, but, with all their exertions, they can never get their pupils to adopt any but the cramped hand of the French. Some person pretended that he could tell the characters of individuals from their handwritings: I know not whether he spoke truth or not, but assuredly he might have asserted, with the most perfect confidence, that he could distinguish a man's country by his handwriting. The difference between our writing and that of the French is immense—a schoolboy would distinguish it at a glance. Mix together a hundred sheets of manuscript written by a hundred of our own countrymen, and a hundred sheets written by Englishmen, and no one would fail to say which was the British and which was the French, even though they should all be written in the same language, and with the same pens, ink, and paper. The difference between the Italian, Spanish, and German styles of writing, is equally as great.

THE ACTION OF FEAR.—There is a curious ordeal in India, which shows the action of fear on the salivary glands. If a wrong is committed, the suspected persons are got together, and each is required to keep a quantity of rice in his mouth for a certain time, and then put it out again; and, with the greatest certainty, the man who had done the deed put it out almost dry, in consequence of the fear of his mind keeping back the saliva.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—Thomas Stothard, the great painter, when a young man, had to maintain himself on a very small income. But by self-denial he succeeded not only in keeping out of debt, but also in being able to assist a friend or brother artist when in need. On the failure of heirs male to an old family mansion and large landed property in Gloucestershire, he was advised to assert his claim to them as next heir, with every prospect of success, if he would adopt the usual legal measures. He would not, however, distract his mind and withdraw his attention from his easel and his studies by engaging in a law plea; and, besides, he remarked, with the accustomed simplicity of his character, "that he should not like to disturb with law the three maiden ladies who had the property in possession!" How rare such good sense, as well as such magnanimity! The artist's biographer, Mrs. Bray, has well remarked on this, that "Burke would not have said that a spirit of chivalry was dead in England, could he have heard this anecdote of Stothard."

PRAYER AT SEA.—If prayer were not instinctive to man, it is here that it would have been invented, by being left alone with their thoughts and their weaknesses, in the presence of the abyss of the heavens, in the immensity of which the sight is lost—and in the abyss of the sea, from which they are only separated by a fragile plank, the ocean roaring meanwhile, whistling and howling like the cries of a thousand wild beasts; the blasts of wind making the cordages yield a harsh sound, and the approach of night increasing every peril, and multiplying every terror. But prayer was not invented: it was born with the first sight, the first joy, the first sorrow of the human heart; or rather, man was born to pray—to glorify God, or to implore Him, was his only mission here below; all else perishes before him, or with him; but the cry of glory, of admiration, or of love, which he raises to the Creator, does not perish on his passing from the earth; it reascends, it resounds from age to age in the ear of the Almighty, like the echo of His own voice, like the reflection of His magnificence. It is the only thing in man which is wholly divine, and which he can exhale with joy and pride—for this pride is a homage to Him to whom closer homage is due—the Infinite Being.—Lamartine.

[CECIL'S VISIT TO THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH, AT SOMERSET HOUSE.]

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ., AUTHOR OF

"AMY LAWRENCE," "ROBIN GOODFELLOW," ETC.

ELIZABETH,

QUEEN REGNANT OF ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XV.

Must I dissemble thus with mine own honour?
Mask the conviction of my inmost soul?
Give truth the lie, and own the lie for truth?
O sad necessity, of times more sad!—THE MARTYR.

No sooner had Elizabeth reached her home in Somerset House, and dismissed her attendants, than she retired to her closet, and there, unseen by every eye, gave vent to the long pent emotions of her soul: pride, mortification, and regret, at the concession she had been compelled to make to the exacting temper of her sister, and the hard necessity of her position.

"This is the hardest struggle of my life!" she exclaimed, as with her white hand she dashed the tears indignantly aside; "doomed to accept the faith I hate, conform to the rites of a church which brands the name of harlot on the brow of my unfortunate mother, and stamps my birth with the stain of illegitimacy! I have struggled with mine enemy, and have been worsted! Worst!" she repeated, slowly, as she paced the floor of the apartment with a hurried and unequal step; "not yet—not yet! for in the future beams the bright and glorious reward of all my sufferings and sorrows—the crown! I yet shall live to wear it—to trample on my foes—root from the land the worship which pollutes it—repay its insolent prelates scorn for scorn—injury for injury! There is some consolation even in the thought of such a triumph! They think to degrade me: fools—fools!" she added, bitterly, "they but strengthen me—the people will judge me rightly!"

The youthful princess was not far wrong in the conclusion that the nation generally would look upon her attendance at the mass but as a forced concession to the will of the new sovereign, whose harshness and bigotry were already manifested by the steps which her government had commenced against the professors of the reformed faith; still her position was a critical one. The throne of Mary was, to all appearance, well established—the parliament had proved itself most obsequious to her wishes: it was on the eve of declaring the marriage of Henry VIII. and Catherine of Aragon legal, annulling by implication the one of Anne Boleyn, and confirming the illegitimacy of her daughter Elizabeth. Still the Act of Settlement remained, passed in her father's reign, and securing to her the reversion of the crown after Mary, in the event of her dying without issue. It was of the utmost importance to her future prospects to maintain that act intact: once repealed, the young Queen of Scots, who was married to the French Dauphin, was the legal, as she already was the legitimate heir to her sister. This unfortunate princess had, even at that early age, excited the hatred of both the daughters of Henry VIII.—the King of France, her father-in-law, having compelled her to assume the style and arms of Queen of England almost immediately after the death of Edward VI. In his ambition to unite the crown of England, as well as those of Scotland and France, on the heads of his descendants, the monarch contended that the daughters of Catherine of Aragon and Anne Boleyn were both illegitimate—a paradox too futile to require discussion in these pages.

In the course of the following day, three divines, commissioned by Gardiner, waited on the princess, in order to argue with her on the errors of Protestantism. They were men of little learning, and less natural understanding—ill calculated to make any serious impression upon the well-schooled mind of Elizabeth, who easily detected and exposed their fallacies: a fact which was far from displeasing to the astute prelate who sent them, or the Catholic councillors of Queen Mary, by whose advice Gardiner acted. They did not wish the heiress of the crown to conform—it would have been a blow to their schemes and ambition.

Things were in this train whilst preparations were being made for the coronation of the queen: the place Elizabeth was to hold at which august ceremony, became a question of intense interest to the nation generally, and of frequent debate in the councils of her sister.

The great object of the Catholics was to exclude her from all share in the ceremonial—thereby causing it to be tacitly inferred that the daughter of Anne Boleyn was no longer to be considered in the line of succession.

The queen had not given her decision: she was not so bigoted as not to perceive that Elizabeth's popularity with the Protestant party of her subjects was one of the bulwarks of her throne—a bar to the ambitious designs of the house of Suffolk. It was her policy, therefore, not to touch the Act of Settlement, unless driven to it by the firmness of her sister.

On the 7th of September, the eve of the festival on which the Church of Rome honours the nativity of the Blessed Virgin, there was a meeting of the privy council at the palace of St. James; the queen herself presided.

She had given orders that the mass on the following day should be celebrated with more than usual pomp; and, assisted by the ladies of her chamber, had embroidered, with her own hands, the white antependium to the altar, used on the occasion.

The subject to be debated, was the programme of the approaching ceremonial of the coronation, and the exclusion of Elizabeth—the great point with Gardiner and those who acted with him.

"It is time," he observed, "that your majesty should at once destroy the hopes of the heretical party, who hold but a divided allegiance to your person and your throne; who look forward to the accession of the daughter of Anne Boleyn as the signal for uprooting the true faith, now happily restored within the realm: better an open enemy, than a concealed one!"

The Earl of Arundel was the only member present opposed to the specious arguments of Gardiner, who well knew how to address himself to the intolerant prejudices of Mary, who looked upon the restoration of England to Catholicity as the noblest monument of her reign, and felt proportionably jealous of all that could assail it.

"The zeal of the good bishop," he exclaimed, bluntly, "outruns his discretion! Destroy the rights of Elizabeth, and what will be the result? You raise in her place a far more dangerous rival near the throne—the young Queen of Scots—who, if I am rightly informed, already assumes the style and title of Queen of England!"

A dark shade passed over the countenance of the queen.

"Hath this been inquired into?" she demanded, harshly, addressing herself to Gardiner.

"It has, most gracious sovereign!" answered the prelate; "no sooner did the rumour reach me of the ridiculous assumption, than I demanded an explanation of Monsieur de Noailles, the ambassador of France."

"And his answer, my lord?"

"I trust you will find it satisfactory, madam," replied Gardiner, bowing to the queen; "or Monsieur de Noailles would no longer be in England, the accredited representative of France."

It was evident that the speaker wished to avoid all further discussion on the question; and so accustomed was Mary to yield to his counsels and suggestions, that he most probably would have carried his point, but for the persevering obstinacy of Arundel, whose pride felt hurt, that the prelate should arrogate to himself the deliberative as well as the executive power of the council.

"In a point, madam," he said, addressing Mary, "so nearly concerning the honour and dignity of the crown, I am sure your majesty will command that there be no concealments from the members of the council. It is neither just nor politic," he added, "that all should share in the responsibility of the act of one."

The wily priest bit his lips in mortification—for he well knew that the explanation he had to offer on the part of the representative of France, would prove anything but satisfactory to the patriotic peer, whose influence with the queen, in secular matters, almost counterbalanced his own.

"You are right, my lord!" exclaimed Mary; "there shall be no concealment from those who are responsible for the measures of my government, and the honour and dignity of my crown! It is my will," she added, addressing Gardiner, "that the answer of Monsieur de Noailles be communicated without reserve or hesitation to the privy council!"

When Queen Mary pronounced anything to be her will, there were few of her ministers or servants who ventured to dispute it; for, like most weak minds, she prided herself upon her obstinacy—mistaking it for firmness.

Thus called upon by his sovereign, Gardiner drew a paper from his bosom, and read it to the council. It was the reply of Monsieur de Noailles to his demand for an explanation of the fact of the young Queen of Scots having assumed the title and arms of Queen of England.

It commenced by an elaborate setting forth of the acts of the English parliament, which declared both the marriages of Henry, with Catherine of Arragon and Anne Boleyn, null and void, and his issue by them consequently illegitimate; consequently, that previous to the law declaring Mary legitimate, no real offence could have been committed. It next denied that the king his master had exercised any influence in the matter—that the Queen of Scots was an independent sovereign, perfectly free from his influence or control—that she had asserted her claim to the English crown of her own proper notion and responsibility—that the French monarch was in no way a party to it, since he had acknowledged the Queen of England, de facto, in accrediting an ambassador to her court.

"And this you call a satisfactory explanation!" exclaimed Mary, indignantly starting from her seat, her usually pale countenance flushed with anger; "by our Lady, but his master shall find that we are both de facto and de jure queen of this fair realm! My lord—my lord," she added, in a tone of deep reproach; "we had expected a nicer sense of what was due to our honour, from so tried a servant as yourself! Do not speak," she continued; "let it be ordered that Monsieur de Noailles has no longer access to our presence!"

"Madam," observed Gardiner, respectfully, "such an order is tantamount to a rupture with the court of France!"

"At least," continued the queen, who perceived the force of his objection, "till he has given more legitimate satisfaction, in his master's name, to our greatly offended pride and dignity; our cousin of Arundel will look to it."

The earl bowed. There was a slight expression of triumph upon his countenance: it was something to have obtained a victory over Gardiner.

"And now, my lords," said Mary, "to a point which touches us more nearly, and in which the zeal of my lord bishop is less likely to blunder or to err. The Lady Elizabeth—how hath she received the instruction of the learned divines whom your charity and our sisterly love have appointed to attend her? Have the scales fallen from her blinded eyes? Are they at last open to the true and only faith?"

There was a pause. Every eye was fixed upon Gardiner; for the question was one of intense interest to the council, as well as to the nation generally.

"Madam," replied Gardiner, with pretended sorrow on his countenance; "I regret to inform your majesty that the daughter of Anne Boleyn as yet hath given no sign of true conversion, but clings to her heretical opinions with a tenacity which hath more in it of political consistency than reason—since the learned men who have attended her grace, have left unhandled no one point which doubt could dwell upon."

"No sign?" repeated Mary, in a tone of disappointment; "no yielding?"

"None!"

Without a word, the queen rose from her chair, and, approaching the council-table, took up the two programmes for the ceremony of her coronation: in one of them the place of Elizabeth was marked with that of Anne of Cleves, the divorced wife of her father, and denoted her position as heiress presumptive to the crown.

In the other paper no mention was made of her. She was excluded alike from share in or witnessing of it.

After reading them both carefully over, the queen signed the latter, and handed it to Gardiner, who received it with an air of satisfaction which he could not conceal.

"You will see, my lord," she said, with calmness, "these instructions adhered to—to the very letter. We will neither be braved nor trifled with, with impunity! Elizabeth has had her choice—the mass, or no place at the coronation of her sister! She has chosen her part, and I have taken mine!"

So saying, Mary Tudor left the council-chamber, followed by the subtle and triumphant Gardiner.

CHAPTER XVI.

And who shall guide my footsteps mid the snares
Mine enemies have set? He were a friend
Who steered my bark over the stormy waves
Of such a troubled sea—a friend to be remembered!

CREON.

LADY TYRRWHIT had been dismissed by the Princess Elizabeth from her attendance for the night, and was just retiring to rest, when her waiting-woman, who partook of the same religious views and feelings as herself—for which they had both so narrowly escaped with life in the reign of Henry, who permitted no freedom of opinion which differed from his own—informed her that a gentleman was praying with great earnestness to see her.

"At such an hour!" exclaimed her mistress. "Doth he take me for a light-of-fame, that I should receive a stranger at such an hour? But perhaps," she added, thoughtfully, "he hath given his name?"

"No!"

"Or sent some message?"

"None, but a humble request to see your ladyship," said the woman.

"Dismiss him, then, at once," said Lady Tyrrwhit; "or tell him to return in the morning: it is not fit that in the household of her grace I should give cause of scandal; albeit," she added, "my years might silence such distractions!"

Martha—the name of the attendant—was leaving the chamber of her mistress with a reluctant air; just as she reached the door she stopped, and, retiring to the side of the room where Lady Tyrrwhit was seated, said, in a low, earnest tone:

"Madam, I entreat you to see this person!"

"And why so, mistress?"

"Something assures me," continued the woman, "that his errand is of importance. Although young, there is an air of gravity and seriousness in his features and demeanour far beyond his years. I feel certain," she added, "that something touching the safety of her grace, or the welfare of the cause, has brought him, at this unseemly hour. For the sake of our persecuted faith, admit him!"

The earnestness of the speaker, together with the hope that she might be the means of serving either her young charge or the church, for which she had so nearly laid down her life, induced the prudent lady to dismiss her doubts and hesitation: replacing the coiffure and veil, which she had already removed, she directed Martha to conduct the gentleman as quickly as possible to her chamber, and, on her return, to remain as a witness of their interview.

"Heaven help me!" added Lady Tyrrwhit, as soon as she was alone; "I have not the nerve I once had! I thought the days of persecution were past. I fear me that, for the sins of the land, they are only now commencing!"

Her tire-woman soon afterwards returned, accompanied by a gentleman, whose features were partially hidden by the velvet barret, which he wore closely drawn over his brows and the high collar of his cloak. The lady saw in an instant, from his manner and bearing, that he was a gentleman.

"You would speak with me, sir?" she said; "and, although I fear I must have given you but a poor opinion of my wit and discretion, by receiving you at such an unseemly hour, permit me to assure you, that you may speak in all confidence in my honour!"

"'Twere indeed most ungrateful to doubt either!" replied the stranger. "Nor can I express my gratitude in terms sufficiently strong for your condescension, which has emboldened me to proffer a second request!"

"A second request?" repeated Lady Tyrrwhit.

"Yes!"

"Name it, sir?"

"That you will receive me alone!"

"Grant it, my lady!" exclaimed Martha; "pray grant it! I am sure the gentleman means well—there can be no cause of fear!"

"None!" added the mysterious visitor, struck by the sincerity and confidence of the speaker; "neither is there any mistrust of you who have so well seconded my prayer—rather kindness. Knowing nothing, you cannot be suspected."

"And if I am," said the female, in a firm tone, "and in the cause I deem it to be, I could bear all their tortments—the rack would not wring a word from me: it would not be the first time that I have been menaced with it, and stretched upon it," she added, with a shudder—for the very marrow in her bones thrilled at the recollection "but I remained faithful to God and to my mistress."

Without giving her lady time to reply, the speaker left the room; closing the door quietly after her, but without letting fall the arras, by which arrangement the persons in the chamber were assured against the possibility of her returning to listen: not that Lady Tyrrwhit, she well knew, would suspect her.

"Now," said her ladyship, "your request?"

"An audience with the Princess Elizabeth," replied the stranger.

"You must be mad to ask or dream of such a thing!" replied the astonished lady; "her grace has retired for the night, and even to her most valued friends would refuse the boon you ask."

"I must still repeat it," said the gentleman.

"This pertinacity," exclaimed Lady Tyrrwhit, shrugging her shoulders impatiently, "will not serve your purpose, sir! An interview with the sister of the queen—the next heiress of the crown—at such an hour! What would the world say? Alack! her grace has enemies enough already! Even those who eat her bread and drink of her cup are little better than spies upon her!"

"I am aware of it," observed her visitor; "and the purport of my visit is to guard her against a danger, the greatest which has threatened; for, unless I see the princess this very night, her chance of the crown, and the establishment of the pure Protestant faith, become weaker than a dicer's promise!"

"Your name?" demanded Lady Tyrrwhit, more and more struck by the impressive yet quiet earnestness of his manner.

"Her grace will tell you that," answered the gentleman; "merely say to her that the person who sent her a token on the late king's death, to Hatfield, by which the treacherous scheme of Northumberland, to get her into his power, was defeated, entertains a few minutes' audience of her highness. If I mistake not," he added, looking round the apartment, "from this very chamber there is a communication with the bed-room of the Lady Elizabeth?"

"There is," replied the lady; "though how you came to know it, passes my poor wit, since it is a secret to all the household save her cofferer, Parry, his wife, and myself."

"Let my knowledge of it be an additional incentive to induce you to comply with my request."

Lady Tyrrwhit no longer hesitated. She felt that there was danger in refusing to be the bearer of a message in which so many important interests were compromised, and that the princess must decide for herself. Drawing aside a portion of the arras near the bed, she opened a private door, so artfully concealed within the woodwork, that few unacquainted with the secret could have discovered its existence, or even then, without the minutest search.

"Remain till my return," she said. "Heaven send that your purpose be fair as your speech! Her grace at least shall learn your visit; for the rest, her own wisdom must decide."

"I ask no better, madam," replied the intruder, seating himself near the door, with the assured air of a man convinced that the response would be favourable; for Elizabeth had already received too convincing a proof of his devotion to her interests to doubt his fidelity one moment.

In less than a quarter of an hour his messenger returned: without taking the least notice of him, she proceeded to the door of the apartment, which she opened, and called her attendant, Martha.

"I am here," replied the faithful woman, who had remained in the antechamber, on the watch.

"Knock loudly at the door of my chamber," said her mistress, "should any but Parry, or his wife enter the antechamber; to any other person, say that I am retired for the night, too ill to be disturbed."

"I understand, my lady!"

"And when this gentleman," added Lady Tyrrwhit, "quits the palace, you must be his conductor. Should any one observe you, remember that his visit has been to yourself, not me! Neither my name, nor that of one a thousand times more precious than myself, must be breathed!"

"It will only pass my lips, madam, in my prayers!" answered the devoted Martha.

Satisfied with the assurance, her mistress not only closed and barred the door between them, but let fall the arras, so that it was impossible for any curious ear or eye to ascertain who were in her chamber, or the subject of their conversation there.

No sooner had she completed her precautions, than the Princess Elizabeth, wrapped in a loose night-robe, appeared at the other end of the room. Her countenance was extremely pale, but the pride and resolution in her keen, bright eyes were undiminished.

The instant she made her appearance, the stranger, who had hitherto remained patiently seated, rose, and, doffing his velvet barret, bent the knee gracefully before her.

"As I anticipated!" murmured the princess: "Master Secretary Cecil?"

"Your highness's faithful servant!" replied her future minister; "who, in the hour of danger, will ever be found ready to warn and guard you!"

"Danger!" repeated the princess, with forced calmness. "Let me know it; I am so familiar with its features, that they cease to appal me! Speak, man—speak!" she continued, in a hurried tone; "suspense is worse than ill continued!"

Thus adjured, Cecil briefly informed her of the decision that had taken place in that day's council, in which her enemies had succeeded in excluding her from her proper place in the coronation of her sister.

"And on what pretence?" demanded Elizabeth, stamping her foot with violence upon the floor. "Am I not, by the Act of Settlement, the next heir of the crown, failing the issue of my gracious sister?"

So prudently had the future queen disciplined herself, that even in her passionate anger at the insult offered to her, she spoke of Mary in the most respectful terms.

"The council, since the legalisation of your august father's first marriage, pretend to ignore your claims."

"The foresworn traitors!"

"And speak of the young Queen of Scots as the next heir."

"Let them!" exclaimed Elizabeth; "the people will not ignore them!"

"True!" observed the statesman: "in the event—which heaven forbid we should anticipate—of the present queen's death. But long before that hour arrives," he continued, lowering his voice to a whisper, "there will be time for a fearful page to be written in the annals of England! Had my advice prevailed, this would not have been!"

"I know—I know!" said the princess, and tears of mortification and shame fell from her eyes. "I would, if possible, have avoided this triumph to my enemies."

"On the contrary," observed Cecil, "it is the very last thing they wish your grace to yield. The very men they sent to work in your conversion, proves how little they desired it; since they were amongst the weakest and most ignorant of their church—which, to speak truly, is not deficient in learned men. To-morrow," he added, "is the festival of the Blessed Virgin: unless your highness appears at the mass, the queen, one hour afterwards, will have taken a step which pledges her irrevocably against your succession to the crown."

"I will be there!" exclaimed Elizabeth, with sudden energy. "God, in His own time, will avenge the violence to which I am subjected!"

A few minutes after this decision of the princess, a boat, with a solitary rower, pushed off from the landing-place at Somerset House.

WHO WANTS A MONKEY?

DEAR SIR—As I know that you have always a word of advice for those who need it, and a warm sympathy for the distressed, I venture to hope you will kindly help to extricate me from a difficulty in which I am at present placed by the generosity of a friend. A few weeks since, on a very hot afternoon, I was aroused from my usual daily siesta, by the intelligence that a box, containing a valuable present for me, had just arrived from the West Indies; and, paying the rather large amount that was required for the freight and express expenses, I joyfully hastened down stairs to inspect it. Imagine my consternation, when I saw a long, narrow box, with slats nailed on one side, through which peeped the mischievous head of a little grey monkey! Now, sir, I am not a single lady of a certain age, and I do not like monkeys; nay, I will at once confess, that I have a peculiar aversion for them; and you may therefore imagine my vexation, which, I am ashamed to say, vented itself in a burst of tears, though I retained sufficient self-possession not to tear my hair. The new arrival had been followed into the house by a crowd of ragged boys and girls, and dirty women, with forlorn-looking babies in their arms; and the animal, doubtless thinking his welcome very cordial, expressed his delight by grinning, chattering, and cutting many antics around his contracted dwelling, thereby scattering about tomato skins, nutshells, orange-peel, melon-rinds, and other agreeable fragments of former repasts.

Excessively disgusted, I ordered him into the yard, and having, with some trouble, got rid of the admiring spectators. I sat down calmly to consider what course to pursue in this pressing emergency; and, as a preliminary duty, opened and read the letter received with the box. It contained merely a few lines, stating that, having with some difficulty procured me a monkey from South America, he hastened to forward it, thinking I should be pleased with such a curious pet, and begging me to write him, by the return of the vessel, whether "Beauty" had arrived safely.

I could scarcely read the above with patience, and determined, forthwith, to indite him an answer of bitter reproaches; but the remembrance of the friendship he had evinced for me in trying times, prevailed, and I renounced the idea, though I could not prevent myself from impugning his motives for such a gift.

"Why," soliloquised I, "why, if generously inclined, did he not send a parrot, or a little lilac turtle, or a tropic? How pleased should I have been with one of the fairy dogs that never grow so large as a kitten, and are equally loving and playful; even a box of confitures, or a dozen flasks of preserves, would have been acceptable; but a hateful monkey! Oh!" sighed I; "heaven deliver me from my friends," as Shakespeare, or somebody, says (I do not precisely recollect who, in my present state of nervous excitability.)

I reverted to the first query—why did he send me the disagreeable animal? Suspicion whispered that he had found it very troublesome at home, and, as the shortest way of dispatching it, had shipped it off to his dear English friend. I imagined him saying to his wife:

"Well, Mimi, we've been intending for a long time to send Chericot some curiosities; why not get rid of this detestable monkey?"

I could see his black slave, Jerard, fastening up the snarling little thing, and taking it to the vessel, while his mistress stood on the verandah, waving a joyful farewell to the departing torment; but as these reflections did not tend to improve my temper, I wisely banished them, and went down to the yard, to look at my present, in the hope of becoming accustomed to him.

I found there several of my neighbours, who had been attracted by the new comer, and who seemed as delighted with it as I was displeased, and made many suggestions about his diet, to which the monkey listened with more satisfaction than I did. One person said it must be fed daily with oranges, sugar, nuts, cakes, and fruits of all kinds; that it could eat no other sort of food, and would die if deprived of it. I thought on the many human beings who needed a crust of bread, and mentally resolved my monkey should not fare better than a Christian; but here another friend declared that the first thing to be provided was a new domicile and a chain, as the poor thing would die if kept in such close confinement. I assure you, sir, I am not naturally hard-hearted; indeed, it gives me pain to see any living thing suffer; but you may imagine the intense acid to which my milk of human kindness had turned, when I contritely acknowledge that I savagely determined, if the monkey's death would result from keeping him in that box, there he should stay. But how vain are human calculations! I had not retired into the house many minutes, when my humane and officious neighbour returned, with a clean barrel, nicely prepared for the odious animal, who was immediately installed therein, and daintily fed, as before suggested, on oranges, nuts, and sundry other delicacies.

However, not to draw too largely on your sympathy, I will briefly say, that some days passed before I could sufficiently compose my feelings to consider the proper thing to be done in this imminent crisis. I had serious thoughts of premeditatedly losing him; but though he was often liberated from confinement, he seemed to like the premises so well that he would not leave them; indeed, every one in the family became so attached to the little monster, that they carefully prevented any attempt on his part to escape. One eventful day, however, that Alice (our Irish servant) had furtively released him, with the view of nursing "the darling craythur," he sprang from her arms, and took that opportunity of exploring unknown regions, and making a tour throughout the house. Off darted "Beauty," and off went Alice in pursuit; but he cunningly eluded all attempts to capture him, and listened unmoved to her coaxing petitions that he would return to the shelter of her arms. Up to the attics, down again to the chambers, through which he made sundry excursions, playfully poking his nose into every hole and corner, he at last approached the room where I sat at my desk, faithfully chronicling the further adventures of Aunt Tabitha; and, leaping affectionately on my shoulder, caressingly threw his paws round my neck. I sprang up in agony, clutched my tormentor, and threw him violently from me—he screamed—jumped on the table, whisked a bottle of ink over the unfortunate Mrs. Higgins, destroyed a touching ode to the muse, of Sensibility, and in his frenzy devoured an Essay on Dietetics, that had been sent me by a friend, and which I fear he will find to be very hard of digestion. Flying through the door, he rushed down stairs, examined everything in the parlour, leaving sundry scratches and defacements on books and daguerreotypes, and as the panting Alice pursued him, he descended into the kitchen, alighting on the range; but probably, thinking it uncomfortably warm, he climbed the chimney, made his egress at the stove-pipe hole, and, dexterously evading the servant's outstretched arms, entered the dining-room, and concealed himself on the supper table, in the sooty apparel he brought from the chimney. Here, while comfortably regaling himself on hot buttered toast and preserves, he was at last caught. Do not fancy, sir, that I beheld all these accidents. I believe I fainted; but I recovered to desperate energy, and, seizing a pen, indited the following letter to a friend:

DEAR SIR,—I am indebted to you for so much kindness, which I have never been able to repay, that I have suffered acutely, as a delicate mind must, when oppressed by the weight of obligations it cannot return. Imagine, then, the pleasure I feel in believing that I am at last able to offer you a token of my gratitude, in the shape of a valuable monkey. It is not only a curiosity, but it is the prettiest pet imaginable—so gentle, and so endearing, that I am sure you will soon become as much attached to it as I am; indeed, it is only in parting with it that I have discovered how dear it is to me; but, as I would not give you anything I did not particularly prize, I trust that the reluctance with which I do so, will evidence that I consider this the only offering that could fully express the esteem and gratitude of

Truly yours,

CHERICOT."

I sealed my letter, gave it and the monkey into the charge of a porter, and sat down, with buoyant spirits and fine appetite, to the relics of my supper, congratulating myself on having paid a debt, and got rid of my tormentor at the same time; or, in vulgar parlance, on having "killed two birds (my friend and the monkey) with one stone." Short-lived, however, were my transports, for in an hour my messenger returned with the "plague of my life," and the following answer to my epistle:

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—I appreciate the delicacy which prompts you to return what you wrongly estimate as benefits on my part; but much as I admire the interesting animal you have sent me, I would not for worlds deprive you of a pet which you seem so highly to value. I should blame myself were I to take advantage of the self-sacrificing spirit which animated you, when you so amiably wished to express a gratitude that I really do not merit; and I hasten to assuage the grief you must doubtless be suffering at parting from your monkey, and, by promptly returning him, convert your sorrow into smiles of joy. If it is ever in my power to be of use to you, do not hesitate to command me, and remember I can never consent to receive any return for the trifling services of

Yours respectfully,

J. JONES."

If my correspondent could have seen the face that met my view in the opposite mirror, as I raised my head after perusing his letter, I fancy he would have beheld frowns instead of the smiles he had anticipated; but I will only say, that I ordered the grinning little beast down stairs, so that I might not be tempted to tear him to pieces, and, retiring to my bed, passed a sleepless night in a vain attempt to discover a way out of my perplexities. The fruit of my cogitations was a resolve to make another attempt to dispose of "Beauty," by presenting him to a lady of my acquaintance, the mother of a large family of spoiled children, who were very fit associates for my monkey. I sent him to her accordingly, after breakfast, and was more cautious this time in expressing my affection for him:

"MY DEAR MADAM,—I have just received a valuable and curious monkey from the West Indies, and as I have no place to keep him in without confining him too much, I send him to you, begging you to accept him as a present for your very interesting children. He is the most gentle of his species—so winning in his ways, and so harmless, that your dear little cherubs may play with him with impunity. I trust he will be the source of many a happy hour to them, and of consequent pleasure to you. Give my regards to Mr. Smith, and be sure to kiss all your precious darlings for

Yours, truly,

CHERICOT."

The porter shortly returned with a message of thanks giving me the consolatory assurance that the family appeared delighted with their new acquisition; and now, what a load was removed from my oppressed bosom! How gaily I set about repairing the monkey's misdemeanours; in what spirits I re-indited my account of Mrs. Tabitha's doings in her New Home, and how sweetly I slept that night, you can imagine better than I can describe.

But I was rudely awakened from a peaceful slumber, early the following morning, by Alice, who handed me a letter, saying:

"Sure, the craythurs's like a bad penny—he's come back again!"

I opened the missive with trembling hands and a palpitating heart, and read as follows:

"I have hitherto considered you a friend, and in the belief of your affection for me and mine, have lavished on you the tenderness of a confiding friend. How you have repaid that trust, let your conscience answer, if it be not deaf to the loud thunders of accusing friendship, which demands, in accents not to be misunderstood, why did you send me that monkey?"

"When your treacherous letter and equally treacherous present were handed to me, I hailed them with pleasure, as new proofs of your love. I considered them delightful evidences of that tender intercourse of soul, that congeniality of mind and attainments, that had hitherto united us in the lasting bonds of enduring unanimity. While my innocent babes danced eagerly round the new comer, I sat in a delicious reverie, apostrophising you as the friend of my soul. I recalled the blissful period,

When we grew together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted;

and now, false friend, if we are parted for ever, blame your monkey for it! If I supposed you undesignedly injured me, I would forgive it, and restore my confidence to you; but circumstances too plainly prove what Mr. Smith and myself have for some time suspected—your intense hatred of my defenceless family. The very last day we spent at your house, I could not help remarking the impatience with which you regarded their playful gambols, and your malignant looks when my noble George Washington broke the lamp and upset the oil on the carpet. Could you not have vented your malice on me, and spared my precious infants?"

"But listen to the detail of the suffering you have inflicted, and if you have any feeling, or any tears to shed, prepare them now! Mr. Smith, to please our darlings, released the odious thing from the cruel confinement in which you had kept it, and, tying it with a rope under the shed in the yard, our compassionate children immediately began to feed it. I am sure you must have starved the poor creature, for never did I see such an appetite. Tomatoes, peaches, oranges, water-melons, nuts, and cakes, went down its throat in such rapid succession, that at last the nasty beast could not move. It continued in a state of torpor until after tea, when my timid fawn, Rosa Matilda, playfully poking a stick in its eye, the little wretch jumped up, broke its string, rushed at her, and bit her cheek till the blood streamed down her neck. While I bathed the gory wounds with my tears and some amica, every one pursued the infuriated animal; and Zachary Taylor, bravely attacking it in the rear, caught hold of its tail, but it fiercely bit his poor little finger, and dashed into the house, where it whisked its paw into William Henry Harrison's eye, swelling it shut, and making it so black and blue that he really is not fit to be seen. As for Winfield Scott, notwithstanding he retreated to the pantry, and intrenched himself behind the butter-tub, the monkey laid in ambush, and the minute the poor child lifted his head, left scarcely a lock of hair on it; indeed, he looks as if he had been scalped. My cap was snatched off and torn to pieces, and when he had demolished that, he flew at poor Mr. Smith, clutched his wig, threw it into the kitchen fire, and literally covered his bald head with scratches.

"My dear, witty, little Charles Dickens says it looks for all the world like the globe, with ever so many lines of latitude and longitude on it, and shows that his pa has passed the meridian of his life. We have only just caught the animal, after two hours of riot and destruction, that I cannot pretend to describe. My looking-glasses, in particular, Mr. Smith thinks you ought to pay for; but I don't suppose you have feeling enough for that, so I will just add, I have done with you for ever; and here's your monkey back again. And if you don't feel remorse when you read this, come and see for yourself, that what Scott says is true:

No spectre can the charnel send,
So dreadful as an injured friend.

For I may say, that inside and outside we are nothing but injuries. Mr. Smith joins me in hoping you may never know what peace is any more, but I don't suppose you care what we think.

"FANNY SMITH."

Now, Mr. Editor, I declare to you that the lady who wrote the above letter, never was an intimate friend of mine; that we had been acquainted but a short time, and that I was as innocent of any regard for her as I was of malice prepossession towards her children. You will perceive a strange discrepancy in her style, which varies from injured eloquence to coarse vulgarity; and as it is a fair sample of her conversation, you may imagine how probable it was that I, who have a soul which soars above the meaner things of earth, could have been linked with her in the ties of friendship! Dear little "Beauty," I could almost love you for the good taste you have shown in disliking that horrid woman!

When I recovered my temper, which was not for a day or two, I immediately began to consider about giving the monkey his credentials, and sending him again on his travels; and, fortunately recollecting that a fair, frivolous young lady of my acquaintance, who had a passion for pets, had formerly expressed a wish for one, I thought myself tolerably secure, in sending "Beauty" to her, of never seeing him again. Alas! how vain were my hopes! but I will not anticipate.

"DEAREST ORIANNA,—I have often heard you wish for a monkey, and I am supremely happy to contribute to your enjoyment, by sending you one I have just received. I have had some difficulty in preserving it for you, so many of my friends coveted it; but as I destined it for you, my fondest and fairest, I resisted all petitions. Our mutual friend, Mrs. Smith, is quite offended with me about it; but I shall not care if you are pleased, which I am sure you must be, with such a pet. Au revoir.

"CHERICOT."

Two days—a week—elapsed, and, as I heard nothing of "Beauty," I began to consider him as among the things that were; but, as usual, like uncurrent coin, or a counterfeit note, he would not pass, but invariably came back to me. The gentle Orianna's rose-scented billet will explain the difficulty:

"FRIEND OF MY HEART,—It grieves me to the soul to send you back the darling fellow; but pa, like Fate, is inexorable, and I am forced to submit to his decrees. You will readily conceive my anguish at parting with him, for he is not only an inestimable token of your affection, but is, besides, the dearest little love of a creature I ever beheld. I was so delighted to get him, and had such pleasure in working for him! I never looked at my canary, nor spoke to Fidele, while he was in the house; but, alas! those days of happiness are fled for ever, and I am left in solitude to sigh! You may imagine how I loved him, when I tell you that, with the exception of the whiskers and moustache, he was the exact image of dear Harry Harumscarum (who, I suppose you know, has deserted me for that vile California).

"I had a sweet blue cashmere mantle made for him (the monkey, not Harry), tied with charming cherry-coloured rosettes; also a pink, bound with white satin, and an orange, with lilac fringe; a velvet cap, with gold tassel, completed his costume, in which he did, indeed, look irresistible. Ah, poor little fellow! I shall never admire you again as I have done, dancing with delight at your finery; for, my dear, he was just as much pleased with dress as any man I ever saw. Pa was absent until yesterday, and, when he returned, began, as I had expected, to grumble at and abuse the sweet fellow; but I do think matters would not have come to an extremity, had not dear "Beauty" injudiciously jumped out of my arms, as we sat at table, and knocked a cup of scalding-hot tea down pa's bosom; the immediate consequence of which was, that he swore shockingly, and ordered me to send him instantly out of the house. This command I obeyed with many tears, and, feeling reluctant to hurt your feelings by returning him to you, I sent him, with a friendly message, to Mrs. Smith, who, you intimated in your note, was anxious to have him. Imagine my dismay at his being sent back, with such a letter! Oh, my dear, you never saw anything like it! and I can't pretend to tell you all that was in it: she accuses poor innocent me of having leagued with you to add insult to injury, and says she hopes neither of us will ever darken her doors again. Of course we won't; but do explain to me what she means? Je vous embrasse tendrement.

ORIANNA.

"P. S.—I am forced, as you perceive, to return the monkey; but I shall often call to see him. Indeed, if you do not object, I should like to have his daguerreotype, as, in the hurry of departure, dear Harry forgot to leave me his, and they are so much alike."

As usual with people in distress, I have many friends to give me advice, but there is no one generous enough to take my monkey; in fact, he has given me so much trouble, that I am resolved to sell him, and get paid for it; but here, again, is a difficulty—no one will have him as a gift, no one will steal him, no one will buy him.

One gentleman says he would be glad to have him; but he once owned a monkey, for which he paid two pounds; and the first time he left the house, his wife traded the animal off to a Jew for a common red bird, paying him five shillings to boot; so he don't like to put another such expensive speculation in her way.

I should like to know the value of my monkey; but that, like everything else concerning him, is a mystery. One person says he is worth three pounds; a second tells me two is too much for him; a third advises me to get rid of him on any terms, and a fourth bids me let him run. I turn in despair to the newspapers, and the prices current tell me that ashes have a tendency upwards, that molasses is firm, cotton shaky, tobacco in demand, while common salt is rated heavy. I even see Scotch pigs mentioned (which, I am told, refers to iron); but there is nothing said about monkeys. In fact, a friend assures me that the market is glutted. He asserts that they are to be seen for nothing, in any quantity, parading Regent Street at fashionable hours, twirling their canes, and gazing impertinently at the belles who pass them.

But my monkey, sir, is not like those; he really is an uncommon monkey. Notwithstanding all the abuse that Mrs. Smith and Orianna's pa have lavished on him, I solemnly assure you he is a most desirable acquisition to any family circle. When you caressingly smooth his soft, grey fur, you are rewarded by a smile that displays two rows of seed pearls, and his bright, hazel eyes beam gratitude on you, while his long, feathery tail twines caressingly round your arm. Indeed, sir, if you can persuade anybody to purchase him, they will never repent it. I would advertise him, but that malicious Mrs. Smith takes the Times; and I am sure she would slander him, so that no one would like to have him. So, if you have any friend who answers to the description of the old proverb, "A fool and his money are soon parted," ask him to BUY MY MONKEY.

THE SPIRIT-MAIDEN OF RHINE-LAND.

It was almost evening; the sun was sinking upon its imperial couch of gorgeous clouds, whilst beautiful beams of crimson and gold were reflected through the trees. The calm, broad-bosomed Rhine slept along its green-embowered banks, and the dying sun-rays twinkled and flashed in its blue depths.

The summer air was soft, and sweet as a breath of roses; and a gush of dreamy melody, from some idling bark upon the water, stole as a "spirit's presence" over the earth.

Paul stood at the door of his father's mansion, watching the changing colours of the beautiful landscape. His heart was overflowing with tumultuous emotions, thanksgiving and praise to the Watchful One. He turned his head over his shoulder, and glanced back into the chamber which he had but just left: there, in his accustomed place, the evening glow tinged his silvery locks, sat the blind and aged father, and at his side, upon a low stool, was seated his young cousin, the meek and fair-haired Bertha.

The maiden held her lute, and her white fingers glanced like snow-flakes over the glistening chords, as she played a light, wild melody. She was singing a Rhenish love-song, and her voice, so sweet and low, fell like the tones of a silver bell upon the evening air.

A soft and holy influence was enveloping Paul's senses; but he thought he saw a white figure glancing in the wood, and a spirit-voice seemed calling to him, as it said:

"Paul, Paul! where art thou?"

The voice called, and the echoes caught the wild, witching melody, and Paul knew that it was the voice of his spirit-maiden singing to him. He walked forth into the wood with a saddened heart, and seated himself upon a mossy stone.

"Etheria, Etheria! here is thy Paul!" he called in answer; but the voice was silent, and he heard only the sound of the wind, as it moved in the leaves, or the dreamy tinklings of the fountain.

Paul had never seen his spirit-maiden, save in his dreams, when she came to him clothed in all her virgin beauty, and whispered to him of her love. But she floated upon every gold-tinted cloud. She smiled in the shining sunlight, and breathed words of love in the beautiful flowers. He saw her not, and yet he loved.

The sun was gone quite down, and had left, as a remembrance of what had passed, and what was yet to be, a crown of glorious rose-clouds lingering in the sky. Paul wandered again sorrowfully towards the mansion. Bertha was sitting at the table, with her Bible open before her, and she read to the aged man the holy words. Never had she looked so lovely. Her soft blue eyes were filled with tears as she read, and her bright, fair hair fell like a beautiful veil over her neck and shoulders. As Paul gazed upon her beauty, a gleam of flashing silver light glanced through the apartment; but an instant, and it was gone again. It was not the moonlight—it was the smile of the spirit-maiden. And Paul thought no more of the fair Bertha, but mourned for his soul's shadow.

When the devotion was over, Bertha led the old man to his chamber, and, returning, found Paul sitting, listless and gloomy.

"Paul," whispered the beautiful Rhenish maiden, as she laid her hand gently upon his arm, "thou art sorrowful, and I may not comfort thee!"

Her tones were very sad and reproachful. Paul drew her towards him, and kissed her fair brow.

"I am sorrowful, my beloved Bertha," he said, mournfully, "for I must leave this beautiful Rhine-land—my spirit-love awaiteth me. Hearest thou not her voice calling me? See'st thou not her wavy tresses beckoning me? My love awaiteth me, and I may not stay."

Bertha knew of his strange love for the spirit-maiden, and she bowed her face amid her ringlets, and wept.

"Weep not, my beloved one," said Paul, in a soothing voice; "weep not—I shall soon return, and thy heart shall be gladdened by the gay smiles and witching tones of my own spirit-maiden."

Bertha pushed back the drooping tresses from her weeping face, and, gliding from his embrace, reached the door.

"Paul," she whispered, sadly, "when thou art far distant, forget not the maiden of Rhine-land!"

Alas! Paul knew not the deep and holy love which rested in that innocent heart for him.

Paul reclined upon his couch, but slept not. The moon looked down at him, and the stars twinkled and danced in the sky. A voice full of mirth and witchery came floating on the breeze, and whispering in the leaflets. Paul arose from his couch, and, stealing from his chamber, gained the open air. With quickened footsteps he reached the wood, and hastened to the fountain. And there, among the trees, stood a maiden of wondrous beauty, clad in shadowy garments, beckoning and smiling through the shower of the fountain.

Paul sprang to catch the beautiful form in his embrace; but, as he came nearer, it still receded—the mirthful tones still calling:

"Paul! Paul! where art thou?"

Sometimes she hid among the trees, and then again her soft breath fanned his cheek, and her dark tresses fell like a cloud over his face. Now she vanished in a wreath of spray, or seemed lost in her own strain of fairy music; and then she floated in the moonlight, smiling, and waving her white arms. But ever sang she, and ever followed the youth.

Paul stood upon the summit of a high mountain, whither he had followed his spirit-love. His father's mansion was lost to view, and the spirit-maiden had vanished in a mist of snow—her voice was hushed. He had reached the highest peak; but he was alone—the clouds above, and the snow below. He thought he heard the vesper-bell ringing on the air; and Bertha's voice reading the evening devotion; the lulling sound of dreamy whisperings bewildered him, and he sank upon the ground insensible.

The years pass by in their varied attire, ever choosing a new devotee to worship at the shrines of bitter sorrow, or awakening hopes. The aged father was long since dead, and was buried upon the banks of the beautiful Rhine. The witchern drooped its branches over his grave, and the "sad bird" sang mournfully in the green leaves.

The gentle Bertha dwelt alone in the old mansion, more beautiful and beloved than before. She often thought of her old love, Paul; but he had disappeared years ago, and was perhaps buried in a foreign land. Thus, like a fair lily, she bloomed in sequestered loveliness upon the banks of the Rhine, ever modest, gentle, and meek.

One lovely day, when the summer had returned again in fragrance and flowers, Bertha sat at her lattice, netting a silken fillet to bind her fair tresses. Old memories came crowding around her heart, and tears trembled upon her golden lashes. She thought of one so dear to her heart—Paul. A tall, sunburnt man, with a saddened, care-worn look upon his features, came slowly up the pathway which led to the door. He was changed—much changed—and older; but Bertha's heart knew that it was Paul. He reached the doorway—Bertha threw down her silken net, and, gliding to the door, cried:

"Paul—Paul! is it thou?"

In an instant he folded her in his arms, and she rested, weeping and smiling, upon his breast.

"And the spirit-maiden, Paul?" asked the fair Bertha, as they sat, side by side, in the father's hall, as in days of yore.

"Ask me not, Bertha!" he answered, in a low voice, as he pressed her hand still closer in his; "ask me not! It is enough—alas! too much—to know, that I sought for the ideal, and knew not the true value of the real. Had I but dreamed how fond and true was the gentle heart that beat for me in mine own Rhine-land, then would the spirit-maiden have been indeed as a shadow!"

Bertha felt she was beloved at last, and she rested her fair cheek fondly upon his bosom, whispering:

"Oh, Paul! shall we not be happy now?"

Many—ah, how many have deserted the substance, which was within their grasp, for the shadow, which, uncertain, flits hither and thither! Ideal bliss takes wings and flies away; real happiness folds its pinions amid the flowers of earth, nor seeks a better resting-place. The substance places a wreath of emerald around the heart, unchanging in its hues; the shadow rests in the soul as an opal, with its many beauties. Then seek not for a happiness greater than that of the present hour: the morn arises in golden beauty, but the night may be a clouded sky, starless and unsearchable.

MY GHOST.

THIS is not a tale of spiritual rappings. I never heard any. My table does not hop, or rear up, or fly. Between you and me, it is lucky it does not. If it did, the claw would come off, to a certainty. I think it right to mention this, and to warn any playful young ghosts of the fact.

Aurelia Garford and I loved one another passionately—so passionately, that, at the age of seventeen, we resolved to marry. Both our parents opposed the scheme. We had neither of us any money, and, though I fancied myself a Titian, the portraits I daubed were poor things even for sign-painting. But we could not wait. We grew desperate. We determined to run away into the wide world.

The wide world! How narrow it is, after all! A gimlet, eight thousand miles long, would bore a hole right through it. And what is eight thousand miles? Less than most people walk in a couple of years. "What is anything compared with everything?" as an editor down East observed.

Aurelia's parents lived in Two-hundred-and-twenty-second Street. Their house is near the corner of Fourth Avenue. It is a long way "up town." Some say there is no such street; but that, of course, is nonsense, because I know Aurelia lived in it. Many people, no doubt, have started off in the cars to look for the street, and never found it. It is not easy to find; though, as it is the next street to Two-hundred-and-twenty-first Street, it is not so difficult, after all. But I knew the street like a book. There was only one house in it, and that was only half built, owing to the owner's want of funds. I need not add, that that house was the house of Aurelia's parents.

There was a large garden to the house—people can afford space for gardens up in Two-hundred-and-twenty-second Street. It was a very nice garden. Only one thing grew in it, and that was grass. But give me grass to walk on: trees are all very well for climbing, and timber is useful for building; fruit is a capital thing, if you want to eat; and flowers are very pretty, if you want to look at them; but Aurelia and I only wanted to walk about with our arms round one another's waists, and we preferred grass to trees, as we did not want to climb like squirrels, or build like carpenters. We valued grass even more highly than flowers, because we preferred sitting down upon it, and looking into one another's eyes, to gazing at the roses and magnolias in creation. And, as for fruit, we scorned to think of earthly peaches or apricots, when our lips could be so much more sweetly occupied in exchanging celestial kisses, of which no amount could possibly give us a surfeit.

It is my deliberate conviction that the garden of Eden was a grass-grown bit of land, with a good high fence round it, to cast a shade in hot weather. The rest was love, which makes a paradise of any place.

We resolved to run away; and we did. We met one afternoon behind the grass-grown garden, and made for the cars. As we went along, I summed up the items of my happiness, drew a line, and calculated the total. The items were:

1. An angelic disposition.
2. The softest black eyes in the world; silken tresses to match.
3. A complexion pure as the whiteness of a pearl.
4. A mouth which beat all the Greek statues to fits.
5. A neck and shoulders of human, though quite equal to vegetable ivory.
6. A slender, graceful figure, that would have destroyed St. Anthony's saintship to a dead certainty, and so much the better for him if it had tempted him.
7. Love for a certain individual (who, like Mr. Ferocious, n "Tom Pepper," shall be nameless), carried to the confines of hero-worship.

Total: Aurelia Garford.

I was in a state of tremendous exhilaration. My soul cut capers, and threw up its hat inside my breast; at least, so I conjectured, from the thumps I felt against the walls of that portion of my body. Aurelia and I took one long-drawn, champagnish sort of kiss, just before we turned the corner of that, to many, apocryphal Two-hundred-and-twenty-second Street, and in another minute we were at the railway station.

So was old Garford!

He had come home two hours before his time from his office down town, where he was supposed to make money somehow. Not that he ever made any. His wife had a small income of her own, and that supported the family. Mr. Garford, at least so it appeared to me, was allowed to play at business, just to keep himself out of mischief.

"Hollo, young people?" he cried, jovially, "taking a walk, eh? Where are you off to? and what does my pretty Aurelia carry in that confoundedly bulgy basket there?"

"Oh, papa!" cried Aurelia, whose self-possession was upset by the sudden rencontre; and the dear girl burst into a passionate flood of tears—tears of disappointment and vexation, I conscientiously believe.

"Hollo! what's this, what's this, young gentleman?" said old Garford, sternly, smelling a rat for the first time.

"Why, sir," said I, perhaps stupidly impelled by an irresistible impulse, "if you had not met us so unluckily, we should have run away and got married."

"Hum!" said old Garford, looking at me fixedly! "is there any particular reason for your getting married in such a hurry?"

"Yes, sir," said I.

"And pray what is it?" said old Garford, severely.

"We love one another!" said I, looking him boldly in the face.

"Oh, is that all? Very well. You need not run away. I have not the least objection to your being —"

"Oh, sir —"

"Stop a moment. I have a great objection to your marrying without anything to live on. Much as I was attached to Mrs. Garford, sir, I should never have dreamed of marrying her unless we had had between us sufficient to support a respectable establishment, sir."

"But sir —"

"But sir," resumed Mr. Garford, who evidently took a pleasure in playing his part of heavy father in the drama; "but, sir, you perhaps imagine that I can give my daughter a fortune. You anticipate —"

"Not at all, sir," I interrupted, eager to disclaim all interested motives. "I know very well that you cannot give your daughter anything."

"Indeed, sir—indeed! And pray how do you know that I cannot give my daughter a fortune? Are you aware, sir, that the business I am engaged in is one by which some of the largest fortunes in this life have been realised, sir?"

To use a somewhat worn, but expressive phrase, I had hit my intended father-in-law "in the raw," and all attempts to conciliate proved fruitless. Nor did a hint from Aurelia, that "papa knew very well he had not made the rent of his office for the last two years," at all mend matters.

Finally, Mr. Garford positively forbade my further visits to or correspondence with his daughter, until I could show him that I was worth five thousand dollars clear, and making an income of at least two thousand a year.

Thus we parted. I made several attempts to see Aurelia, but failed. In the end I resolved to set to work to make the required sum and income with the least possible delay.

Luckily I had made friends with a very clever painter, who undertook to put me in the right way. I had to begin again. The fact was, I had a tolerable dexterity in the blending of colours, but I drew like a Chinese, or a Yankee, as I was. My master was a Frenchman: he had studied at Paris, under Delaroche. He opened my eyes. I was quick. In a few months, with considerable labour, I could produce a portrait, at any rate tolerably correct in outline and perspective. This at once raised me above the majority of my rivals, and I soon procured considerable custom.

I had just laid the first stone of my fortune, in the shape of a hundred dollars deposited in the bank, when an overwhelming blow destroyed the whole edifice of my hopes.

I received a letter, announcing the death of Aurelia: she had been dead three weeks when the news reached me. My friend, the painter, was present: he saw me turn pale, and cover my face with my hands.

"What is it?" he asked, kindly.

"She is dead!" I replied, in a shaken voice.

He knew my history, and needed no further explanation.

I threw myself on a sofa, and wept convulsively. When I had exhausted the first violence of my grief, my friend approached me, and, in a tone of grave sympathy, asked me of what I was thinking.

"Of death!" I replied.

"Of suicide?" said he.

I made no answer.

"Do you possess her portrait?" said he.

"Yes, a daub of my own, but which reminds me, at least, vividly of the original. I have also a daguerreotype, but daguerreotypes have always a cold, ghastly look."

"You should paint her."

"Paint her?"

"Yes, paint her as an angel of heaven; realise your memory of her beauty on the canvas. Leave a monument of your love and talent behind you. Then die, if you please."

The artist's suggestion pleased me. No youth of eighteen is in a hurry to die, even for love. I resolved to adopt my friend's idea, and a gloomy sort of ambition seized me to make this work a work of art worthy of its model. Nay, I even dreamed of posthumous fame; of going down the stream of American art-history, as the man who painted a real angel, and then pursued its prototype into the world of angels.

I commenced my task that very day, and laboured as long as the light allowed, without cessation. My master aided me by his counsels; and when the work was complete, he laid his hand affectionately on my shoulder, and said:

"Truly, you are a pupil worthy of a greater master!"

We had the picture framed, and sent to the exhibition of the Academy. On the very first day my triumph was unquestionable. "An Angel" was decidedly the attraction of the exhibition. The same afternoon an offer to purchase it for a large sum arrived from one of the richest merchants of New York. I sat, with this letter in my hand, trying to read it by the already waning light of my studio, when I heard the door open, and somebody enter. Supposing it to be the painter, I did not look round.

Presently I raised my eyes, and beheld, to my horror, a shadowy figure in white, with a face of unearthly pallor.

The face was Aurelia's!

I confess that fear seized me. My shattered nerves, my recent over-exertion, my fasts and vigils, had increased my nervous sensibility to an alarming degree. I tried to reason with myself, and account for the vision on grounds of mental delusion, when I was startled out of all reason by the figure saying, in a low but distinct tone:

"Frederick, do you know me?"

"Yes, I know you," was my solemn answer.

"And you still love me?"

"Now and for ever!"

"Then, why do you not embrace me?" said the figure, gliding nearer.

"Can ghosts embrace?" I cried, rising dubiously, and gazing more assuredly at the pale phantom.

"Try!" said the ghost.

And I did try; but it was no spectre: it was a living, breathing angel I folded in my arms.

"What is the meaning of this? I thought you dead!"

"And I believed you buried. They told me so at home. I had a fever in consequence: see how pale and thin I am."

"But I am alive; so are you!"

"That is evident."

"What could have been your father's motive for such conduct and such falsehood?"

"An insane wish to marry me to his partner, Mr. Smithson?"

"His partner?"

"Yes; he has caught a partner with money, as mamma says, and she thanks God she will not have to pay the rent of the office out of her own income any longer."

"But how did you know I was alive?"

"Dead men do not paint pictures."

"Then you know —"

"Yes, I have seen—oh, you flatterer!"

"Flatterer! not at all. But look at this—an offer seven hundred dollars for the picture. An hour ago I would not have sold it for seventy thousand. But now, suppose we take the seven hundred dollars, and run away at once?"

"It is not necessary; my father gives his consent—and here he is."

Old Garford entered.

"Well, sir," said he, "I congratulate you on your success. We shall be happy to see you at Two-hundred-and-twenty-second Street this evening, if you are not otherwise engaged."

Shortly afterwards I was married. As soon as Aurelia and I were alone in the carriage that bore us from the church, I said to her, smiling:

"My dear little ghost, I sincerely trust you will haunt me to my dying day!"

"I will try," said Aurelia, looking full at me with beautiful and fathomless eyes, "to be your ghostly comforter as long as I live."

It is my opinion that a ghost is very much improved by having a body attached to it. W. N.

HAPPY HOURS.

BY O. G. WARREN.

ONLY count the happy hours,
Moments with pleasure rife,
Seasons that bloom with joyous flowers,
For these are all of life.
I soon forget the troubles past,
Nor future ones would borrow
My pains behind my back I cast,
I would not hoard my sorrow.

An hour of pleasure more is worth
Than months consumed in tears;
Even moments to such joys give birth,
They live and grow to years.
The darkness is a blank to me,
I only see the light;
And thus in joyous memory,
Existence all is bright.

Give me the light, although it be
The twilight of the past;
Better one ray the soul should see,
Than gloom be on it cast.
Thus count I but my happy hours,
Nor think of cares or strife;
Spring, blooming fresh with fragrant flowers,
Shall be my only life.

FIERCE ATTACK BY A GRISLY BEAR, IN CALIFORNIA.

I SAW, about fifteen miles from this point, on the road from here to Carson Valley, a man who had been most horribly mutilated by a grisly bear. A man living near Sly Park Creek, on the emigrant road, while hunting, discovered a she bear, with two cubs about the size of a common dog, coming up a ravine within gun-shot of where he was standing in the road. As the bear had not discovered him, he determined to give her a shot. The ball struck her on the back of the shoulder, but too low to prove fatal. She immediately rose upon her hind legs, turning her head from side to side, to discover her assailant. He had commenced loading, but before he got the powder down, the bear discovered him. He took to a tree, and barely escaped, as the bear was so near that he kicked her head with his foot before he got out of her reach. She was enraged, and kept him in the tree for over two hours. While there he shouted for help, and succeeded in attracting the attention of some men in the employ of Bradley, Berden, and Co., who went to his relief; but when they reached the tree, the bear had been gone about ten minutes. They tracked her into a deep chapparal, covering about three acres, and there left her.

At dinner they mustered double-barrelled guns and rifles, to the number of fourteen shots, and started for the chapparal. Upon reaching it, the men very imprudently scattered, some venturing in to see if they could start her, while others climbed trees, to be in a place of safety, and to get a view of the ground. Among those who took a tree was a man named Charles H. Packard, who had gone a short distance into the bush, and as he had no gun, placed himself in a sapling about six inches through. The tree forked about six feet from the ground, and Packard went up one of the branches, a distance of about twelve feet from the ground, and in reply to one of his companions, said he considered himself safe.

At this moment he cried out: "Here's the bear within a rod of me!" but hardly got the words out of his mouth, before she made towards him furiously, jumped at and caught the tree a few feet below him, and, with her tremendous weight, split it at the fork, carrying man and tree both to the ground. He fell upon his back, and the bear seized him by the left side of his head and face, tore his left ear completely from his head, laying bare his skull. She then seized him by the other side of his face, cutting a deep gash in the upper lip, and tearing the flesh from the right corner of the mouth to near the large artery in the neck, then, by the fore-arm, laying bare the tendons, breaking some of them, and biting his right hand through and through. She then left the upper part of the body, and made an effort seemingly to tear open his bowels, as she left some fifteen severe wounds on his body, but none of them so deep as to enter the cavity, and finished her horrible work by taking out about two pounds of flesh from his right thigh. By this time, Packard was so nearly exhausted, that he lay as if dead, and the bear left him. Some of the company were within twenty steps of the wounded man, but were unable to render him any assistance. They saw the bear break down the tree, heard his cries for help, but after he struck the ground, they could see neither bear nor man, so thick was the chapparal around them.

Mr. Packard was carried to the house, and notwithstanding he is so terribly mutilated, he is in a fair way to recover. He said to a friend that he thought he would be up in a few weeks. Dr. Slaughter, of Pleasant Valley, dressed his wounds. This bear is said to be one of the largest kind, and, in consequence of being wounded, had become ferocious. She has not been captured.—Sacramento Union.

FACETIÆ.

POETS seldom make good astronomers. They so love women, they cannot see the other heavenly bodies.

THE horse "warranted to stand without tying," which a man bought at auction the other day, is offered for sale by the purchaser, with the guaranty that "he will not move without whipping."

THE Spaniards do not often pay hyperbolic compliments, but one of their admired writers, speaking of a lady's black eyes, says: "They are in mourning for the murders they have committed."

An eminent lawyer was employed in an action against the proprietors of a Rockingham coach. On the part of the defendant the coachman was called. His examination in chief being ended, he was subject to the leader's cross examination. Having held up the fore-finger of his right hand at the witness, and warned him to give a "precise answer" to every question, and not to talk about what he might think the question meant, he proceeded thus: "You drive the Rockingham coach?" "No, sir, I do not." "Why, man, did you not tell my learned friend so this moment?" "No, sir, I did not." "Now, sir, I put it to you once more, upon your oath—do you not drive the Rockingham coach?" "No, sir, I drive the horses."

THERE are two gentlemen by the name of Potter in the Rhode Island legislature, who look so much alike, that when one takes a bottle of wine, the other gets tipsy on it.

A man who had made a fortune by industry and close economy, in a retail business, at length retired from trade, and used to loan his money on interest. One day, in mid-summer, a friend happened to say to him: "How pleasant it is to have such long, bright days!" "Why, y-e-s," replied he; "but these long days the interest comes in so slow!"

An old preacher once took his text—"Adam, where art thou?" and divided his subject into three parts. "First, all men are somewhere; second, some men are where they ought not to be; and third, unless they take care, they will soon find themselves where they would rather not be."

A doctor was employed by a poor man to attend his wife, who was dangerously ill. The doctor gave a hint that he had fears of not being paid. "I have five pounds," said the man to the doctor, "and if you kill or cure, you shall have them." The woman died in the doctor's hands, and after a reasonable time he called for his five pounds. The man asked the doctor if he killed his wife? "No!" "Did you cure?" "No!" "Then," said the poor man, "you have no legal demand!"

A bachelor friend of ours got a valentine this year which "opened" beautifully. The fair writer sang in sweet rhymes that she was dying to learn a secret which he cruelly kept shut up in his heart. It was not to know if he had wealth—it was not to ascertain his pedigree, and learn if he had noble blood in his veins; for love despised all such considerations. But would he tell her—and cure the wound in her soul; would he tell her—and thrill a maiden's heart with ineffable joy; would he tell her—and confer a happiness upon her, which riches and honour could not bring; would he, would he tell her—how much he paid for that new wig?

WHICH love sunshine the most, women or flowers? During the prevalence of cold, raw weather, the feminine gender is as great a rarity in Regent Street as a drove of goslings would be. Let the sun shower down, however, for an hour or two, and, presto! what a change! The side-walks are all budding with loveliness, while the dry-goods men are so surrounded with eyes made of violets, that you would swear he was a stick for morning-glories to climb on.

A little girl had seen her brother playing with his burning-glass, and had heard him talk about the "focus." Not knowing what the word focus meant, she consulted the dictionary, and found that the focus was the place where the rays meet. At dinner, when the family were assembled, she announced, as grand as could be, that she knew the meaning of one hard word. Her father asked her what it was: she said it was the word "focus." "Well, Mary," said he, "what does it mean?" "Why," she replied, "it means a place where they raise calves!" This of course raised a great laugh; but she stuck to her point, and produced her dictionary to prove that she was right. "There," said she, triumphantly: "Focus, a place where the rays meet." Calves are meat, and if they raise meat, they raise calves—and so I am right.

THE only servant we have got that don't give impudence, is steam. It makes no odds what you set it doing—whether it's driving a floating palace, or pumping out a poudrette vat—it does both equally willing and equally cheerful.

"HERE'S your money, dolt. Now, tell me why your scoundrelly master wrote me eighteen letters about that contemptible sum?" said an exasperated debtor. "I'm sure, sir, I can't tell, sir; but if you'll excuse me, sir, I think it were because seventeen letters didn't fetch it!"

It is rumoured that as soon as the militiamen can "wheel about" with any degree of precision, they are to be armed with Colt's "revolvers!" Of course a "revolution" must follow!

AN ANACHRONISM.—The "Golden Age," according to all authority, is a mythological affair. But the real golden age is unquestionably the present time, for the truth of which may be cited the authorities of California and Australia. No wonder! the yellow fever is so prevalent amongst the emigrant ships!

AN accepted suitor, one day walking in a pretty village in Bedfordshire, with the object of his affections hanging upon his arm, and describing the ardency of his affection, said: "How transported I am to have you hanging on my arm." "Upon my word," said the lady, "you make us out a very respectable couple, when one is transported and the other hanging!"

MEDICAL MYSTERIES.—Foote has left his verdict against medical mysteries, in his whimsical definition of a physician, whom he describes as "a grave, formal animal, who picks our pockets by talking unintelligible stuff in a sick man's chamber, till nature cures or medicine kills him." Howbeit, blessing and honour, say we, be upon the head of the true physician, of whatever creed, for his is ever a work of mercy and love. As Lamb says, "There is healing in the very creak of his shoes, as he comes up the stairs." There be those, however, in every community, who, in circulating their quack nostrums, care little whether they make the well sick, or the sick sicker. "Do you eat well?" asked one of our modern pill venders, who was in the process of manufacturing a patient. "Yes, very well." "Do you sleep well?" "Yes." "Eh?—you do, eh? That's not exactly the thing for one in your condition! I'll do away with that for you. Take four of these every morning, and four after dinner. You'll soon see a change!"

PREJUDICES make up identities. Without them we should be only like peas in a bag.

THE man who has never been struck by the glance of a bright eye, deserves to be struck himself; he who bows not to love, ought to be trimmed with a hickory bough; and the one who needs not the soft consolation of a gentle and devoted wife, should be well kneaded with hard rubs.

CARDINAL RICHELIEU, amongst all his great occupations, found a recreation in violent exercises; and he was once discovered jumping with his servant, to try who could reach the highest side of a wall. De Grammont, observing the cardinal to be jealous of his powers, offered to jump with him; and in the true spirit of a courtier, having made some efforts which nearly reached the cardinal's, confessed the cardinal surpassed him. This was jumping like a politician; and by this means he is said to have ingratiated himself with the minister.

WRETCHED IGNORANCE.—A stupid fellow writes to inform us that he has received an invitation to an evening party, and the note was sealed with a stamp, on which was engraved the word circumspice: he wishes to know the meaning of this word. Pitying his ignorance, we inform him its literal meaning is, "Sir, come spicy."—Diogenes.

SUPPOSING the Muses to be in a particularly beatific state, what range of mountains would they remind one of?—The Appennine.—Ibid.

PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS.—The Election Committees have returned Sir Frederick Smith to Chatham, Mr. Clay and Lord Goderich to Hull, Mr. Horsfall to Derby, and Mr. Mackinnon to Rye. These honourable gentlemen having lost their seats, have also lost their senses, from the excitement consequent upon exposure and disappointment. The first loss falls heavily upon themselves; the second will scarcely be felt by anybody. If the whole House were tried by the same tests that have upset the honourable gentlemen alluded to, probably nobody would retain his place but the Speaker.—Ibid.

TO AMBITIOUS BUTCHERS.—To any butcher who may be desirous of giving a classical, and at the same time a distinguishing name, to a son destined to follow the profession of his father, we cannot offer one more appropriate than Suet-onius.—Ibid.

A PIG'S WHISPER.—One of the witnesses before the Derby Election Committee deposed, that a kind friend nudged him, and offered a pig for his vote. This is really a case of a pig in a poke with a vengeance!—Ibid.

STRANGE, BUT TRUE.—A friend of ours, and consequently a wit, has been pleased to observe, that certain M.P.'s have been so much used to standing at the late election, that even now they find it impossible to keep their seats.—Ibid.

VEGETATIVE IDEAS.

PURSUANT to public advertisement, a souirée of the Liverpool Vegetarian Association was lately held. The room was elegantly decorated with wreaths of evergreens, bouquets of cauliflowers, young turnips and carrots, ears of wheat and barley, and festoons of onions.

James Simpson, Esq., of Foxhill Bank, President of the Vegetarian Society, occupied the chair. He was happy to appear before them as a thorough-going advocate of the vegetarian theory, and a consistent disciple of it. He rejoiced to say that there were many nowadays who no longer chewed the substance of animals for food, but eschewed the practice of eating flesh altogether. To minds morally dyspeptic, the vegetarian theory might appear an absurdity; but, if taken in a proper light, it might easily be digested. He discarded the use of animal substances altogether: his shoes were of gutta-percha—his clothes of flax—his hat of straw. He could not look upon anything about him, and feel that he had robbed a fellow-creature of it. He considered the life of a vegetable to be so superior to that of an animal, that he longed to be identified with the bloodless and toothless occupants of the fields. He was already looked upon as the flower of the Vegetarian Society, and there were many who thought they discovered a little green in his eye. (Loud cheers.) He objected to everything that savoured of the animal system—why did they allow their city to be called by the disgusting name of Liver-pool? How much better Turnip Town would sound—and how uniquely its divisions might be laid out into Parsley Bed, Radish Street, and Cauliflower Gardens? He never saw a poor animal cut to pieces but he was moved to tears. Some of the objectors to the system said that the same effect would be produced by the cutting up of an onion! He could answer that objection. He had often wondered why the mutilated onion excited tears; and he had at length arrived at the conviction that it was because the onions pitifully remonstrated against being tossed into a frying-pan in company with a rump-steak.

After several speeches in the same strain, the meeting broke up. Prices advanced considerably in the Vegetable Market on the following day.—Ibid.

WHAT SHALL I DO WITH MY MONEY?—A very simple question answered by an old money-lender.—In all money matters, never do things by halves—excepting in lending it—and then never lend more than one half the sum that is asked of you; for you may be sure that the person who is borrowing has asked for twice as much as he wants, in the full consciousness that he is not likely to get more than one half.—Punch.

THE SPREAD OF EDUCATION.—An alderman being asked about the spread of education, said, extremely perplexed: "I can't tell you what it is, unless it's 'the feast of reason and the flow of soul.'"—Ibid.

TOUCHING A CORD.—The price of hemp is rising fast in the Austrian part of Italy; where the hangmen begin to anticipate some difficulty in finding halters. We hope, however, for an obvious reason, that some means will be found to supply the government with rope enough.—Ibid.

WONDERFUL THINGS.

A Cab which is not a vehicle of abuse.
A so-called "Quiet" Street without a barrel-organ in it.

A "Quart" Bottle of Beer that you can squeeze above a couple of half-pint glasses out of.

A Lodging-house Knife that will cut.

A Government Steamer which can be at sea a whole week without being forced to put back for repairs.

A Dress Circle whose centre is discoverable without a sixpence to the box-keeper.

A Punctual Railway Train.

A Glass of Thames water that you can drink without deodorising.

An "Alarming Sacrifice" where the process of selling does not invariably include the purchaser.

A Statue which the British Nation need not blush to godfather.

A Carpet-Bag or Omnibus that it is possible to fill.

A Clean Street in the City, or one not under repair.

A "Warranted Foreign" Cigar which you may not safely bet is cabbaged from a London market-garden.

A New Orleans Paper without the advertisement of a Slave Sale in it.

A Homoeopathic Practice which is not quite a sine cure.

An Umbrella which has not been borrowed.

A Betting Office, where, whatever horse you wish to back, you may not safely calculate on being "taken"—in.—Ibid.

SCIENCE.

NEW INVENTIONS, ETC.

GAS LIGHTING.—An important improvement is said to have just been made in France in the mode of purifying gas for lighting. Instead of lime, the inventor uses peat charcoal and acids, which deprive the gas of the sulphur and ammonia. The gas thus purified is said to have an addition of 10 per cent. to its illuminating power, and the materials used for the purification of the gas are converted into a manure so valuable, it is declared, that it can be sold for more than the original cost.

"YOUNG AMERICA."—Mr. McKay, of East Boston, has now on the stocks the longest, sharpest, and largest ship in the known world, and has named her Young America. Her keel is 310 feet long; the vessel will be 330 feet long on deck, will have 53 feet breadth of beam, 30 feet depth of hold, with three decks, and will register over 4000 tons. The frames are placed close together, and bolted fore and aft, and will be diagonally cross-braced with iron, like the Collins steamers, and every other means of strength will be used to make her a perfect ship. Her model is said by competent judges to be the most perfect specimen of naval architecture ever produced by Mr. McKay, and is expected to prove the swiftest in the world. She will have four masts, the after one fore-and-aft rigged, and the others square-rigged, with double top-sails. The yards on the fore and main masts will be alike, and on the mizenmast will correspond with the yards above the lower topsail-yards on the other masts. In rig, as well as model, all the improvements of the day will be introduced. Mr. McKay builds her on his own account, and intends to place his brother, now captain of the Sovereign of the Seas, in command of her. She will cost about 300,000 dols. Mr. McKay has been induced to undertake this vast enterprise by numerous solicitations from the most influential citizens of California. They admire his daring enterprise, for they know that his clippers rank first among the foremost, and have said, "Build us something to astonish the world, and we'll fill her with freight." He has taken them at their word, and will soon show them a vessel which will be an honour to our flag. She will be ready for launching in three or four months. Good luck to her!—Boston, U. S., Atlas.

SAND is rock, and other hard substances, reduced into powder of various degrees of coarseness. And there was therefore, no sand in chaos. While the earth was still without form and void, the materials of which sand is composed had not assumed their present peculiar character. For sand is a highly manufactured article, and requires time for its production. A bran new planet can no more have sands (unless ready made) spread over it, than a new park can be adorned with symmetrical avenues of old stag-headed oak trees. Allowing, then, for the small proportion of sand which the winds, the rains, and the rivers have ground out for us, what an old established concern the ocean-wave-mill must be, to have pounded thus finely for us the immense quantity of sand which we have in the world!

THE LARGEST MERCHANT STEAMER IN THE WORLD.—The screw steamer, Himalaya, of 3600 tons measurement, designed and built at Mr. Mare's establishment, Blackwall, for the Peninsular and Oriental Company, is about to be launched. She is to be propelled by machinery of 700-horse power.

ACCELERATION OF THE COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.—Orders have been issued by the Emperor of Austria, that an electric telegraph be constructed between Zarah and Agram as speedily as possible. When the telegraph is complete, news from the East will (with the additional aid of the Levant steamers) reach England two days sooner than at present.

THE LEAVES OF THE COFFEE PLANT A SUBSTITUTE FOR TEA.—In the Singapore Free Press of the 17th September last, are extracts from the Colombo Observer, by which it appears that a patent has been taken out by Dr. Gardner (known by his travels in South America), for preparing the coffee leaf in a manner to afford a beverage like tea—that is, by infusion; "forming an agreeable, refreshing, and nutritive article of diet." A writer in the same paper says: "It may be interesting to Dr. Gardner, his friends, and the public in general, to learn that an infusion of the coffee leaf is an article of universal consumption amongst the natives of this part of Sumatra; wherever coffee is grown, the leaf has become one of the few necessities of life which the natives regard as indispensable."

INFLUENCE OF CLIMATES.

MUCH misconception prevails with respect to the efficacy of foreign climates in cases of pulmonary consumption; and, however agreeable to the senses warm air, sunny skies, and luxuriant vegetation may seem, they afford no proof of salubrity, nor of the beneficial effect of any climate. Madeira, with all its sanitary fame, is no exception to this rule, as the meteorological observations of Drs. Heineken, Goulay, and Mason incontestably establish. Malta is subject to great vicissitudes of temperature, and to the baneful effects of the Sirocco and Libeccio—African blasts. The climate of the South of France is rendered most injurious to consumptive invalids by the influence of the Mistral, the scourge of Provence. The mortality from consumption, amongst the natives, shows this. Nice, which exhibits the luxuriant vegetation of the tropics, is subject to great alternations from heat to cold, and the deaths by phthisis are numerous, even amongst the inhabitants. The climate of Italy, however delightful to persons in good health, affords no immunity from pulmonary disease. It has been vastly overrated, especially as an adjuvant in the cure of phthisis; and the localities generally recommended are not the most favourable. For example: Northern Italy, which has been hitherto overlooked by the profession, affords, in my opinion, two of the best localities for the residence of pulmonary invalids throughout the Italian peninsula—namely, Como and Venice. Invalids residing in Italy, will find the summer climate of Lake Como the best adapted for pectoral affections. The transitions of temperature are more gentle here than at any other station in Italy, and its climate approaches nearer equability than elsewhere. Venice presents peculiar advantages. The climate of this singular city is in great measure exempt from those violent atmospheric perturbations which are the bane of the Neapolitan sea-board; whilst it possesses a certain mildness of character and equability, often unknown in some of the more southern parts of Italy; besides the gondola exercise, the gliding motion and gentle oscillation of which are so peculiarly adapted for consumptive invalids. Como is admitted by all writers to be one of the most unfavourable localities in Italy for pulmonary complaints. Florence is equally prejudicial. The climate of Pisa is far too relaxing, humid, and murky, to be beneficial in tuberculous disease. The Roman climate, if mild, is sedative and depressing; and, owing its mildness to malarious emanations, cannot prove salutary, particularly in a malady characterised by depression of the vital force, and accompanied by vitiated nutrition. It is a mistake to suppose that a warm, humid, relaxing atmosphere, can benefit pulmonary disease. Cold, dry, and still air, appears a more rational indication, especially for invalids born in temperate regions. The climate of Naples is the most dangerous throughout Italy, for persons suffering from affections of the respiratory organs. From the preceding summary of the characters manifested by the different Italian climates, it will be seen, that however useful they may prove in other complaints, one more likely to act beneficially in pulmonary consumption might easily be found within the United Kingdom.—T. H. Burgess, M.D.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COMPLETION OF THE KOH-I-NOOR.—The Koh-i-Noor diamond (that looked in the Great Exhibition like a dingy chandelier drop) has now, after an expenditure of £2000 in bringing it to light, been finally set in an exquisite circle of small diamonds, and made the "Mountain of Light" on a most graceful tiara of diamonds for the brow of Queen Victoria. The old setting, as worn by Runjeet Singh, has been preserved, with beautiful counterfeits of the stones, as they were seen on the arm of the Lion of Lahore.

THE POLKA.—View it philosophically, and you find it to be neither more nor less than the nuptial dance of Bacchus and Ariadne. Our mothers or grandmothers were staggered, and some of them shocked, at the introduction of the ballet in the opera-houses. What would they say now, could they see one of their female descendants absolutely in the embrace of some hairy animal—fronting him—linked to him—drawn to him—her head reclining on his shoulder, and he perusing her charms—executing the most graceful of all possible movements, at the will of a notorious Tomnoddy?—Blackwood.

CURIOUS PROCEEDINGS AT LAW.—As the congregation were lately leaving the parish church of Westbury, after the usual Sunday morning service, their attention was drawn to a clerk from the under-sheriff's office, who, having taken his stand at the principal entrance to the church, proceeded, in an audible voice, to read a writ of dower—or, in other words, a formal claim to a widow's third, or jointure. It appears that this curious procedure, which is in strict compliance with an un repealed statute of Elizabeth, has been adopted on the advice of Mr. Slack, solicitor, of Bath, who has been retained for a widow who claims a third share of two cottages of the value of £150, or thereabout, situated at Dilton Marsh, near this town, but who for the last seventeen years has been deprived of what she considers her legal share. Of what the result may be, we of course are uninformed; but the proceeding is said to be as costly as it is curious.—Bath Gazette.

EFFECTS OF COLD.—The effect which the exposure to severe frost has, in benumbing the mental as well as the corporeal faculties, was very striking in this man, as well as in two of the young gentlemen who returned after dark, and of whom we were anxious to make inquiries respecting Pearson. When I sent for them into my cabin they looked wild, spoke thick and indistinctly, and it was impossible to draw from them a rational answer to any of our questions. After being on board for a short time, the mental faculties appeared gradually to return with the returning circulation, and it was not till then that a looker-on could easily persuade himself that they had not been drinking too freely. To those who have been much accustomed to cold countries, this will be no new remark; but I cannot help thinking (and it is with this view that I speak of it) that many a man may have been punished for intoxication, who was only suffering from the benumbing effects of frost; for I have more than once seen our people in a state so exactly resembling that of the most stupid intoxication, that I should certainly have charged them with that offence, had I not been quite sure that no possible means were afforded them on Melville Island to procure anything stronger than snow-water.—Arctic Voyage.

WINTER TRAVELLING IN SIBERIA.—A traveller in Siberia, during the winter, is so enveloped in furs that he can scarcely move; and under the thick fur hood, which is fastened to the bear-skin collar, and covers the whole face, one can only draw in, as it were by stealth, a little of the external air, which is so keen that it causes a very peculiar and painful feeling in the throat and lungs. The distance from one halting place to another takes about ten hours, during which time the traveller must always continue on horseback, as the cumbersome dress makes it insupportable to wade through the snow. The poor horses suffer at least as much as their riders; for, besides the general effect of the cold, they are tormented by the ice forming in the nostrils, and stopping their breathing. When they intimate this, by a distressed snort, and a convulsive shaking of the head, the drivers relieve them by taking out the piece of ice, to save them from being suffocated. When the icy ground is not covered by snow, their hoofs often burst from the effects of the cold. The caravan is always surrounded by a thick cloud of vapour: it is not only living beings which produce this effect—even the snow smokes. These evaporations are instantly changed into thousands of needles of ice, which fill the air, and cause a constant slight noise resembling the sound of torn sail or thick silk. Even the reindeer seeks the forest, to protect himself from the intensity of the cold. In the Tundras, where there is no shelter to be found, the whole herd crowd together as close as possible, to gain a little warmth from each other, and may be seen in this way quite motionless. Only the dark bird of winter, the raven, cleaves the icy air with slow and heavy wing, leaving behind him a long line of thin vapour, marking the track of his solitary flight.

DISEASES OF NATIONS.—Rev. Thomas Starr King, in his admirable lecture on "Show and Substance," holds a post-mortem examination over the remains of ancient nations, and finds they did not perish by the might of foreign conquerors, but by their own innate corruption. Such would be their verdict: "Babylon died of delirium tremens; Nineveh, apoplexy; Persia, weakness of the spine; Greece, quick consumption; Rome, paralysis." The present characters of nations were hit off rapidly, thus: Ireland was hungry and dirty; France was troubled with neuralgia and St. Vitus's dance; Spain had the scurvy; Austria was bad off with colics and cramps, that required the utmost nursing skill of the Russian Czar; Germany was subject to the gout and headache; England had a plethora—while even in our youthful nation signs of a great black cancer might be seen in our lower limbs!

THE SLAVE TRADE.—A correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, whose letter is dated Rio de Janeiro, Dec. 29, says, that on the 22nd of that month one thousand slaves were landed a few miles south of Rio, and marched into the interior, the cargo having been sold for 800 milreisch each. The slaver escaped. It is the first important importation since the Brazilian government, at the instance of Great Britain, issued its prohibitory decree.

A TOUCH OF NATURE.—A car full of passengers recently passed over the Western Railroad, in which occurred a simple but touching scene, worthy of record. One of the passengers was a woman, carrying in her arms a child who annoyed every one by its petulance and cries. Mile after mile the passengers bore the infliction of its noise, which rather increased than diminished, until at last it became furious, and the passengers nearly so. There were open complaints, and one man shouted, "take the child out!" The train stopped at a station, when an old gentleman arose, and made the simple statement that the father of the child had died recently, away from home, that the mother had been on a visit to her friends, and had died while on the visit, that her dead body was on board the train, and that the child was in the arms of a woman who was a stranger to it. It was enough. There was a tear in nearly every eye, and all were melted into patience and pity. All selfishness was lost in thinking of the desolation of the poor little wanderer, who would have found a warm welcome in hands that, a moment before, would almost have visited it with a rod.

A BILLION.—What a very great sum is a billion! It is a million of millions! A million seems large enough, but a million of millions—how long do you suppose it would take to count it? A mill which makes one hundred pins a minute, if kept to work night and day, would only make fifty-two millions five hundred and ninety-six pins a year; and at that rate the mill must work twenty thousand years, without stopping a single moment, in order to turn out a billion of pins.

HYENAS IN ALGERIA.—Not a tree is to be seen in this desolate land; a few rose-laurels on the banks of the Seybouse are the only signs of vegetation to be seen for miles around. The ground is deeply cracked in all directions, and the crevices afford shelter to numbers of reptiles. The jackals prowl about the neighbourhood after sunset; and, though they never attack a man, a child might easily become their prey, or be devoured by the wild beasts that follow in their wake. Hyenas are as common here as wolves in some parts of Europe. One evening I heard a piercing scream, like the cry of a child. My companion seized me by the arm, and said: "Listen to the hyena!" A cold shudder ran through my whole frame, and shortly afterwards the wild animal passed our cottage, pursued by all the dogs in the place. These creatures are of a cowardly nature, and take flight at the least alarm. This one had evidently made its way to the "gourbe," or stable, where all the cattle in the village were kept; but, unable to enjoy the feast in silence, its cry had betrayed it. The driver of the car which had brought me to Mondovi told me that a hyena had crossed our road, but had taken flight at the mere cracking of his whip. Lions seldom make their appearance. Occasionally they come from the mountains of Ella-rough, and prowl about Mondovi during the night.—Residence in Algeria, by Madame Prus.

TALES OF SNAKES.—Two were told me by a military friend as having occurred in his presence. He and several others were sitting after dinner, over their wine, when one of the party turned pale, and said "A snake has come in, and twisted itself round my leg, and that of the table." His companions rose hastily, in order to kill it; but he said, "if you awake it, it will stick its fangs into me, and then I am a lost man. You had better all go out of the room, and I will sit quietly with my hoolah till it awakes of itself; and then probably it will glide away without doing me any injury." After some expostulation his plan was adopted, and there he sat with the most perfect stillness for an hour, and an hour of much greater anxiety could scarcely have been passed: he was, however, rewarded by the snake quietly uncoiling itself, and taking its departure. The other story was that of an officer being about to put on his boots, and, thrusting his foot into one of them, felt something wriggling at the bottom; with the greatest presence of mind, he instantly stamped his foot upon the ground with the utmost violence. His chief difficulty was to know when to leave off this fatiguing exercise; but at last his leg ached so much, that he stopped, and finding all still, he drew off his boot, and there found a venomous serpent, which had crawled in, and coiled itself up in the last of the boot, but which he had killed by his exertions.—See Lee's Anecdotes.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. JONES.—1. As executor under your father's will, you are the legal guardian of your father's infant children. 2. While the children are out of your custody, you cannot be compelled to contribute towards their maintenance. 3. Treat the person referred to as if he were a perfect stranger.

J. H.—It is not known when or how playing-cards were first introduced into Europe. It is supposed that they originally came from the East. In France, the nearest point at which the best antiquarians have arrived, is between 1392 and 1440. In Germany, it is pretty certain that card-making was carried on to a considerable extent about the year 1418.

A. C.—A copy of the will of a person who died in one of the British colonies, may be procured at Doctors' Commons. Unclaimed dividends are deposited in the Bank of England, to the credit of the Accountant General. Lists of them are kept at the Bank, where they may be inspected, gratis.

PAIR PLAY.—We give the substance of your letter, because it refers to a fact that should be more noticed than it is. You write: "I am no teetotaler, but should really like to know the reason we seldom or ever see a brewer's drayman with grey hair." It cannot be from the hard work, because, in the railway stations, at the docks, and also at the depots of our large carriers, we find hale, hearty, strong old men, with fine heads of grey hair, that do their work in a way that would shame many a younger hand. This state of things, if true, is really serious, and as far as I may be allowed to judge, ought to be made public. I cannot help thinking that malt and hops must be very unwholesome and weakening, if men, by the use of such, render themselves unfit for work, and are rarely seen over thirty-five or forty years of age.

LESLAH.—It has been well known for centuries that the descendants of the English and Irish are among the finest specimens of the human race. All mixed races are superior to inbred races.

PAUL BRANDON.—1. Foreigners are allowed to enlist into the continental armies. The standard height is generally lower than in England. 2. The consent of the father, or, if dead, the mother, or if both the parents are dead, the natural guardian, or next friend, is indispensable to render a deed of apprenticeship binding.

W. B.—Somerset House was originally built by Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, uncle to Edward VI. On his attainder, it came into possession of the crown, and was used as a royal palace until the reign of William III. It was then appointed for the reception of ambassadors; but in 1775 the whole of the structure was demolished, and the present edifice erected for the accommodation of the public offices, under the superintendence of Sir William Chambers.

M. J.—Copyhold property descends according to the custom of the manor. Very likely your eldest brother took possession as heir-at-law. If so, the sale by him was perfectly legal. You had better consult a respectable solicitor.

BUGR.—A will must be proved within six months after the testator's death. Having ascertained the value of the personal property, the executor must apply to the proctor of the court, if the will is to be proved in either of the prerogative courts; or to the registrar, or deputy-registrar, or other acting officer, if it be in any of the inferior courts, and if the executor live near it; but if he live at a distance, he may do the business through the medium of the nearest surrogate of the court. The penalty for acting under a will without taking out probate within six months from the date of the deceased's death, is £100.

JUNUS.—According to law, an infant attains his or her majority, or full age, on the day preceding the twenty-first anniversary of his or her birth. It appears, therefore, from the authorities, that a person born on the 1st of January, is of age for all legal acts on the morning of the last day of December; though perhaps the individual may not have lived twenty-one years, by nearly forty-eight hours. The reason assigned for this, is that the law does not recognise any fraction of a day. Hence, probably, arose the reservation, in some cases, of a year and a day, by which is meant a year complete, according to the common acceptance.

A. D. C. R.—The publication that contained the base and malignant slanders of the most influential of the popular periodicals, has no standing whatever. Its circulation does not exceed a few hundred copies per week. It has made one or two attempts to attract the notice of the public, but they have all miserably failed. You correctly describe it as "borrowing features and matter from other publications without acknowledgment, and being totally destitute of novelty, talent, or even ordinary common sense, in any single department." Its correspondence page betrays the poverty of its condition, both as to circulation and management. We never hear of the thing, much less read it, and should not have noticed its frantic spite, but for your friendly communication. The circulation of the LONDON JOURNAL is nearly 270,000 per week. The "Penny Magazine" never reached half that number.

LADIES' CLUB.—We can only remember three titled ladies who were married from the stage. Those were the Duchess of Bolton, the Countess of Derby, and Lady Boothby. In about three instances the daughters of eminent actors have married into titled families. The actors have not been so fortunate. Ladies have a greater dread of ridicule than men.

L. L. M.—The persons who cannot make wills are minors, male or female, married or single—married women, except under certain conditions—madmen, lunatics, idiots; persons grown childish by reason of old age or distemper, or who have lost their senses through drunkenness. To this class may be referred such persons as are born deaf, blind, and dumb, who, as they have always wanted the common inlets of understanding, are held to be incapable of making their wills. But persons by nature deaf and dumb only, may make a will, if it is manifest that they clearly understand what a will means, and can declare their intention by signs and tokens. Blind persons may of course make their wills, for they are not excepted out of the statute, and must comply with its directions as far as they are able. With respect to prisoners, they are not absolutely incapacitated from making a will, but it is left to the court to judge upon the peculiar circumstances of their capacity, whether or not such persons could be supposed to have had sufficient freedom of will so to do. A married woman is incapable of making a will without the consent of her husband. To this general rule there are, however, some exceptions. The queen, whether regnant or consort, is especially exempted; and any married woman may make her will of goods held by her in reversion (in right of another person), as executor or administratrix. If a married woman has any pin-money or separate maintenance, she may dispose of the savings, but this would be merely by an instrument in the nature of a will, which the husband, in equity, would be bound to carry out: The wife of a man who has undergone what the law terms a civil death, by having abjured the realm, been banished by Act of Parliament, or transported as a felon for life, may make a will as though she were unmarried, or her husband were actually dead. A married woman may also make a will under a power of appointment given to her either before or after marriage. In the third class of persons prohibited from making wills, are comprised traitors, felons, outlaws, and, odd as it may sound, suicides. The will of a felo de se cannot dispose of goods and chattels, for they are forfeited by the manner of his death, but it will be a good devise of his lands, because as a suicide he is not attained as a felon.

M. D. N.—The recent disclosures before committees of the House of Commons served to prove that the present electoral system is ineffectual and vicious. The cases taken show that, per se, the election disputed was as hollow a piece of business as well could be imagined. Mammon figures conspicuously in the transaction, and cant contributed to render the display more detestable. Our own impression is, that purity of election is impossible without the ballot. Why it should have been delayed so long is to us incomprehensible. It is not a new suggestion, but one familiar, and in practice among all classes of Englishmen. The nation will be wiser by-and-by.

MARY ANNE tells a story, which unhappily is too common. A gentleman visited at her parents' house daily for some months, and she fancied that it was for the sake of her society. Lately, however, she learned that he was engaged to a girl many years her junior; and this so chagrined her, that she, by those representations and insinuations which seem natural to jealous people, succeeded in prejudicing his parents against the innocent object of his attachment. This scandalous conduct did not, of course, enable her to succeed in her object; and now she is torn by remorse, "and would give worlds if she could recall the past." As she has behaved as a woman under the evil aspect of her sex, she must not go down on her knees and confess, but she may seek the injured girl's society, and by her manner and kindness show that she is anxious to remove the injurious impression she has created. Her mother, or, if she has none, a good-souled kind of elderly female friend of both families, would be the best mediator.

AMY H.—Amongst fashionable people, it is not the etiquette to pay a visit to a lady before three or after five in the afternoon. On returning visits, a card left at the house is generally considered all that is necessary; but if you are admitted, the morning visit should not be protracted. A gentleman, when paying a morning visit, should never leave his hat in the hall—it makes him look too much at home—he should take it into the room with him. The same rule applies to people who visit private residences on business. The hat should be carried in the hand, and, if engaged in conversation for any length of time, placed on a side-table.

SAMUEL HALL.—In almost every country the law has made marriage an exception to ordinary contracts. It is not dissoluble at the wish of the parties. There are weighty reasons for this; for, in discouraging divorce, the law and its ministers are fearful, perhaps, that the numerous petty disputes and disagreements which unhappily occur between the married, would lead them from mere temporary spite to seek for divorces—when, if that object were only attainable through great trouble and expense, and after a lapse of time, the gust would harmlessly pass over. Sir Walter Scott was a shrewd observer, and hearken to his dictum on the subject: "When people understand that they must live together, except for a very few reasons known to the law, they learn to soften, by mutual accommodation, that yoke which they know they cannot shake off. They become good husbands and good wives, from the necessity of remaining husbands and wives; for necessity is a powerful master in teaching the duties which it imposes. If it were once understood that, upon mutual disgust, married persons might be legally separated, many persons who now pass through the world with mutual comfort, might have been at this moment living in a state of the most licentious and unreserved immorality."

N. B. asks what conclusion is to be drawn from the circumstance of a young lady yawning in the presence of her lover. The obvious one would be that he was indifferent to her; but some men make love so awkwardly, that the poor girls, however strong their liking may be, are positively mesmerised into dullness. As we are called upon for an opinion, we should say that these slow lovers generally make fast husbands. When their mauvais honte has disappeared, their tongues wag freely enough, and, like a railway train behind time, they put on steam and go ahead at get-off-the-rails, tumble-over-embankments, and smashing speed.

ROSE W.—The young gentleman kisses hands to you every time he meets you, does he? Well, we presume he has taken a fancy to you; but as he can kiss hands he is not bashful, and had better be avoided. Young men that wink, blink, and giggle are insufferably vulgar creatures. They are not over honest, either.

HAMLET puts a painful question. He asks how he shall cure a drunken wife: not a dram-drinker, but a fuddler of home-brewed, at home? He has two daughters, is in comfortable circumstances, with about £200 per year coming in from property that he has accumulated by his own hard industry; but the conduct of his wife blights his happiness, and he is afraid her example will be pernicious to his daughters. We don't know how to assist him; we wish we could. Drunkenness is a disease, and must be treated like a disease. In Russia they mix the favourite beverage of the drunkard with his food, until he loathes the very smell of the accursed drink. The only remedy in England is prevention. Total and immediate abstinence must be insisted upon. We remember reading an account of a young and beautiful wife being addicted to the vice, and the husband, without even rebuking her, placed her in a remote part of the country, with some people he could depend upon, who were neither to keep intoxicating liquors in the house, nor procure them under any pretence. The result was a radical cure. The habit wore away, and the lady, more beautiful than ever, returned to her husband, to become a tender wife and exemplary mother.

TARUS.—A naval cadet serves two years, not four, before he can be made a midshipman. The Royal Navy takes precedence of the Army: par exemple, a post captain in the Navy takes precedence of a colonel holding a commission of the same date. The Navy is also universally "Royal," whereas there are only a few favoured regiments that bear that appellation. The number of votes for and against Louis Napoleon being Emperor—viz., for, 7,119,799, against, 1,119,000—if written on transparent paper, will, at the back, by placing the left thumb on the first three ciphers, form the word "Empeur." The phantasy has been attributed to some ingenious French priest—a Bonapartist, of course.

A WIDOW.—As you have only personal property, and intend leaving it to your daughter for life, the following will be the form in which your will should be drawn: "This is the Last Will and Testament of A. B., of So-and-so, widow. I give and bequeath to C. D., of So-and-so, and E. F., of So-and-so, all my estate and effects. Upon Trust, to collect and get in the same, and invest the amount thereof at interest, for the benefit of my daughter Mary—, for her life, and after her death to divide the principal among such of the children of the said Mary—as shall be attaining the age of twenty-one; or in case there shall be but one to him or her, on his or her attaining the age of twenty-one; but if there shall be no children of the said Mary—, living at the time of her decease, then to pay over and divide the said principal sum as she shall by deed or will appoint. And I hereby nominate and appoint the said C. D. and E. F., to be executors of this my will." Dated this day of , 1853.

The signing must take place in the presence of two witnesses, who, without going out of the room, must sign the following: "Signed by the said A. B., the testatrix, in the presence of us, present at the same time, who, in her presence, and in the presence of each other, attest and subscribe our names as witnesses thereto."

LEPSOG.—Only the arms of prisoners capitally convicted are pinioned, and then only a few minutes before execution.

JULIA A. wishes to know if she can with propriety break off an engagement of very short duration, with a young man, when she has seen another she likes better, and who she thinks would make her more happy in the marriage state. Julia must be punished. She is not only fickle, but indiscreet. She should have sounded the depths of her heart before she entered into any engagement. She must abide by it, but probably the young man will be glad to be let off so easily.

THOMAS must peruse our last dozen numbers for instructions on will making. A testator may of course make his own will, but it is dangerous, and the lawyers like the fun. It used to be a standing toast in the profession: "The man who makes his own will." Employ a solicitor; don't run the risk of having it said after your death that you were "penny wise and pound foolish."

WILL SCARLET.—The tradition runs that the outlaw, Robin Hood, was the legitimate heir to the earldom of Huntingdon. The probability is that he was a clever fellow, and when the oppressed Saxons, in the Northern and Midland counties, took to the forest, to escape the tyranny of the Normans, he naturally became their leader. 2. An Irishman. 3. About five hundred.

JUVENIS.—Devote yourself to some study. Ascertain your bias, and then follow it. Desultory reading is only injurious when unaccompanied by application to something definite. The arts, sciences, and literature offer a thousand opportunities for self-culture in some particular branch. Your letter shows that you are a modest, sensible young man, and from the diction and the style of the handwriting, we should say you were not deficient in energy. Try! It is a little word, but it means everything that builds up and secures success in any undertaking.

CATHOLICUS desires to marry, and would be glad to meet with a Catholic young lady, between eighteen and twenty-four, of respectability and good education, with lady-like manners, domesticated habits, and a small income. He is twenty-eight years of age, of good family and education, and fond of home. He has been educated abroad, has travelled much, and flatters himself he would not be objected to as regards looks. His income at present is about £200 a year.

SINCERITY, a young lady of fortune, thinks she should like to marry, if she could meet with one that she could love and esteem. She would prefer him being rather tall, from twenty-five to thirty, of a truly affectionate and sincere disposition, and well-educated. She is dark, and considered good-looking; not very tall, of an amiable and cheerful disposition, well-educated, and, from all her tastes and habits, peculiarly adapted for a domestic life.

AMANDA is desirous of corresponding with "Challenger." She has just turned twenty-four, has received a good education, can speak French, and has a taste for music and singing. She flatters herself that she could make a husband happy. She has about £200 a year coming in from freehold property.

CAM, a gentleman thirty years of age, tall in stature, with dark, oval features, black eyes and hair, and generally considered good-looking, would be happy to correspond with a lady, with view to a matrimonial engagement. He is a professional gentleman (son of a highly distinguished officer), and moves in good society. The lady must be of an amiable temper, and if a little older than himself, it would not be considered an objection.

F. Y., a gentleman of respectability, without incumbrance, aged thirty-nine, tall, and good-looking, offers himself to "Ave Maria," who very disparagingly calls herself an ugly old maid. But he contends, and we fully agree with him, that many are the aspirants to matrimonial honours who cannot boast the honesty of purpose and true notions of happiness that the old maid can lay claim to. We should inquire the cause of their celibacy, before we rail at them for their misfortune: if we did, we should find, in a majority of cases, that higher and purer motives than the mere possession of a husband have caused, in a great measure, the loneliness of their state. How often does a premature death sever the beings, but not the hearts. How often is it that we find women preferring a single life to the misery consequent upon a mercenary marriage; and how often, too, may we not find them broken-hearted by man's caprice. The old maid, in our opinion, should be the object of our sympathy and respect, not ridicule.

The charming face, fine shape, and piercing eyes,
Sickness, or accident, or age destroys.
But she the fairest is, in whom we find
The sweetest graces of a pleasing mind:
These form the basis of a lasting love;
They charm when young, and will with age improve.

LETTERS RECEIVED.—Malvina (Lady Byron, the wife of the poet, is still living)—Kate F. (An unmarried lady may wear a ring on any finger. The only engaged finger is the wedding finger)—Edward Spencer (The towns and cities in the interior of the United States)—Drawing Room (An old nursery tale)—W. Moore (Not destitute of merit, but the spelling spoils it completely)—Thomas (A good, bold style of handwriting)—Telegraph (See our previous numbers)—G. R. Wiston (A case for a solicitor)—W. Undy (Cousins and half-cousins may lawfully marry)—W. C. S. (Good handwriting)—Walton Butler (Both are correct)—Tom King (Consult the advertising columns of the WEEKLY TIMES)—Topsy (Do not marry until he has given you twelve months' good conduct, as an assurance for the future)—J. T. G. (Old, very)—Lohs (Declined, with thanks)—A. Henderson (Being five feet nine and a half inches, you are eligible for the Royal Engineers' or Sappers and Miners' corps)—Ellen (We are sorry we cannot oblige you, but such questions are never answered in respectable journals)—H. R. (Nearly all the systems of short-hand in use are good. The selection is a matter of taste)—Zin (A debt is not recoverable after the lapse of six years)—P. T. O. (Squinting may be cured. There are various methods in practice—but go to an experienced oculist)—Felix (You may purchase a book on the "Art of Swimming," in any of the news-shops in Belfast)—G. J. B. (You are a grumbler)—J. S. O.—L. and C.—Charles—Charles Percut—Constant—Tibbie—Peggy and Janet—J. and T.—William Hill—David Gibber—A. B.—M. A. W.—Perseverance—Alpha—Alvario—Cris—Christina—Matilda—An Old Maid—A Lonely One—H. S. D.—Honourable—Celeste and Ise—Horace—Comus—Allegro—W. J. Hedgley—E. P. A.—Q. E. S.—Fielding—Constant—Circumstances—J. M. B.—Rogers and Lilly—T. F. C. Amato—Jane H.—Augustus—M. J.—E. J.—Agnes O.—Amo—W. C. B.—Rochester—Polly and Anna—Helen—Theodore—S. J. M.—A Yorkshireman—A. M.—W. C.—An Artisan—Mercator—Eliza—Martin L.—Constance and Juliana—M. and E.—Blanche and Geneva—Georgiana and Eliza—Candid—J. B. S.—T. L. C.—Montague Stewart—John Bradshaw—Sarah—Richards—Agnes Somers—Consuelo—Isolated—James—Anne—Alfred—B.—L. K. W.—A Lonely One—J. J. L. H.—S. B.—Charles—Margaret and Marian—Julian B.—J. H.—Ellen Montgomery—Mary and Effie—Harry L.—and S. King—Philos—Harry H.—Joseph Marshall—M. W. A.—Miss E. G.—Fanny Rosalind—Frank—C. H. and J. G.—Expectant—Charles Vere—B. R.—L. C.—T. N. Antonio—H. C. S.—A. B. C.—Emma Durham—Charles Harcourt—E. P.—George Leigh—J. C.—J. R.—Thomas Cummins.

THE LONDON JOURNAL:

And Weekly Record of Literature, Science, and Art.

No. 428.—VOL. XVII.]

FOR THE WEEK ENDING MAY 7, 1853.

[PRICE ONE PENNY.]

[RED RALPH EXHIBITING HIS JOY AT HAVING TRAPPED WILL SIDELER.]

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

THE JESUIT, "THE PRELATE," "MINNIGREY," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

What though no friends in sable weeds appear;
Grieve for an hour, perchance, and mourn a year,
And bear about the mockery of woe
To midnight dances and the public show.
What though no sacred earth allow thee room,
Or hallowed dirge be muttered o'er thy tomb,
Yet shall thy grave with rising flowers be drest,
And the green turf lie lightly o'er thy breast.

POPE.

THE first care of our hero, on reaching his hotel, was to shut himself in his chamber and peruse the packet which Martingale had given him on their last interview. With an endurance which an Indian fakir might have envied, he read the long-suppressed letters, one by one; not a groan or cry escaped him—he had wrought himself to bear that mental agony, that rending of the heart-strings, compared to which the body's sufferings are little heeded.

The unusual paleness which overspread his features, and a slight quivering of the lips, when he came to the detail of the murder of his benefactor, alone gave token of the storm of grief, indignation, and horror rising in his soul. This unnatural calmness was terrible as the pause which precedes the falling of the thunderbolt, or the explosion of the smouldering fires long pent in some volcano's breast.

"And I away!" he murmured, through his clenched teeth; "and I away!"

To his grief for the loss of Sir William, was added the maddening thought that Ellen was left exposed to the machinations of his rival, whom his heart instinctively designated as the author of so much misery. What would have been his feelings had he known all the trials to which she had been exposed—the treachery of Colonel Mowbray, and the persecution of Meeran? his reason must have sunk beneath the blow.

How deep and beautiful is the confidence which woman reposes in the honour of the man on whom she has bestowed her first affections! It requires years of unkindness and infidelity before her trusting nature can believe the unworthiness of the idol of her imagination. Even when conviction is forced upon her sickening heart, she hopes against hope, and trusts despite of reason; but when once the spell is really broken, no after promise can reunite the severed links.

Whilst the letters of the orphan expressed the deep anguish she endured at his silence, not one word betrayed a doubt of his faith: illness, treachery, even death, appeared more probable to her foreboding heart, than the falsehood of the love of her choice.

"Ellen—sweet Ellen!" he murmured, as he pressed the signature with passionate emotion to his lips; "I shall save thee yet from the trammels of the fiend who would destroy our happiness! The miserable, cowardly assassin!" he added; "would that my impatient spirit could annihilate the distance which divides us! Never till now did I feel hatred towards any human being: something whispers me that, when next we meet, the contest will be mortal!"

Seldom had one so young been placed in a more embarrassing position than Henry Ashton: but a few hours since, life seemed full of promise—now all was dark and clouded. Sir William Mowbray and his son—for such he felt assured was the tie between Walter and the baronet—were dead—each laid in an untimely grave by the hand of violence! Lady Mowbray, too, how could he break the mournful intelligence to her? How destroy her hope of being reunited to the husband of her youth—of clasping to her maternal breast her long-lost son?

The blow was doubly severe, falling at the moment when everything seemed to promise so brilliantly for the future.

He determined to consult the Duchess of Devonshire, and be guided by her advice: her woman's heart, he rightly judged, could best decide whether to break the mournful intelligence at once to the unhappy lady, or, in pursuance of his first intention, depart with her for England.

That same evening, he drove for the last time to the palace of her grace, in the Corso, and related to her sympathising ear the treachery of which he had been the victim.

"To England, instantly!" she exclaimed, speaking with that decision which takes counsel of the heart, not the brain; "lose not a moment—for that moment might place an eternal barrier between you and the object of your love! Colonel Mowbray I know to be as unscrupulous as he is cold and calculating. Still he is not so much to be feared as this Meeran Hafaz: the headlong passion of such a man o'erleaps every barrier of manhood and of honour!"

"And Lady Mowbray?" interrupted the young man.

The duchess paused for an instant before she replied.

"I will accompany her myself," she said; "it is not exactly the moment I should have selected to revisit my native land—but sooner or later my affairs must have taken me there."

"You think, then," inquired her visitor, "that, even under present circumstances—the death of her husband and the loss of her son, for such I am convinced Walter was to her—the voyage should be made?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Alas! what has she to hope?"

"The clearing of her fame from the calumny which has clouded it," replied the duchess; "and perhaps the discovery of her son—for I am far from feeling the conviction which you possess, that Walter was that son. Colonel Mowbray is not the man to have shown even such poor justice to his brother's heir, as to adopt him for his own."

"Surely you do not think him capable of having murdered the infant?" exclaimed Henry, with a shudder.

"No," replied her grace, after a moment's reflection; "he is one of those who temper cruelty with prudence—who calculate the future as well as the present. The crime might not appal him, but the danger would. He may have concealed his nephew—banished him to a foreign land—caused him to be reared in ignorance and poverty; but he has not destroyed him."

The conviction was too deeply rooted in the breast of her visitor to yield to the opinion of the speaker, unsupported as it was by evidence of any kind; respect alone kept him from replying to her. Before taking his leave, he learned with astonishment that both her grace and Sir Thomas Lawrence had for several days possessed proofs of his benefactor's death, but that they had determined upon withholding them from him till the result of the appeal to Pius VII., respecting Lady Mowbray, should be known.

In making his adieux to that unhappy lady, he explained to her that the death of his friend compelled his immediate return to England, where he would prepare for her reception. Poor fellow! his heart swelled with emotion as he listened to her anticipations of once more meeting the husband of her youth, without a cloud upon her fair fame. He could not undeceive her—he left that task to the sympathising friendship of the warm-hearted Duchess of Devon hire.

It was time that he took his leave—his tears and agitation almost betrayed him. One task only remained previous to his departure from the Eternal City—it was to consign the body of Walter to its last resting-place, in the burial-ground set apart for Protestants and strangers, near the pyramid of Caius Cestus.

At an early hour the following morning, the wretched Martingale was conducted for the last time before his judges. He had been taken almost in the commission of the act for which he was about to suffer, and for once Italian justice was as rapid as it was well directed. The attempt which he had made upon his life determined the members of the Holy Office at once to proceed to execution—every moment of his life was numbered.

The hall, as usual on such occasions, was hung with black, relieved only by the large ivory crucifix suspended over the chair of the inflexible Micara, who presided. Groups of apparitors and officials were standing at the lower end of the apartment, the doors of which were guarded by a party of carabineers, under the command of the lieutenant of the Governor of Rome.

It was his duty to receive the prisoner from the hands of the members of the tribunal—who, being priests, could not pronounce a sentence involving the shedding of blood, it being against the canons of the Catholic Church.

On an arm-chair at the foot of the dais, the Governor of Rome himself was seated. It was his province to act as doomster—or, in other words, to pronounce the judgment of the Holy Office.

The criminal bowed with his usual grace when led into the hall. He knew very well the purpose for which he was brought there, but not even the approach of death could disturb the serenity of his manner. Had it been possible, he would have abridged, brief as they were, the intervening hours.

The secretary of the Holy Office read the decree by which the judges, finding the prisoner, Robert Martingale, guilty of the crime of blood, consigned him to the secular arm to deal with him. He concluded by adding the usual recommendation to mercy.

The governor rose, and asked the prisoner if he had anything to urge why sentence of death should not be pronounced against him.

"Nothing," replied Martingale, with a bitter smile; "for it would avail me little here, or I might ask your right to punish one murder by another—for the taking of human life is murder, no matter what mockeries and superstitious forms accompany the act; but I do not wish to prate," he added; "give Rome its holiday!"

"Say, rather," interrupted the governor, to whom the prisoner's observations were anything but pleasing, "justice its due. I am not here to defend the law, but to pronounce its judgment: which is, that at the hour of noon you be led into the Piazza del Popolo, and there beheaded on the public scaffold; your body to be interred in the common moat, without the city walls!"

"It will rest as well there," said the condemned man, coolly. "as under the dome of St. Peter's. I have been too difficult in the choice of my habitation while living, to care much about my resting-place when dead!"

The condemned man was instantly removed from the prison of the Holy Office to that of the city, where the governor informed him that, if he wished it, a priest of his own faith might be permitted privately to visit him. The offer was politely but firmly declined.

No sooner was it known in Rome that the execution of an Englishman was about to take place, than the city poured forth its motley population of artists, travellers, monks, artisans, and tradesmen; spectators of a higher rank were not wanting. Strange that such a magnetic power should exist in the horror excited by the fearful spectacle of a public death: its influence is frequently felt by the strongest mind, and even those whose humanity or sensibility shrinks from the sight of human suffering, feel a strange fascination in listening to the tale.

To the honour of the Italian women, there were but few of the gentler sex gathered in the magnificent square: the desire of marking the last struggles of the victim to outraged justice, of counting its agonies and tears, is not one of the morbid tastes which can be laid to their charge, whatever other faults truth must assign them.

At a short distance from the scaffold were a party of Englishmen, many of whom had been acquainted with the condemned both at home and in Italy. The crime for which he was about to suffer had destroyed all sympathy for his fate: they attended, as they might at any other spectacle, merely to see him die. Several began to look impatiently at their watches; as the hour drew near, the excitement increased.

"This will be strange news at Newmarket!" observed a sporting baronet, who had taken the odds that Martingale would die game.

"I can't understand the affair," added the gentleman with whom the first speaker had betted; "always thought him a shrewd fellow—never knew him make his book so blunderingly before!"

"Th' usual case, I suppose," said a retired dandy; "a woman!"

"The beautiful Therese Colonna!" exclaimed one.

"No; the divine Pauline! Mowbray was eternally at the Villa Borghese," pronounced a second.

"Not more than his friend Ashton!" added another.

The speculations and surmises of the speakers were suddenly hushed—the measured tramp of approaching cavalry was heard advancing along the Corso: in a few minutes, the escort which surrounded the vehicle containing the prisoner and the officers of police who guarded him, entered the piazza at a sharp trot.

The Romans—who were accustomed to see not only the brothers of the Order of Mercy, but troops of Franciscans and other friars, accompany the condemned wretch to the place of execution, filling his ears with exhortations, and the air with psalms and prayers—were inexpressibly shocked at the absence of the holy fathers on the present occasion.

"Cospetto!" muttered one of the porters of the Ripetta, "I have often heard that the English die like dogs, but never believed it till now!"

One of his neighbours observed that the criminal was a heretic; but even this reason, generally so unanswerable to an Italian, failed to convince the faguino, whose sympathy was sharpened by the recollection of the many scudi he had received from the countrymen of the assassin.

"Heretic or not," he replied, "their prayers could have done him no harm, and would have been but a mark of politeness to the Inglesi, who spend so much money in Rome!"

The instant the carriage reached the foot of the scaffold, Martingale descended, and, after a few brief words to the greffier, who demanded if he had any declaration to make, ascended the fatal planks. The instrument by which he was to suffer was the guillotine—first introduced at Rome by the French in the time of Napoleon, and almost the only improvement of his administration which has been retained; but its superiority over the brutal and clumsy apparatus previously in use, was too apparent even for a government of priests to avoid acknowledging it.

Before being strapped to the fatal plank, which turns upon a pivot, and then slides in a groove, till the head of the victim is brought under the fatal knife, Martingale looked slowly round upon the vast multitude assembled to witness his death. A very slight flush suffused his cheek as he recognised several of his former fashionable friends in the group of his fellow-countrymen, which the officers had permitted to stand within the line of soldiers formed around the scaffold. It was a delicate attention paid to their nationality. Englishmen have the reputation on the continent of seeking sensations in the terrible rather than the intellectual and beautiful—hunting after morbid excitement, instead of healthful pleasure; of course we mean morally and physically.

The murderer waved his hand to his quondam associates with the same careless grace that he would have done in the park or mall; and then, turning to the group around him, demanded which was the executioner.

A little, withered old man, dressed in a rusty suit of black, stepped forward.

"I am," he said, "at the service of your excellency." Martingale smiled bitterly: a being whose strength, compared to his own, was as that of an infant—a thing he could have crushed and trampled on—armed with the fearful authority of the law, stood ready to consign him to the grave. Tossing his purse to him, he said, in a firm tone:

"What you have to do, do quickly!" "Si signor!" exclaimed the fellow, clutching the gold; "you shall not wait an instant."

At a sign from their chief, his assistants led the wretched victim of pride and ambition to the plank: he was strapped to it in an instant, and pushed into the groove. The instant his head was inclosed in a circle made to receive it, the last minister of justice pulled a small cord: the knife descended with a sharp, hissing sound, and the head of the murderer fell in the basket, filled with sawdust, which stood ready to receive it.

"You have lost!" said the baronet, coolly addressing the gentleman who had given him long odds. "Martingale died game."

This was the fitting epitaph of a man whose talents and energies had been applied to an honourable career, might have achieved distinction and fortune. Misdirected, they led him, step by step, down the abyss of crime, till outraged society avenged itself in his death and degradation.

At the hour of sunset, that same evening, two funerals took place in the environs of Rome. One was attended only by a few officials, who consigned, without prayer or ceremony, the corpse of the murderer to a deep pit, dug in the remains of a moat which formerly surrounded the city walls. The unhallowed resting-place was hastily filled with the earth and stones which had been cast from it, and those who had been present retired from the spot as men retire from the fulfilment of an unpleasant duty. Not a benison was uttered over it, or a single tear shed to consecrate the grave.

The simple but sublime prayers of the English church had been pronounced over the final resting-place of the noble-hearted Walter Mowbray, whose remains were deposited in a simple grave at the foot of the pyramid of Caius Cestus. The clergyman and mourners had all withdrawn, save Henry Ashton, who lingered in the burial-ground, unwilling that any human eyes should witness the weakness of his sorrows—the tears sacred to friendship and to virtue.

There was a stillness in the air, a solitude in the scene, which affected the imagination far more powerfully than the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault of the most magnificent temple—a silence and a solitude which is only felt when the spirit is suffering and lonely.

"But for one tie—only one," he murmured, "how gladly would I have done with life, and rest beside thee! The world may give me other friends, but not a friend like thee! Thy memory shall rest enshrined in my heart, dear Walter, and the recollections of thy virtues shall embalm it!"

"There is another tie," he added, after a pause, "which binds me still to earth—revenge. My benefactor and my friend—father and son—from their untimely graves call on me to pursue it. Here, by this hallowed dust—by Him, whose name you stars pronounce, whose might the roaring sea or tempest's breath alike make manifest—I do devote my soul to its fulfilment! Tears shall be henceforth weakness: when I have avenged their murder, there will be time to mourn them!"

Our hero knelt, and, in the excitement of the moment, pressed his lips to the fresh-turned earth upon the grave of Walter; then, as if fearing to trust his firmness by further delay, he slowly left the burial-ground.

There was something terrible in the air of confidence and calm resolution which marked his manner—every energy of his young heart seemed concentrated in one powerful passion—hatred. Could the author of so much misery have heard the vow, and witnessed the look which accompanied it, even he might have trembled.

By daybreak the following morning, Henry Ashton left the Eternal City, on his way to England, as fast as four fleet horses could bear him along the Appian Way. He determined to travel day and night—to deny himself even a moment's rest till he once more stood upon his native strand: once there, he felt the rest was easy.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

The toils are loosened, but not broken;
They may knit again, closing the victim
In their meshes.

OLD PLAY.

WHEN Ellen recovered from the swoon into which the terror and excitement of the scene she had encountered had thrown her, she found herself reposing on a bed, in a plain, but comfortably furnished chamber, attended by an aged female, whose respectable air and matron-like appearance were in themselves sufficient to inspire confidence.

"Where am I?" she demanded, casting a look of terror round the apartment, as if she dreaded to encounter the glance of her relentless persecutor.

"Where you are safe, my dear young lady—quite safe, replied the female; "under the protection of my master!"

At the word master, the orphan shuddered—for her fears reverted to Meeran Hafaz or the colonel.

"His name?" "I do not know it," answered the woman; "but do not let that alarm you! I know that he is good, although his conduct may appear strange; he has been most anxious on your account!"

"I must see him!" exclaimed the agitated girl; "hear from his own lips all I have either to hope or fear! Suspense," she added, with an hysterical burst of grief, "destroys me!"

Before the party to whom she had addressed herself could answer, there was a gentle tap at the door of the room.

"It is my master," said the attendant; "fear nothing—you will find in him a father!"

Without waiting for the assent of her charge, she disappeared in the passage, and, after a few hastily whispered words, returned, followed by a tall man, of middle age, and a severe, but benevolent cast of countenance. Despite her alarm, Ellen could not avoid being struck by the dignity of his appearance: a beard, which time had already partially silvered, descended to his breast.

After the description we have given, we need scarcely inform our readers that her preserver was the Khan. He, too, like Elworthy, had been upon the watch, and fortunately arrived in time to save her.

"Whom have I to bless or fear?" demanded the orphan, fixing her eyes with an imploring expression upon him.

"A friend," answered the renegade, mildly; "who has indeed proved himself one, by breaking the long familiar ties of human love which bound him to your persecutor! Fear not," he added, taking her gently by the hand, and speaking in a soothing tone; "you are safe! I would not abandon to its enemies the meanest of God's creatures that had sought the shelter of my roof, far less one whom heaven must love, and manhood is bound to guard!"

"You are the friend, then—the generous, unknown being—whom the physician named to me?"

The renegade replied to her only by a smile. "Bless you!" she continued; "heaven bless you for your kindness to one whom all seem to have forgotten! Tears must be my thanks—I cannot speak as I ought; but He who has promised to be a father to the fatherless, will recompense you for your generous protection!"

"May He accept it," said the Khan, who felt pained at listening to his own praise, "as an atonement for my cruel wrongs towards one who would have watched over your safety as the guardian angel watches the soul committed to his charge!"

These words, perhaps incautiously uttered, plunged the still excited Ellen in a train of thought which nearly shook her reason. Was it possible, she asked herself, that he alluded to her dead uncle? and if so, what was the nature of the wrongs he named—could it be murder?

"You mean Sir William Mowbray?" she almost shrieked.

"You are —"

"Sir William Mowbray!" hastily interrupted the Khan, at once perceiving her suspicion. "No, young lady—no I would have defended him with my life! The child he loved is not more innocent of his blood than I am. More than twenty years have elapsed," he added, with a sigh, "since I beheld him."

The tone in which these words were uttered carried conviction with them; the eye of the speaker was untroubled, and his voice firm and clear, as that which an approving conscience gives.

"Thank heaven!" sobbed Ellen, relieved from a fearful terror. "Forgive me that I wronged you!"

Her next inquiries were for her friends, the faithful Susan and her lover, who had risked so much to save her. Her mysterious protector answered by the assurance of his belief that they were safe. The honest rustic, he observed, was not one to be easily taken and, as for Susan—with all his vices and storms of passion, Meeran Hafaz was incapable of injuring a woman. The heart of the young Indian, he felt assured, was not yet corrupt enough for that.

He next persuaded his guest to take a draught which he had prepared, promising her that the female, whose presence seemed to Ellen a protection, should not quit her side. The orphan received it with grateful confidence from his hand: so much kindness and sympathy, she felt assured, could not be the mask to deceit or cruelty.

"In the morning," he said, "I will seek your friends; by that time they will have returned to London. I shall doubtless hear of them at Lawyer Elworthy's."

The name of the man whom Sir William Mowbray had trusted, appeared to Ellen as an additional proof of his sincerity; and she felt, as he left the chamber, as if she had parted from a friend.

"I have heard his voice before!" she thought; "it returns like the memory of my childhood's dream, or some long-forgotten strain. Where could it have been? in India? Yes—yes! it must have been in India!"

Vainly she endeavoured to render her recollections more distinct: her overwrought brain gradually yielded to the narcotic which the renegade had prepared, and she sank into the arms of Nature's nurse—a sweet, refreshing sleep.

Hail, blessed sleep! thine is the gifted spell
To wake in shadows scenes remembered well;
To set the chained imagination free,
And paint, in rainbow hues, what's e'er might be.
Visions of bliss with thoughts of earth combine,
And form a whole half human, half divine.

In her dreams the sufferer was happy: the scenes of her youth appeared again. She saw the eyes of affection beaming upon hers; kind, familiar faces smiled upon her; Henry and Sir William, too, were there; and she felt happy—oh, how happy! her heart appeared to have recovered all it had ever loved or mourned. No hideous image marred the pleasing picture.

Such dreams are like the reflection of a pure and virtuous mind, seen in a mirror, ere passion's breath has sullied it—they are given to the innocent alone.

The Khan had rightly judged, when he supposed that the lawyer and his friends, once assured of the failure of their scheme, would not remain an hour longer than was necessary in the neighbourhood of Cromwell House, to brave the wrath of Meeran. Before, however, they quitted Mortlake, Joe Beans arranged with Ralph to watch the proceedings of its inmates. The lad promised to bring him daily intelligence to the office of Mr. Elworthy. He ran little risk in doing so; for, to use his own words, it was no easy thing to bar him from the old, crumbling mansion. He knew each turn and hiding-place it contained much better than his prayers.

At daybreak, the disappointed friends of the orphan returned to London, which they reached at an early hour. Susan was heart-broken at the failure of their scheme, which had promised so fairly; and poor, faithful Joe was little less dispirited than herself.

"I promised Master Harry," he said, "that I would watch over her and protect her—and I have broken my word. If any misfortune happens—I shall never be able to look him in the face again. He would have died rather than have deceived me!"

"It is indeed most unfortunate!" exclaimed the lawyer, who had been perusing the letters which had arrived during his absence. "Dr. Orme, on whose promise I relied to second my application to the Chancellor, has left England."

"Left England!" repeated the rustic friend of our hero, with an air of astonishment. "Parson gone to furrin parts!"

"To Italy," added Mr. Elworthy, with an air of vexation; "at such a moment, too! Little does he dream of the mischief his presence will occasion!"

"It is in the right!" exclaimed Joe, with a cry of joy. "Parson be always right; he will bring Master Harry back; and then I should like to see who will keep Miss Ellen from him!"

The man of law shook his head despondingly: he had not the same confidence in the presence of our hero as the speaker.

"I thought," he said, addressing his senior clerk, who entered the private office where they were seated, without being summoned, "that I gave orders not to be disturbed?"

"So I told the gentlemen, sir," replied the man, submissively; "but he would not take a refusal!"

"What gentlemen?" hastily demanded his employer.

"A strange one" continued the scribe; "for he looks more like a heathen, with his long black hair, than a Christian! And yet," he added, "he must be a gentleman—he speaks with as much authority as a peer. Tell your master, he said, 'that I bring him intelligence which he will be glad to hear, touching the circumstance which at the present moment most occupies his mind!'"

"See him!" whispered Joe, struck by the speaker's description of the visitor; "it must be the Khan!"

"And who is the Khan?" inquired the lawyer.

This was more than our honest friend could inform him; all he knew was, that he had, on more than one occasion, shown himself friendly to Henry Ashton, and that, in his judgment, was a guarantee for every other virtue.

"Admit him," said the man of law; "it is a faint hope, but in our present position we must not cast the least chance aside."

The renegade entered the office with his usual calm deliberate step. Mr. Elworthy felt that he was about to hold communication with no common person.

"Your business, sir?" he inquired, after having pointed to a chair.

Before making a reply, his singular visitor scanned the countenances of all present. Turning towards the clerk, whom curiosity kept lingering in the room, he silently pointed to the door.

"Go!" said his employer; "I will ring, should I require your services."

As soon as the fellow had withdrawn, the old man took the proffered seat.

"You were at Mortlake," he began, "last night?"

"Before I answer that question," replied the cautious man of law, "I must first learn your motive."

"I came," continued the Khan, "to discuss facts, not motives! I need not observe to one of your experience, that the latter are too often confounded with pretexts."

"I was at Mortlake," said Mr. Elworthy, more and more puzzled by the manner of his visitor.

"And these persons with you?"

"Yes."

"He knows all about it!" exclaimed Joe, with a faint smile; for he began to entertain a vague hope from the visit of the stranger. "Best tell him all, Master Lawyer!"

"Where you attempted," resumed the renegade, "to carry off Miss De Vere from the guardianship of her uncle, her only legal protector: are you aware of the consequences of such a step?"

"He has abused his rights shamefully—infamously abused them!" exclaimed the legist; "and my conscience acquits me."

"I thought, sir," once more interrupted his visitor, "I told you that I came to discuss facts, not motives. That yours are known to me, my presence here is sufficient proof; and if I alluded to the risk you have run in acting as you have, it was to justify my own caution—perhaps to test yours. I am aware of the sufferings Miss De Vere has endured, and the dangers she has escaped!"

"Escaped!" shouted the attached friend of our hero, starting from his seat, and clasping the speaker by the hand; "did 'ee say escaped? Say it again, and I'll kneel and worship 'ee!"

"Escaped!" repeated the Khan.

Joe's joy became so wild and boisterous, that it was some moments before the conversation could be renewed. In his transports he embraced Susan, kissed away her tears, asked what she was crying for, and declared "that he could not Master Harry now without shame." In the exuberance of happiness, he could even have embraced the lawyer and the messenger of so much joy.

"This is indeed a happy event!" exclaimed the former of the last-named personages; "for never, in the course of my professional career, have my feelings been more deeply interested! May I ask where the niece of my late client is concealed?"

"To be sure thee may!" hastily interrupted Joe. "He be too good to keep her from her friends; I knowed thee hadst a looking towards Master Harry! From the night of Sir William's burial, I have not forgotten what thee saidst, when —"

This was addressed to the Khan, who, whatever confidence had passed between himself and the speaker, did not wish it to be repeated in the hearing of Mr. Elworthy. Perhaps he feared that the astute mind of the lawyer might draw inferences, and put questions which neither his former regard nor oath to Meeran Hafaz permitted him to answer.

"It was for that purpose," he said, interrupting him, "that I came to seek you; the health of the young lady is already severely shaken—the presence of her friends will prove more beneficial than even the skill of the physicians."

The thoughts of seeing the object of Henry Ashton's affection—the being he had promised his absent friend to guard and watch over—so completely diverted the current of the thoughts of the honest rustic, that he quite forgot the allusion he was about to make. Not so the man of law—he had noted his words, and treasured them for a future occasion.

It was finally arranged that the party should leave the chambers in the temple directly, and proceed by water to London Bridge, by which means they trusted to avoid the danger of being followed. From thence they could take a coach to the retreat of the renegade.

When, at a late hour, Ellen awoke from the refreshing slumber which had lasted so many hours, the first person she saw at the side of her couch was Susan, smiling through her tears. At first the orphan imagined herself to be still dreaming, but the warm drops which fell upon her hand, as the faithful girl covered it with kisses, assured her her happiness was real.

"Saved—saved!" she murmured, in mental thanksgiving; "but where is your lover—Henry's true and only friend? Is he, too, safe?"

Susan assured her that he was, and poor Joe—who had been listening at the door to assure himself, by hearing her voice, that the object of his solicitude was really there—hastily retreated.

"She called me his friend!" he said, as he dashed aside the tears which he feared disclosed his melancholy; "if colored or the Indian Meeran caught to hear her again, or separate her from Harry, I'd shoot 'em as I would a couple of wild cats, though I hang for it the next minute!"

So saying, he descended to the lower apartment, where the Khan and Lawyer Elworthy were deeply engaged in conversation.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

How weak a man can still a woman's blow,
When Providence has made her hand so true,
The avenger, who is meted by a foe.

—MILTON.

ALTHOUGH Ambler, the schoolmaster of Mortlake, had pronounced that Nature had done to that Ralph the faculty of imagination, to make amends, she had amply endowed him with the quality of cunning. The boy wisely suffered two or three days to elapse, before he ventured to approach the scene of his late exploits. He was fearful of being recognised, for he was quite shrewd enough to know that the transactions he had witnessed were of no ordinary character; and he felt an instinctive presentiment of danger, should he fall into the hands of those whose schemes he had attempted to baffle.

He first ventured cautiously to approach the offices, which he entered by one of those unsuspected ways known only to himself: there, safely ensconced in the loft over the apartment of the groom, he took a survey of the mansion, and noticed with pleasure that, of the innumerable chimneys, one only gave token of being used.

"Gentlefolks be gone!" he muttered, with a grin of satisfaction; "there be only some one left to take care of place."

Emboldened by this discovery, he next crept to the house, which, according to his usual practice, he entered from one of the skylights in the roof, immediately over the chambers lately occupied by the domestics of Meeran Hafaz and the colonel. Everything was in that state of confusion which denotes a hasty departure; the furniture out of place, and in most admired disorder.

From the servants' rooms he descended to the principal apartments—the fires were all extinguished. In the saloon he saw several letters scattered carelessly upon the table: these he eagerly seized, and stuffed into his pocket.

"All gone!" he kept repeating to himself—"all gone! The old house and I may keep company together!"

So convinced was he that the place was no longer tenanted, that he made his way boldly, by the great staircase, to the ground floor. He had forgotten the solitary stream of smoke which he had seen issuing from the chimney of the kitchen—he even began to whistle. The imprudence nearly cost him his life, for it attracted the attention of Will Sidelers, who had been left to take charge of the place.

No sooner did the ruffian catch the sound, than, arming himself with a large knife, he rose from his seat in the kitchen, and crept cautiously along the passages till he reached the great hall, into which the dining-room opened. This was the work of some little time, from his lameness—for he had only partially recovered from the effects of the severe chastisement he had received at the hands of Meeran Hafaz. A grin of savage pleasure divided his thin lips, as he peered into the room, and discovered the boy seated at the table, devouring the remains of his own breakfast.

Determined this time not be disappointed of his prey, he slipped off his shoes, that his footfall might not startle the lad, whose back was turned towards him.

Fortunately for poor Ralph, he was seated directly opposite a large mirror, which reflected not only his own delicate person, but the entrance to the dining-room, and a portion of the passage beyond. He was in the act of raising the bone of a fowl to his capacious mouth, when his arm became momentarily arrested by terror: he distinctly saw in the glass the warren, with the knife in his hand, stealing on tiptoe behind him.

At that moment the instinct of self-preservation served him better than imagination. He rapidly glided from his seat, and disappeared under the long table, which, when he rose again, was placed, by this manoeuvre, between him and his enemy.

Sidelers, with equal tact, concealed the weapon he carried in his sleeve.

No sooner did the lad find a barrier between himself and the warren, than he recovered his former courage; for he felt assured that, in a contest of agility, the old man would be but a poor match for him: the great danger was the possibility of his once placing his iron grasp upon him.

"What does 'ee want wi' I?" he demanded.

"What are you doing here?" replied the ruffian, endeavouring at the same time not to look too ferociously, for he perceived his disadvantage. "If I were not one of the best natured fellows in the world, I should send you to prison for breaking into the house."

"Thee dare not!" exclaimed Ralph, with a saucy look.

"Dare not?"

"Nay, dare not!"

"And why so?" demanded the old man, eager to learn how much, or how little, the urchin knew or suspected of the late transactions at Cromwell House.

"Cos I'd tell Squire Justice of the pretty lady that wor prisoner here; and how thee tried to serve out the maid, and all about the black woman that frightened I so!"

"Indeed!"

"Ees, indeed!—thee beest nation 'outo—but I," added Ralph, "am 'cuter! I heard old lawyer say he should live to see thee hanged!"

The brow of Will Sidelers grew dark, as he listened to the taunting words of the lad: his rage was not unmixed with alarm, for he rightly judged that the lawyer could have been no other than Mr. Elworthy, who had so nearly been his victim.

"Hanged!" he repeated, with a laugh; "a likely story, indeed! What should I be hanged for?"

"I don't know," answered Ralph; "murder, most likely!"

"Murder?"

"Ees—thee hast committed more nor one, I reckon does thee think I didn't see the knife in thee hand as thee crept like a thief, or summat worse, behind me?"

Finding that his purpose was discovered, the ruffian made a sudden spring at the speaker—but Ralph was too nimble for him: he dived rapidly under his arm, sprang over the table, and rushed through the door, into the hall, unfortunately the French windows which opened upon the lawn were closed: with great presence of mind, the boy next tried the folding-doors which communicated with the staircase he had so lately descended: to his confusion, he found that the warren, in his way from the kitchen, had taken the precaution to lock them.

"You can't escape!" exclaimed the ruffian, who had followed closely upon his steps; "I have trapped too many such vermin in my time, to be baffled by such as you! You may as well give in—I won't hurt you!"

Ralph, however, was of a different opinion; perhaps the last assurance did not appear sufficiently satisfactory. The poor fellow knew that his only chance of escape was by the kitchen—if that was secured, all would be over with him. Fortunately, he remembered the trap in the floor of the passage which conducted to it—it was his only chance of safety.

"I beant caught yet!" he doggedly answered; "there be many who go out shearing, as old master used to say, and return shorn!"

Darting down the corridor, he had time to raise the trap before Will Sidelier reached the entrance: it was so obscure, from the closing of the shutters and doors of the hall, that the ruffian did not perceive the abyss at his feet, but pursued his way, uttering curses and fearful menaces. It would have fared ill at that moment with poor Ralph, if the ruffian had succeeded in laying his powerful grasp upon him; for, when excited by resistance, like all cowardly natures, he became cruel and ferocious.

"It be all useless!" he shouted to the flying boy; the doors are securely locked, and the keys—"

There was a break in the voice, and the noise of a heavy body falling from a distance—then a groan or two, and all was still.

Ralph instantly paused, and began to dance and grin with delight. It would have been difficult to tell whether he felt more pleasure in having outwitted his pursuer, or escaping from his clutches.

"Trapped!" he exclaimed; "I ha' trapped un at last!"

He returned towards the corridor, and, carefully feeling his way to the edge of the trap, peered down the abyss—it was too dark for him to distinguish any object.

"Holloa!" he shouted while does 'ee think now?"

A groan was the only reply.

"Beest 'ee hurt?"

Still no answer.

"Well," said Ralph, "I'll seek out lawyer gentleman and his friend—they'll find a way to make 'ee speak, I warrant me!"

As he was about to turn back the trap-door, the voice of the warren restrained him.

"I have broken my leg!" he said.

"Won't do!" replied the boy; "I ha' jumped down dozens o' times, and never hurted myself; it won't do!"

He forgot the difference between a man of Will Sidelier's weight, unexpectedly falling from a height of twelve feet, and the act of leaping down, by a slight youth like himself.

"I tell you," repeated the ruffian, with a bitter curse, "that my leg is broken!"

"Pity it wasn't thee neck!" answered the lad, who did not believe him; "but it will come to that at last!"

"Send for help!"

"For the justice thee mean'st! that be the only help thee wilt get from me!" So saying, the speaker left all the door, and the ruffian was left to his agony, darkness, and his own reflections.

Ralph's joy was something like that of the man who had caged a tiger, and, when he had caught him, did not know what to do with him. In this dilemma, he decided on making the best of his way to London; find out Joe Beans, who had given him the address of Lawyer Elworthy; and confide the affair, which now began to assume a serious aspect, to him.

"If I have broke his leg," he thought, "it would serve un right: he would have done worse to me! They can't hang I for it, do what they will!"

Shortly after, he left the house, and started for London. He did not find his way to the Temple, where the chambers of the worthy lawyer were situated, till after office hours: consequently he could not obtain an interview with Joe that night.

"No matter!" thought Ralph; "I ha' brass—and gowd, too, for the matter o' that—in my pocket; and I can as well stay here!"

So saying, he made the best of his way to a public house, in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden, which he had frequently visited with the market gardeners from Mortlake, and where he knew he could procure a bed for the night.

"I wonder," he thought, with a grin of satisfaction, as he devoured a plate of beef and potatoes, "how old man likes his quarters—he mun be tarnation hungry!"

Several times the question returned to him, and he began to think that, after all, he might get into difficulties through his meddling with the warren.

At a very early hour the following morning, Ralph presented himself at the office in the Temple. Mr. Elworthy, in anticipation of his visits, had given strict orders to the clerks that the lad should be at once admitted to his presence, or, in the event of his absence, detained till his return. Fortunately, however, the lawyer was already there when his visitor arrived.

"Well, my lad!" he said, pointing to him to take a seat; "you bring me some intelligence from Mortlake?"

"Noa, sir!" replied the lad; "I ha' brought nothing!"

"I mean," said the gentleman, with a smile, "that you have something to tell me?"

"Ees, I have; but where be Mr. Beans?"

"Absent, at the house of a friend."

"Oh, then he don't live here?" observed Ralph, with a sigh.

"No; why do you inquire?"

"Nothing, sir!" hastily answered the boy, who had a secret terror of lawyers, and trembled at the idea of being questioned; "still, I should loike to see him!"

Struck by his impertinence, and partly guessing the cause of his reserve, Elworthy rang the bell, and directed the clerk who answered it to take a note to an address which he gave him, and accompany the person whom he should find there back to the office.

"Mr. Beans will soon be here!" he said, as soon as the man had left the room.

This piece of intelligence seemed wonderfully to relieve the mind of his visitor, who gradually became more communicative. He even went so far as to mention his visit to Cromwell House—his encounter with the warren, his escape—but not a word of the trap or its consequences.

"The family, then," observed Mr. Elworthy, "have left?"

"Ees, sir!"

"Are you quite certain?"

"They be all gone but the old man," replied the boy.

"And perhaps by this time," said the gentleman, pettishly, "he has left, too?"

Ralph began to grin. He knew that he had him safe enough.

"I trust it is not the case," continued the speaker; "I would give something rather than lose such a chance of laying hold of him!"

"Would 'ee, though?" demanded the boy.

"I would!"

"How much would 'ee give?"

"Fifty pounds, at least, my man!"

"Fifty pounds!" repeated Ralph. "What, fifty gowden sovereigns?"

"Even so."

"Give them to me, then," continued his visitor. "Egad, my fortin is made! for I ha' got un—I ha' got un!"

To the great astonishment of the lawyer, his visitor threw his cap into the air, and began to dance, like a newly-liberated bear, round the apartment.

"Got who?" impatiently demanded Mr. Elworthy.

"The old man—the chap you and Mr. Beans call the warren. He be safe enough!"

"But he may escape?"

"Not out of my trap!" exclaimed the lad, with a grin; "not out of my trap!"

(To be continued in our next.)

ANECDOTE OF A RING.

HANNIBAL, it is said, in terror of falling into the hands of his enemies, always carried poison in a ring, and by means of it, after his defeat and flight into Bithynia, disappointed the hopes of the Romans, by destroying himself.

That such might have been the case, is clearly proved by the capabilities of the Russian lady's ring (mentioned in Thiebauld's "Original Anecdotes of Frederic II."), which concealed a small syringe, and which she very offensively made use of as follows: "While the French minister, M. de Guines, was astonishing the court of Berlin with the grandeur he conferred on his legation (a circumstance extremely mortifying to men of the same rank, unable to keep pace with his profusion), a Russian ambassador, on his way to Petersburg with his newly-married wife, arrived at Berlin. The lot of presenting him at court, &c., fell to the Prince Dolgorouki, who gave a splendid dinner to all the ambassadors, at which M. de Guines was placed by the side of the lady, who was aware of the existing rivalry, and anxious, it would seem, as there was no competing with him, to render him ridiculous. The ring alluded to was of great beauty, and curious workmanship—circumstances to which she invited the French nobleman's attention during dinner: and while he was stooping down to examine it, she pressed a small spring, which was turned to the inside of her hand, and spouted the small quantity of water the syringe contained, into his eyes. The latter laughed, rallied her with great good-nature, wiped his face, and thought no more of it; but the lady again filled the syringe without his perceiving her, and (while pretending to wish to speak across him to some one near them) discharged its contents again in his face. The minister, without appearing the least angry or out of countenance, in a tone such as we use when we give a piece of friendly advice, observed: "These kind of jokes, madam, on the first experiment may be laughed at; on the second, we may be inclined to consider them as the thoughtless act of youthful gaiety, particularly in a lady; but, madam, the third time could be deemed nothing less than an affront, and you would at that very instant receive in exchange this goblet of water that stands before me: I have, madam, the honour to give you proper notice."

But the lady, imagining he would not dare to execute his threat, filled her ring again, and, holding up the glittering engine, emptied it as before in the face of the ambassador, who instantly seized his goblet of water, and threw it over her, calmly observing: "I had given you notice, madam."

The Russian husband took his share of the adventure by declaring that M. de Guines had done exactly what was right, and that he thanked him for it; and while the lady left the table to change her dress, her friends prevailed on the remainder of the company to keep the incident to themselves. It was M. Dinot de Jopecourt (says the writer) who communicated the circumstance to me as a great secret, on the evening of the day on which it happened.

In reading this anecdote, one scarcely knows which to be most surprised at, the childishness or the rudeness of the transaction. One thing, however, it proves, that poison could as readily be concealed in a ring as water, and especially the subtle poisons of antiquity and the East; the use to which Hannibal put his, therefore, becomes the less extraordinary, particularly when we remember his antipathy to the Romans, and his constant fear of falling into their hands. Of late years the most curious use to which rings have been applied is in the cure of rheumatic disorders; and many persons continue to wear them of gold or silver galvanised, and affirm their conviction of being benefited thereby.

ESCAPE OF FONTANE.

DURING the siege of Lyons, the poet Fontane had been shut up with his family in the midst of the city in ruins. Full of alarm for the fate of his young wife and infant, he resolved, at all risks, to escape if he could.

Having obtained a passport, a difficulty arose as to how he could carry away some plate and other valuable articles, then considered quite anti-republican. Among these valuables was a chalice, a present from a sovereign, on which an able artist had engraved the arms of the King of Sardinia. Fontane greatly dreaded lest this chalice should be discovered, as being a vessel used in the service of the church, and bearing the arms of a king, it would tell as a threefold proof of aristocracy. However, he decided on taking it, and hastened to the house of a friend, who had been a nursery gardener.

The poet then laid aside all his feudal ornaments, and set about exchanging his clothes, to give himself another appearance.

